And now all Addreſſes were made to Sir Robert Car, who was ſaid to be Favourite in Ordinary; no Suit nor Reward were manag'd but by his Means; his Hand diſtributed Favours, and his Hand reſtrain'd them; and the Lords could ſcarce have a Smile without his Approbation. And what greatly added to his encreaſing Power was the Death of the Earl of Dunbar, who was the King's old Servant, and the Cabinet of his Secret Councils; ſo that he ſolely took them into his Charge, together with the Office of Lord High-Treaſurer of Scotland, which Staff the other had left behind him: And tho' it could be no mighty Supporter, yet the Credit of it carry'd ſome Reputation into his own Country, where it was his Happineſs to be extoll'd, as well as in England. Then further to aggrandiſe this young Favourite, the King created him Baron of Brandſpech, and Viſcount Rocheſter, and ſhortly after Knight of the Garter, together with his Son Charles Duke of York, and the Earl of Arundel. Thus was he drawn up by the Beams of Majeſty, to ſhine with the greateſt Splendor, often conteſting with the Prince himſelf in his own Sphere. For the Prince, being of a high-born Spirit, and meeting with a young Competitor in his Father's Affections, of a ſhort and ſudden Growth, thought the Infection would increaſe too near him, and therefore he us'd all reaſonable Means to ſtifle and ſuppreſs it: And this Conteſt was gradually blown up by ſome Sparks of Love, as well as Emulation, being both amorous, warm and youthful, and by Accident fixing their Thoughts upon one Object, contracted to a third Perſon, in which the Viſcount gain'd the Superiority, but to his final Ruin.

He is a great Favourite.

A. D. 1612. Reg. 10.

The Caſe of the Lord Sanquir.

In the mean Time, while Fortune thus ſmil'd upon the Viſcount Rocheſter, it frown'd with as much Severity upon the Lord Sanquir, a Baron of the ſame Nation, and marry'd into a conſiderable Family in England. This Man too much valuing himſelf upon his unfortunate Skill in Fencing, undertook a Deſign to affront and diſparage a Fencing-Maſter in his own School, whoſe Name was John Turner; but he apprehenſive of his Deſign, preſs'd ſo rudely upon the Baron, that he puſh'd out one of his Eyes. The Baron being afterwards in the Court of France, where that King, freely entertaining him in Diſcourſe, ask'd him how he loſt his Eye; and underſtanding it was done by a Sword, without knowing the Circumſtances, he reply'd, Does the Man live that did it? The Queſtion from the Mouth of a King blew up new Fires of Revenge in the Baron's Breaſt; and ſeveral Years after, coming into England, he hir'd two of his Countrymen, Gray and Carliſle, to murther the Fencing-Maſter, which they did with a Caſe of Piſtols at his own Houſe in White-Friars. One of the Murtherers was apprehended upon the Borders of Scotland, the other in a Ship bound for Hamburg; and the Lord Sanquir having abſconded, and hearing that no leſs than a thouſand Pounds was offer'd for his Head, he reſign'd himſelf to the King's Mercy, by the Mediation of Dr. Abbot, the laſt Year, made now Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, to whom he preſented himſelf as an Object of Commiſeration. But no Interceſſion could prevail, and their Lives ſatisfy'd the Law, without allowing the Baron the Death of a Nobleman, who in a very penitent Manner ſuffer'd before the Gate of Weſtminſter-Hall.

His Execution.

Still the juvenile Favourite Rocheſter maintain'd his Ground againſt all Oppoſers; and among his chief Friends Sir Thomas Overbury was the Creature he moſt particularly honour'd with his Familiarity. This begot an Emulation between the two great Earls of Salisbury and Suffolk, who ſhould ingroſs him; each preſenting, proffering, and accumulating Favours upon Overbury's Relations. His Father was accordingly made a Judge in Wales, and he himſelf was offer'd a Place; but being naturally of a rough and inſolent Temper, and ſwell'd with being the Confident of ſuch a Favourite, whoſe Munificence could not be retail'd without him, he with a kind of Scorn neglected both their Friendſhips, and yet made uſe of them when he had Occaſion. Before that Time the politick Miniſter, the Earl of Salisbury, had made an Alliance with the Houſe of Suffolk, by marrying his eldeſt Son, the Lord Cranborn, to Katharine the eldeſt Daughter of that Family; and that Reſentments might not become Hereditary, he was a great Inſtrument in marrying the young Earl of Eſſex to the Lady Frances Howard, another of thoſe Siſters. The Earl of Eſſex was then but fourteen Years of Age, and the Lady thirteen when they were marry'd; and therefore he was ſent to Travel in Foreign Countries 'till Time might capacitate their Co-Habitation. The Lady in the mean Time was kept by her Mother, and educated in all the inchanting Pleaſures of the Court; and being a celebrated Beauty, every Tongue became an Orator at her Shrine, and the Prince himſelf ſent out many amorous Glances as the Ambaſſadors of his Inclinations. But the victorious Lady more favouring the increaſing Fortunes of the Viſcount Rocheſter, the moſt zealous of her Adorers, the Prince ſlighted her, as tho' he had offer'd his Addreſſes more to diſtract the other's Amours, than to purſue his own Deſires. Upon the Return of the Earl of Eſſex, the Counteſs, who was actuated by the moſt violent Reſolutions of Enjoyment, had a double Task to undergo; firſt to hinder her Husband from carnal Knowledge of her, and then to ſecure the Viſcount's Affections; for unlawful Love always produces the greateſt Jealouſies and Confuſion. In order to effect her impious Deſigns, we are aſſured ſhe had recourſe to infernal Arts, and conſulted one Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Phyſick's Widow, whom Prodigality had reduc'd to Poverty, and render'd her fit for any Miſchief; and ſhe introduc'd into their Conſultation one Forman an Aſtrologer, and a reputed Magician, who ſupply'd the Lady with Charms, Spells and philtrous Potions, both to debilitate the Ardour of the Husband, and to inflame the Paſſion of the Gallant. Theſe Things being manag'd and adminiſter'd according to unknown Arts, they gave this uneaſy Woman Aſſurances of extraordinary Effects. Her amorous Invitations that drew the Viſcount to admire her, were imputed to the Operation of thoſe Drugs he had taſted; and the very unnatural Comportment ſhe expreſs'd to her Husband was concluded by her to be the Effects of thoſe wonderful Potions and Powders adminiſter'd to him: So ready is the Imagination to take Impreſſion of thoſe Things we are willing to believe.

The King's Profuſeneſs.

The innocent Earl being made ſenſible of his own Miſfortunes, complain'd to her Father, in hopes of Relief; and through his Importunities and Threatnings, ſhe was perſuaded to retire into the Country to Chartley with her Husband; where her Diſappointments ſo enrag'd her Spleen, that ſhe could ſcarce afford common Civility to him, and brought her ſelf to a continu'd Melancholy and Sullenneſs. At length ſhe wrote to her wicked Correſpondents Forman and Mrs. Turner, That ſhe ſaw little Effect produc'd by all the Potions ſhe had given her Husband, for he ſeem'd more eager after her than ever, and ſhe was ſenſible that the Viſcount would never love her, if he knew her Husband enjoy'd her, whom with Difficulty ſhe had put off; but how long ſhe ſhould be able to reſiſt his Violence ſhe knew not; and therefore unleſs they deſign'd to ſee her the moſt miſerable Creature in the World, they ſhould ſpeedily aſſiſt her, and for their Reward they ſhould make their own Propoſals. And now all the abominable Tricks that could ariſe from Sorcery and Female Averſion being imploy'd to debilitate the Earl, he at length ſuffer'd her to ſteer her own Courſe; and the next Winter came up with her to London, where ſhe us'd all the Ornaments that Art and Nature could invent, to inflame the Viſcount's Affections; and her Abſence increaſing his Paſſion, they had many repeated Meetings. Several Perſons qualify'd for ſuch kind of Offices were imploy'd; and when Nature was enfeebled and exhauſted, new Spirits were purchas'd at the moſt extravagant Rates to rekindle their unlawful Fires. Thus the Viſcount triumph'd in his Conqueſts, but as to the Heighth of the King's Favours, the great Salisbury was ſtill an Obſtacle in his Way, ſo that he could not arrive to that Pitch of Grandeur, in his Time, that he afterwards obtain'd. One Thing among the reſt, in which he defeated or diſappointed him, was in Moderating the King's Bounty to him on this Occaſion: The King had given to Rocheſter five thouſand Pounds, which this Treaſurer thought too extravagant a Preſent, where there was ſo little Merit, therefore he laid the Mony in Silver upon Tables in his Gallery at Salisbury Houſe; and having invited the King to Dinner, he made this Room the Paſſage to his Entertainment. The King ſurpris'd at the Sight of theſe great Heaps of Mony, ask'd for what purpoſe it was aſſign'd; to whom the Earl reply'd, That he had Orders from his Majeſty to give ſo much to the Viſcount Rocheſter. The King who either careleſly thought five thouſand Pounds was no more than the Name of ſo much in Scotland, or ſubtlely finding the Treaſurer's Meaning, ſaid, It was too much for one Man, and made him be contented with leſs than half of the Sum. But the King was generally profuſe to his Favourites; particularly one Day being in his Gallery at Whitehall, with only Sir Henry Rich a young ingenious Knight, and James Maxwell, one of his Bed-Chamber, ſome Porters paſs'd by with three thouſand Pounds going to the Privy-Purſe: Sir Henry whiſpering Maxwell, the King ask'd what he ſaid; and being told he wiſh'd for ſuch a Sum, he immediately order'd the Porters to carry it to his Lodgings, with this Expreſſion, You think you have a great Reward; but I am more delighted in giving you the Mony, than you in receiving it.

The Body of the Queen of the Scots remov'd to Weſtminſter.

Sir Robert Sherley's Travels.

And now the King caſt his Thoughts towards Peterborough, where the Body of his unfortunate Mother lay, which he caus'd to be tranſlated to a Magnificent Tomb at Weſtminſter; where many ſolemn Ceremonies were perform'd, to pay the laſt Tribute to her Memory. About the ſame Time the King, in ſpecial Favour for the preſent Plantation of Engliſh Colonies in Virginia, granted a Lottery to be held at the Weſt-End of St. Paul's; of which one Thomas Sharplys, a Taylor of London, had the chief Prize, amounting to four thouſand Crowns in fair Plate. This Year was alſo obſervable for the Arrival of Sir Robert Sherley, third Son to Sir Thomas Sherley of Suſſex, who for ſixteen Years had betaken himſelf to Travel, and had ſerv'd ſeveral Chriſtian Princes for the Space of five Years, but chiefly Rodolphus the Emperor, who for his Services made him an Earl of the Empire. He afterwards travell'd into Perſia, and ſerv'd that Emperor ten Years, who made him General of the Artillery, and had ſo great an Eſteem for his Perſon, that he gave him the Lady Tereſia in Marriage, whoſe Siſter was one of the Queens of Perſia; After which, the Perſian imploy'd him to ſeveral Princes of Europe; and ſent him in a ſpecial Embaſſy to King James in England, to whom he deliver'd his Letters, and ſhew'd his Commiſſion; all which teſtify'd the Perſian's great Love and Affection to his Majeſty, with voluntary Offers of free Commerce to all his Subjects throughout the Perſian Dominions. After a Year's Stay in England, in which Time his Lady was deliver'd of a Son, to whom the Queen was God-Mother, and Prince Henry God-Father, he left the Child in this Kingdom, and then with his Lady took Shipping for Perſia.

The Arrival of Frederick Prince Palatine.

The Death of Prince Henry.

Cenſures upon it.

It was in the tenth Year of King James's Reign, and the ſixteenth of October, when the illuſtrious Prince Frederick, Count Palatine of the Rhine, with whom a Treaty of Marriage had been made with the King's Daughter Elizabeth, arriv'd at Graveſend; to whom the Duke of Lenox and ſeveral other Lords were ſent by his Majeſty, who conducted him to Whitehall, and from thence into the great Banqueting-Houſe; where the King, the Queen, the Prince, and the Lady her ſelf, entertain'd him after the moſt obliging Manner, and then by Barge conducted him to Eſſex Houſe appointed for his Reception. It was many Years ſince any King's Daughter had been marry'd in England; which now occurring, and to ſo worthy a Prince, was a juſt Cauſe of Triumph and Rejoycing: But according to the frequent Changes of human Happineſs, Joy was no ſooner ſet forth, but was purſu'd by an unexpreſſible Sorrow; firſt by the Sickneſs, and then the Death of that great Delight and Hopes of the Nation, Prince Henry, who on the ſixth Day of November was ſnatch'd away at the Age of eighteen Years, eight Months and ſeventeen Days. Several Paſſages are related of this excellent Prince that redound to his Honour; particularly once when he was Hunting the Stag, it happen'd that the Game was kill'd, and his Sport ſpoil'd by a Butcher's Dog; at which the Company endeavour'd to incenſe him againſt the Butcher, and told him, That if his Father had been thus interrupted, he would have ſworn ſo that no Man could have endur'd it: Away, reply'd the Prince, all the Diverſion in the World is not worth one Oath. At another Time, when the French Ambaſſador, upon taking his Leave, ask'd him, What Service he would command him to his Maſter, the Prince bad him tell his Maſter What he was doing, being then toſſing a Pike. The World is always ready to attribute the Deaths of beloved Princes to unfair Practices, and it became the general Rumour of that Time, that the Prince was poiſon'd. We dare not determine that nice Matter, yet the Preſumptions ſeem too ſtrong to be bury'd in Silence; eſpecially if we conſider the violent Conteſts between him and Rocheſter, and the wicked Practices of that implacable Man. For the Prince being an open-hearted Man, and reſenting every Injury done to his Nation, had once declar'd, That if ever he was King, he would not leave one of that Family unpuniſh'd; and therefore he and the Howards could not think themſelves ſecure, 'till he had paid his Debt to Nature; and ſo the manner of his Death was paſs'd over by a Certificate from ſome Court Phyſicians, 'That his Liver was paler than 'ordinary, his Gall without any Choler in it, his Spleen, 'Midriff and Lungs were very black, and his Stomach in 'no Part offended;' as if no Poiſon could produce ſuch Effects. On the ſeventh of December he was ſolemnly carried on a Herſe to Weſtminſter, where the Pomp of his Funeral was fully compleated by the Tears and Lamentations of the People.

A. D. 1613. Reg. 11.

Prince Frederick marry'd to the King's Daughter Elizabeth.

But all Tears were ſoon dry'd up at Court, where grand Preparations were making for the Solemnities of a Chriſtmas, and a Marrriage between the Prince Palatine and the excellent Lady Elizabeth. In order to the latter, on the ſeventh of February, the Prince was firſt inſtall'd Knight of the Garter at Windſor, together with the Deputy of Grave Maurice of Naſſaw. And on Shrove-Sunday, and St. Valentine's Day, the much deſired Marriage was ſolemniz'd after an extraordinary Manner in the Chappel at Whitehall. The beautiful Bride was publickly led by two Batchellors, her Brother Prince Charles, and the Earl of Northampton, Lord Privy-Seal; ſhe being glorioufly adorn'd in White, having a reſplendent Crown of Gold upon her Head, her Hair diſhevel'd down her Back, nobly ſhining with Jewels like a Conſtellation, and her Train ſupported by twelve young Ladies, finely attir'd with all the Emblems of Innocence. The King himſelf gave her in Marriage, the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury perform'd the Office, and the Biſhop of Bath and Wells preach'd the Nuptial Sermon; during which Time, ſome peculiar Coruſcations and Lightnings of Joy appear'd in her Countenance, which ſome thought to be Preſages of her future Misfortunes. This Marriage was celebrated the firſt Night with a magnificent Maſque of the chief of the Nobility, both Lords and Ladies; the ſecond Night with another of the Gentlemen of the Middle-Temple and Lincolns-Inn; and the third Night with another as remarkable preſented by the Gentlemen of the Inner-Temple and Grays-Inn: And after this the Lord Mayor and Aldermen preſented the fair Bride with a Chain of Oriental Pearl, valu'd at two thouſand Pounds. Now when all Things had been perform'd for the Honour of this Marriage, which either Love and Obſervance could invent, or Art and Magnificence could effect, on the tenth of April the illuſtrious Couple took leave of the King and Queen at Rocheſter; and there taking Shipping, they arriv'd not long after at Fluſhing: From whence the Earl of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viſcount Liſle, and the Lord Harrington waited upon them to their capital City of Heidelberg; being receiv'd in all Places as they paſs'd with great Pomp and State. On the fourteenth of June the Engliſh Lords return'd home; only the Lord Harrington dy'd by the Way at Worms, whoſe Corps was brought over, and interr'd in England. A Gentleman much lamented in his own Perſon, but much more in that of his admirable Son, whoſe Deceaſe ſhortly after put a Period to that noble Family.

They both retire to Germany.

The Earl of Saliſbury's Death.

Before this Time dy'd that famous Stateſman, the Earl of Saliſbury, and Lord Treaſurer of England; a Perſon of admirable Abilities, and one of whom Oſborn confeſſes, that with all his Faults, he was a Man of incomparable Prudence, who coming ſo near ſuch an unadviſed Scatterer as King James, might have much more inrich'd his Family, had he not look'd upon low Things with Contempt; leaving much to the Gleaning of his Servants, of whom many were afterwards advanc'd. He further inſinuates, 'That this Earl was the firſt ill Treaſurer, and the 'laſt good one ſince Queen Elizabeth's Reign;' the laſt Part of which Cenſure might naturally ariſe from the numerous and ſudden Changes in this high Office. For within this Reign, and the Compaſs of a very few Years, the Earl of Saliſbury was ſucceeded by five ſeveral Treaſurers: Firſt, the Earl of Suffolk, who held the Office longeſt, and was diſcharg'd in a great Meaſure for the Miſmanagement of his Lady: Secondly, Sir Henry Montague, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Mancheſter, and within leſs than a Year diſcharged: Thirdly, Sir Lyonel Cranfield, who was made Earl of Middleſex, and then not only thrown out, but alſo fin'd fifty thouſand Pounds: Fourthly, Sir James Lee, taken from the King's Bench, and made Earl of Marlborough, who thought fit to reſign his Place in a ſhort Time: And laſtly, Sir Richard Weſton, from Chancellor of the Exchequer was made Lord Treaſurer, and ſhortly after Earl of Portland.

The great Changes in the Treaſury.

Upon the Death of the Earl of Saliſbury, the aſpiring Rocheſter without Controul aſſum'd the whole Adminiſtration of the Government, executed the Place of Principal Secretary, receiv'd Pacquets and diſpatch'd Anſwers, without the Knowledge of the King or Council, and all done by the Privity, if not Aſſiſtance, of his Confident Sir Thomas Overbury. But when that Gentleman underſtood that Rocheſter deſign'd to marry the Lady Eſſex, he dealt freely and honeſtly with him, declaring to him, That nothing could be more deſtructive to both their growing Hopes, than to lay a Foundation upon ſo much Injuſtice as to marry another Man's Wife, while her Husband was living; and therefore paſſionately deſir'd him, To fix his Thoughts upon a more honourable Object, and not upon one, whoſe Diſloyalty to her Husband was branded with perpetual Infamy. This rough Advice found no Reception in the debauch'd Mind of the Viſcount, who being faſcinated with the Charms of his amorous Miſtreſs, did not only eſtrange himſelf from the Friendſhip of Overbury, but both denounc'd Enmity, and alſo excited the Fury of the Counteſs againſt him: and ſhe fir'd with the moſt implacable Reſentments, muſtring up all the Paſſion and Envy that a Female Malice could invent, never left him 'till ſhe had diſcharg'd all the Vollies of her Rage upon him. She importun'd the Earl of Northampton her Uncle, to vindicate the Honour of their Family; and he joining with the Viſcount, they agreed to take away Overbury's Life by Poiſon; but that not being eaſy to be done in a publick Way, they contriv'd to exaſperate the King againſt him, and procure him to be impriſon'd, that they might with greater Privacy effect his Ruin. The King about this Time deſigning to ſend an Ambaſſador into Flanders to the Arch-Duke, the Viſcount treacherouſly recommended Sir Thomas Overbury to him for that Service; and dealing on both Sides, he us'd all Methods to diſſwade him from undertaking the Imployment, as well knowing that his Refuſal would highly diſoblige the King. Overbury was not ſo little a Courtier, or ſo void of Reaſon, as not to ſee the Danger of diſobeying the King's Commands; therefore the Viſcount promis'd him both to mollifie the King's Diſpleaſure, and to procure him better Preferment; while on the other Side he ſo aggravated his Offence in Refuſing his Obedience, and ſo incens'd the King, that the poor Gentleman was without Hearing ſent to the Tower for Contempt. Then to compleat his ſtrange Tragedy, Sir William Wade Lieutenant of the Tower was diſplac'd, and Sir Jervaſe Elways put into his Room.

Overbury checks him.

For which his Life is threatned.

He is thrown into the Tower.

This firſt Point being gain'd, the Counteſs, like another Alecto, drove on furiouſly with two Wheels, which ran over all Impediments; the one was to procure a Divorce between her and her Husband, that ſhe might marry the Viſcount; and the other was to remove Sir Thomas Overbury, who had laid ſuch a Stain upon her Honour, as nothing but his Blood could expiate. For theſe ſhe had ſeveral Inſtruments and Agents, particularly the Earl of Northampton, who reſenting his Niece's Grievances, acquainted the King with her Virgin Modeſty, how unwilling ſhe was to divulge her Husband's Infirmities, and how long ſhe had been marry'd without enjoying the Rights of a Wife; that the Earl's Inability muſt needs produce an unnatural Conjunction, ſuch as neither Law nor Reaſon could excuſe; and that there was an entire Affection between the Viſcount and her ſelf, which ought to be encourag'd, as more ſuitable to Equity and Nature. This was ſeconded by the Viſcount's humble Submiſſions to the King's great Wiſdom, who he acknowledg'd had not only rais'd him to his preſent Condition, but might yet make him more happy, by uniting him to a Lady of ſo much Honour and Virtue. The King, who abundantly delighted to compleat the Happineſs of thoſe he lov'd, immediately granted a Commiſſion under the Broad Seal, to ſeveral Biſhops and others, to try the whole Cauſe, who accordingly made their Appearance. But before they proceeded any further, they impanell'd a Jury of twelve diſcreet Matrons to ſearch the Counteſs, whether ſhe was a Maid or not, as ſhe pretended to be in her written Allegations, for if that prov'd true, they might fix upon a Nullity, and ſo ſeparate them for the Honour of her Virginity. The Counteſs, under a Pretence of Modeſty and Shame to undergo ſuch an Examination, would not expoſe her Face to the Light, but procur'd leave of the Court to appear in a Veil before the Matrons; by which means ſhe had an Opportunity, according to common Report, to ſend in a young Girl in her Place, who in the Opinion of the Jury paſs'd for a real Virgin. Then Articles being drawn up in Form, the good Earl, willing to be freed from ſo horrid a Plague, confeſs'd that he had ſeveral Times attempted to enjoy her, but he never did, and believ'd he never ſhould. Upon theſe Grounds the Judges proceeded to a formal Sentence of Divorce and Separation, in ſuch Terms as are more fit to be tranſcrib'd by Perſons of any Profeſſion than my own. The ſcandalous Reports that had flown about concerning this Lady, caus'd ſome worthy Men to decline the Buſineſs, particularly the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury and Biſhop of London refus'd to appear, tho' they were nominated in the Commiſſion; and what is ſaid in Favour of the reſt of the Judges, is, That they might not know that another Female was impos'd upon the Jury inſtead of the Lady Eſſex.

They are parted by Law.

While one great Engine was working at Lambeth, the other had its Motion in the Tower, puſh'd forwards by the Lady Eſſex againſt the unfortunate Sir Thomas Overbury; and two of her Agents Forman and Greſham being dead, ſhe rely'd wholly upon the Aſſiſtance of Mrs. Turner, who procur'd one Weſton, formerly her Husband's Servant, and not unskill'd in the Art of Poiſoning, to be the Inſtrument to effect their impious Purpoſes. The Lady alſo procur'd Sir Thomas Munſon to recommend him to Sir Jervaſe Elwayes, and he to Sir Thomas Overbury to be his Attendant; by whoſe means, with the Aſſiſtance of one Franklin, and the Connivance of the Lieutenant, ſeveral Potions were adminiſter'd to conſume Nature inſenſibly. But theſe were not thought quick enough to ſatiate that Malice, that was as active as ſubtle; therefore ſtronger Ingredients were infus'd, and given him in his Broths, his Meats and his Tarts; and his very Salt was uſually mixt with White-Mercury. Thus was the poor abandon'd Gentleman daily rack'd and tortur'd with a horrid Diſtemper; but being young and of a ſtrong Conſtitution, was able to ſtruggle a long Time with theſe corroding Tormentors: But his Body being not always able to bear ſuch unnatural Preſſures, he fell extreamly ſick; and having no Friend that could or durſt viſit him, none to ſupplicate but the mercileſs Cauſers of his Miſery, he, without Knowledge of his Diſtemper, languiſh'd both in Body and Mind, after an unheard-of Manner.

Poiſon often given to Overbury in the Tower.

In the mean Time the Counteſs being freed from her Husband triumph'd and ſhin'd above all the Court Ladies, and became admir'd by the King, as well as lov'd by Rocheſter; who to deſerve ſo valuable a Lady was now created Earl of Somerſet; and all the ſplendid Equipage, and magnificent Preparations, that could fill a Court with Delight, or the People with Wonder, were not wanting for the Marriage. On the twenty ſixth Day of December the new Earl and Counteſs were marry'd at Whitehall, in the Preſence of the King, Queen and Prince, and a great Confluence of the Biſhops and Temporal Nobility. The Biſhop ſhop of Bath and Wells marry'd them, and the Dean of Weſtminſter preach'd the Nuptial Sermon, and that Night was concluded with a glorious Maſque of Lords and Ladies, which a few Nights after was much exceeded by another of the Prince's Gentlemen, to the extraordinary Satiſfaction of the King, who cauſ'd it to be acted a ſecond Time, upon the third Day of January. But Whitehall was too narrow to contain the Triumphs for this Marriage which were extended into the City; for on the next Day, the happy Pair, accompany'd by the Duke of Lenox, the Lord-Privy-Seal, the Lord Chamberlain, the Earls of Worceſter, Pembroke and Montgomery, with a numerous Train of Nobility and Gentry, were invited to a Feaſt in the City at Merchant-Tailor's-Hall; where the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen entertain'd them with extraordinary Pomp and Formality, and after the Treat with a Waſſaile, two Maſques, a Play and a Ball; and after all, the whole Company were invited to a magnificent Banquet, which continu'd 'till three in the Morning. Before theſe Pleaſures were well digeſted, upon Twelfth-Day the Gentlemen of Grays-Inn invited the Bride and Bridegroom to a ſolemn Maſque; which concluded all the triumphal Gaities of this remarkable Marriage.

A. D. 1614. Reg. 12.

The Pomp of the Nuptials.

The Noiſe of theſe Rejoycings reſounding in the moſt ſecret Receſſes, brought the News to Sir Thomas Overbury, a poor Relief to a Man in Miſery, who was conſcious to himſelf, that all his Sufferings proceeded from his Oppoſition to what was now fully ſurmounted; ſo that in his dark Confinement he could not ſee the leaſt Glimmerings of Liberty, when he conſider'd the implacable Nature of the Woman. But yet preſuming upon the former Friendſhip between the Earl of Somerſet and himſelf, he wrote to him in the midſt of his Glory, to let him know his deplorable Condition, and how vaſtly his Health was impair'd, which he imputed to his Recluſeneſs and want of Air; humbly imploring his Aſſiſtance, that he might no longer languiſh under the Burden of his intollerable Infirmities. Somerſet not willing to have him exclaim, made Anſwer, That the King was now full of great Buſineſs, but he would take the firſt Opportunity to move him for his Relief, and make his great Indiſpoſition a ground for the King's Mercy; including in the Letter a White Powder, which he deſired him to take; aſſuring him, That tho' it made him a little ſick at firſt, it would do him much good in the End. The poor abus'd Gentleman took his Powder, which having a poiſonous Quality, added to his Affliction; yet it was not ſtrong enough to compleat the Deſign. The Lieutenant of the Tower daily liſten'd to his Complaints with all the outward Marks of Commiſeration, but always declar'd what he ſaid to the Authors of his Calamities; ſo that his very Words were rack'd, as well as his Body tormented. Thus he continu'd in this diſmal Place above four Months, languiſhing under unheard-of Pains; 'till his Enemies being more impatient that he endur'd ſo long, than that he ſuffer'd ſo much, they finiſh'd their Work by an impoiſon'd Glyſter compounded by Franklin, which in a few Days ended his miſerable Life. Here we may ſee the unhappy Fate, and precarious Fame of Princes govern'd by Minions and Favourites; and how many Ways the King's Name was us'd and abus'd in perpetrating this execrable Fact: Firſt in procuring the King to ſend Sir Thomas on an Embaſſy into Flanders; Secondly in committing him to the Tower for his Refuſal; Thirdly, in continuing a cloſe Priſoner from all Relations and Servants, a Practice never known for a bare Contempt; and laſtly in practiſing his Death, when he was under the King's immediate Protection.

Overbury in great Diſtreſs.

His Death by Poiſon.

The Earl of Northampton, who was a great Actor in this Tragical Event, inhumanly endeavour'd to kill him a ſecond Time by ruining his Fame, and raiſing a Report, 'That he dy'd of the Pox, and had prodigious Sores and Ulcers in his Body, that produc'd ſuch Putrefaction, that the People, unable to indure the noiſome Smell, were forc'd to throw him in a looſe Sheet into a Coffin, and bury him privately on Tower-Hill; concluding in a Letter to the Earl of Somerſet, That God was gracious in cutting off evil Inſtruments before their Time;' tho' he little imagin'd that he was then pronouncing his own Sentence and Doom. For he being one of the principal Miniſters of State, and a Papiſt in Reality, tho' a Proteſtant by Profeſſion, he did many Kindneſſes to the Roman Catholicks contrary to Law; and a Letter of his being intercepted, that was directed to Cardinal Bellarmine, diſcover'd both his Religion and his Intentions: Which Things being firſt whiſper'd, then urg'd againſt him, they touch'd him to the Heart; ſo that he ſuddenly retir'd, diſpos'd of his Eſtate, and dy'd. He had a capacious Mind aiming at great Things, which he was the better able to effect by living a Batchelor to an old Age, being always attended with Gentlemen of Quality, to whom he was very bountiful. Leaving no Iſſue to propagate his Name, he built a noble Houſe by Charing-Croſs to continue it, by him call'd Suffolk-Houſe, and ſince Northumberland-Houſe. His contriving Overbury's Death was yet a Secret, and made no Noiſe againſt him; but when it broke out, Fame loaded his Memory with all the Blackneſs that Infamy and Odium could produce.

The Earl of Northampton's Death.

Still the great Favourite, the Earl of Somerſet, and his Buſineſs, met with no Stop nor Interruption, 'till by Degrees he perceiv'd he muſt a little alter his Biaſs, or find ſome new Ways to bring in Mony; for the Revenues of the Crown were not ſufficient to maintain ſuch vaſt Expences, occaſion'd by his Riot, tho' he had all the Earl of Weſtmorland's Lands at his Marriage and Creation added to his Earldom. Therefore a new Project was advanc'd, and now effected, which the Earl of Salisbury had formerly promoted, upon the Occaſion of new Colonies and Plantations to be eſtabliſh'd at London-Derry and Colerain in Ireland, of which Alderman Cockain was the firſt Governor. In order to promote theſe and the like Improvements, King James inſtituted a new Order of Knights, call'd Baronets, which were to be Hereditary, and to take Place next to Barons younger Sons, and appointed certain Laws to make them capable of being admitted: Firſt that they ſhould maintain thirty Foot Soldiers in Ireland for three Years, at the Rate of eight Pence a Day; and to pay down a whole Year's Wages at the paſſing of their Patent, the whole amounting to a thouſand Pound for their Honour: That they ſhould be Gentlemen of Blood of Three Deſcents; and laſtly ſhould have Land of Inheritance in Poſſeſſion, or immediate Reverſion, to the Value of a thouſand Pounds a Year. Then to keep the Order from ſwarming, it was limited to the Number of two hundred, and as the Iſſue ſhould fail, the Order to ceaſe; of theſe Sir Nicholas Bacon in the County of Suffolk was the firſt. Sir Richard Baker obſerves, That he who examines how well the Inſtitution and the Order has been obſerv'd, will find it to be here as it was in the Order of St. Michael in France, into which at firſt none were admitted but Princes and eminent Perſons, but afterwards all Sorts of Men without Diſtinction; which made it a Queſtion, Whether the Dignity of the Order did more grace the Perſons, or the Meanneſs of the Perſons diſgrace the Order; and when the Laws of an Inſtitution are not in ſome Meaſure obſerv'd, it ſeems to make a Nullity in the Collation.

The firſt Inſtitution of Baronets.

Notwithſtanding theſe, and other Projects of raiſing the Value of the Gold Coin, the King's Expences prov'd too large for his Incomes and Revenues; therefore after four Years Intermiſſion, he reſolv'd to have Recourſe to a Parliament, which was ſummon'd to meet on the fifth of April. There were ſeveral about the Court, preſuming to have Friends in every County and Borough, undertook to make Elections of ſuch Members for Knights and Burgeſſes, as ſhould ſolely comply with the King's Deſires; of whom Somerſet was the Head and Chief: But this prov'd a meer Embrio, and became abortive. For the Parliament meeting according to their Summons, when they were excited to give Money in Conſideration of the King's marrying his Daughter, and his unuſual Entertainments, with other Expences, they inſtead of contributing to the King's Wants, freely laid open his Waſtes, eſpecially thoſe made to the Scots, 'With whom they deſir'd a Share of his Favour; alſo beſeeching his Majeſty to ſtem the Current of the future Acceſs of that Nation to his Preſence and Bounty. They likewiſe enquir'd into the Cauſes of the unexpected Encreaſe of Popiſh Recuſants ſince the Gun-Powder Plot, the Deteſtation of which, they thought, ſhould have utterly extinguiſh'd the whole Party; and this they found was owing to his Majeſty's Admiſſion of Popiſh Nobility into his Councils; his Silencing of many watchful and diligent Miniſters; the ſeveral Treaties he had made, not only for the Marriage of the deceaſed Prince Henry, but for the preſent Prince Charles, with the Daughters of Popiſh Princes; all which diſheartned the Proteſtant, and incourag'd the Recuſant.' Theſe, and other Miſcarriages in the Government being freely remonſtrated, the King, without receiving any Advantage, or paſſing any Act, put a ſtop to all, and diſſolv'd the Parliament on the ſeventh Day of June. After which he committed ſeveral of the moſt tumultuous Members of the Commons to the Tower and other Priſons, without Bail or Main-prize. And laſtly he proceeded to the moſt uneaſie of all Aids in England, a Benevolence upon the Subject; where thoſe that did not give their Mony, were oblig'd to give their Names: So that what was in its Nature and Eſſence a free Gift, was judg'd in its Effect and Conſequence, a heavy Impoſition.

The ſecond Parliament in this Reign.

It is diſſolv'd.

In the ſame Year, and the Month of July, Chriſtian King of Denmark, out of a great Love to his Siſter and King James, came a ſecond Time into England; but being ſecure of himſelf, he travell'd privately, and with a ſmall Retinue, ſo that he unexpectedly enter'd Somerſet-Houſe, where where the Queen reſided, before the Nation had any Knowledge of his Arrival. But King James being then in his Progreſs in Bedfordſhire, upon the News of it, immediately return'd back; and after he had entertain'd him fourteen Days with Hunting, Hawking, Running at the Ring, Bear-Baiting, Plays, Fire-Works, and Fencings, on the firſt of Auguſt, Prince Charles brought him aboard his Ship, where he took his laſt Leave and return'd home. Thus theſe two Kings met with a Happineſs, rare among Princes, of freely ſeeing and converſing with each other, without any Marks of Danger or Jealouſie.

Reg. 13.

VI. The King having now reign'd above twelve Years in England, by turning the Stream of his Bounty into particular Channels, gave more and more Occaſion to uneaſie People to ſhew their Diſguſts and Reſentments; for he had generally the Misfortune, incident to many Princes, to be too much govern'd by Favourites. The Earl of Somerſet, lately made Lord-Chamberlain, now like a mighty Coloſs ſtood the Fury of all the Tempeſts rais'd againſt him, making thoſe who carry'd the greateſt Sail to ſtrike and come under him; nor would he ſuffer any Place in Court, or Dignity in State, to be conferr'd on any, which was not ſweeten'd with his Smile that gave it, or their Bounty that enjoy'd it. This Pride and Avarice, join'd to his other Miſcarriages, caus'd ſuch a Number of Underminers, that he ſoon found he had but a tottering Foundation, with no other Support but the King's Favour, which by Providence and inferior Accidents was gradually removed; making a Way towards the Vengeance due to the Blood of Sir Thomas Overbury.

The Riſe of George Villers.

For about this Time the King began to caſt his Eye upon a new and brighter Object, a young Gentleman nam'd George Villers, a younger Son to Sir George Villers of Brookesby in Leiceſterſhire by his ſecond Lady of the Family of the Beaumonts. This promiſing Youth being left by his Father with a ſmall Fortune, his Mother took an extraordinary Care in his Education; and having a beautiful Perſon and a graceful Deportment, to compleat his Accompliſhments ſhe ſent him into France, where he ſpent two or three Years in attaining the Language, and perfecting himſelf in the Exerciſes of Riding and Dancing, which laſt was his Maſter-piece: And thus taught and qualify'd, and gloriouſly attir'd, at the Age of twenty one Years, he made his Appearance in the Court of England, after he had been well acquainted with the Nature and Cuſtoms of that of France. The Lord Clarendon obſerves, that King James, of all wiſe Men living, was the moſt delighted and taken with handſome Perſons and fine Cloaths; ſo that he was ſoon captivated with this pleaſing Object, firſt affording him his Smiles, and making him his Cup-Bearer, and then bringing him nearer by ſeveral Steps, leſt he ſhould too much expoſe him to the Malice of a jealous Competitor. The Courtiers ſoon perceiving the King's Inclinations, began to adore this Riſing Star, and the more becauſe they hated Somerſet, and knew that the Riſe of one Favourite would be the Ruin of the other; for which Reaſon alſo, the Queen her ſelf, tho' ſhe expreſs'd great Fears of Villers's future Power, conſented to join in his Advancement, to ſuppreſs the exorbitant Authority of the other. He was Cup-Bearer but a few Weeks before he mounted higher, and being Knighted, without any other Qualification he was made Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and then Knight of the Order of the Garter; and in a ſhort Time, conſidering the Vaſtneſs of the Aſcent, he was made a Baron, a Viſcount, an Earl, and a Marqueſs, and became Lord High-Admiral of England, Lord Warden of the Cinque-Ports, Maſter of the Horſe, and entirely diſpos'd of all the Favours of the King, in conferring all the Honours and Offices of three Kingdoms without a Rival.

His Greatneſs.

Somerſet declines.

The Beginnings of theſe accumulated Graces became very formidable to the Earl of Somerſet, who as he began to decline, became more ſenſible of the Terrors ariſing from the innocent Blood of Overbury; therefore was as active to preſerve himſelf, as his Enemies were to ruin him. Tho' nothing at preſent was laid to his Charge but the imbezelling ſome of the King's Jewels, yet finding himſelf in a tottering Condition, he threw himſelf at the King's Feet, acknowledging the great Truſt his Majeſty had repos'd in him, and the mighty publick Weight lying upon him, which through Youth and Ignorance might make him ſlip into ſome Miſcarriages; therefore he humbly beſought his Majeſty to grant him a general Pardon for what was paſs'd, that he might not be expos'd to the Malice of thoſe who would make the worſt Interpretation of all his Actions. The King who had rais'd this fair Edifice, being unwilling to have it quite deſtroy'd, gave Order for the drawing up a general Pardon in ſo ample and full a Manner, that it might rather exceed than take riſe from any former Precedent; which was immediately ſent to the Broad-Seal. But the Queen having Intelligence of this, and uſing her Power with the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, put a ſtop to the Seal 'till the King ſhould come to Town, who was then on his Progreſs in the Weſt. And now what had been privately murmur'd in Corners, openly reſounded in the Streets; for the Apothecary's Boy that gave Overbury the Gliſter, falling ſick at Fluſhing, reveal'd the whole Practice, of which Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, gave a full Relation by his Correſpondent; and a ſmall Breach being thus made, the Earl had Enemies enough to ruſh in and overwhelm him. The King being inform'd of theſe Tranſactions, and ſtruck with Horror at the Relation, he ſent for the Judges, and gave them ſtrict Charge to examine the Matter with the utmoſt Severity, making Imprecations againſt them and their Families if they did not endeavour to diſcover it; and if he ſpar'd any that was guilty, he wiſh'd God's Curſe might light upon him and his Poſterity; ſo zealous the King appear'd in the Proſecution of this black Affair. Upon this he repair'd to Royſton, and took Somerſet along with him, whoſe Ears were now continually tormented with freſh Reports and Diſcoveries; but he ſtill thought himſelf too firm in the King's Favour to be remov'd. Therefore when the Lord Chief-Juſtice Cook ſent for him, he went to the King with an open Complaint, reputing it an extraordinary Preſumption; but the King made Anſwer, Thou muſt go then, for if Cook ſends for me I muſt go too. Others ſay that when he came to take his Leave of the King, his Majeſty embraced and kiſs'd him often, urging him to haſten his Return, and ſhewing an extream Concern to be without his Company; but as ſoon as he was gone, ſaid with a Smile, I ſhall never ſee thy Face again. However it was, his Counteſs was apprehended before his Arrival at London, and committed to Cuſtody in Black-Friars; and as ſoon as he came he was ſeiz'd, and committed to the Charge of Dr. Mountain, Dean of Weſtminſter; and then they proceeded without Interruption, try'd, convicted, and condemn'd all the Offenders.

He and his Counteſs are impriſon'd for Over-bury's Murther.

Weſton was the firſt Man examin'd and try'd, who ſtood very ſtiff and obſtinate, 'till the Biſhop of London on one ſide, and the Lord Cook on the other, ſo effectually managed him, that he laid open the whole Conſpiracy; and being at the Gallows allur'd with Promiſes to deny his former Confeſſion, his Mind being prepar'd for Death, he reſiſted the Temptation, and penitentially ſeal'd the Truth of it with his laſt Breath; and Hollis, Wentworth, and Lumſden, who had violently urg'd him to pervert Juſtice, were afterwards fin'd and impriſon'd. Mrs. Turner follow'd next, a notorious Example of Pride and Laſciviouſneſs, who now became ſenſible of the Follies and Impieties of her paſt Life. Sir Jervaſe Ellways, Lieutenant of the Tower, was the third, who ſuffer'd on Tower-Hill, and was pity'd more than the reſt, being ſeduc'd by the Earl of Northampton to be a Spectator, rather than an Actor in this bloody Tragedy; which Connivance was too Criminal to be vindicated. At his Death he left two uſeful Sentences for human Inſtruction: The firſt, Not to vow any thing to God, but to perform it; the ſecond, Not to take too great Delight in a Pen; for one began, and the other perfected his Ruin. The fourth that fell by the Hand of Juſtice was Franklin, a Man whoſe ſordid Behaviour at his Death agreeing with his pernicious Life, his Memory deſerves no further Notice.

Somerſet and his Lady condemned and pardon'd.

Their Exits.

After the Execution of theſe inferior Criminals, the primary Murtherers, the Earl of Somerſet and his Counteſs, were ſolemnly arraign'd before their Peers; where all the ſcandalous Letters between the Lady and Forman were read in open Court, and the Wax and Brazen-Poppets were publickly expos'd to diſplay the Folly, as well as the Malignity of her Actions. But the Earl and her ſelf being both condemn'd to die, found the King's Mercy, notwithſtanding his former Imprecation, and after ſome Time of Impriſonment in the Tower were ſet at Liberty, and liv'd in private and obſcure Condition: Manifeſting, That no Content or Happineſs can be truly eſtabliſh'd, but on the ſolid Foundation of Juſtice. For that Love that caus'd them to break through all Reaſon and Oppoſition, either on her Side declining towards ſome new Object, as was commonly reported; or on his inclining to Reluctancy towards the old, became at length ſo languid, that it quite pin'd away, and they liv'd long after in the ſame Houſe as Strangers to each other. Her Death happen'd firſt, having all reaſonable Marks of the Vengeance of Heaven, being accompany'd with ſuch loathſome and prodigious Circumſtances, as are not fit to be mention'd, only that they were directly oppoſite to all the fatal Charms of her former Beauty that ever could produce Love or Deſire. The Earl's Death was obſcure, without Fame, and without Poſterity; of whom we ſhall ſay no more, but that he had ſeveral commendable Qualities, and publick Affections, 'till they were all ſwallow'd up in this Gulf of Beauty, which plung'd him into theſe dangerous Contrivances. Sir Thomas Monſon, another of the Counteſs's Agents, had paſs'd one Day's Tryal at Guild-Hall; but the Lord Chief-

Juſtice Cook, in his Rhetorical Flouriſhes at his Arraignment, dropp'd ſome Expreſſions, as if he could diſcover more than the Death of a private Perſon; intimating, tho' remotely, That Overbury's untimely Death had ſomething in it of Divine Retaliation, as if he had been guilty of the ſame Crime againſt Prince Henry; bleſſing himſelf with Admiration at the Horror of ſuch Actions. In which he flew to ſo high a Strain, that he was taken down by a Court Lure, Sir Thomas Monſon's Tryal laid aſide, and he ſoon after ſet at Libery, and the Judge was humbled ever after. This ſudden ſtopping of Monſon's Tryal fill'd Men's Minds with ſtrange Imaginations; and the Lady Arabella dying about this Time in the Tower rais'd new Apprehenſions and Suſpicions, that ſhe dy'd no natural Death; ſo naturally does one evil Action introduce the Belief of another. The Lady was Daughter to Charles Stuart, younger Brother to the Father of King James by Elizabeth Cavendiſh, who privately marry'd Sir William Seymour, Son to the Lord Beauchamp, and Grandſon to the Earl of Hartford: So that both were at ſome Diſtance ally'd to the Crown, which caus'd all her Trouble and Confinement; ſo dangerous is every Appearance that borders upon Sovereign Titles.

The Lady Arabella's Death.

During the ſeveral Tryals of Overbury's Murtherers, ſome publick Acts were perform'd of another Nature; particularly a memorable one was compleated by Mr. Hugh Middleton, a Citizen and Goldſmith in London, who having an Act of Parliament for his Warrant, with infinite Expence, and indefatigable Labour, brought Water to the City of London from the two great Springs of Chadwell and Amwell in Hartfordſhire; having cut a Channel from thence to a Place near Iſlington, whither he convey'd it to a large Pond, and from thence in Pipes of young Elms to all Places of the City. As this was of a great Conveniency to the City, ſo another Act was perform'd which added much to the Pleaſure of the Place: For on the North-Side of London, a Place call'd Moorfields, environ'd with deep ſtinking Ditches, and noiſom Common-ſhoars, was now not only made fair and ſweet, but ſo levell'd into Walks and ſet with Trees, that it became the pleaſanteſt Place in all the City. On the following Year another thing was done for the Benefit and Beauty of the City; for Smithfield, which was before a rude and miry Place, was now pav'd all over, and ſtrong Rails ſeparating the middle Part of it, were ſet up to make it a fair Walking-Place, and fit for Markets or any other Publick Uſe.

Several Conveniences added to the City.

A.D. 1616. Reg. 14.

VII. In theſe peaceable Times, the Temples of Janus being ſhut, all warlike Habiliments were turn'd into Masking-Attire, Halcyon Days ſhin'd round the Iſle, and the Influence of the King's pacifick Mind had almoſt an univerſal Operation. Spain's Ambition was content to be bounded with the Pyrenean Hills and the Atlantick Ocean, reaping the Fruits of Italy and Sicily, hoarding the Treaſures of the Indies, and willingly ſinging a Requiem to the Netherlands. France wanting ſufficient Exerciſe, began to ſurfeit with Diſeaſes at home, which by Fits broke out into Tumours among themſelves: And the Germans were ſwell'd into a Dropſie of Voluptuouſneſs, by a continual Plenty, and the Delights of Peace. In theſe Times of Reſt, the grand Care and Concern of the King of England was for his only Son Charles, now about ſeventeen Years of Age, whom this Year he ſolemnly made Prince of Wales, with a Creation of twenty five Knights of the Bath, and a publick Tournament of forty Gentlemen of the Inns of Court. But the principal Part of his Care was how to find a proper Match for him, about which he was ſo earneſt and intent that for moſt of the latter Part of his Reign, it over-rul'd all his Counſels, and had a mighty Influence upon the whole State of Chriſtendom. His Intentions were ever Zealous for the Honour and Height of Royal Majeſty, and his Deſire was to match him with one of the higheſt Rank; tho' of a different Religion. Therefore his Thoughts were ſo long and earneſtly fix'd upon Spain, that it gave that King great Advantages over him and his Creatures. There had been a Treaty of Marriage between the late Prince Henry and a Daughter of Spain, which on the Spaniards Part was found to be a meer Compliment, carry'd on with the accuſtomed Gravity and Formality of that Nation. For the wiſe Earl of Salisbury purſu'd and drove the Matter to that point, that the Duke of Lerma, wanting further Evaſions, diſclaim'd the very Being of a Marriage-Treaty. Nevertheleſs, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, to acquit himſelf to England, and vindicate his Honeſty, openly produc'd his Commiſſion, together with Letters of Inſtruction from the Duke's own Hand: Which manner of Dealing might have been a ſufficient Cauſe of Indignation againſt any future Motions of this Nature.

The King's Son Charles made Prince of Wales.

Therefore after the Death of Prince Henry, King James turn'd his Thoughts upon a Daughter of Henry the Fourth, late King of France, as the moſt proper Match for his Son Charles; and by Sir Thomas Edmonds, his Leiger Ambaſſador, endeavour'd to know the Mind of that Court; but could not diſcern their Affections, being not very willing to diſcover his own. At length, in this Year 1616, he took an Occaſion to ſend the Lord Hays extraordinary Ambaſſador to the French King, with unuſual Pomp and Magnificence, to congratulate his Marriage with Anne the Infanta of Spain; and at that Time reſolv'd to make a full and compleat Tryal. The Subject Matter was declar'd, and in Appearance well approv'd, but ſtill had no Succeſs; for the Duke of Savoy had engag'd King Lewis, and prevail'd for his Son the Prince of Piedmont. In the very Time of this Negotiation in France, the Duke of Lerma frequently intimated to Sir John Digby, Ambaſſador in Spain, 'An extraordinary Deſire in the King his Maſter, 'not only to maintain Amity with the King of Great Britain, but to join in all Methods that might be offer'd for 'the nearer Uniting of their Majeſties, and their Crowns; 'as alſo a Diſpoſition in this regard, to marry his ſecond 'Daughter to the Prince of Wales.' The Ambaſſador, remembring the laſt Defeat, was extraordinary cautious how he gave Ear to the Spaniard's Propoſals; but after many Debates, innumerable Scruples rais'd, and Difficulties urg'd, the Matter was brought to this Iſſue: 'That the 'ſeveral Difficulties ſhould be digeſted into certain Heads, 'and ſelect Perſons be appointed for a Conference, but 'with this Proviſo, That the Kings on either ſide ſhould 'not be intereſted, nor their Names be us'd, 'till by clear'ing of Particulars there ſhould be great Appearances that 'the Marriage would take effect. Upon a Review of 'theſe Proceedings, Digby adviſ'd King James Not to ſuf'fer his other Reſolutions to be interrupted by this Over'ture, which might be made purely to divert the Match 'with France, and to keep his Majeſty from declaring 'himſelf againſt Spain, in the Affairs of Cleves and Juliers, 'ſtill undetermin'd; nevertheleſs, he might be pleas'd for a 'while to ſuſpend the French Treaty, and to entertain this 'Motion; to which End he deſir'd from him, only ſome 'private Inſtructions for his Direction and Warrant.' Theſe remote Conferences made Way for that tedious ſolemn Treaty of ſeveral Years Continuance, in which the Advantage was apparent on the Spaniard's ſide, who was indeed very formal and ſpecious in it, but no ways warm and vigorous, if in any Degree real. But King James having a violent Inclination that way, when he was once induc'd and elevated with Hopes, was ſo fix'd upon it, that he would grant all things poſſible rather than break it, and was impatient in diſſembling his own Eagerneſs. This Affair was chiefly manag'd by the famous Gondomar, a Man exquiſitely form'd for the Purpoſe, who by his facetious Ways had highly captivated the King's Affections.

His Father's Deſign for his Marriage.

The Management with Spain.

The King now endeavour'd to remove all Impediments that lay in the Way to his darling Deſign, and ſtudy'd all Methods to render himſelf acceptable to Spain. The Walls of Great Britain, the Engliſh Fleet, once the ſtrongeſt of all Europe, now lay uſeleſs in the Road, diſarm'd and in a ruinous Condition; while Gondomar, as we are told, alledg'd to King James, that the refitting and furniſhing of it would raiſe Suſpicion in the King his Maſter, and avert his Mind from the deſign'd Alliance. Moreover the King reſolv'd to ſurrender the three Towns of Fluſhing, Ramekins, and Brill, which were held by way of Caution from the United Provinces 'till vaſt Sums were repaid, and which were the Keys of the Netherlands, and open'd the Paſſages in and out of the Maes, the Rhine, and the Scheld. For a Sum not amounting to the tenth Part of the Debt, due at this Time from Holland to England, he freed himſelf from thoſe Places, to prevent Requeſts and Propoſitions from the King of Spain, who claim'd the Propriety of them; and Gondomar puſh'd hard to obtain them, as knowing the great Advantage of their Situation. Such was the King's Care and Contrivance to keep Faith with the Confederate States, and not diſoblige Spain; and to make this appear a politick Action, it was alledg'd, 'That the vaſt Expence in keeping 'thoſe Forts, was as conſiderable as the Advantages of 'Poſſeſſion.' However the States were certainly great Gainers, and all the Power of the Engliſh Intereſt in their Country was by this Means weakned, and brought to a Period; and the Alienation between King James and theſe Provinces, which appear'd of late, and was nouriſh'd by Bernvelt a Penſioner of Spain, was now increas'd, by the Obſervation and Diſcovery of his Compliances with Spain.

The King delivers the Cautionary Towns to Holland.

His Intereſt loſt in thoſe Parts.

Before theſe Tranſactions, ſeveral Alterations were made in the Miniſtry, beginning with a Breach between the Lord Chief-Juſtice Cook, and the Lord Chancellor Egerton, which open'd a Paſſage to both their Declenſions. Sir Edward Cook was diſcharg'd from his Place, and within two Days Sir Henry Montague, the King's Serjeant at Law, was plac'd in his Room. The Perſon remov'd was a Man of excellent Parts, and an extraordinary Lawyer, but Paſſion and Pride were too predominant in him; yet being turn'd out chiefly by Villers, he might have been reſtor'd, Several Removals.

The Earl of Suffolk's Fall.

ſtor'd, if he would have given a Gratuity; but he honourably anſwer'd, A Judge ought not to receive, or give a Bribe. About the ſame Time, the Lord Chancellor, weary with Imployment, and weakned with Age, deſir'd the King's Permiſſion to retire; upon which the Seal and Place was given to the famous Sir Francis Bacon, the Attorney-General; and the Lord Egerton, or rather Elleſmer, wore out the Remainder of his Life in Quiet, dying in a good old Age full of Honour and Fame, proving the Fountain of a noble Poſterity, who were afterwards advanc'd to the Earldom of Bridgewater. Time and Age had alſo worn out Sir Ralph Windwood, the King's able and faithful Secretary, who dying, Sir Robert Naunton, and Sir George Calvert, were made Secretaries; Men of contrary Religions and Parties, but join'd by the King, like contrary Elements, to find a Medium between them. But the greateſt Remove was the Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Treaſurer, who began to ſink upon Somerſet's Fall; and now both his and his Wife's Extortions and Briberies being laid open, he not only loſt his Place, which was given to Sir Henry Montague, but was alſo fin'd thirty thouſand Pounds. About the ſame Time, Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, being charged by his own Servant with Bribery, he was turn'd out of his Place, and cenſur'd in the Star-Chamber to pay twenty thouſand Pounds; being ſucceeded by William Byrde, a Man of greater Integrity. Alſo Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney, for ſecretly adding new Privileges to the Charter of London, was remov'd in Diſpleaſure, and Sir Thomas Coventry put in his Room; tho' afterwards Yelverton, for his great Undertakings in the Law, was made a puiſny Judge of the Common-Pleas.

The Arch-Biſhop of Spalato's Arrival.

As there were frequent Varieties in Matters of State, ſo great Waverings were now diſcover'd in Mens Minds in Points of Religion; ſome went over from the Church of England to the See of Rome, and others came from Rome into the Engliſh Church. Among the reſt, one of eminent Note, M. Antonius de Dominis, Arch-Biſhop of Spalato, a Man tho' old, corpulent and unfit for Travel, came into England. Here he both preach'd and wrote againſt the Church of Rome, and extoll'd the Proteſtant Religion, 'till he came to be made Dean of Windſor, and Maſter of the Savoy, which he enjoy'd ſome Years: And then, whether out of an Humour of Change, or in Expectation of greater Preferment at home, he return'd to Rome, where he renounc'd and reproach'd the Proteſtant Religion: But all he could do to ſatisfie that Court had no Effect, for the Inquiſition laid hold upon him, he dy'd in Priſon, and after his Death they burnt his Body for a Heretick. We are aſſur'd that to this Man the World has been oblig'd for that noble Hiſtory of The Council of Trent; for by his Means, and the Meaſures he had concerted with the famous Father Paul, before he left Italy, Arch-Biſhop Abbot got the Manuſcript tranſmitted by Parcels into England.

The King's Journey to Scotland.

Buckingham's Greatneſs.

The King's Return.

It was now above fourteen Years ſince the King had ſeen his native Country Scotland, whereupon he reſolv'd to take a Progreſs thither, beginning his Journey in the Spring, and warming the Country as he went with the Glories of the Court. In his ſlow Paſſage, the Days were generally ſhorten'd with the Diverſions of Hawking, Hunting, and Horſe-Racing, and the Nights extended by the Entertainments of Feaſting, Masking and Dancing. And the King had proper Inſtruments for theſe Sports about his Perſon, as Sir George Goring, Sir Edward Zouch, Sir John Fennit, and others, who knew exactly how to pleaſe his Majeſty with their Witticiſms, their Diſguiſes and Maskarades; but chiefly his great Favourite Villiers, who being an excellent Dancer, brought that Paſtime into the higheſt Requeſt. Upon this Man he had ſhower'd many Titles and Preferments, one of which was Earl of Buckingham, who now reign'd ſole Monarch in the King's Affections; his Majeſty could not be well without him, and the Nobility could not be happy but by his Means, ſo that all Addreſſes were made to him for every Place or Office in the Court or Country. In the Diſpoſal of which, the Lord Clarendon ſays he was guided more by the Rules of Appetite than of Judgment, exalting almoſt all his own numerous Family, and Dependants, whoſe greateſt Merit was their Alliance to him; which equally offended the ancient Nobility and the People, who daily ſaw the Flowers of the Crown fading and wither'd, and the Demeaſns and Revenues ſacrificed to enrich a private Family, ſcarce known to the Nation, and the Expences of the Court ſo vaſt and unlimited, that they had a ſad Proſpect of that Poverty and Neceſſity, which afterwards fell on the Crown, almoſt to the Ruin of it. The King enter'd Scotland in the Beginning of May, where he ſtay'd about three Months, took ſeveral Progreſſes, receiv'd many Entertainments, and made ſeveral Eſtabliſhments, and return'd into England in the Month of Auguſt.

The Book of Sports publiſh'd.

The Boy of Bilſon an Impoſtor.

The King being a great Lover of Sports and Recreations, this Year put out a Book that gave Toleration for the uſe of all common Paſtimes after Evening Prayers on Sundays; which was call'd The Book of Sports; and all Miniſters were enjoin'd to read it to their Pariſhioners in the Churches, and thoſe who refus'd were ſummon'd into the High-Commiſſion Court, impriſon'd and ſuſpended; all which gave great Offence to many pious and conſcientious Perſons, and was one Cauſe of the many Miſchiefs in the ſucceeding Reign. This new Encroachment upon the Sabbath gave both King and People more Liberty to prophane the Day with Authority; tho' the Arch-Biſhop, and ſeveral of the Biſhops, took the Liberty to declare againſt ſuch Practices. And as Prophaneneſs crept in on one ſide, ſo Superſtition increas'd on the other, by the means of new Swarms of Romiſh Prieſts, who now dealt much in pretended miraculous Operations. One Company of them repair'd to Staffordſhire, among the Family of the Giffords in that Country, Gentlemen of plentiful Eſtates, where they practis'd their ſubtle Artifices to ſeduce the People. Among which there was a notorious Inſtance of the Boy of Bilſon, who pretended to be bewitch'd and poſſeſs'd by the Devil, proving one of the greateſt Impoſtures of the Age. After he had plaid many ſtrange and deluding Tricks, and caus'd a poor Woman to be condemn'd for a Witch at the Aſſizes, the Cheat was by much Time and Diligence detected by Dr. Morton Biſhop of the Dioceſe, who happily preſerv'd an innocent Woman, diſplay'd the Roman Forgeries, and converted a wicked Boy, who afterwards prov'd a good Man; as the whole Story may be ſeen at large in Wilſon.

Sir Walter Raleigh undertakes a Voyage to America.

He is betray'd.

About this Time the Fate of the famous Sir Walter Raleigh began to operate after a peculiar Manner; of whom Prince Henry was wont to ſay, That no King but his Father would have kept ſuch a Man in a Cage. He had been almoſt two Years releas'd out of the Tower, where he had been a Priſoner twelve Years, during which he compil'd his incomparable Hiſtory of the World, a Deſign and Performance ſo great, that no other Man of leſs Parts and Abilities could have accompliſh'd. Being now enlarg'd, and deſirous of Action and a full Liberty, he propos'd to the King to undertake a Voyage to America, upon a particular Aſſurance from one Captain Kemiſh of gaining a Mine of Gold in Guiana, a Country which he had formerly known. The King knowing him to be a Man of Skill and Bravery, gave him Liberty, and a Commiſſion under the great Seal of England to ſet out Men and Ships for that Service; but commanded him upon his Allegiance to give under his Hand the Number of his Men, the Burthen and Strength of his Ships, together with the Country and River which he was to enter. All which was exactly done, and came ſo timely to Gondomar's Knowledge, that a full Account was ſent to Spain, and from thence to the Indies, before the Engliſh Fleet ſet ſail from the Thames: So that Sir Walter was unfortunately betray'd in the Beginning of a Deſign, which ſome thought too romantick in it ſelf.

He lands in Guiana.

St. Thomas taken.

In the mean Time his Reputation and Merit brought many Gentlemen of Quality to venture their Eſtates and Perſons, in this promiſing Enterprize; and being gallantly furniſh'd with all Things neceſſary for Peace or War, they ſet out with ten Ships, encountering no Difficulties 'till they came to Cape Verde in Africa; but there, and at Bravo, they met with many violent Storms, which prov'd a great Hindrance to their Voyage, being forc'd to leave their Cables, Anchors and Water-Casks behind them; ſo that by Length of Time, Heat of the Climate, and Want of Water, a great Sickneſs fell among them, and ſwept away many of their beſt Men, both for Sea and Land Service. But with much Patience and Hardſhips gaining Sight of the Coaſt of Guiana, they came to an Anchor in the River Caliana; where they landed their ſick Men, ſet up Barges and Shallops that were brought out of England in Quarters, waſh'd their Ships, and took in freſh Water, being furniſhed and aſſiſted by the Indians whom Sir Walter had formerly known. He, in this general Contagion, having ſtruggled with a long Sickneſs, and being yet unable to move otherwiſe than in a Chair, gave order to five ſmall Ships to ſail up the River Orinoque, under the Conduct of Captain Kemiſh, towards the Mine of which he had inform'd Sir Walter in England. In theſe five Ships were as many Companies of Foot, under Command of Captain Walter Raleigh the General's eldeſt Son, Captain Parker, Captain North, Captain Thornhurſt, and Captain Chedley, Gentlemen of great Valour, and infinite Patience, in ſuffering Hunger, Heat and Labour. As they paſs'd up the River, the Spaniards began the War, and fir'd at the Engliſh Ships with great and ſmall Shot; yet ſtill they landed their Forces without much Loſs, near the Town call'd St. Thomas, of which with little Difficulty they made themſelves Maſters, but with the Death of Captain Raleigh, to the great Grief of the Aſſailants. Tho' the Spaniards were not ſtrong enough to defend the Town, yet they were ſufficiently prepar'd to ſecure the Mine; ſo that Captain Ke- miſh finding it impracticable to get up to it by Water, and the Avenues by Land ſo well guarded, he thought the Enterprize too hazardous, and with deep Sorrow return'd.

The Voyage unſucceſsful.

Sir Walter Raleigh, with the News of his Son's unhappy Death, and the fruitleſs Return of Kemiſh, was touch'd to the very Soul, crying out to Kemiſh, That he had utterly ruin'd him, and wounded his Credit with the King beyond Recovery; but he, who was the firſt Mover of the Deſign, muſt expect to bear the Weight of the King's Anger as well as himſelf. Kemiſh, as deeply tormented as himſelf, and leſs able to ſuſtain the Burden, retir'd to his Cabin overwhelm'd with Melancholy, and ſhot himſelf; and the Bullet only breaking the Rib, which was too ſlow for his Fury, he deſperately thruſt a Knife in after it up to the Haft, and with him the Glory of the whole Voyage expir'd. For the Deſign being thus diſcover'd and broken, their Ships being leaky, Proviſions failing, and the Men miſſing the Golden Showers they expected, ſeveral of them began to Mutiny, ſome would return home; and the major Part forc'd the General to ſwear, not to go home without their Allowance. Then ſome would go for Italy, ſome for France, and few for England, fearing the Spaniſh Power there more than they did in the Indies; and thus being ſhatter'd in Judgment, with greater Storms than the Seas and Winds had produc'd, Sir Walter at length arriv'd with four Ships at Kingſale in Ireland, where he ſtaid for ſome ſhort Space in Safety.

A. D. 1618. Reg. 16.

The King diſavows the Deſign.

Raleigh committed to the Tower.

His former Sentence reviv'd againſt him.

The News of the taking and burning St. Thomas coming to Gondomar, he violently ſet upon the timorous King, and inſiſted upon Reparation; and the Matter was aggravated with the blackeſt Circumſtances by thoſe of the Spaniſh Faction, as if this Enterprize not only might make a Breach of that deſign'd Marriage between Prince Charles and the Infanta, but alſo prove an Infringement of the Peace and Amity eſtabliſh'd between the two Crowns. The King's Fears beind kindled into Anger, he diſavow'd the whole Action; and leſt other of his Subjects ſhould by this Example attempt the like Hoſtility againſt Spain, he iſſu'd out a Proclamation, in which he ſhew'd his Deteſtation of ſuch Proceedings, and threaten'd ſevere Puniſhment to the Actors; which gave ſome Satisfaction to Gondomar; whoſe chief Deſign was now to get Sir Walter Raleigh into his Power. Therefore he ſubtlely veil'd over his Reſentments, that whilſt Sir Walter lay in Ireland, he neither found nor heard of ſuch great Difficulties, but that he might appear ſafely in England; and the Men not willing to be baniſh'd their own Country, put in at Plimouth. Raleigh was no ſooner on Shoar, but he had private Intimation, which gave him Cauſe to ſuſpect the Smoothneſs of the Beginning would have a rough Concluſion: Therefore he attempted an Eſcape from thence in a Bark of Rochelle; but being ſuddenly apprehended by Sir Lewis Stukley, his Kinſman, who had a private Warrant for that Purpoſe, he was brought to London, and recommitted to the Tower, from whence he attempted a ſecond Eſcape, but was taken upon the Thames, and more cloſely committed. Being now in ſafe Cuſtody, all his Tranſactions in this Voyage were put upon the Rack, and by his Adverſaries ſtretch'd to his Diſadvantage; yet he ſtill excus'd the main Charge by ſaying he was forc'd to take St. Thomas by the Spaniards firſt attacking him, without which he could not arrive at the Mine. Gondomar prov'd an Adverſary too powerful for him, ſo that at length his Life was offer'd up as a Sacrifice for Spain, but not upon ſuch Grounds as that Ambaſſador had deſign'd: For he deſir'd a Judgment upon the pretended Breach of Peace, that by this Occaſion he might ſubtlely gain from the Engliſh an Acknowledgment of his Maſter's Right in thoſe Parts of America, and prevent all future Attempts of that Kind. But the late Voyage was not ſo much as brought into Queſtion, only his former Condemnation, which was believ'd to have been obtain'd by an Artifice, was now reviv'd; his Arraignment at Wincheſter fifteen Years before was laid before him at the King's Bench Bar, where it was demanded of him, Why Execution ſhould not paſs upon him, according to the Sentence therein pronounc'd? Sir Walter couragiouſly anſwer'd, That he was reſtor'd by the King's late Commiſſion, which gave him new Life and Vigour; for he that has Power over the Lives of others, muſt neceſſarily be Maſter of his own. This reaſonable Plea, and unanſwerable with reſpect to Conſcience, was by no means admitted by the Court, therefore he deſir'd that ſome Time might be allow'd him to prepare for Death; but it was anſwer'd, That the Time appointed was the next Morning, and it was not to be doubted, but that he had long ſince prepar'd himſelf for Death.

He is beheaded.

His Character.

The next Day, to the deep Concern of many worthy Perſons, he was brought to a Scaffold purpoſely erected in the Palace-Yard in Weſtminſter, where with a brave Conſtancy and Chriſtian Courage he loſt his Head, in the ſixty ſixth Year of his Age; at which Stroke ſuch Abundance of Blood iſſu'd from his Veins, as ſhew'd he had a ſufficient Stock to have continu'd many Years, if it had not been taken away by the Hands of Violence. This was the fatal End of the great Sir Walter Raleigh, highly in Favour with Queen Elizabeth, and next to Drake the great Scourge and Terror of the Spaniards; a Man of extraordinary Bravery and admirable Abilities, who in his excellent Writings has nobly trac'd the Steps of the Divine Providence and Vengeance in the Falls of great Men, yet after all could not eſcape himſelf. This has given Occaſion to others to trace thoſe leading to his own Fate; and to inſinuate, as the Hardſhips he ſuſtain'd were Indications of the Hand of Heaven, ſo his unjuſt ſwallowing ſuch large Portions of the Church's Revenues in the late Reign, and his thirſting after the Blood of the Earl of Eſſex, did at length call for Puniſhment, by a double Deprivation, one of Eſtate, the other of Life.

Articles of the Spaniſh Match.

The Engliſh averſe to it.

However, it was one of the great Blemiſhes of the Reign of King James, who now ſeem'd totally wedded to the Spaniſh Intereſt, or at leaſt fully reſolv'd to carry his Cauſe in the Marriage of Prince Charles with the Infanta. Therefore after many tedious Delays and Obſtructions, he this Year enter'd into certain Articles with the King of Spain; the Sum of which were, 'That the Pope's Diſpenſation ſhould be firſt obtain'd by the King of Spain: That the Children of this Marriage ſhould not be compell'd in Matters of Religion, nor their Titles prejudic'd if they prov'd Catholicks: That the Infanta's Family might be Catholick, and have a decent Place for Divine Service, according to the Uſe of the Church of Rome, the Eccleſiaſticks wearing their proper Habits: That ſhe ſhould have a competent Number of Chaplains, a Confeſſor, &c. That the Marriage ſhould be firſt ſolemniz'd in Spain according to the Council of Trent, and afterwards reiterated ſo as to make it valid according to the Laws of England.' In the allowing of theſe Articles, the King thus expreſs'd himſelf, Since this Marriage is to be with a Lady of a different Religion from us, it becomes us to be ſo tender, as on the one ſide to give them all convenient Satisfaction, ſo on the other, to admit nothing that may blemiſh our Conſcience, or detract from the Religion here eſtabliſh'd. The People of England, equally hating the Spaniards and the Popiſh Religion, were irreconcileably averſe to the Marriage, and would have bought it off at the deareſt Rate; and as far as they durſt, oppos'd it by Speeches, Counſels, Wiſhes and Prayers; but if any ſpoke louder than the reſt, he was ſoon ſilenc'd or check'd from above; when as in Spain and in Flanders, Books and Pictures were publiſh'd to expoſe both the King and State, for which the Engliſh Ambaſſadors in vain ſought for Satisfaction. The Engliſh Catholicks extreamly deſir'd the Match, hoping for a Moderation of Fines and Laws, perhaps a Toleration, if not a total Reſtoration of their Religion; for they gain'd more and more Indulgence by this ſlow-pac'd Treaty; and the Articles of Religion were long forming in the Spaniſh Court, and inlarg'd and multiply'd by endleſs Demands.

The King's Endeavours againſt Arminianiſm.

The King at this Time was alſo buſily employ'd in Matters of Religion, occaſion'd by the ſpreading of the Doctrines of Arminius in Holland, whoſe Followers were call'd Remonſtrants. The King hearing ſome Years ago, that the States of Holland were determin'd to chuſe one Vorſtius, the chief of theſe Remonſtrants, to be Divinity Profeſſor in Leyden, whoſe Opinions were contrary to thoſe King James had imbib'd, he earneſtly ſollicited the States, both by his own Letters and by his Ambaſſador Sir Ralph Winwood, by no means to admit the ſaid Vorſtius to that Employment, leſt his Doctrines ſhould ſpread themſelves into his Dominions. The Ambaſſador in the King's Name preſſing the Matter, the States anſwer'd in Juſtification of Vorſtius, 'That he was choſen according to ancient Cuſtom by the Curators of Leyden; and whereas he was afterwards charg'd by ſome Perſons to be unſound in Doctrine, the Curators thought fit, with the Conſent of Vorſtius, that both at Leyden and the Hague, he ſhould appear and anſwer his Accuſers, which he did, and none came to charge him. But not long after ſix Miniſters undertook to prove that Vorſtius had publiſh'd falſe Doctrine, who being heard in a full Aſſembly of the States, they could find no Reaſon to diſplace him: And they aſſuredly believ'd, That if his Majeſty of Great-Britain were inform'd of the true Circumſtances of this Affair, he would according to his great Wiſdom conceive favourably of them; their Proceedings being with all Reverence, Care and Reſpect to his Majeſty's ſerious Admonition. The King perceiving by this Anſwer, that the States thought ſo well of Vorſtius, that they would not comply with his Requeſt, he caus'd his Books to be publickly burnt in St. Paul's Church-Yard, and in both the Univerſities, and again wrote to the States, That if they did not diſplace him, he would publickly proteſt againſt them. Sir Ralph Winwood repreſented this to the States, and finding them cold and backwards in proceeding againſt

Vorſtius, he ſeverely remonſtrated againſt them; to which the King finding them only to make dilatory Anſwers, he at laſt exhorted them to call a National Council, to put an End to theſe Controverſies, to which they at length conſented.

The Arminians or Remonſtrants knowing that they were like to be out-number'd, oppoſ'd the calling of a Council; and it was diſcover'd that Barnevelt, the Chief of the Remonſtrants, now Arminius was dead, had ſecretly levy'd Soldiers in Utretcht, to defend themſelves againſt Maurice Prince of Orange, who ſided with the contrary Party; on Notice of which the Prince with five hundred Men march'd to Utretcht, which ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the new levy'd Companies, that at the firſt Word of Command they laid down their Arms and ſubmitted. After this, Barnevelt, Hogenberts, Leydenberg, and Grotius, the four Chiefs of the Arminian Party, were ſeiz'd, and committed to ſeveral Priſons. Leydenberg in Deſpair ſtabb'd himſelf in Priſon; Hogenberts and Grotius were condemn'd to perpetual Impriſonment; but Grotius after ſome Time, made an Eſcape in a Trunk, which his Wife told the Soldiers of the Caſtle was full of Arminian Books, which ſhe would ſend away that they might not diſtract her Husband's Head. Barnevelt met with the hardeſt Fate, for he was beheaded at the Hague: Yet he liv'd long enough to ſee his own Opinions condemn'd at a National Synod held at Dort, whither King James ſent Dr. Carlton, Biſhop of Landaff; Dr. Hall, Dean of Worceſter; Dr. Davenant, Divinity Profeſſor, and Maſter of Queen's College in Cambridge; Dr. Ward, Maſter of Sidney College in Cambridge; and Mr. Belcanquel, a Scotchman and Batchelor of Divinity; where they met with Divines from the Palatine, Heſſe, Geneva, Bern, Embden, and other Provinces, who generally agreed to condemn the Doctrines of Arminius, concerning Conditional Election and Reprobation, the Univerſality of Redemption, &c. But herein King James in a great Meaſure loſt his Aim; for this Cenſure caus'd theſe deep Points to be more nicely ſearch'd and examin'd, and theſe condemn'd Opinions ſprouted and gather'd Strength by being topt by a combin'd Party; ſo that in this and the next Reign, Arminianiſm became faſhionable in England, and was generally oppos'd to Puritaniſm.

The Synod of Dort.

Shortly after there appear'd a mighty Blazing-Star in Libra, which occaſion'd Variety of Conjectures concerning its Influence and Prognoſtication. Many thought it portended the Death of Queen Anne, who after its Appearance dy'd of a Dropſy at Hampton-Court, when ſhe was forty five Years of Age. She was brought from thence to her Palace in the Strand, for the more triumphant Glory of her Obſequies, which were celebrated at Weſtminſter above a Month after. She dy'd on the firſt Day of March $\frac{18}{19}$, to the deep Concern of all good Men and loyal Subjects; leaving behind her the Name of a peaceable and dutiful Wife, and a virtuous and pious Queen.

Q. Anne's Death.

A.D. 1619. Reg.17. The King's Troubles.

VIII. The King for a conſiderable Space continu'd a very melancholy Widower; which was a ſort of Introduction to further Troubles, Perplexities and Imbarraſſments; from which he was ſcarce ever free all the reſt, and indeed moſt infirm Part of his Reign. Theſe had their Riſe from the Fires that broke out in Germany in the preceding Year, between the Proteſtant Princes and the Houſe of Auſtria; which Commotions involv'd and drew along the Affairs of moſt Chriſtian Princes, eſpecially the two Potent Kings of England and Spain. The Catholick Cauſe, and the Lot of the Houſe of Auſtria, induc'd and oblig'd the King of Spain, who was the ſtrongeſt Branch of that Family; and King James was ingag'd both by common and particular Intereſt, the Religion he profeſs'd, and the State of his Son-in-Law, the Elector Palatine, who was a principal Agent in theſe Wars. It was a mighty Concern to the whole Chriſtian World, and the Iſſue had a main Dependance upon the King of England, being the moſt powerful Prince of the Proteſtant Profeſſion: But his Proceedings were now ſtrangely govern'd by the unhappy Spaniſh Treaty; ſo that it in conſequence brought great Diſhonour to himſelf, and inſuperable Calamities to his Son-in-Law.

The Troubles in Germany.

The German Troubles and Commotions began with the Emperor's Crowning his Couſin Ferdinand King of Bohemia and Hungary; but with a Reſervation of all Regal Power to himſelf during Life. The Conſequence of this ſoon prov'd a terrible Oppreſſion of the Proteſtants in Bohemia, which at that Time were very numerous, and had large Privileges, as well as great Power and Authority. The States and Nobles of the Country, ſummoning an Aſſembly at Prague to redreſs their Grievances, were oppos'd by ſome of the Emperor's Miniſters of State, the very Day of their Meeting; the manner of which exaſperated them to ſuch a Height of Paſſion, that they threw Slabata the Emperor's Chief-Juſtice, Smeſantius one of the Council, and Fabritius the Secretary, from a high Window into the Caſtle Ditch. Upon cooler Thoughts the Bohemians endeavour'd to palliate this raſh Action by Apologies to the Emperor; but at the ſame Time they ſtrengthen'd themſelves with new Levies both of Horſe and Foot, the better to ſecure their own Peace, and to baniſh the main Incendiaries, the Jeſuits, out of Prague, whoſe diſtemper'd Zeal had firſt kindled the Flame. The Emperor finding theſe Diſturbances, rais'd an Army under the Command of Count Bucquoy; and the Proteſtant States perceiving the Emperor inrag'd, rais'd two Armies, one commanded by Count Thurne, and the other by Count Mansfeldt. Some Skirmiſhes paſs'd between the Imperial and Bohemian Forces, and ſome Towns were taken on both Sides; but in the Heat of theſe Conteſts, the old Emperor dy'd in the Beginning of the Year 1619. Upon which the Count Palatine of the Rhine, who in the Interregnum is chief Vicar of the Empire, publiſh'd his Right by the Golden Bull to govern in chief, 'till a new Emperor be choſen; and by Advice he aſſum'd the Power, requiring the People to demean themſelves peaceably under his Government.

The Emperor Matthias dies.

After many Struggles, Ferdinand King of Hungary and Bohemia, and adopted Heir of Matthias the late Emperor, at Frankfort was elected King of the Romans, and afterwards crown'd Emperor of Germay. The States of Bohemia diſclaim'd the Election as invalid, becauſe he could not be an Elector himſelf as King of Bohemia; for that he had never been actually in Poſſeſſion of the Crown. And tho' their Diſſent could not leſſen the Election of Ferdinand to the Empire, yet they proteſted by Oath, never to acknowledge him their King. Theſe Heats grew into greater Flames, and the Proteſtant States of Moravia, Sileſia and Hungary, join'd with the Bohemians, and baniſh'd the Jeſuits. They were proſperous in the Beginning; but the Auſtrian Party receiv'd Vigour by new Supplies out of Hungary and Flanders; and the Emperor capitulated with the Duke of Bavaria to levy Forces to his Uſe, for the Expence of which he engag'd Part of his Country to him. The War daily encreaſing, the King of England interpos'd in theſe Differences, and ſent the Viſcount Doncaſter extraordinary Embaſſador to mediate a Reconciliation. His conſtant Love of Peace, and his preſent Fear of the fatal Iſſue of ſuch Commotions, together with the Requeſt of the King of Spain, mov'd him to undertake this Affair. It was the Spaniard's Policy to make him a Reconciler, and ſo by that means to place him in a State of Neutrality, and fruſtrate the Hopes of that Support the Princes of the Union might expect from him by the Intereſt of the Count Palatine: For which Cauſe the King of Spain ſpread abroad ſpecious Pretences, That King James ſhould be the ſole and grand Arbiter of this Cauſe of Chriſtendom. Nevertheleſs his Mediation was neglected by the Catholick Confederates, and his Ambaſſador ſlighted and poſtpon'd in the Buſineſs. And at the ſame Time, the King's Agent Mr. Cottington, being ſenſible of their unworthy Dealings in the Court of Spain, profeſs'd, That his moſt uſeful Service, and beſt agreeing with his own Conſcience, would be to diſengage the King his Maſter. However the Bohemians reſolv'd to proceed in their own Way; and being aſſembled for that Purpoſe, with the Conſent of their Confederates, they ſolemnly elected Frederick Count Palatine of the Rhine for their King; ſtill hoping to be ſtrengthen'd and ſecur'd by the Alliance and Aſſiſtance of his Father-in-Law, the King of Great Britain.

Ferdinand ſucceeds him.

The Count Palatine elected King of Bohemia.

The Count Palatine being elected King of Bohemia, immediately crav'd Advice of King James his Father-in-Law, concerning the Acceptance of that Royal Dignity. When this Important Buſineſs was debated in the King's Council, Arch-Biſhop Abbot, whoſe Infirmities would not permit him to be preſent in the Conſultation, wrote a zealous and fervent Letter to the Secretary of State, to urge the King's utmoſt Aſſiſtance in this critical Juncture, which might turn highly to the Advancement of the Proteſtant Religion all over Europe. But the King was unfortunately engag'd in thoſe Ways, out of which he could not eaſily extricate himſelf. Beſides it did not pleaſe him to find Kingdoms diſpos'd after ſuch a Manner, as that his Son-in-Law ſhould ſnatch a Crown out of ſo hot a Fire; and he was wont to ſay, That the Bohemians made uſe of him, as the Fox did of the Cat's Foot to pull the Apple out of the Fire for his own Eating. In the mean Time, before the King could give any Anſwer, the Count Palatine was perſuaded by the Proteſtant States to accept of the Election; and thereupon he made his Entrance into Prague upon the laſt of October, and on the Fourth of November was ſolemnly crown'd King of Bohemia. Of all which he ſent ſpeedy Advice into England, excuſing the Suddenneſs of this Action, becauſe the Urgency of the Cauſe would admit of no further Deliberation. King James, ſurpris'd at this bold Step, diſavow'd the Act, and would never ſo much as King James diſapproves the Election.

grace his Son-in-Law with the Stile or Title of his new Dignity. But Sir Richard Weſton, and Sir Edward Conway were ſent Ambaſſadors into Bohemia, to make up the Breach between the Emperor and the Elector Palatine. And he was ſo very apprehenſive, leſt the Palatine's Nearneſs to him might give Cauſe of Suſpicion to his Brother of Spain, that he commanded his Agent Cottington to give that King plenary Information of all Proceedings, and to let him underſtand that whatever the Palatine had done, was without his Countenance, Procurement or Allowance. The King of Spain, tho' he condemn'd Doncaſter's Proceedings, was at length ſatisfy'd with King James's Integrity, declaring, That it would gain the more Authority and Eſtimation, if he ſhould continue to diſclaim that which had been done ſo contrary to his Opinion.

A. D. 1620. Reg. 18.

The King of Bohemia proſcrib'd by the Emperor.

The Spaniſh Deſigns.

The Count Palatine was no ſooner ſetled in his new Kingdom, when the Emperor publiſh'd a Proſcription againſt him, 'wherein he proclaim'd him guilty of High-'Treaſon, excluded him out of the publick Peace, and 'proſecuted him as the publick Enemy of the Empire, and 'a Contemner of his Imperial Majeſty; likewiſe abſol-'ving all his Subjects from their Oaths and Duties to 'him, and commanding all Perſons whatſoever to aban-'don him and his Adherents.' All the Princes and Potentates in the Empire were alarm'd, and began to make ready for War, joining to that Side whither their Intereſts or Inclinations led them. In Spain alſo they made all Preparations for the ſame War; only the King of England would take no Alarm, abhorring War in general, and diſliking the Palatine's Cauſe as a dangerous Precedent againſt Monarchy, being ſtill fed with Hopes of compoſing all Differences by the Succeſs of the Spaniſh Treaty. For which Purpoſe Sir Walter Aſton was ſent Ambaſſador into Spain, and Gondomar return'd into England, to continue there, 'till the long debated Match ſhould be concluded. The Articles of Religion for Securing Liberty of Conſcience to the Infanta and her Family were greatly enlarg'd by the Commiſſioners, and allow'd by the King of England; but ſtill without a Diſpenſation from Rome, all the Tranſactions were but Nullities. And for this Cauſe it was expected that King James ſhould propoſe ſuch Conditions for the Increaſe and Advantage of the Catholick Religion, that the Pope might deliberate whether they might any ways merit the Diſpenſation. To this Demand the King made Anſwer in his Letter to the King of Spain, 'That he had 'done as much in Favour of the Catholicks as the Times 'would bear, and promis'd upon the Word of a King, That 'no Roman Prieſt, or other Catholick, ſhould henceforth 'be condemn'd upon any Capital Law: And tho' he could 'not at preſent reſcind the Laws, inflicting only pecunia-'ry Mulcts, yet he would ſo mitigate them, as to oblige 'his Catholick Subjects to him: And if the Marriage took 'effect, his Daughter-in-Law ſhould find him ready to in-'dulge all Favours which ſhe ſhould requeſt for thoſe of 'her Religion.' With this the Spaniſh Council acknowledg'd great Satisfaction; and a Paper was drawn up accordingly by a Junto of Canoniſts, Lawyers, and Divines, to perſuade the Pope to perform his Part.

Sir Horatio Vere ſent into the Palatinate.

But with ſmall Succeſs.

In the mean Time an Army of thirty thouſand Men was raiſing in Flanders, under the Command of the Marqueſs Spinola; which gave King James an Occaſion to enquire after the Cauſe of ſuch great Preparations. The Marqueſs gave Anſwer, That he receiv'd his Commiſſion ſeal'd up, with a Command, not to open it 'till his Army was compleated, and brought to a Rendevouz; but the King had ſufficient Proof to aſſure him, that his Army was deſign'd for the Palatinate. Yet after all, no more than one Regiment, under the Command of Sir Horatio Vere, could be obtain'd from him, tho' two more were promis'd. When Spinola had his Rendevouz, where he muſter'd twenty ſix thouſand Foot and four thouſand Horſe, he open'd his Commiſſion, which requir'd him to make War againſt all ſuch as ſhould be confederate with the Bohemian Rebels; all which he communicated to the Ambaſſador of Great Britain. At the ſame Time the Engliſh began their March, with as brave a Regiment as had appear'd in any Age, conſiſting moſt of Gentlemen, under a moſt worthy Commander, who was accompany'd with the Earls of Oxford and Eſſex, Perſons ennobled as well by their own Virtues, as by thoſe of their Progenitors. This handful of Men reach'd the Palatinate with ſome Difficulty, by the particular Aid and Conduct of Henry Prince of Naſſaw. But Spinola, having got the Start of the Engliſh, by reaſon of a far ſhorter March, had no ſooner arriv'd, but he took in ſeveral Towns, and greatly prevail'd over a diſpirited People: Yet he cautiouſly declin'd the Hazard of a Battel with the Proteſtant Confederates; nor was the Marqueſs of Anſbach, the Head of them, very forward to engage his Forces. And now the great Acceſs of Strength to the Emperor's Party, and this ſlender Aid from the King of Great Britain, to preſerve his Childrens Inheritance, extreamly diſhearten'd the German Princes, and at length diſſolv'd the Confederacy. After a ſhort Space, the Seaſon of the Year advancing, the Princes of the Union retir'd into their ſeveral Countries, and the Engliſh Regiment was diſpos'd into three principal Garriſons: Sir Horatio Vere commanded in Manheim, Sir Gerard Herbert in Heidelberg, and Captain Burroughs in Frankendale; having only Power to preſerve themſelves in thoſe Walls, while the Enemy rang'd the Country at their Pleaſure.

The King of Bohemia defeated at Prague.

He loſes all his Dominions.

As the new King of Bohemia ſuffer'd extreamly in his Hereditary Dominions, ſo at this Time he met with a more ſevere Fate in his own Kingdom, which ſoon put a Period to his ſhort Reign. The Imperial Forces gathering Strength under Bavaria, Bucqnoy, and D. Balthazar, advanc'd towards Prague, with a Reſolution to fight King Frederick; upon which the Bohemians quitted their Garriſons, to make their Army the more compleat. So upon the eighth Day of November, being Sunday, both Armies met for the fatal Deciſion of the grand Controverſie: The Bohemians ſtood upon the moſt advantagious Ground, between the Imperialiſts and the City of Prague; but the Enemy breaking through, diſpers'd and ruin'd the whole Army, and effectually purſu'd their Victory. The King and Queen, ſurpris'd with this Defeat among a wavering People, in a City not very defenſible, were conſtrain'd to fly the next Morning, with what Things they could carry with them. The Queen being of the more gallant Spirit, bore it with moſt Undauntedneſs; but the King ſuffer'd doubly as he went, being condemn'd for keeping his Soldiers without Pay, having a vaſt Maſs of Money by him, which he was forc'd to leave behind him to augment the Spoils of his Enemies. Thus after one Year's Reign, King Frederick firſt loſt a deciding Battel, with all his Treaſure, and ſhortly after all his Kingdom of Bohemia, and not long after that, all his Hereditary Lands and Dominions in Germany; being at length forc'd to abandon his Native Country, all his Honours and Places, and with his Lady and Children retire into Holland for a Place of Refuge and Reſidence.

The Spaniſh Policy.

Gondomar's Influence.

The Misfortune of this Family began now to rouſe King James, and to move him both to Pity and to Action: Wherefore a Council being call'd, an Order was made to promote the Palatine's Reſtoration; and the King, to encourage the Princes of the Union, and to keep them in Arms, ſent them thirty thouſand Pounds; yet withal reſolv'd to treat for a Peace, and diſpatch'd Sir Edward Villers to carry the Palatine's Submiſſion to the Emperor, upon Conditions to be conceiv'd according to Equity and Conveniency. On the other Side the Spaniards never more flatter'd King James, than after the Defeat at Prague: They declar'd that he ſhould order all Things according to his Pleaſure, for the Palatine's Reſtoration, and be obey'd; that the Infanta's Portion was preparing, and that the Pope was oblig'd to grant the Diſpenſation, from whom they reſolved to take no Denial: All which was encourag'd by Digby, Cottington, Arundel, Worceſter, and eſpecially by Buckingham and Gondomar; which laſt had gain'd the Acceſs of a Favourite, rather than a Foreign Ambaſſador; ſo that Sir Robert Naunton, for ſhowing a Diſlike to him, notwithſtanding his known Worth, was remov'd from his Secretary's Place, and Conwar put in his Room. The King took great Delight in the Company and Converſation of Gondomar; a Perſon, as Nani obſerves, who with a ſtupendous Acuteneſs of Wit, ſo confounded pleaſant Things with ſerious, that it was not eaſie to be diſcern'd when he rally'd, or when he ſpoke of Buſineſs. He knew how to inſinuate and transform himſelf to the King's own Way and Humour; was full of Conceits, Jeſts and witty Sayings, and would ſometimes ſpeak falſe Latin purpoſely to pleaſe the King, telling him, That his Majeſty ſpoke Latin like a Pedant, but himſelf like a Gentleman. By ſuch little pleaſing Arts, and others of a more bountiful Nature with the Nobility and Ladies, he gain'd an extraordinary Influence, and ſerv'd his own Maſter with great Advantage.

The Power of Buckingham's Mother.

The Favourite Earl was now made Marqueſs of Buckingham, and to his Maſterſhip of the Horſe was added the Office of Lord High-Admiral of England; and continually lying in the King's Boſom, every Man paid Tribute to his gracious Smiles. His Mother was made Counteſs of Buckingham, her eldeſt Son was made firſt a Knight, and afterwards Viſcount of Purbeck, her other Son was created Earl of Angleſey; and now happy was that Perſon who could gain a Kinſwoman, it being the next way to a rich Office, or a ſwelling Title. The King, who never much regarded Women, had now his Court fill'd with young Ladies, Relations to the Marqueſs. Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief-Juſtice, who was reported to have given twenty thouſand Pounds for the Office of Lord-Treaſurer, before the Year expir'd had it taken from him, and it was conferr'd upon Sir Lionel Cranfield, who by being bred up in the Cuſtom-houſe, and knowing the ſecret Arts of thoſe Offices, beſt knew how to ſupply by Projects, what was conſum'd by a riotous and prodigal Court. But the great Step to this Office, was Cranfield's marrying one of the Marqueſs's Kindred, which ſoon rais'd him to be Earl of Middleſex; and the Lord Chief-Juſtice Montague in lieu of his Mony, was made Preſident of the Council, Viſcount Mandeville, Earl of Mancheſter, and after Worceſter's Deceaſe, Lord Privy-Seal. The Marqueſs of Buckingham, in Appearance, made all theſe Removes and Advancements, but in Reality moſt of the Affairs in Church and State were privately tranſacted by his Mother, for moſt Addreſſes were firſt made to her, and ſo convey'd to be finiſh'd by her Son, who generally regarded his Pleaſure more than his Profit: Which caus'd Gondomar, among his other pleaſant Stories, to write into Spain, That there was never more Hopes of England's returning to Popery than now; for there were more Prayers and Offerings made here to the Mother, than to the Son.

The Marqueſs himſelf, as he was a Man of excellent Symetry and Gracefulneſs, ſo he affected Beauty where he found it; but being a general Lover, he treated all Women accordingly, only to gratifie his own unlawful Ends, and then diſmiſt them for the more prevailing Charms of the next fair Lady. He deſign'd to have practis'd this Method upon the Earl of Rutland's only Daughter, who was to be Miſtreſs of all her Father's vaſt Fortunes: He ſpread his fine Nets for her, carry'd her to his Lodgings in Whitehall, kept her there for ſome Space, and then return'd her back to her Father. But the ſtout old Earl, fir'd with Indignation, ſent him this threatning Meſſage, That he was too much of a Gentleman to ſuffer ſuch Indignity; therefore if he did not immediately repair his Daughter's Honour by marrying her, his Greatneſs ſhould not protect him from his Juſtice. The Marqueſs, who perhaps made uſe of this Stratagem to gain her Father's Conſent, ſhe being the greateſt Match in the Kingdom, had no Reaſon to diſlike the Propoſal, and therefore he ſoon ſalv'd up the Wound by conſummating the Marriage. This young and beautiful Lady was bred up a Roman Catholick by her Mother, but was converted by Dr. White to be a zealous Proteſtant; which croſſing the Inclinations of the old Counteſs of Buckingham, who was a fiery Romaniſt, ſhe with the Help of her Jeſuit at length plac'd her on the firſt Foundation.

A.D. 1621. Reg. 19.

The King himſelf being jealous of uncontroll'd Soveraignty, and impatient of his Peoples viewing the Myſteries of State, had fallen into a great Diſlike of Parliaments, and for ſeveral Years had given way to Patents, Monopolies, of ſuch diſtaſtful Projects: And probably many of his Miniſters, fearing an Enquiry into their own Actions, ſuggeſted to him, That he had better furniſh himſelf by thoſe Ways, and the Match now in Treaty, than by Subſidies accompany'd with the Redreſs of Grievances. Nevertheleſs he now reſolv'd to call a Parliament, conceiving it might prove of ſpecial Advantage: For he found the Affections of the People much rais'd for the Recovery of the Palatinate, which would naturally open their Purſes to the Supply of his Wants; then the Treaty of Spain might effect the Buſineſs, without the Expence and Troubles of War, and the good Agreement between him and his People would quicken the Spaniards to conclude the Match.

The third Parliament in this Reign

Accordingly a Parliament was ſummon'd to meet on the thirtieth Day of January at Weſtminſter; where the King made a long Speech, which may be ſeen at large in the Introduction to Nalſon's Collections; 'in which he laid open his great and numerous Expences, and handſomely pleaded for ſuitable Supplies; he alſo declar'd his great Readineſs to recover the Palatinate, for which rather than fail he would engage his Crown, his Blood, and his Son's Blood, to effect it.' At the ſame Time his Majeſty ſent the Lord Digby Ambaſſador to the Emperor, to urge him to a poſitive Anſwer, whether the Palatinate might be recover'd by Peace, before he proceeded to actual War; and now expecting the Emperor's Anſwer, the Parliament proceeded in their Work, receiving Petitions from ſeveral Perſons impriſon'd and ruin'd by the horrid Extortions of voracious Patentees and Monopolizers, who were active in promoting illegal Exactions, to which the King's Neceſſities and ill-advis'd Counſellors had driven him. The chief Inſtruments of theſe Grievances were Sir Giles Mompeſſon, and Sir Francis Mitchel. The former had Fortune ſufficient to have maintain'd him fairly in the Country, but at Court he wanted this Novelty for his better Support; to whom Mitchel was made a Co-Partner, a ſervile Suburb Juſtice of Peace, who living by the Failings of his Neighbouring Females, was brought to Court and Knighted, and corroborated by theſe Letters Patents to oppreſs the needy Commoners. All which being canvaſs'd and laid open in Parliament, Mompeſſon made his Eſcape, and Sir Francis Mitchel was cenſur'd after this Manner: Firſt he was degraded with all the debaſing Ceremonies that Juſtice could invent, and after that was made to ride through the City with his Face to the Horſe's Tail, with a Paper on his Breaſt and Back declaring his Crimes: This expos'd him to the Scorn and Contempt of the Rabble in his Paſſage; but a large Fine and long Impriſonment ſecur'd him from further Miſchief. The pecuniary Puniſhment fell as heavily upon Mompeſſon, and upon other leſſer Confederates, which put an End to this Grievance.

Oppreſſors puniſh'd.

The Lord Bacon's Fall.

Not long after the great Lord-Chancellor Bacon was brought to a Cenſure for the moſt extravagant Weakneſſes that ever enter'd into the Heart of a great and wiſe Man. He was a true Emblem of human Frailty, being more than a Man in ſome Things, and leſs than a Woman in others. His Crimes were Bribery and Extortion, yet more thoſe of his Servants and Dependants than his own, all which were prov'd and aggravated againſt him by ſo many Circumſtances, that he who in moſt Things was thought a Man of the greateſt Parts in the Kingdom, and elevated above Pity, now fell miſerably below it; and his eloquent Tongue that us'd to charm his Auditors with admirable Harangues, was now forc'd to deſcend to ſervile Supplications; for throwing himſelf and his Cauſe at his Judges Feet, before his Sentence was paſs'd, 'he humbly begg'd the Lords in Parliament, That his penitent Submiſſion might be his Sentence, the Loſs of the Great Seal his Puniſhment, and that their Lordſhips would recommend him to his Majeſty's Grace and Pardon for all that was paſt.' Thus his great and towering Spirit was brought low, and Humiliation might have rais'd him up again, if the Weight of his Miſdemeanors had not kept him down. He loſt both his Peerage and Seal, and the Beam was wavering whether he ſhould carry the Title of Viſcount St. Albans to his Grave, which now was all he had; and to heighten his Miſery, many were cruſh'd in Pieces by his Fall, through the Debts he had contracted; and tho' he had a Penſion from the King, he wanted to his laſt; living obſcurely in his Lodgings at Grays-Inn, where the Remembrance of former Plenty and Grandeur lay ſo heavy upon his ingenious and now melancholy Temper, that he pin'd and conſum'd away. He was of a very grave and comely Preſence; of a quick and high-flying Wit, ſtriving in ſome things rather to be admir'd than underſtood, and yet when he pleas'd to condeſcend no Man was more intelligible. In ſhort, he was of a moſt capacious Mind, and a great Maſter of all Kinds of Learning, and the World is ſo much oblig'd to his noble Diſcoveries in Nature, that his Name will be celebrated with Honour to Perpetuity. Gondomar hearing of his Miſcarriages, and metting him the Lent before his Cenſures, thought to pay him with his Spaniſh Sarcaſms, ſaying, My Lord, I wiſh you a good EASTER; And you, my Lord, reply'd the Chancellor, a good PASS-OVER: For he could neither endure his Engliſh Buffoonry, nor his Spaniſh Treaty; tho' he was too wiſe to oppoſe them publickly. He treaſur'd up nothing either for himſelf or his Family, but his fatal Error was his Indulgence to his Servants; and his Decrees were always made with ſo much Equity, that none were ever revers'd as unjuſt. He was ſucceeded in his Place by Dr. Williams, Dean of Weſtminſter, who was firſt made Biſhop of Lincoln, and afterwards Arch-Biſhop of York.

Dr. Williams made Lord-Keeper.

In this Parliament, tho' no Laws and Statutes were paſs'd, yet many Debates aroſe relating to the King's Power and Prerogative, and particularly in the Houſe of Lords, where the King had the ſtrongeſt Party; yet ſeveral of that Houſe ſtood up boldly for the publick Liberty, as the Earls of Oxford, Southampton, Eſſex, and Warwick, the Lord Say and Seal, and the Lord Spencer. This laſt Lord ſpeaking ſomething in the Houſe of Actions of their great Anceſtors, Arundel being diſpleas'd, ſaid, My Lord, when theſe Things were doing, your Anceſtors were keeping Sheep, reflecting upon the numerous Flocks he lov'd: Spencer immediately reply'd, When my Anceſtors were keeping Sheep, as you ſay, your Anceſtors were plotting Treaſon. This caus'd ſuch a Heat, that Arundel as the Aggreſſor was ſent to the Tower, where after ſome time, upon his Submiſſion to the Houſe, he was reſtor'd. The Commons on the other Side were no leſs warm and impatient, highly diſreliſhing both the Treaties with the Emperor and the King of Spain; and Gondomar had ſo rais'd the Peoples Fury, that he was revil'd and aſſaulted in the Streets of London. Upon which the King reſolv'd upon exemplary Juſtice; and being inform'd that one Man was apprehended, who had us'd railing Speeches againſt the Ambaſſador, it was his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that on the next Morning he ſhould be publickly and ſeverely whipt through London, beginning at Aldgate, and ſo along by the Place where the Affront was offer'd in Fleet-ſtreet to Temple-Bar, without any manner of Favour. This terrible Puniſhment more enrag'd the People againſt Gondomar, who by means of his Power with the King, had tranſported Ordnance, and other Warlike Proviſions, to furniſh the Spaniſh Arſenals; and it was believ'd that he privately procur'd the ſending of Sir Robert Manſel into the Mediterranean Sea, againſt the Pirates of Algier. The Merchants of England, by them much infeſted, were alſo induc'd to move for this Expedition, in which the Engliſh Fleet perform'd gallant Exploits, and bravely fir'd the Pirate Ships within their Harbours.

Heats in both Houſes.

Nevertheleſs, by this the Engliſh Strength was diverted, the Treaſure exhauſted, and the Spaniſh Fleets and Merchants ſecur'd from thoſe Robbers, and Spain left at Liberty to aſſiſt in ſubduing the Palatinate.

The Parliament adjourn'd by the King.

The Parliament having ſate about four Months, the King was deſirous to give them a Time of Receſs; therefore on the fourth of June a Meſſage was ſent to the Houſe, ‘ That his Majeſty, by the Advice of his Privy-‘ Council, thought fit to Adjourn the Parliament, leſt the ‘ Seaſon of the Year, by the continual Concourſe of Peo‘ ple, ſhould cauſe Infection:’ Which Adjournment, keeping the Parliament ſtill in Being, was thought better than a Prorogation. The Commons were extreamly ſorry at their Diſappointment, having but juſt before made ſo hearty a Declaration to aſſiſt his Majeſty in the Affair of the Palatinate. A Committee of both Houſes attending his Majeſty, he declar'd to them, That he took it very ill, That the Commons ſhould diſpute his Reaſons of Adjournment, all Power being in him alone, to call, adjourn, prorogue, and diſſolve Parliaments. The Adjournment was appointed 'till November following, with a Declaration, That in the mean Time he would by his own Authority redreſs Grievances. Moreover he iſſu'd out a Second Proclamation againſt licentious Speeches and Diſcourſes concerning Affairs of State: For notwithſtanding the Strictneſs of the King's former Commands, the Peoples inordinate Liberty of irreverend Language daily increas'd. Wherefore the King now threaten'd Severity, as well againſt the Concealers of ſuch Diſcourſes, as againſt the Laviſhneſs of audacious Tongues and Pens. The King grew more and more uneaſy, being continually ſollicited both from Spain and Rome, to enlarge his Favours to the Popiſh Recuſants; for Reports were then brought to Rome that all the Catholicks in his Dominions were cruelly treated. And beſides this, a Rumour was there ſpread, That King James in a Speech in Parliament had declar'd, That notwithſtanding the Spaniſh Match, the Engliſh Catholicks ſhould not in the leaſt Point be in a better Condition, when he had only ſaid, That if any of that Party grew inſolent, let his People count him unworthy to reign, if he gave not extraordinary Puniſhment. Thus was the King unhappily embarraſs'd and intangled in the Ways he had choſen; for it was not poſſible for him at once to pleaſe his People, and to ſatisfy his Foreign Intereſts.

The Second Meeting of the Parliament.

The Commons remonſtrate.

The King writes to the Speaker.

At the Beginning of the Winter, the Lord Digby return'd from ſolliciting the Emperor, and the Duke of Bavaria, to the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, where he had met with no reaſonable Succeſs. And on the twentieth of November, when the Parliament met the Second time, the King commanded him to give an Account of his Journey to the Houſe of Commons, and to repreſent how neceſſary it was for the King to obtain that by War, which he could not procure by a Peace. But tho' the King by his Miniſters encourag'd the Parliament to a War, yet they found him more inclinable to a Peace, both in regard of Gondomar's Power with him, his Indulgence to the Roman Catholicks, and his Fondneſs of the Spaniſh Match, which he hop'd might heal all Breaches; tho' it was poſitively diſlik'd and diſapprov'd by all England, beſides Romaniſts, and thoſe of the Spaniſh Faction. Therefore the Houſe of Commons, before they granted Subſidies, reſolv'd to try the King's Spirit by a ſolemn Petition and Remonſtrance, in which they laid open to his Majeſty the ſeveral great and increaſing Dangers ariſing from the Romiſh Religion in general, the Power of the Papiſts in particular, and the great Oppreſſions of the Proteſtants in Foreign Parts; repreſenting at the ſame time proper Remedies for theſe great Calamities, too long to mention in this Place. The Commons were more apprehenſive of the Danger of their Religion, not only from the terrible Wounds lately given by the Houſe of Auſtria, but alſo from the Severities the Proteſtants met with in France, from Lewis the Thirteenth, who at this Time beſieg'd them in Montaubon and Rochelle, and other Places, againſt all the Arguments and Mediation of King James's Ambaſſador. When the Remonſtrance was brought to Perfection, the King had a Copy of it before the Houſe had Time to ſend their Members with it; in which ſomething ſo highly diſpleas'd him, that he wrote the following Letter to Sir Thomas Richardſon, Speaker of the Houſe of Commons. We have heard by divers Reports, to our great Grief, that ſome fiery and popular Spirits in the Houſe of Commons, have publickly argu'd and debated Matters far above their Reach aud Capacities, tending highly to our Diſhonour, and the Breach of the Royal Prerogative. Theſe are therefore to command You, in our Name to make known to the Houſe, that none therein ſhall preſume henceforth to meddle with any thing concerning our Government, or deep Matters of State, nor with our Son's Match with the Daughter of Spain, nor to touch the Honour of that King, or any other our Friends or Confederates. And if they have already touch'd any of thoſe Points, which we have here forbidden, in a Petition of theirs, which is to be ſent unto us, it is our Pleaſure that You tell them, That except they reform it before it comes to our Hands, we will not deign the hearing of it.

The Parliament's Reply.

The King's Rejoinder.

When the Houſe had duly conſider'd the Reaſons they had to draw up their Remonſtrance, which at that Time were cogent and prevailing with them, they ſent the ſaid Remonſtrance, together with a new Petition to the King, in which they declar'd, ‘ That the Honour and Safety of ‘ the King and his Poſterity, the Welfare of Religion and ‘ State of the Kingdom, are at no Time unfit for a Parlia‘ mentary Conſideration; not that they took upon them‘ ſelves, but as Loyal Subjects, to demonſtrate ſuch Things ‘ to his Majeſty, which they were not aſſur'd could o‘ therwiſe come ſo fully and clearly to his Knowledge. ‘ And whereas his Majeſty ſeem'd to reſtrain them from ‘ intermedling with the Matters of Government, that have ‘ their Motion in the Courts of Juſtice, and ſeem'd to a‘ bridge them of the ancient Liberty of Parliaments, Free‘ dom of Speech, they were now forc'd to pray his Ma‘ jeſty to allow it, and to take away the Doubts and Scru‘ ples, which his Letter to the Speaker had brought upon ‘ them.’ After this the Houſes were much diſcourag'd to proceed to Buſineſs, while there was ſo great a Difference between the King and them; for the King thought their Actions an Incroachment upon his Prerogative, and they thought the King's Expreſſions an Infringement of their Liberty; therefore they reſolv'd to give over all Buſineſs, 'till they had an Anſwer to their Petitions. The King hearing of this, was exceedingly vex'd and uneaſy, and very roughly entertain'd the twelve Members that were ſent to him; ſome ſay he call'd for twelve Chairs for them, ſaying, Here are twelve Kings come to me. After he had conſider'd their Deſires and Requeſts in their laſt Petition, he return'd them a long Anſwer in Writing, mix'd with ſome ſevere Expreſſions, in which he ſaid, That their firſt Petition was unworthy of Anſwer, that their giving Advice about his Son's Match, and urging him to a War, was Intrenching upon his Prerogative, inſinuating that the Firſt concerning his Son was High-Treaſon. In the latter End he tells them, That he wonders they ſhould make ſo unjuſt a Comment upon the Words in his Letter to the Speaker, as if he meant to reſtrain them from their ancient Privileges and Liberties in Parliament: For tho' he cannot allow the Stile, calling it their ancient and undoubted Right and Inheritance, but rather have wiſh'd that they had ſaid, That their Privileges were derived from the Grace and Permiſſion of his Anceſtors and himſelf, ſince moſt of them grew from Precedents, rather ſhewing a Toleration than an Inheritance, yet he gave them his Royal Aſſurance, that as long as they continu'd within the Limits of their Duty, he would be as careful to maintain their Liberties and Privileges, as ever any of his Predeceſſors did, nay, as he was to preſerve his own Royal Prerogative.

The Petition of the Lords.

But before this Heat aroſe in the Houſe of Commons, the Lords began to conſider how cheap they were made by the Multitude of Iriſh and Scotch Earls and Viſcounts the King had created, not the Natives of thoſe Kingdoms, but private Engliſh Gentlemen, who had purchas'd and aſſum'd thoſe Titles, to get above the Engliſh Barony, contrary to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Land. Therefore a Petition to the King was drawn up and ſign'd by thirty three Lords, praying that the Privilege of their Birth-Rights might be preſerv'd, and a Stop put to this growing Miſchief. The King was extreamly uneaſy at this Petition, not knowing what Conteſts the Endeavours for Place and Precedency might produce: And being fully prepar'd, he ſent for the Petitioners ſeparately, and privately expoſtulated the Buſineſs with them one by one, beginning roughly with ſome of them; yet ſtill he clos'd with them at laſt, as tho' his Anger was rais'd to make them humble, and reconcile themſelves to him, that he might the better reconcile himſelf to them. And to the Earl of Eſſex he threw out this Expreſſion, I fear thee not, Eſſex, if thou wert as well belov'd as thy Father, and hadſt forty thouſand Men at thy Heels: Which Words were utter'd with ſuch a Force, as if he had chid himſelf for letting them eſcape from him. And tho' this Petition did not derogate from the Dignity of thoſe Creations paſt, yet the King willingly reſtrain'd himſelf for the Time to come.

The Commons Proteſtation.

But the Houſe of Commons proceeded to bolder Attempts; and judging the King's Letters ſo many Impediments to their Privileges, and for all the King's Promiſes the Proteſtant Religion was unſecure, if the Spaniſh Match ſucceeded, they reſolv'd, whatever might be the Conſequence, to leave ſome Prints and Footſteps of their Parliamentary Rights and Privileges to their Poſterities, as their Anceſtors had done to them; and therefore on the nineteenth of December, they regiſter'd the following Proteſtation in their Journal Book after they had given two entire Subſidies. ‘ That the Liberties, Franchiſes, Privi‘ leges and Juriſdictions of Parliaments, are the ancient and undoubted Birth-Right and Inheritance of the Subjects of England, and that the arduous and urgent Affairs concerning the King, State and Defence of the Realm, and of the Church of England, and the Maintenance and making Laws, and Redreſs of Miſchiefs and Grievances, which daily happen within this Realm, are proper Subjects, and Matters of Counſel and Debate in Parliament. That in handling and proceeding in ſuch Buſineſs, every Member of Parliament hath, and of Right ought to have Freedom of Speech, to propound, treat, reaſon, and bring the ſame to Concluſions. That the Commons in Parliament have likewiſe Liberty and Freedom to treat of theſe Matters, in ſuch Order as in their Judgments ſhall ſeem fitteſt. That every Member of the ſaid Houſe hath like Freedom; from all Impeachment, Impriſonment and Moleſtation, other than by Cenſure of the Houſe it ſelf, for, or concerning any Speaking, Reaſoning, or Declaring of any Matter or Matters, touching the Parliament, or Parliament Buſineſs. And that if any of the ſaid Members be complain'd of, or queſtion'd for any Thing done or ſaid in Parliament, the ſame is to be ſhew'd to the King, by the Advice and Aſſent of all the Commons aſſembled in Parliament, before the King give Credit to any private Information.

The King oppoſes it.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

The King was again alarm'd by this Proteſtation, and he who naturally lov'd Peace both at home and abroad, had a War rais'd within his own Breaſt: For if he ſhould be ſilent or connive at this Proteſtation, it would remain as a ſtrong Bulwark for the People to Poſterity. Therefore neglecting his Pleaſures and Health in the Country, he came haſtily up to London, and upon the thirtieth of December, in a full Aſſembly of the Council, and in the Preſence of the Judges, he declar'd the ſaid Proteſtation void, invalid, and of none Effect, and with his Hand took the ſaid Proteſtation out of the Journal Book of the Clerk of the Houſe of Commons, and commanded an Act of Council to be made thereupon, and this Act to be enter'd in the Regiſter of the Council-Cauſes. And to put a Stop to all Complaints, as he conceiv'd, on the ſixth of January he by a Proclamation diſſolv'd the Parliament, after it had continu'd almoſt a Year, without paſſing one Act beſides the Subſidies, of which the Commons gave two, and the Clergy three. The Proclamation ſet forth, 'That the Meeting, Continuing, and Diſſolving of Parliaments, does ſo peculiarly belong to the King, that he needs not give any Account thereof to any other; yet he thought fit to declare, That in the Diſſolution of this Parliament he had the Advice and uniform Conſent of his whole Council; and that ſome particular Members took inordinate Liberty, not only to treat of his High Prerogatives, and Matters not fit to be argu'd in Parliament, but alſo to ſpeak diſreſpectfully of Foreign Princes: That they ſpent their Time in diſputing Privileges, and deſcanting upon the Words and Syllables of his Letters and Meſſages; and that theſe ill-temper'd Spirits ſow'd Tares among the Corn, and by their Carriage have impos'd upon him a Neceſſity of diſcontinuing the preſent Parliament. And laſtly he declar'd, That tho' the Parliament was broken off, yet he intended to govern well; and ſhould be glad to lay hold on the firſt Occaſion to call another.

Cenſures upon it.

This unexpected Diſſolution and Proclamation gave Occaſion to ſeveral ſawcy Tongues to ſlander their Sovereign and his Government, eſpecially when they found that ſeveral eminent Members of the Houſe of Commons, as Sir Edward Cook, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Mr. Mallery, and others, were committed to the Tower and other Priſons. They ſaid that Great Britain was now grown leſs than Little England, which had loſt its Strength by Changing of Sexes; and the ſcandalous Story of David Rizio, written by the King's Tutor Buchanan, had dy'd in every Engliſh Man's Opinion, if it had not been reviv'd by theſe Controverſies with the Parliament. And as Troubles bred Diſturbances at home, ſo they caus'd no leſs Diſhonour abroad, for they now deſpis'd the King's Power, as much as formerly they did his Courage; and in the King of Spain's own Towns, in their publick Comedies, they preſented Meſſengers bringing News in haſte, that the Palatinate would ſhortly be repleniſh'd with a moſt formidable Army; For the King of Denmark would furniſh them with a hundred thouſand Pickel'd Herrings, the Hollanders with as many Butter-Boxes, and England with as many Ambaſſadors. In one Place they Pictur'd King James with a Scabbard without a Sword, and in another with a Sword that none could draw out, tho' ſeveral were pulling at it; and at Bruſſels they painted him with his Pockets hanging out, and no Mony in them, or his Purſe. And what was highly pitiable, as well as vilely diſhonourable, at Antwerp they pictur'd the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia like a poor Iriſh Mantler, with her Hair diſhevel'd, and her Child on her Back, with the King her Father carrying the Cradel after her. And every one of theſe Pictures had ſeveral Motto's, expreſſing the Fruitfulneſs of their Malice; ſuch Deriſions and Reflections were put upon the King, and in him upon the whole Nation. But Spanhemius more ſeriouſly and ſolemnly ſums up all the Ills that attended the Conduct of King James, and his Son-in-Law in Germany, 'That thereby the Proteſtant Religion was entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the Electoral Dignity transferr'd from the Palatine Family, the Palatinate it ſelf loſt, the Liberty of Germany overthrown, and the Famous Library of Heidelberg remov'd to Rome, to the irreparable Prejudice of Learning.' So that Gondomar ſeem'd to have ſome Reaſon to ſay in one of his Letters to the Duke of Lerma, That he had lull'd King James aſleep, that he hop'd neither the Cries of his Daughter nor her Children, nor the repeated Sollicitations of his Parliament and Subjects on their Behalf, ſhould be able to awaken him.

Digby's Embaſſy into Spain.

The Character of Biſhop Williams.

IX. King James having freed himſelf from the Complainings of a troubleſome Parliament, ſtill retain'd his main Deſigns and Reſolutions of compleating the Marriage of his Son with the Infanta of Spain; where King Philip the Third being lately dead, was ſucceeded by Philip the Fourth. In order to effect this long and dilatory Affair, he ſent the Lord Digby his Ambaſſador Extraordinary into Spain; who landed at St. Andero, a poor Maritime Town in Biſcay, where the People uſually went bare-foot. In that mean Place his Lordſhip had the Patience to ſtay a Fortnight in Expectation of the Spaniſh Court Civilities; but in Reality was ſo ſlighted by tedious and impertinent Delays, and at laſt by baſe and ſordid Accommodations, that it was admir'd how he could bear it, and that the Spaniards were not aſham'd to offer it to an Ambaſſador. It was thought the more ſtrange, ſince King James had now treated the Roman Catholicks at home with ſo much Indulgence, that Gondomar boaſted he had releas'd four thouſand Recuſants by his own Mediation, either to make his Service more acceptable to his Maſter, or to let him ſee how willing King James was to advance that Match which had never been really deſign'd in Spain. Then to expedite the Diſpenſation at Rome, he wrote to ſome of the moſt active Cardinals there, and receiv'd Anſwers from them by Gage, his Agent, full of promiſing Hopes. And that he might give ſome publick Teſtimony of his Indulgence, he commanded Biſhop Williams, then Lord-Keeper, to paſs Writs under the great Seal, to require the Judges of every Circuit to enlarge all ſuch Papiſts as were impriſon'd for Recuſancy, which was accordingly obſerv'd and perform'd. This Biſhop, as was formerly hinted, ſucceeded the famous Lord Bacon; and for ſome Time continu'd in Favour with the Marqueſs of Buckingham, and the Counteſs his Mother, whoſe Creature he was, and who as it was believ'd, could mould and form him into any Shape to ſerve their Purpoſes; but afterwards growing high and ſtiff, they laid him aſide. He was of a comely and ſtately Preſence, which being animated with a great Spirit, made him appear very proud to vulgar Eyes; tho' really as he was a Man of extraordinary Parts, aiming at great Things, ſo he was of a bountiful Mind to all Men in Want, and a noble Patron to ſupport where Merit wanted a Supply. This was ſhewn in his Treatment of Monſieur de Moulin, a famous Miniſter of France, driven by Perſecution into England; which being told the Biſhop, he order'd Doctor Hacket his Chaplain to make him a Viſit from him, and likewiſe to carry him ſome Money, not naming any Sum, purpoſely to ſound the Generoſity of his Chaplain. Doctor Hacket finding the Biſhop to mention no certain Sum ſaid, He could give him no leſs than twenty Pounds. Upon which his Lordſhip ſuddenly anſwer'd, Is twenty Pounds a fit Preſent from me to a Man of his Parts and Merit? Take a hundred Pounds, and preſent it from me, telling him he ſhall not want, and I will come ſhortly and viſit him my ſelf. Which he afterwards perform'd, and made good his Promiſe, in ſupplying him during his Abode in England.

Archbiſhop Abbot's Misfortune.

About this Time, the Reverend Prelate Doctor Abbot Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, began to fall into Diſgrace at Court, his Enemies taking Advantage of a late ſad Miſfortune; for ſhooting at a Deer with a Croſs-Bow in Bramzil Park, the Arrow glancing caſually kill'd the Keeper. This unfortunate Accident was ſuch a ſenſible Affliction to this pious Man, that he retir'd to an Alms-Houſe of his own Building at Guilford in Surrey, there to mortifie himſelf from the Enjoyment of worldly Pleaſures. Some were of Opinion that it diſabled him from exerciſing his Epiſcopal Function; but the King granting a Commiſſion to enquire into the Fact, he found Friends that reſtor'd him from his Alms-Houſe to his Palace, and he conferr'd a comfortable Subſiſtance upon the Widow and Children of this unhappy ſlain Man. But however, having diſguſted the King by diſapproving the Spaniſh Match, he never could recover any great Authority; and a Plant was now growing up that overſpread him while he liv'd, and after his Deceaſe obtain'd the Primacy.

The Riſe of Biſhop Laud.

And this was the famous Dr. William Laud, a Perſon of extraordinary Spirit and Zeal, who was now made Biſhop of St. Davids, by the Intereſt of the Marqueſs of Buckingham and the Lord-Keeper Williams. This great and fiery Man, at Oxford had ſhown himſelf a mortal Oppoſer of the Puritans, of whom Abbot was thought to be a Favourer, and was there charg'd not only with Arminianiſm, but with holding ſeveral of the Romiſh Tenets. But for the ſcandalous Manner of his Riſe, related by Coke, and pretendedly atteſted, it is ſo contrary to Probability, that it can deſerve no Place in Hiſtory. The King had been diſoblig'd at ſome Actions of his, therefore Buckingham his great Friend reſolv'd to make uſe of Williams to raiſe him into the Biſhoprick; and Williams knowing the Diſpoſal of the Seal was at the other's Pleaſure, found himſelf oblig'd to become Laud's Advocate to the King. But his Majeſty was at firſt utterly averſe, for ſeveral Reaſons; but the Keeper earneſtly perſiſting; the King at laſt ſaid, Is there no Hold, but you will carry it! Then take him to you; but on my Soul, you will repent it: And ſo departed in a great Paſſion, with other fierce and ominous Words, publickly diſcours'd in Court; after this Arminianiſm daily increas'd, and Puritaniſm was more ſtrictly watch'd; but to reſtrain the licentious Tongues among either Party, the King iſſu'd out a Letter to the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, with ſeveral good Articles and Directions to all Preachers whatſoever, as may be ſeen at large in Wilſon and Ruſhworth.

As the King now labour'd to ſettle things at home, and keep his People in Obedience, ſo he was as active abroad to preſerve his own Reputation: For he ſtill concluded that he ſhould ſalve all Miſcarriages by the intended Match with Spain, and that his People might ſee he could diſcern further into deep Matters of State than they, and ſo make the Error theirs.

The King's Endeavours for the Spaniſh Match.

Therefore he induſtriouſly urg'd it by his Agents and Ambaſſadors, and all Indulgences to Recuſants were admitted to ſmooth and ſoften their Addreſſes. The Lord Vaux, a Roman Catholick, had Liberty to tranſport four thouſand Engliſh, to reinforce the King of Spain's Armies, both againſt King James's Confederates of Holland, where his baniſh'd Children had Refuge, and againſt their Country it ſelf the Palatinate, which he had ſo much endeavour'd to preſerve. The Articles of Marriage had taken up much Time in Debate, between the Commiſſioners of the two Kings, before they could be brought to any Form; and thoſe concerning Religion had many various Shapes and Turns, 'till they were dreſs'd to their Satisfaction; and when they were form'd and faſhion'd by them, the Pope ſtrip'd them, and new modell'd them as he pleas'd. So that the ſending and reſending between Spain and Rome, and Rome and Spain, waſted much Time, and might have ſerv'd for a Colour to draw the Treaty in Infinitum. Wherefore King James wrote ſeveral Letters to the Lord Digby, whom he made Earl of Briſtol; and he was commanded to declare plainly to the King of Spain, 'How far the King his Maſter had condeſcended in Matters of Religion, which was more than was capitulated in the late King of Spain's Reign; and if that would give Content, to proceed to a Concluſion of the Marriage, without further Delay; if otherwiſe, that then without more Loſs of Time, the King his Maſter may diſpoſe of his Son, and the King of Spain of the Infanta, as they pleas'd.' But the Spaniard ſtill continu'd in his former Pace, and would not be ſpurr'd forwards; and the Earl of Briſtol ſtill aſſur'd his Maſter, That the King of Spain, tho' ſlow in his Proceedings, was real in his Intentions.

The Spaniards unfair Dealings.

And tho' the Articles were fully drawn up in form, and agreed on both Sides, yet it is plain from the King of Spain's Letter to Olivarez this Year, that the Spaniard never deſign'd the Match at all, in which he poſitively tells him, 'That his Father had the ſame Deſign as well as himſelf, and ſo declar'd upon his Death-Bed; therefore he would have him break it off as ſoon as conveniently he cou'd.' Thus was King James's Plain-heartedneſs deluded, his Honour blemiſh'd, his Love among his Subjects diminiſh'd, his Childrens Patrimony deſtroy'd, and he himſelf left without any Satisfaction.

Reg. 21.
Buckingham's ſtrange Project.

This ſtrange and unreaſonable Management in the Court of Spain gave Riſe and Occaſion to a very peculiar, if not romantick Project form'd by the Marqueſs of Buckingham, who envy'd the Earl of Briſtol for having the ſole Management of ſo great an Affair. Therefore he took the Opportunity to inſinuate to Prince Charles the common Misfortune of Men of his Rank, 'That in ſo nice a Part of their worldly Happineſs, as depended upon their Marriage, they had ſo ſmall a Share, uſually depending upon the uncertain Credit of others, for the Nature, Humour and Beauty of the Ladies they were to marry. Next, how brave and gallant it would appear for his Highneſs to make a Journey into Spain, and bring home his Lady; that it would put an End to all thoſe ſlow Formalities, which might ſtill retard the Infanta's Voyage for ſeveral Months; all which would be immediately remov'd by his engaging Appearance: That it would be ſuch a ſingular Obligation to the Infanta, as ſhe could never ſufficiently eſteem or requite, as being a Reſpect rarely paid by any other Prince, on the like Occaſion: That in the great Affair concerning the Palatinate, it was very probable the King of Spain might readily gratify his perſonal Interpoſition, which in a Treaty with an Ambaſſador might be protracted, or attended with the ſtarting of new Difficulties: However, the Mediation could not but be frankly undertaken by the Infanta her ſelf, who would ambitiouſly make it Part of her great Debt to the Prince, that he might by her Influence preſent to his Majeſty the Peace and Reſtitution of his Family; which could not be effected by any other human Means.' Theſe Diſcourſes made ſo deep an Impreſſion upon the Mind and Spirit of the Prince, who was naturally inclin'd to Adventures, that he was tranſported with the Thought of it, and impatiently ſollicitous to compaſs the Deſign. The moſt apparent Difficulty was how they ſhould procure the King's Conſent, who they knew to be very quick-ſighted in diſcerning Difficulties, and raiſing Objections, but very ſlow in maſtering and unravelling them; who, not knowing how to ſtruggle with deſperate Contingencies, abhorr'd to be involv'd and intangled with them. This was therefore firſt to be attempted by the Prince himſelf, and to communicate it to the King as his humble Suit, with this Circumſtance, that ſince all his Actions depended entirely upon his Majeſty's own Approbation, he would vouchſafe to promiſe Not to communicate the thing propos'd, before he had firſt taken his own Reſolution: And that this Condition ſhould be firſt obtain'd, before the ſubſtantial Part ſhould be diſcover'd; and ſo this Approach being firſt made, the Succeſs and Proſecution was to be left to the Credit and Dexterity of the Marqueſs.

The King acquainted with it.

All things being thus concerted, the two Adventurers ſoon found a proper Opportunity to make their Approaches. His Majeſty chearfully conſented to the main Condition of Secrecy, the Prince upon his Knees declar'd his importunate Suit and Requeſt, while the Marqueſs ſtood by and enlarg'd upon the infinite Obligations his Majeſty would accumulate upon the Prince, by his yielding to the tender Paſſion with which his Highneſs was tranſported; which being refus'd, would make a deep Impreſſion upon his Spirits, and be accounted as the greateſt Misfortune that could befall him in this World. The Prince taking Opportunity from the good Temper of his Father, inſiſted upon two Points, That his Preſence in Spain would immediately conclude the Marriage, and likewiſe determine the Reſtitution of the Palatinate to his Brother and Siſter; both which the King paſſionately deſir'd. Theſe Diſcourſes, urg'd with the utmoſt Artifice and Addreſs, ſo prevail'd upon the King, that with leſs Heſitation than was uſual, and much leſs than was agreeable to his Wiſdom and Character, he gave his Approbation and Conſent that the Prince ſhould make the Journey he ſo earneſtly deſir'd.

The King conſents to the Prince's Journey.

They therefore, to prevent any new Meaſures which a ſolemn Preparation for ſo raſh an Undertaking might gradually occaſion, as ſoon as they had gain'd the King's Promiſe upon the main, repreſented, 'That the Security of ſuch a Deſign depended on Expedition; that were they to ſtay either to the equipping a Fleet to attend the Prince of Wales, or 'till a Paſs may be obtain'd from France, the principal Ends of their Journey would by Delays be diſappointed; That therefore, ſince the Deſign had hitherto been a Secret to all but themſelves, they might with the Attendance of only two Servants, get through France, before they could be miſs'd at Whitehall:' Which indeed was very probable, and ſo the more readily conſented to by the King; the Time of their Departure, the Servants that were to attend them, and whatever elſe ſhould be thought neceſſary, being deferr'd 'till a ſecond Conſultation on the next Day.

But when the timorous King in his Retirement came ſeriouſly to revolve what had been ſo looſely conſulted, as he had a wonderful Sagacity in ſuch Reflections, a thouſand Dangers and Difficulties occurr'd to his diſtracted Thought; ſuggeſted as well by the violent Affection of a Father to his only Son, as the Influence he thought it might have on his People, too much inclin'd to murmur, and complain of the leaſt Inadvertency; together with the Reputation he ſhould forfeit among all Foreign Princes, if he ſo much departed from his Dignity, as to expoſe the immediate Heir of three Kingdoms to all the Jealouſies and Dangers, that might ariſe from that fathomleſs Abyſs, Reaſons of State. Theſe Reflexions were ſo terrible to him, that they robb'd him of all Peace and Reſt:

He repents.

ſo that when the Prince and the Marqueſs came to him about the Diſpatch, he fell into a violent Paſſion with Tears, and told them, That he was undone, and that it would break his Heart, if they purſu'd their Reſolution. Then he recounted to them all the numerous Difficulties and Miſchiefs that had occurr'd to himſelf in his Retirement; particularly obſerving to the Marqueſs, who was already unpopular to the higheſt Degree, how unevitable his Ruin muſt be; concluding with that Diſorder and Paſſion with which he began, and with Sighs and Tears conjur'd them, That they would no longer urge him to conſent to a thing ſo contrary to his Reaſon and Underſtanding, the Performance of which would prove his Death. The Prince and the Marqueſs took no Pains to anſwer any of his Majeſty's Reaſons: His Highneſs only reminded him of the Promiſe he had made the Day before, Which if he ſhould violate, it would make him never think of Marriage more. But the Marqueſs, who better knew what Arguments would prevail, treated him more rudely, and with all the Inſolence of a Favourite told him, His Breach of a Promiſe ſo ſolemnly made, would ruin his Credit with all Mankind; that ſome Raſcal had furniſh'd him with his pitiful Reaſons; and that it would be ſuch a Diſobligation to the Prince, whoſe Heart was fix'd upon the Journey after his Majeſty's Approbation, that he could never forget it, nor forgive any Man who had been the Occaſion of it. So that at length the Prince by his humble and importunate Entreaties, and Buckingham by his rougher Dialect, prevail'd ſo far, that the Debate upon the Journey was reſum'd, in which it was agreed, That they ſhould take their Leaves of the King in two Days, his Highneſs pretending to hunt at Theobalds, and the Marqueſs to take Phyſick at Chelſey.

Buckingham hectors him.

They next proceeded to the manner of Attendance, and told the King, That being to have no more than two in their Company, they had fix'd upon Sir Francis Cottington, and Endymion Porter, who were both grateful to the King, the former being Secretary to the Prince, and the other of his Bed-Chamber; ſo that his Majeſty wiſh'd that it might be immediately imparted to them, becauſe many things might occur to them, as neceſſary to the Journey, which they two would not think on. Whereupon Sir Francis Cottington, waiting then in the outward Room, was quickly brought in; to whom the King ſaid, Here is Baby Charles and Stenny (for ſo he uſually call'd the Marqueſs) have a mind to go Poſt into Spain, to fetch home the Infanta, and deſigning to have but two in their Company, have choſen you for one; what think you of the Journey? Sir Francis, ſurpris'd and trembling at the Conſequence, reply'd, That he could not think well of it; for the Spaniards, when they had the Prince in Poſſeſſion, would make what new Overtures they believ'd moſt advantageous to themſelves, and among the reſt, many that concern'd Religion, and the Exerciſe of it in England, and by that means ruin all the Attempts that have been for the compleating the Match. Upon this the King threw himſelf upon his Bed, and ſaid, I told you this before, and fell into new Paſſion and Lamentation, That he was undone, and ſhould loſe Baby Charles! Hereupon the Marqueſs reproach'd Cottington with all poſſible Bitterneſs of Words, and told him, That the King only ask'd him about the Journey, and beſt Way of Travelling, and not his Advice upon Matters of State, which he had the Preſumption to give againſt his Maſter, and which he ſhould repent as long as he liv'd. This threw the poor King into a new Agony, on the Behalf of a Servant like to ſuffer for anſwering honeſtly; upon which he reply'd with ſome Heat, and a profane Oath, You are very much to blame to uſe him thus; he has anſwer'd like an honeſt and wiſe Man to the Queſtion I ask'd him, and you know 'tis no more than I told you before he came in. However, after all this Paſſion and Heats on both Sides, the King yielded; having by this plainly diſcover'd that the whole Intrigue was firſt contriv'd by the Marqueſs, and now purſu'd by his Spirit and Impetuoſity.

He yields.

The Prince and Buckingham begin their Journey.

The two Adventurers being ready, with their two Attendants, ſet forwards with falſe Beards to cover their ſmooth Faces, and paſs'd towards Dover under the Names of Jack Smith and Tom Smith, in all Places leaving greater Impreſſions of their Bounty than was agreeable with their Diſguiſes. At Dover the officious Mayor examin'd them ſo ſtrictly, that the Marqueſs was forc'd to diſcover himſelf in private, and tell him he was going to viſit the Fleet; ſo they had Liberty to take Shipping, and landed at Bologn the ſame Day, making the ſwifteſt Motion by Poſt Horſes 'till they arriv'd at Paris. There the Prince ſpent one Day to view the Grandeur of the City, and Splendor of the Court; and they both together ſaw the Queen-Mother at Dinner, the King in the Gallery after Dinner, and towards the Evening they had a full View of the Queen Infanta, and the Princeſs Henrietta Maria, with moſt of the Beauties of the Court, at the Practice of a Masking-Dance; being admitted by the Duke of Montbaſon, the Queen's Lord-Chamberlain, in Courteſie to Strangers, when many of the French were refus'd. Here the Prince ſaw thoſe Eyes, which afterwards ſo inflam'd his Heart, that it was thought to be one Occaſion of inflaming three Kingdoms. From Paris they paſs'd with all Expedition to Bourdeaux, where the Duke d'Eſpernon, Governor of the City, offer'd them the Civilities of his Houſe; but Sir Francis Cottington handſomly declin'd the Invitation, by informing him, That they were Gentlemen that deſir'd to improve themſelves, and had not Breeding ſuitable to his Grandeur. They met with ſome Difficulties alſo at Bayonne, the laſt Town in France, where the Count de Gramont was Governor; who being a pregnant Man, read ſomething extraordinary in their Looks, but this being a Time of Peace, he out of ordinary Civility let them paſs: Yet within a few Hours after they had taken Poſt, he had Notice by a Courier from the Spaniſh Ambaſſador to the Engliſh Court, that the Prince of England was among them; ſo that the Prince had great Fortune in meeting with ſuch little Interruption, when the French might have made great Advantages by ſtopping his Paſſage.

They arrive in Spain.

Upon Saturday the ſixth of March they arriv'd at Madrid; where the Prince and Marqueſs came one Day before Cottington and Porter, to raiſe the leſs Noiſe in Appearances. They lighted at the Earl of Briſtol's Houſe in the Evening, where the Marqueſs brought in the Portmanteau, while his Maſter ſtaid without with the Guide, 'till he had prepar'd a way for Privacy. The Earl of Briſtol was aſtoniſh'd at the Sight; and the next Morning the City was fill'd with Rumours of the Arrival of ſome great Prince; which was ſufficiently known to the King of Spain, tho' he thought fit to conceal it. In the Evening Buckingham and Briſtol went to Court, and had private Audience of the King, who ſent his grand Favourite Olivarez back with them, to congratulate the Prince's Arrival, who let the Prince know how infinitely happy his Maſter was in the Enjoyment of him there; and that the Obligation was ſo great, that he deſerv'd to have the Infanta thrown into his Arms; all this while kneeling, kiſſing his Hands, and imbracing his Thigh, with all the Marks of Spaniſh Humility. Next he addreſs'd himſelf to the Marqueſs of Buckingham, telling him, That now the Prince of England was in Spain, his Maſter and he would divide the World between them, with other Flights of Rhetorick and Fancy. After his Departure, about ten a Clock at Night, the King of Spain came in a cloſe Coach to viſit the Prince, who having Notice of his coming, met him in the Way; and there they ſpent ſome Time in ſuch Careſſes and Embraces as are uſual at the Interviews of great Princes and Monarchs. Gondomar, lately return'd, had alſo his peculiar Compliment the next Day; for he declar'd to the Prince, That he had ſtrange News to tell him, which was, That an Engliſhman was ſworn Privy-Counſellor to the King of Spain; meaning himſelf, who had lately receiv'd that Honour, tho' he was an Engliſhman in his Heart.

Their kind Reception.

The Prince highly honour'd.

The common Sort did highly applaud this brave Adventure, and expreſs'd his Welcome by Shouts and Acclamations of Joy; and immediately they marry'd him to the Infanta, as it were by publick Voice. The King and Council contriv'd how to give his Highneſs the moſt honourable Reception, and decreed, that upon all Occaſions of Meeting he ſhould have the Precedency of the King; that he ſhould make his Entrance into the Royal Palace, in the ſame State that the Kings of Spain us'd to do on the Day of their Coronation, and that one of the chief Quarters in the King's Palace ſhould be prepar'd for his Lodgings; that an hundred of the Guard ſhould attend him, and all the Council obey him as the King's own Perſon. A general Pardon was publiſh'd; the Priſons were open'd, and hundreds of Offenders were ſet at Liberty; and a late Proclamation againſt Exceſs in Apparel was revok'd. The following Day after Dinner the King came in Perſon, with his Favourite Olivarez, and ſeveral other of the Nobility, to conduct the Prince from the Town to the Court, having Horſes and all Equipage proper for ſuch Shew and Grandeur. Thus nobly mounted, they rode through the Streets under a Canopy in as much State as at a Coronation, the Prince riding on the King's right Hand. The Queen and the Infanta from a Window in the Court ſaw them; and when they diſmounted the Infanta retir'd, and the Queen went to her Chamber, in Expectation of a Viſit. When the King and Prince enter'd her Room, ſhe roſe to meet them, making a low Obeiſance to the Prince, which he return'd with a profound reverential Bow; and after ſome Compliments, they ſat down on three Royal Seats, the Queen in the middle, and the Prince on her right Hand; when after half an Hour's Converſation, the Queen brought the Prince to the utmoſt Extent of her Chamber, and the King to a ſtately Apartment provided for him. Immediately after the Queen by her Major-domo gave him a further Welcome, with ſeveral rich Preſents of Perfumes, and coſtly wearing Linnen; and the King ſent him two Golden Keys, which would open all his private Lodgings, and his Bed-Chamber, letting him know, that he had free Acceſs to him at all Hours. Here he was conſtantly attended and ſerv'd with Grandees and Titulados, as the King himſelf; and was entertain'd with many Shows and Triumphs, and ſeveral daily Paſtimes. And one Day running at the Ring, in Company of many of the Nobility, his Highneſs was the only Perſon that bore the Ring away, and that in the Preſence of the Infanta his Miſtreſs; which was interpreted as a fortunate Preſage at the Beginning of his Atchievement. In ſum, there wanted nothing that human Invention could produce to manifeſt and diſplay the Height of outward Glory. And now the Engliſh Nobility came over in great Numbers into Spain, and the Marqueſs of Buckingham had the new Title of Duke ſent him by King James, that he might be in the higheſt Rank among the Spaniſh Grandees; and the Prince was ſo incircled with a magnificent Retinue of his own People, that it might be ſaid, there was an Engliſh Court in the Palace of the King of Spain.

His Inclinations for the Infanta.

When all the ſplendid Ceremonies were a little over, the Prince began to conſider the main Buſineſs of his Journey, and deſir'd a more intimate Acceſs to his Miſtreſs, which Olivarez promis'd from Day to Day, but ſtill delay'd: But at length, when unperform'd Promiſes were heightened into Shame, he plainly confeſs'd that it was agreed by the King and Council, That he might not ſee her as a Lover, 'till the Diſpenſation came from Rome; but he had ſometimes Acceſs to her as a Prince in a publick Way, the King of Spain being always preſent, and the Earl of Briſtol Interpreter. It was obſerv'd that the Prince had ſometimes his Eyes immoveably fix'd upon the Lady for half an Hour together, in a thoughtful ſpeculative Poſture, other times he watch'd a full Hour in a cloſe Coach in the Streets to ſee her as ſhe went abroad; and one particular Time, he climb'd over a lofty Wall, and hazarded his Life, to ſee her in a Garden. But now the chief Obſtructions ſeem'd to have proceeded from the Pope, who us'd all Endeavours to cauſe the Prince to turn Catholick; the People of Spain were not a little elevated with ſuch Hopes, and Promiſes were made to him of great Aſſiſtance, if his own People Endeavours to make him turn Catholick.

ſhould rebel upon that Conſideration. Orations and Proceſſions and pompous Shows were made to allure him; Popiſh Books were dedicated, and Popiſh Pictures were preſented to him; they carry'd him to the moſt Religious Places, and to Perſons famous for pretended Miracles; and the Pope himſelf wrote a ſmooth inſinuating Letter to him, and another to the Duke of Buckingham, to bring about this glorious Converſion. He return'd a civil Anſwer to the Pope's Letter, but as he had firſt anſwer'd Olivarez, He came not thither for Religion, but for a Wife, ſo he remain'd ſtedfaſt in his Religion, nor did he expreſs any ſhew of Change, when he was under the greateſt Temptations.

A. D. 1623. Reg. 21.

At length, after innumerable Scruples and Impediments, the long ſollicited Diſpenſation came from Pope Gregory to the Court of Spain, but ſo clog'd that it caus'd new Delays and Difficulties, which were at laſt ſurmounted by the King of Spain, who now began to be ſeriouſly inclin'd to the Match, and caus'd it to be publickly declar'd at Madrid. After which certain Articles, to the Number of twenty three, were ſign'd and ſworn to by the King of England, Articles of the Marriage.

the Prince and Privy-Council. Theſe were ſtil'd by the Cardinals, Propoſitions for the right Augmentation and Weal of the Roman Catholick Religion, and were much of the ſame Nature with thoſe which we have given the Subſtance, Page 394; only in one Article it was provided, 'That the 'Sons and Daughters that ſhould be born of Marriage, 'ſhould be brought up in the Company of the Infanta, at 'leaſt 'till the Age of ten Years.' Beſides theſe publick Articles, which were confirm'd under the Great Seal of England, Ruſhworth has given us ſome private Articles, ſworn to by King James and the Prince, greatly to the Advantage of the Romaniſts in England; but of theſe Nalſon juſtly doubts, as being too much void of Proof, as well as K. James's Satisfaction.

Probability. Thus the great Buſineſs ſeem'd to have been accompliſh'd; which gave King James ſo much Satisfaction, that being tranſported with an Aſſurance of the Match, he was heard to ſay, Now all the Devils in Hell cannot break it; to which one ſoftly reply'd, There was never a Devil left in Hell, for they were all gone into Spain to make it up. In Spain the Infanta was ſtil'd The Princeſs of England, and was kept no longer in her Virgin Retirements. In England a Chapel was building for her at St. James's, and Don Carlos, the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, laid the firſt Stone: Her Picture was every where to be ſeen, and a Fleet was prepar'd for her Paſſage; and the greateſt Enemies to the Alliance ſubmitted to the King's Will. But in all this Capitulation between the two Crowns, the Reſtitution of the Palatinate was laid aſide; the King conceiving that the Conſummation of the Match would overrule and ſettle that Affair to his intire Satisfaction. The French were very apprehenſive of this Conjunction, and thought it ſafeſt to make Peace at home, and employ their Strength to bound the Incroachments of the Emperor and King of Spain: By which means a ſevere Perſecution ceas'd in that Kingdom; the Proteſtants were permitted to call home their baniſh'd Miniſters, to build their ruin'd Churches, and enjoy their Liberty in Religion. This Happineſs did King James's joining with Spain procure to an almoſt ruined People.

New Delays in the Spaniſh Court.

But after all the King's Conceſſions, the Spaniards contriv'd new Delays, and propos'd harder Terms; and the Pope had oblig'd the Catholick King to ſee the Conditions perform'd, and to protract the Marriage, 'till Matters in England were put in perfect Execution. Whereupon the Divines adviſ'd the King, that the Promiſes of Marriage be immediately made, but the Conſummation and the Delivery of the Infanta, be deferr'd 'till May in the following Year. But while they were contriving new Remora's, Pope Gregory that granted the Diſpenſation dy'd, which furniſh'd them with a Pretence that the Diſpenſation was now invalid; yet with a Reſerve to keep up the Prince's Spirit, That it ſhould be no hindrance to the Match, for the new Pope would immediately perform his Part; and the King of Spain aſſur'd the Prince, That if he would ſtay 'till Chriſtmas, the Marriage ſhould then be really celebrated. Theſe repeated Delays, and continu'd Obſtructions, caus'd the Duke of Buckingham, who was highly diſobliged at Olivarez, to ſend home ſuch provoking Accounts of the Spaniſh Procraſtinations, that King James writ to Buckingham in the moſt expreſs Terms to bring his Son back with all Speed, and if his Son's Youthful Follies ſhould tie him to a longer Expectation, he charg'd him upon his Allegiance to come away, and leave him there. This Letter was immediately ſhown by the Duke to the Prince, which ſo effectually wrought upon him, that he took up a ſudden Reſolution to return into England. Of which the Grandees in Spain having Notice, they were exceedingly concern'd; for their Deſign was to detain the Prince there all Winter, not only hoping to turn him to their Religion, but to marry him to the Infanta, that ſhe being with Child before the Spring, they might keep her there 'till ſhe was deliver'd, that ſo the Child might be educated and naturaliz'd a Spaniard, both in Affection and Religion, which this ſudden Reſolution hindering, it extreamly ſtartled them. Olivarez charg'd the Duke of Buckingham with giving him Aſſurance of the Prince's turning Catholick, which the Duke told him was falſe; which caus'd very angry and reſenting Expreſſions on both ſides: So that the Duke, not regarding a ceremonious Farewel, departed haſtily a little before the Prince, pretending to prepare the Engliſh Fleet that lay at Port St. Andero for the Prince's Tranſportation. According to his open Temper, at his Buckingham's Departure.

Departure, he told Olivarez, That he was oblig'd to the King, Queen and Infanta, in an eternal Tie of Gratitude; but for himſelf, he had ſo far diſoblig'd him, that he could not, without Flattery, make the leaſt Profeſſion of Friendſhip for him. Olivarez gave a ſhort Reply, That he accepted of what he had ſpoken. The Duke departing with ſo little Satisfaction, the Spaniards concluded, that he would endeavour by all Means poſſible to hinder the Marriage.

The Eſpouſals agreed.

But his Highneſs had gain'd an univerſal Love and Eſteem, and was look'd upon to be a truly noble, diſcreet, and well deſerving Prince; his grave Deportment ſuited with the very Genius of that Nation, which during the whole Stay was ſupported with the greateſt Affability, Solidity and Conſtancy, and at his Departure, with unparellel'd Bounty, preſenting Jewels of ineſtimable Value to the Infanta, and ſeveral Grandees. Before which, the King of Spain and the Prince both took ſolemn Oaths to accompliſh the Marriage, and to make the Eſpouſals ten Days after the Diſpenſation from the new Pope ſhould arrive; and a Procuration was ſeal'd by the Prince to the King of Spain, and his Brother, and left in the Hands of the Earl of Briſtol, to ſtop the Delivery of the Proxies, 'till further Direction from him, alledging, That the Infanta might retire into a Cloiſter, and defraud him of a Wife; but theſe Inſtructions were to be conceal'd from the Earl, 'till the Diſpenſation came from Rome.

The Prince's Departure.

After ſix Months Stay, to the vaſt Expence of the Kings of England and Spain, the Prince took a moſt ſolemn Farewel of the Queen and Infanta, who look'd upon the Marriage as compleated in Effect; and the Infanta caus'd many Divine Duties to be perform'd, for the Safety of his Return into England, expecting to follow him in no long Space. When the Prince told her, His Heart could never be out of Anxiety, 'till ſhe had paſs'd the intended Voyage, and was ſafe on the Britiſh Land, ſhe anſwer'd with a modeſt Bluſh, That if ſhe were in Danger upon the Ocean, or diſcompos'd with the rolling Waves, ſhe ſhould take Courage, and remember all the Way to whom ſhe was going. The King himſelf conducted him as far as the Eſcurial, and there nobly feaſted him; and at the Minute of parting acknowledg'd the Obligation which his Highneſs had laid upon him, him, by putting himſelf in his Hands, a thing ſo unuſual with Princes: Proteſting, He earneſtly deſir'd a nearer Conjunction of Brotherly Affection, for the more intire Unity between them. The Prince extoll'd the high Favours he had found during his Aboad in his Court and Preſence, which had begotten ſuch an Eſtimation of his Worth, as he knew not how to value; but he would leave a Mediator to ſupply his own Defects, if he would make him ſo happy as to continue him in her good Opinion, his moſt fair and moſt dear Miſtreſs.

His Arrival in England.

From thence, attended with a Train of Spaniſh Courtiers to the Engliſh Fleet, he took Shipping, with great Hazard to his Perſon; and it was obſerv'd That the firſt Words he ſpoke after he was embarqu'd, were, That it was a great Weakneſs and Folly in the Spaniard, to grant him a free Paſſage, after they had us'd him ſo ill. He arriv'd at Portſmouth on the fifth of October, and ſoon appear'd to be the Kingdom's Delight and Darling; the Peoples Hearts were fir'd at the Sight and News of him, and unanimouſly praiſed God, without any publick Edict of Thankſgiving. Publick Societies and private Families overflow'd with the moſt rapturous Expreſſions of Pleaſure and Wonder; and when he enter'd London, the Bonfires, which the Peoples Joy had kindled, ſeem'd to turn the City into one Flame.

New Propoſals to Spain.

The King was then at Royſton, to whom the Prince and Duke of Buckingham rod Poſt, and gave him a fair and plauſible Narration of all their Proceedings, laying the whole Weight of Odium upon the Spaniſh Delays, and the Earl of Briſtol's Miſcarriages; which the King, as an indulgent Father to his Son, and a kind Friend to his Favourite, took for current Payment, without further Examination. And to retaliate the former Uſage of the Spaniards, the Prince and Duke join'd with thoſe of the Council and Nobility who were averſe to the Spaniſh Match, cementing their Power with that Strength, that a Parliament was to be call'd, and the People conſulted; that they laying open the fraudulent Proceedings of the Spaniard, the King's Juſtice in breaking the Treaty might be more conſpicuous to the World. The News of a Parliament to break this Match was quickly carry'd through the Nation; and, according to their Expectations, it prov'd very grateful to the People, and gain'd them much Reſpect and Honour. But the firſt thing they did was to procure an abſolute Command from the King to the Earl of Briſtol, to ſuſpend the Delivery of the Proxy 'till Chriſtmas, tho' the Diſpenſation ſhould come ſooner; and being reſolv'd to affront the King of Spain for his former Delays, Briſtol in his Letter had poſitive Inſtructions to demand the Reſtitution of the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity, which had been wav'd and neglected in the Concluſion of the Treaty: The King in his Letter writing, It would be very ſtrange in me to receive one Daughter in Joy, and leave another in Sighs and Tears. But Briſtol's Power of deferring the Eſpouſals 'till Chriſtmas, was to be kept within his own Breaſt, and not made publick, 'till the Diſpenſation ſhould come to diſcover it: And there was a Clauſe in the Procuration left by the Prince, that the Power of that Inſtrument ſhould expire at Chriſtmas; ſo that the Execution of it was to be reſpited 'till it was altogether invalid. All this was extreamly ungrateful to the Earl of Briſtol, who had ſo long labour'd, and was ſtill endeavouring to bring about the Match.

Great Proviſions for the Match in Spain.

In the mean Time the Spaniards made all ſolemn Proviſions for the accompliſhing ſo glorious a Work; and the King of Spain ſent a ſpecial Ambaſſador into England to congratulate the Prince's happy Voyage and ſafe Return; and from thence he had Inſtructions to go into Flanders, Germany and Italy, to make known to all Princes, Potentates and Allies, how near the Treaty of Marriage was to be conſummated. As ſoon as the Diſpenſation came from the new Pope, in the Beginning of December, Bonfires were made throughout all Spain, and the great Ordnance every where thunder'd out the general Joy. The ninth of the Month was prefix'd for the Marriage Day, a noble Terras was erected between the Court and the next Church, almoſt a quarter of a Mile in length, cover'd with Tapeſtry, for the greater Magnificence, and all things appointed in the higheſt State for ſuch an extraordinary Solemnity. Great Preſents were providing in the Court of Spain for King James and the Prince; the Infanta's Family, deſign'd for England, was ſettled and eſtabliſh'd; ſhe had prepar'd the richeſt Suits for her Lord and Husband, had long practis'd the Engliſh Tongue to make it Natural, and began to draw the Letters which ſhe deſign'd to have written the Day of her Eſpouſals to the Prince her Husband, and the King her Father-in-Law. Her Journey into England was reſolv'd to be in the Beginning of March; and tho' her Portion was not nam'd in the Articles, yet it was fix'd at no leſs than two Millions of Mony, which was four Times as much as had been given with any Daughter of Spain. In this State and Perfection were the Affairs of Spain, when King James's Commands at once blaſted all this blooming Glory: For Briſtol had now Orders to declare poſitively to the King of Spain, That without the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity, the Treaty ſhould proceed no further; which was a ſtrange Surprize to the King and Infanta, when the one was like to loſe his Honour, and the other her Lover. His Anſwer was, That the Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Electorate was in the Power of another; but if the Emperor and the Duke of Bavaria would not yield to Reaſon, he would arm himſelf againſt them. But this Anſwer was not ſatisfactory from one who had us'd ſo many ſubtle Pretenſions, and had been a prime Inſtrument in the Ruin of the Count Palatine. Therefore, a Breach being apparent, the King of Spain ſent to the Earl of Briſtol to demand no more Audiences of him, to deliver no more Letters to the Infanta, and gave Command that none hereafter ſhould call her Princeſs of England. This was the End of the famous ſeven Years Treaty; in which the King of England, a King of Peace, notwithſtanding all the Spaniſh Armado's, gain'd the Victory; and Spain for many Years did not receive ſo retaliating and diſhonourable a Defeat. And this was an Amazement to the Chriſtian World, that when the Match was brought to ſuch Perfection, the Motion ſhould be rejected by that Side, which purſu'd it with ſo much Eagerneſs and unweary'd Patience; which by ſome has been call'd a Maſter-piece, by others a Myſtery of State, of which many various and uncertain Conjectures have been made.

The Match ſuddenly broke.

The Death of Mr. Cambden.

With the Breach of this Spaniſh Match ended the Life of the famous Antiquary and Hiſtorian Mr. William Cambden, Clarenceaux King at Arms, in the ſeventy fourth Year of his Age; a Perſon highly eſteem'd by Foreigners, as well as thoſe of his own Country. The latter are oblig'd to him not only for his noble Productions, but alſo for his Munificence in founding a Hiſtory-Profeſſorſhip in the Univerſity of Oxford, doubly immortalizing his Name, both in his own happy Diſcoveries, and the laudable Incouragement given to the Labours of Poſterity and future Ages.

A. D. 1624.
Reg. 22.

X. We are now approaching to the laſt great Turn of Affairs in this Reign, which had ſuch remarkable Effects in the next, namely the Marriage with France, which Buckingham had been a conſiderable Time in contriving and projecting. The Duke having by a long Converſe made himſelf Favourite to the Prince, as well as to the King, perſuaded his Highneſs to look back to the Beauty he had ſeen in France, which was nearer to him, and probably more eaſie to be obtain'd. But the Treaty with Spain ought firſt to be diſſolv'd, to give a Colour of Honour to a Proceeding with the other; and that was what nothing but a Parliament could fully accompliſh, who once removing the Cauſe, a Treaty of Peace, were beſt able to make good the Effect, which would be a War that muſt follow it. Therefore a Parliament was ſummon'd the twelfth Day of February; when the Grief that the ſudden Death of the Duke of Richmond had given the King, caus'd it to be deferr'd to the nineteenth of the ſame Month. Here the King, in a long and very obliging Speech, ‘ us'd his utmoſt Endeavours to ſweeten the Parliament into a good Opinion ‘ of all his Actions, and of his ſincere Deſires to comply ‘ with them in every thing, for the Good of the Kingdom, ‘ and his utter Averſion to the Infringement of their Liberties. He deſir'd to be accounted the Husband of his People; and becauſe he was blam'd for Remiſneſs in Maintenance of Religion, and incouraging a Toleration to ‘ Papiſts, he declar'd, As God ſhould judge him, he never ‘ thought, or ever in Words expreſs'd any thing that ſavour'd ‘ of it: Only ſometimes, for ſpecial Reaſons, he did not ſo ‘ fully put the Laws in Execution, but conniv'd at ſome ‘ things that might have hinder'd more weighty Affairs. As ‘ to what related to the breaking off the Spaniſh Match, he ‘ referr'd them to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham, to ‘ give them Satisfaction in that Affair. And towards the ‘ latter End he declar'd, He ſpoke as a Chriſtian King, that ‘ never any Traveller, in the burning, dry and ſandy De- ‘ ſart, more thirſted for Water to quench his Thirſt, than he ‘ did for a happy Concluſion of this Parliament, and that it ‘ might atone for the Miſcarriages of the three former.

The fourth Parliament in this Reign.

Within three or four Days, the Prince began to ſpeak of the Spaniſh Affairs in Parliament, in which he forgot not to mention the Duke of Buckingham with more than ordinary Affection, who obſerving the heavy Reſentment the King had of what was paſt, and the Affection he ſtill bore to the Spaniſh Treaty, reſolv'd to uſe all poſſible Means to ingratiate himſelf with the Parliament and People, who he knew always deteſted the Match, and indeed any Alliance with Spain. So when at a Conference between the two Houſes, which his Highneſs and the Duke were deſir'd to manage, the Prince had made a ſhort Introduction, and commended the Duke for his great Care of him in Spain, and his Dexterity in bringing him away, he referr'd the whole Relation to him, who before that auguſt Body declar'd, ‘ That the real Deſign of the Prince's Journey into ‘ Spain, had been to make a clear Diſcovery of the Spani-

Bucking-ham's Narrative of the Spaniſh Treaty.

'ard's Integrity, and if he was ſincere in what he pretended. That the Ambaſſador, who had the ſole Management of that great Affair, wrote in one Diſpatch that all was concluded, and in the next, that new Difficulties and freſh Demands were ſtarted and inſiſted upon. Theſe Ebbs and Floods made the Prince apprehend, that their Buſineſs was to amuſe us while they had other ſecret Deſigns in Agitation; and thereupon his Highneſs had prevail'd upon his Father that he might make that Journey. That they were no ſooner arriv'd at Madrid, than they diſcover'd their Purpoſe never was to give him the Infanta. That inſtead of proceeding upon the Articles, which were thought concluded, they urg'd new Demands, and that ſo peremptorily in Matters of Religion, that the principal Clergy-Men, and moſt eminent of the King's Preachers, had not only frequent Conferences with the Prince to perſuade him to turn Papiſt, but had procur'd the Pope to write a Letter himſelf to his Highneſs upon the ſame Subject; but it had pleas'd God to give him not only a conſtant and unſhaken Heart in his Religion, but ſuch Strength of Argument to defend the ſame, that they ſtood amaz'd to hear him, and confeſs'd that they were not able to anſwer him. That the Prince was never permitted to confer with his Miſtreſs, and very rarely to ſee her, even when they pretended he was upon the Point of Marrying. That they never could obtain a more ſatisfactory Anſwer in the Buſineſs of the Palatinate, than That it was not in the King of Spain*'s Power to reſtore it*, tho' it had been taken by the ſole Power of Spain, and ſtill poſſeſs'd by their Forces; ſo that he was well aſſur'd there was no more real Intention in that Point of Reſtitution, than in the other of Marriage, and that there was no Hopes of recovering the Palatinate by any other Means than that of Force, which would eaſily effect it.' Throughout his whole Diſcourſe he frequently reflected upon the Earl of Briſtol, as if he was privy to the Spaniſh Deſigns, and concurr'd with them; and therefore the King had recall'd him, that he might account for all his Miſcarriages. Whereas in reality his Majeſty had ſent for him, rather to aſſiſt him againſt the Duke, than to expoſe him to his Malice and Fury.

The Parliament applaud him.

The Conference ended in an high Applauſe of the Prince's and Duke's Behaviour, and the Parliament, who had before look'd upon the Duke with a malignant Eye for tempting the Prince to ſo dangerous a Journey, when they found what extraordinary Effects it had produc'd, forgot all former Murmurings, and could ſcarce contain from acknowledging him the Preſerver of the Nation: His Diſcovery was highly extoll'd, and he ſoon became the Favourite of the Multitude. But the King himſelf was infinitely offended, when he heard what the Duke had ſo confidently avow'd, without any Authority or Direction from him, a great Part of which himſelf knew to be falſe; ſo that he only wanted the Aſſiſtance of a reſolute briſk Counſellor to deſtroy the Duke, and ſuch a one he promis'd himſelf in the Earl of Briſtol, whom he daily expected. However he reſolv'd to comply in all things with his Parliament, who now wiſely paſs'd over all Reflections upon particular Perſons; and having the Treaty of Marriage with Spain put into their Hands, they cruſh'd that Serpent in the Head, by adviſing the King to break the Treaty, and proclaim open War againſt the King of Spain, proteſting to aſſiſt the King in the regaining the Palatinate, with their Lives and Fortunes. But the timorous King, apprehending that when the War was begun there would not be ſufficient Means to maintain it, thank'd the Parliament for their Advice, and anſwer'd That he would conſider better of it. The Parliament finding the King begin to ſtagger and ſink, were reſolv'd to rouſe and keep up his Spirits; and therefore they offer'd him an extraordinary Aid of three entire Subſidies, and three Fifteenths and Tenths, payable in the Compaſs of one Year, and ſo cloſely urg'd him to the Beginning of the War, that he had no longer Room to make an Evaſion, but was forc'd to declare both againſt the Emperor, and the King of Spain, according to their Advice. Upon which it was reſolv'd, ſhortly to ſend ſix thouſand Men to join with the Forces of the States of Holland, that by weakning the Spaniards in the Netherlands, they might have a freer Acceſs into Germany, for the Recovery of the Palatinate.

They diſſolve the Spaniſh Treaty.

The Diſſolution of the Treaties with Spain, and the Preparations for War reſounding in every Ear, gave ſuch an Alarm to the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, the Marqueſs of Inoioſa, that he reſolv'd to act his Revenge againſt the Duke of Buckingham. In order to effect it, by a Stratagem he thruſt a Paper into the King's Hands, containing the Particulars of ſome ſtrange and deſperate Deſigns form'd by the Duke againſt his Majeſty, in which the Prince himſelf wanted not his Share; which were ſo plauſibly drawn up, as might have diſtracted a Mind far leſs timorous than his own. This Contrivance ſo prevail'd upon the King, that he became deeply thoughtful and melancholy, and would entertain the Prince and Duke with no Diſcourſe but Riddles and broken Sentences, that like Flaſhes of Lightning from a dark Cloud, ſhew'd a Storm was gathering within. Immediately the Prince and Duke concluded themſelves in Danger; and upon Enquiry found that the Spaniſh Ambaſſador, and Maeſtro a Jeſuit of that Nation, had been with the King, and that ſome of the Ambaſſador's Family had boaſted, That they had ſenſibly wounded the Duke, and laid ſuch a Train as ſhould blow the Parliament in pieces. The King, amidſt theſe terrible Anxieties, prepar'd for Windſor, hoping to divert and eaſe his overcharg'd Imaginations: And at the End of April he took Coach together with the Prince, but made ſome ſlight Pretence to leave Buckingham behind him, as he was putting his Foot into the Coach: At which he broke out into Tears, and humbly begg'd of his Majeſty To tell him his Crime, that he might confeſs it, or clear himſelf. To which the King only reply'd with a profound Sigh, That he was the moſt unhappy Wretch alive, to be forſaken by thoſe who were deareſt to him: Which was follow'd by a Flood of Tears both from himſelf and the Prince; but the King drove away for Windſor, and left the diſconſolate Duke behind him. This coming to the Ear of the Lord-Keeper Williams, he haſten'd to the Duke's Houſe, where with Difficulty he gain'd Admittance to his Grace, whom he found lying on a Couch in a melancholy unmovable Poſture. But at length the Duke was perſuaded to declare the Caſe; at which the Keeper advis'd him immediately to follow the King to Windſor, and never to ſtir from his Preſence Night or Day; for the Danger was, leſt any one ſhould gain the King's Ear, and perſuade him to diſſolve the Parliament, and upon the Diſſolution of it, get his Grace thrown into the Tower, and then God knows what would follow. The Duke follow'd the Keeper's Advice, while the other in the mean Time, by a nice Piece of Dexterity, and through the Means of a Miſtreſs kept by the Spaniſh Secretary, found out the whole Occaſion of the Diſturbance: Which ended in a full and happy Reconciliation between the King, the Prince and Duke, at a Time when the Continuance of the Breach might have caus'd infinite Miſchiefs to them all.

The King ſuſpects Buckingham.

He is reconcil'd to him.

By this the Duke's Power was more firmly eſtabliſh'd, notwithſtanding the ſecret Reſentments of the King, who contrary to his Promiſe was prevail'd upon to reſtrain the Earl of Briſtol at his firſt Arrival, and without admitting him into his Preſence, to throw him into the Tower, upon Suſpicion of High-Treaſon. This noble Earl had left the Spaniſh Court with Honour and Reputation, where he was offer'd Places, Sums of Mony, and Protection againſt his Enemies in England, all which he generouſly refus'd: But now finding Buckingham's Power and Popularity too mighty for him to oppoſe at this Inſtant, he was content with Submiſſion to gain his Liberty, and retire himſelf to a Country Privacy. The Duke, ſwell'd with Grandeur, next turn'd the Weight of his Authority againſt Lionel Cranfield, a Gentleman of great Abilities, who by marrying a near Relation of the Duke's, was rais'd by him to be made a Privy-Counſellor, Maſter of the Wardrobe, Maſter of the Wards, and ſhortly Lord High-Treaſurer of England, and Earl of Middleſex. This Lord had by his great Dexterity gain'd ſo much Credit with the King, that during the Duke's Abſence in Spain, he not only refus'd to remit ſuch Sums of Mony as thoſe unlimited Expences requir'd, but took the Courage to diſpute his Commands, and appeal to the King, whoſe Ear was always inclin'd to him. Therefore when the Duke found his Intereſt in the preſent Parliament, he projected the Ruin of this bold Rival, and eaſily procur'd ſome leading Men in the Houſe of Commons to ſend up an Impeachment of ſeveral Corruptions and Miſdemeanors to the Houſe of Lords againſt that great Miniſter. The diſcerning King readily foreſaw the ill Conſequences of ſuch an Activity, which was a Breach upon his Royal Authority, and a dangerous Precedent againſt the Supports of the Regal Power. He therefore ſent for the Prince and Duke, who had both promoted the Matter, and earneſtly conjur'd them to make Uſe of their utmoſt Intereſt to reſtrain it, as a Wound to the Crown not eaſy to be cur'd; and finding the Duke unmov'd by all his Arguments and Commands, he with an angry Oath call'd him a direct Fool, and Prophetically told him, That in this Fit of Popularity he was making a Rod to ſcourge himſelf. Then turning to the Prince with the ſame Foreſight he ſaid, That when he was dead, he would have his Belly-full of Parliament-Impeachments, and would remember to his Sorrow how much he had contributed to the Weakning of the Crown, by the two Precedents he was ſo fond of; meaning as well the engaging the Parliament in the War, as the Proſecuting the Earl of Middleſex. But the Duke had gain'd ſo powerful an Intereſt in both Houſes, that the King's Interpoſition was ineffectual, and the Earl, notwithſtanding the good Defence he made, was at laſt condemn'd in a great Fine, to a long Impriſonment, and an Excluſion from his Seat in Parliament during Life: A Clauſe of ſuch a Nature, as was never known before in any Judgment of Parliament, and indeed not to be inflicted on a Peer but by Attainder.

The Parliament petition againſt Popery.

The King's Anſwer.

The Parliament ended.

The Lords being now at Leiſure, began to conſider how highly neceſſary it was that they ſhould join with the Commons, in Petitioning the King to curb the Growth of Popery, and reſtrain the aſpiring Romaniſts. And after ſome Conferences between both Houſes, the Petition was reduc'd to two Propoſitions, and preſented to the King as two Petitions: The firſt was to beg his Majeſty, 'That all the Laws might be put in Execution againſt Jeſuits, Seminary Prieſts, and other Orders of the Church of Rome, and generally againſt all Popiſh Recuſants.' The ſecond was, 'That his Majeſty would be pleas'd to ſecure the Hearts of his Subjects, by the Engagement of his Royal Word, That upon no future Occaſion of Marriage or Treaty, or any Requeſt of Foreign Prince or State, he would remove or relax the Execution of his Laws againſt the foreſaid Roman Catholicks.' To both theſe the King gave a particular Anſwer viva voce before the Lords and Commons; and as to the firſt he proteſted before God, That his Heart had bled when he heard of the Increaſe of Popery, and that the Grief of it had been as Thorns in his Eyes, and Pricks in his Sides; therefore he was ready by Proclamation to command all the Jeſuits and Prieſts of the Nation to depart by a certain Day. As to the ſecond he declar'd, That ſince is was againſt the Rule of Wiſdom, that a King ſhould ſuffer any Subject to tranſgreſs the Laws by the Interceſſion of other Princes, therefore he aſſur'd them, That he would be careful that no ſuch Condition ſhould be foiſted in upon any other Treaty whatſoever. From theſe Proceedings many Papiſts were turn'd out of Places of Truſt and Profit, which conſiderably cruſh'd their Party; 'till a new Treaty with France made a great Alteration, and gave them new Life and Incouragement. And now the Parliament having ſate above three Months, given three Subſidies, three Fifteenths and Tenths, paſs'd an Act of general Pardon, and thirty three other Acts of Conſequence, upon the twenty ninth of May it was prorogu'd from time to time, 'till the King's Death diſſolv'd it.

The Dutch Cruelties at Amboyna.

During this Seſſion, four Regiments of Foot, fifteen hundred in each Regiment, were tranſported into Holland under the Command of the Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Southampton, the Earl of Eſſex, and the Lord Willoughby, ſince Earl of Lindſey. But while the Engliſh, the great Supporters of the Dutch, were fighting for them in their own Country, there arriv'd News out of the Eaſt-Indies of ſuch a horrid and barbarous Nature, as no Time nor Age could parallel. The Dutch graſping at the whole Spicery Trade in that Eaſtern World, and having induſtriouſly wrought out the Spaniards and Portugueze, endeavour'd to do the ſame by their beſt Friends the Engliſh, that they might engroſs the whole to themſelves; which cauſing many Conteſts between them, at length they came to Terms of Agreement, and the Engliſh conceiving themſelves ſecure, planted their Factories among them: Where after two Years, that they had reap'd the Fruit of their Dangers and Hazards, the Dutch began to attempt their utter Extirpation, not by the Sword of War or a Maſſacre, but by ſuch cruel and ſavage Tortures, as could hardly be thought to proceed from Chriſtians, or thoſe of human Race. The Iſland of Amboyna was the bloody Stage where they acted this diſmal Tragedy: For, pretending that Captain Gabriel Towerſon, and the reſt of the Engliſh Factory, had conſpir'd to ſeize the Caſtle, and expel the Dutch out of the Iſland, they ſeiz'd upon them, and having no Witneſſes againſt them but their Racks, they extended their Sinews to the full Length, and diſjointed all the Limbs of their Bodies; and with their other Engines making them ſuck in Water with their Breath, they ſwell'd their Bodies to a vaſt Proportion, 'till their Skins were ready to burſt, and their Eyes to ſtart out of their Heads. And thoſe whoſe Innocency and Courage could not be compell'd by thoſe Torments to accuſe themſelves of unacted Crimes, they burnt the Soles of their Feet with Candles, 'till the dropping Moiſture extinguiſh'd the Flame, and with thoſe fiery Inſtruments made ſuch Holes in their Sides, that they might ſee their Entrails, tho' the Monſters would not ſee their Innocence, but perſiſted in their exquiſite Cruelties; which being horrible to expreſs, muſt be inſupportable to ſuſtain. Having thus weary'd out the miſerable Men with Tortures, and they being willing to die quickly, confeſs'd and gave under their Hands whatever their barbarous Tormentors dictated to them, and ended their Cruelties by cutting off their Heads. Ten of the Engliſh loſt their Lives, and the reſt, being near as many more, with rack'd, ſwell'd and macerated Bodies, were ſent to the Engliſh Plantations; ſo the whole Factory was deſtroy'd, and the Dutch ſeiz'd that Trade into their Hands, which they have kept ever ſince.

A Treaty of Marriage with France.

The French inſiſt upon high Terms.

King James receiving the Account of this barbarous Tranſaction, is ſaid to have made a very cold Reply upon the Occaſion, having his Thoughts more nearly imploy'd about his own Family, and the Marriage of his Son with the Houſe of France; in order to which, ſoon after the Breach with Spain, his Majeſty ſent over the Lord Kenſington, newly made Earl of Holland, privately to find out the Inclinations of the French King, in relation to a Match between the Prince and the Lady Heurietta Maria, younger Daughter to King Henry the Great. He continu'd there a Month before he mov'd in that Matter; but as ſoon as he propos'd it to the French King, he was ſo deſirous of the Match, that he told the Earl, He had rather have the Prince of England to be his Brother, than any other Man in the World, and was ſo ready to comply, that he ſeem'd indifferent in making Terms for the Catholicks in England. But when he found King James, who dreaded a ſecond Diſapponitment, to be immeaſurably fond of this Alliance, he abated of his Forwardneſs, inlarg'd his Demands in Favour of Papiſts, and ſtrain'd the King to ſuch Conceſſions, as he had promis'd to his Parliament he would never grant upon the Mediation of Foreign Princes. The famous Cardinal Richlieu was now in the Infancy of his Riſe and Favour, and was made the principal Manager of this great Affair in Behalf of France; and the Earls of Holland and Carliſle were ſent Ambaſſadors Extraordinary from the Court of England in the Month of June. Theſe repreſented to the Cardinal, 'That the Propoſition they made of a Marriage being no new Thing, ſince it had been treated of many Years before to marry the Prince of of Wales with Madam Chriſtiana, who was afterwards marry'd to the Prince of Piedmont; they had nothing now to do, but to re-aſſume the Articles already made, and to continue on the ſame Foot with the Lady Henrietta.' But the French anſwer'd, 'That the Face of Affairs was chang'd ſince that Time, and that they had different Thoughts at preſent; that it was the King of England's Intereſt to preſerve the Reputation of the French King in this Marriage; that at preſent they could not be contented with what they had formerly offer'd about Religion, after what had happen'd in Spain, when there was a Treaty of Marriage between the Prince of Wales and the Infanta; urging, that it was neceſſary to begin the Negotiation by laying thoſe Articles upon the Table, which the King of Great Britain had agreed with Spain upon that Occaſion. The Engliſh Ambaſſadors rejecting this, one of the French anſwer'd, He was much ſurpris'd that they were not come with Power to make the ſame Conceſſions to the Moſt Chriſtian King, as their Maſter had granted to his Catholick Majeſty, ſince they might eaſily imagine France would ſuffer no Inequality in this Affair.

The English and French agree.

This put ſome Stop to the Negotiation, but in effect the Ambaſſadors of England ſoon conſented to agree to all the Articles with Spain, except three; of which one was concerning a Toleration for the Engliſh Catholicks; another for a publick Church for the Retinue of the Lady; and the laſt related to the Education of thoſe Children who ſhould be born of this Marriage, who 'till twelve Years of Age were to be in the Hands of the Queen, to educate them in her own Religion. The French repreſented it would do great Service to the King of England, by uniting to his Party all the Engliſh Catholicks, who would oppoſe themſelves to the Puritans and Presbyterians, by whom the King was not truly belov'd: But the Ambaſſadors would never conſent to grant a Church to the Papiſts, which would endanger a Mutiny in London, tho' they agreed to the Article concerning the Education of Children; but yet rejected to have a Biſhop ſent with the Lady, as a Matter of no Uſe. As for the Dowry, the King of England inſiſted upon eight hundred thouſand Crowns, of which one half was to be paid in London the Evening before the Marriage, two hundred thouſand a Year after, and the reſt in ſix Months after that. There was alſo a Proviſo made, that if the Lady ſhould die before the Prince without Children, he ſhould be oblig'd only to reſtore the Moiety. All this being agreed, the main thing was to procure a Diſpenſation from the Pope to permit the Lady to marry with an Heretick Prince; for his Holineſs was no ways pleas'd with the Marriage, leſt it might occaſion the Reſtitution of the Palatinate. Therefore Father Berullet, who was ſent to Rome for that Purpoſe, us'd many Arguments with the Pope, and inſiſted upon the numerous Advantages that would accrue to the Catholick Religion by this Marriage; ſo that at length the Pope was mollify'd, and conſented to a Diſpenſation, which in three Months Time was compleated.

While one Negotiation was carry'd on at Rome, another more ſecret was managing in England by the Arch-Biſhop of Embrun, who was ſent over by the French King in Favour of the Roman Catholicks in England, and likewiſe to ſound King James about his Thoughts of the Romiſh

He confirms ten thouſand in London.

Religion; of which remarkable Tranſaction we have this following Account from the Arch-Biſhop himſelf, and from Monſieur D'Ageant, a prime Miniſter of State in France. This Prelate, who was a Man of great Knowledge and Experience, having receiv'd his Orders from the French King, took a Voyage into England, in the Habit and Name of a Counſellor of the Parliament of Grenoble, whom Curioſity had induc'd to ſee the Nation. He was ſoon met and diſcover'd by the Duke of Buckingham, who told him, That there was no Occaſion for him to change his Name or conceal his Quality, for he ſhould receive nothing but Honour, eſpecially from the King his Maſter, who had a very particular Eſteem for him. Shortly after he introduc'd him to the King at Royſton, who entertain'd him very graciouſly, and order'd the Duke to be preſent all the Time of the Diſcourſe, which laſted above two Hours. At this firſt Meeting, he prevail'd ſo far, that Orders were immediately given to releaſe many Roman Catholicks out of Priſon, in London and other Places, and the Execution of many Laws againſt them was ſuſpended; and further he was permitted to adminiſter Confirmation to what Catholicks he pleas'd, in the Houſe of the French Ambaſſador, while the Doors were open. Accordingly he confirm'd above ten thouſand, in the Preſence of a great Concourſe of People at the Door and in the Street; at which many were extreamly offended, and complain'd of it to the King, but to no Effect, for his Majeſty anſwer'd them, That he did nothing contrary to his Pleaſure. The Arch-Biſhop had ſeveral Conferences with the King, in which his Majeſty teſtify'd his great Deſire to be ally'd to France, and the other inſiſted upon a Toleration, as the moſt effectual Means to give Satiſfaction to the Catholick Princes: Whereupon the King laying his Hand upon his Hand, ſaid, I plainly ſee that you are a Perſon appointed by God, in whom I ought to confide, and to reveal the Secrets of my Heart.

K. James's Diſcourſes with him.

Afterwards, he freely acknowledg'd to the Arch-Biſhop the good Opinion he had conceiv'd of the Catholick Faith, and ſo particularly, That he omitted nothing; proteſting to him, ‘ That during his Minority, his Tutors having perceiv'd his Inclination to that Religion, he ran great Hazards of being aſſaſſinated: As to a Toleration, he profeſs'd he had long deſign'd to grant it in his Dominions, and for that very Purpoſe, he intended to ſummon an Aſſembly of Prelates and other learned Men of England, together with an equal Number of Foreigners, and upon the Deciſions there made, to found the ſaid Liberty; adding, That he had already determin'd what Perſons ſhould be choſen among the Engliſh; and that if the Aſſembly could not meet at Dover, he would conſent that it ſhould be holden at Boloign, as ſoon as he ſhould be in a Condition to rely upon the King of France, by the Means of the intended Marriage: And to procure theſe good Effects, he thought convenient, that after the Conſummation of it, the Arch-Biſhop ſhould return into England under the Pretence of accompanying the Princeſs, at which Time he would deliver to him two Letters written with his own Hand, one for the French King, and the other for the Pope, containing his ſerious Reſolutions: He would alſo give him a diſtinct Memorial concerning his Intention, which he would Sign, that the Arch-Biſhop being furniſh'd with theſe Diſpatches, he ſhould go to Rome, under colour of viſiting the Apoſtolick See, there to treat with the Pope alone, for whom, he ſaid, he had a greater Reſpect and Affection, ever ſince he underſtood he had compos'd Verſes in his Youth of the violent Death of the Queen of Scotland his Mother, in Commendation of her, and of the Family of the Stuarts, which he ſhew'd to the Arch-Biſhop.’ He further declar'd, ‘ That in Caſe the Arch-Biſhop return'd from Rome with the Approbation of his Holineſs concerning the Convention, he would cauſe it forthwith to be aſſembled, whereupon extraordinary and admirable Events would enſue: But before he proceeded to diſcover his Deſign as to his own Perſon, he would negotiate with the Proteſtant Princes of Germany, and with the Principal Puritan Lords of England and Scotland, and promis'd that all things ſhould tend to a happy Concluſion, and to the great Advantage of the Catholick Church. This, ſays the Arch-Biſhop, is the Subſtance of all the Diſcourſes they had at ſeveral Times upon this Subject.

His Letter to the Pope.

Monſieur D' Ageant further tells us, that being ſatisfy'd as to all the Points in Controverſie, the King wrote a long Letter to the Pope, by a Catholick Gentleman his Subject, whom he privately ſent to him on purpoſe, ‘ In which he acknowledg'd him as the Vicar General of Jeſus Chriſt on Earth, as the univerſal Father of the Chriſtians, and the Chief of all Catholicks; aſſuring him, that after he had taken Care of thoſe things to which he had agreed, he would openly declare himſelf: In the mean Time he promis'd not to ſuffer any Search to be made in his Kingdom after Prieſts that were ſent by his Holineſs, or the Moſt Chriſtian King, provided they were not Jeſuits, in whom he proteſted he could not confide, for ſeveral Reaſons; principally becauſe he accounted them the Authors of the Gun-Powder Treaſon, by which they were to have blown up him and the Chief of the Nation.’ In his Letter, among other Particulars, he intreated the Pope ‘ To vouchſafe that the Goods of the Church that were enter'd into the Patrimony of the principal Families of England ſhould not be taken from them; but that they ſhould be permitted ſtill to enjoy them, becauſe otherwiſe great Trouble and Commotions would enſue.’ He affirm'd moreover, ‘ That nothing could hinder him from making a publick Profeſſion of the Catholick Religion at this Time, but the Deſire he had to gain the King of Denmark his Brother-in-Law, whom he had for that End, tho' under another Pretence, ſollicited to come over into England, where he hop'd to convert him: That by doing this, he ſhould be able to eſtabliſh Peace in his own Dominions, which otherwiſe could hardly be maintain'd; and that they two united in the ſame Deſign, would draw after them almoſt all the Northern Countries.’ The Duke of Buckingham, and the Gentleman he ſent to Rome, were the only two Perſons, that were Subjects, to whom he communicated theſe Intentions. The Duke had promis'd to follow him, and had made a conſiderable Progreſs in the Affair; but all theſe remarkable Deſigns were made void by the Death of the King of England not long after, at which the French King, declaring the News to the Arch-Biſhop of Embrun, expreſs'd a very ſenſible Regret in theſe Words, All our Hopes of England are loſt. Thus far the two French Authors, Monſieur D' Ageant, and William D' Hugues, Arch-Biſhop of Embrun; of whom we can ſay no more, than that the Credit of their Narrative muſt be left to all nice and impartial Readers of this Reign.

The Marriage Treaty concluded.

Cenſures upon it.

In the mean Time the Marriage-Treaty with France ſucceeded, and held fewer Months than the Years that were ſpent in that of Spain. In Auguſt the Match was concluded, and in November the Articles were ſworn to by King James, Prince Charles, and the French King; tho' they were not fully concluded till February following, nor the Match conſummated 'till after the King's Death. Cardinal Richlieu, to prevent all Conteſts that might ariſe by Means of this Alliance, as in former Times had happen'd, oblig'd Madam the Princeſs to renounce all Succeſſions, both Direct and Collateral, which might accrue to her; for which eight hundred thouſand Crowns was to be given to her in Marriage. He alſo took care that her Houſe ſhou'd be compos'd of as great a Number of Officers, as any Queen of England ever had: That her Dowry ſhould be ſixty thouſand Crowns per Annum, which ſhould be aſſign'd her upon Lands, one of which ſhould be a Dutchy or an Earldom: That if ſhe became a Widow, ſhe ſhould have her Choice to ſtay in England, or come into France, whether ſhe had Children or not; and if ſhe return'd into France, the King of England ſhould be oblig'd to conduct her at his own Charge, with agreeable Honours, as far as Calais. The publick Articles concerning Religion were not much ſhort of thoſe for the Spaniſh Match; beſides which Ruſhworth mentions ſome private Articles in favour of the Roman Catholicks, which Nalſon, upon rational Grounds, looks upon as fictitious, particularly for not being to be found in Monſieur D' Ageant's Memoirs, where the Secrets of the Engliſh Court were, or pretended to be, diſcover'd. Yet the French Author of Cardinal Richlieu's Life in Effect declares as much as Ruſhworth, namely, that the King and Prince took a particular Oath to releaſe all the Catholick Priſoners, as ſoon as the Marriage was conſummated, and to prohibit for the future their being ill-treated for their Religion: And further, that they both gave a Promiſe in Writing, by which they bound themſelves, by no Way or Means whatſoever, to oblige the Princeſs to change her Religion. The Author likewiſe highly reflects upon the Wiſdom of King James, and ſays, ‘ As this Match was againſt all the Maxims of good Policy, ſo it drew upon his Son King Charles thoſe Miſchiefs, which perhaps never befel any King ſucceeding to an Hereditary Crown; and his Sons born of that Marriage, and ſeduc'd by their Mother's Perſuaſions, have been moſt unfortunate ſince his Death. And ſeveral were of Opinion, that Cardinal Richlieu, who was then contriving a War againſt the Houſe of Auſtria, ſent this Princeſs into England, as a Ball of Diſſention, that would create ſo much Trouble in that Nation, as would incapacitate them from diſturbing their Neighbours Affairs.

A. D. 1625.
Reg. 23.

Count Mansfield comes into England.

Yet ſtill King James thought it a propitious Match, and a great Step towards the Reſtoration of the Palatinate, and his unfortunate Progeny; but this prov'd no more ſucceſsful than another feeble Attempt this Year, made by Count Mansfield, who came into England for that Purpoſe, was receiv'd with great Splendor, and made Commander of an Army of twelve thouſand Engliſhmen. Theſe Forces were deſign'd to paſs through France into Germany, the French having promis'd, as well an Addition of Strength, as a free Paſſage. The French, notwithſtanding their Promiſe, and the Treaty of Marriage, delay'd, tho' not directly deny'd their Paſſage; nevertheleſs the whole Army was ſhipp'd off, and put over to Calais; and after a tedious Stay, in hopes yet to land and paſs through the Country, they were forc'd to ſet ſail for Zealand. Neither were they ſuffer'd to land there, coming ſo unexpectedly upon the States, and in a hard and ſcarce Time for Proviſion of Victuals. Thus they were long confin'd to their narrow Veſſels, and ſuffer'd the want of all Neceſſaries, by which means a Peſtilence broke out among them, and rag'd ſo extreamly, that they were thrown into the Sea by Multitudes: Inſomuch that ſcarce a third Part of the Men were landed, which alſo ſoon after decreas'd and diſpers'd, and the whole Deſign vaniſh'd into Air. Thus continually unfortunate was the King in the deplorable Caſe of his Children; and neither he nor his Son ſaw the Reſtitution of the Palatinate, which happen'd not 'till twenty three Years after, when the Monarchy of England was under a fatal Eclipſe, and its Sovereign Lord, by an unheard-of Example, brought to the Scaffold to loſe his Head.

His Expedition unfortunate.

Before King James could ſee the Misfortunes of Count Mansfield, or the Marriage of his Son, he was ſeiz'd with a Tertian Ague that prov'd fatal to him. This was preceded by the Deaths of two great and worthy Men, Lodowick Duke of Richmond and Lenox, and James Marqueſs of Hamilton; which exceedingly affected the King, who being inform'd of the Death of the latter, ſaid, If the Branches be thus cut down, the Stock cannot continue long: Which Saying was ſhortly verify'd. His great Indiſpoſition meeting with a fat and unwieldy Body, and daily increaſing, he retir'd to Theobalds; and the Lord-Keeper Williams having Notice that they fear'd his Sickneſs was mortal, went and preſented himſelf before his Majeſty, endeavouring to divert him, and bring him to a chearful Diſcourſe, but all in vain: Thus he continu'd by his Bed-ſide 'till Midnight, but the King found no Comfort. The next Morning, after a Conſultation of Phyſicians, he ſaw no Hopes of Life, and therefore he ask'd leave of the Prince to acquaint his Father with his weak Condition, and put him in Mind both of his mortal and immortal State. Having the Prince's Conſent, he went into his Majeſty's Chamber, and kneeling down told him, He knew he ſhould neither diſpleaſe nor diſcourage him, if he brought him the Meſſage of Iſaiah to Hezekiah, to ſet his Houſe in Order; for he concluded his Days to come would be but few in the World. At which the King calmly reply'd, I am ſatisfy'd, and I deſire you to aſſiſt me in preparing to go hence, and to be with Chriſt, whoſe Mercies I pray for, and hope to find them. Finding himſelf much declining, he call'd the Prince his Son to his Bed-ſide, and recommended ſeveral uſeful Precepts to his future Conſideration; but one eſpecially, viz. love his intended Wife, but not her Religion; while the Keeper continually watch'd with his Royal Maſter, and never ſo much as put off his Cloaths to go to Bed, 'till after his Death. His great Buſineſs was frequently to pray, read and diſcourſe about Repentance, Faith, and Remiſſion of Sins, Reſurrection, and Eternal Life; all which was the Preparation on Wedneſday for the bleſſed Sacrament on Thurſday, which his Majeſty receiv'd with ſingular Comfort. On Friday he became ſenſibly weaker; ſo that now the Keeper ſtirr'd very little out of the Chamber, and that not only to comfort the departing King, but likewiſe to keep off ſome of the Romiſh Religion, who were watching about the Chamber-Door, whom, as a Privy-Counſellor, he commanded to keep at a greater Diſtance. As he drew near to his End, the Prayer uſually ſaid at the Hour of Death being ended, having repeated theſe Words, Veni Domine Jeſu, he gave up the Ghoſt without any Pangs, as are commonly ſeen in dying Perſons, and the Keeper clos'd his Eyes with his own Hands. This was upon Sunday the twenty ſeventh of March, being fifty eight Years of Age, and having reign'd twenty two Years and three Days. Many ſcandalous Rumours were ſpread concerning his Death; and ſome took the liberty to write that he was poiſon'd, as the Duke of Richmond, and the Marqueſs of Hamilton had been before him; which might be occaſion'd by the too bold Officiouſneſs of the Duke of Buckingham in adminiſtring his own Phyſick. But upon opening his Body, there was found no Mark or Sign of Poiſon, his inward Parts being all ſound; only his Spleen was a little affected, which might be Cauſe enough to throw him into an Ague. His Body, for the greater State, was convey'd by Torch-Light from Theobalds to Somerſet-Houſe, where being depoſited from the twenty third Day of April, to the ſeventh of May, it was carry'd to Weſtminſter, where, according to Sir Richard Baker, it was interr'd with great Solemnity, but with greater Lamentation.

The King's laſt Sickneſs.

His Death.

His Character.

To come at laſt to the Perſon and Character of this Prince, we find it a hard Undertaking to draw the Picture of one who had ſo many different Aſpects; eſpecially where both Friends and Enemies have ſo far exceeded the Limits of Juſtice and Impartiality. As to his Perſon and Preſence he made but an Ordinary Figure; his Countenance was homely, his Features harſh, tho' not altogether uncomely; his Stature was of the middle Size, his Body not ill compacted, but fat and unwieldy in his latter Days, uſually wearing his Cloaths plain, large, and different from the common Mode. But as to his Mind, he has receiv'd the higheſt Applauſes and Commendations, particularly, That he was the Solomon of the Age for Knowledge, Learning and Wiſdom; one, who knew how to catch the Inclinations of the People at the firſt Rebound, not ſuffering them to mount higher than he could reach them, nor grow ſo ſtrong, but he could either alter or divert them: That he had an admirable Pregnancy of Wit, which being improv'd by continual Study, he acquir'd ſuch a Promptneſs and Elegancy in expreſſing his Mind, that his extemporary Speeches were little inferior to his premeditated Writings: That he was a mild, peaceful and munificent Monarch, ſuitable to the Engliſh Genius and Nation. All which Particulars were really true, but ſtill with a remarkable Mixture of Allay; and without that, Wilſon acknowledges, that his high, towering and maſtering Reaſon had been of a rare and ſublim'd Excellency. Upon which Account, his Knowledge has been by ſome thought fitter for the Head of a Society, than the Governor of a Kingdom; his Learning to border more upon Pedantry, than riſe to a compleat Underſtanding; his Wiſdom to have more of Subtlety, or a Sagacity in diſcovering Miſchiefs, than an Ability of ſurmounting them; and his Wit too often to deſcend to inferior Sorts of Jeſts and Quibbles, which was the common way of Wit in that Age. His Munificence was many Times a direct Profuſeneſs, and a waſting of the Revenues of the Crown; and his peaceful Temper, which made him take Beati Pacifici for his Motto, had too much of a timorous Diſpoſition, not to ſay Cowardize; which caus'd him not only to be often contemn'd by Foreign Princes, but alſo at home to be govern'd, and ſometimes inſulted by his Favourites, which was one of the greateſt of his Weakneſſes: And this led him to another Quality, or rather an Acquiſition, which ſome thought as wicked, as the other was weak, which he call'd by the Name of King-Craft, others an exquiſite Skill in Diſſimulation; in which he ſo much delighted, that it ſeems to be the greateſt of all his Blemiſhes. He had excellent Notions in Conception, but could bring but few into Action, tho' they tended to his own Preſervation: And this was one of his Maxims, of which he made no timely Uſe: A Prince, who would avoid Conſpiracies, ought to be rather jealous of ſuch, whom his Favours have advanc'd, than of thoſe whom his Frowns have diſcontented: For the Latter want Means, while the Former have them at Pleaſure, to execute their Deſigns. But to come to his moral Virtues, in ſpite of Calumny, he was eminent for his Chaſtity, which was remarkable in a Court ſo looſe and luxurious as his own. He was very temperate in his Exerciſes, and Diet, and not intemperate in his Drinking; yet he drank very often of the ſtrongeſt ſweet Wines, but always in very ſmall Quantities, and rather out of a Cuſtom than any Delight, as Weldon himſelf acknowledges. He was by Education patient, pious and religious; yet ſometimes his Choler and Paſſion would prevail over all, and throw him into the profaneſt Oaths and Curſes; for which he would afterwards ſhew himſelf heartily penitent: And indeed, he was not only ready to ask Forgiveneſs of God, but alſo of Men; and ſometimes in ſuch a peculiar Manner, that they could ſcarcely ſay whether it was a pious Condeſcenſion, or an abject Diſpoſition. As to his Religion, in which he diſplay'd the Height of his Parts and Learning, he was really a Calviniſt in moſt Points, excepting that of Epiſcopacy, as appears from ſome of his Books, and his Zeal for the Synod of Dort: Yet he gave very unhappy Suſpicions to the Nation, by making ſuch Advances to the Pope and Papiſts, upon the Account of the Spaniſh and French Treaties. Notwithſtanding his open Indulgencies, and perhaps ſecret Inclinations to the Roman Catholicks, yet in many publick Speeches he declar'd againſt them, and once in a very remarkable Manner, in the Preſence of many Lords, as we find it in Croke's Reports; for having been charg'd with a Deſign of granting a Toleration to Papiſts, he made a ſolemn Proteſtation, That he would ſpend the laſt Drop of Blood in his Body before he would do it; and pray'd, That before any of his Iſſue ſhould maintain any other Religion than his own, that God would take them out of the World. How far this Imprecation reach'd or affected himſelf, or any of his Family afterwards, we leave to the Determination of an omniſcient Being.

His Reign in general.

To take ſome Notice of this Reign in general, it is highly remarkable, that tho' the Nation was warlike and ready to kindle at any Flame, yet this King kept it his whole Reign all in Peace, without any War from abroad, or Rebellion at home. It is true, there were ſome Heats between him and his Parliaments about the Prerogative; and it happen'd then, as it does in moſt Feuds, Things were carry'd to great Extremities: Yet impartial Writers think, that conſidering his Majeſty's Circumſtances, he was not well us'd, and that if the Houſe had been freed from half a dozen popular and diſcontented Members, the Diſturbances would ſoon have ended. It is alſo remarkable, that during this whole Reign the King never took away the Life of one Nobleman in England, but reſtor'd many; yet his artificial taking off Sir Walter Raleigh, by vertue of a former Condemnation, after an equitable Reſtoration, and his ſparing the Earl and Counteſs of Somerſet, after ſuch Imprecations upon himſelf and Progeny, are both real Blemiſhes in this King's Conduct. He came to the Crown with all the Advantages of Power, Love and Reputation, and the former Part of the Reign was more active and laudable; but the latter, with the encreaſing Weakneſs of the publick Miniſtry, became more paſſive, and declin'd in Vigour and Greatneſs to the laſt Moment of his Life. If we conſider the whole Reign with the former, it will bear no Compariſon; and tho' there was a great Increaſe of Affluence and Trade, the Reputation of England began ſenſibly to ſink; ſo that the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, when join'd under one Monarch, made a leſs Figure, than one of them had in former Ages. The martial Heat and Exerciſe of the Nation began gradually to decline, by the Example of a pacifick King; and Sir Richard Baker obſerves that two Things in this Reign grew to loſe their Luſtre: One, the Exerciſe of Tilting, which in the laſt Reign was ſo much us'd, that no Year paſs'd without ſpecial Solemnities in that Kind: The other, the Band of Gentlemen-Penſioners and Yeomen of the Guard, which in the Queen's Time conſiſted of the moſt ſelect Perſons of the Realm for Stature, and other Qualifications; and was ſo noble an Ornament in her Court, that no Prince in Chriſtendom could ſhew the like. But this King ſo little valued theſe Particulars, that both in his Time came utterly to be neglected; no Solemnity of Arms but by Accident, and no Regard had to what Perſons were admitted into that Service. In ſhort, the main Conduct of the Reign ſeems inconſiſtent with it ſelf, and differing from the common Methods of Mankind: Therefore whatever may be ſaid in Commendation of the Bleſſings of Peace and Plenty, and whatever Rhetorick has been us'd to extol the uninterrupted Pleaſures of this Reign, it cannot be deny'd, but that this admir'd Calm was only the Fore-runner of a moſt diſmal Storm, and that this peaceful Monarch was not only really unfortunate in himſelf and Daughter, but alſo left to his Son an unneceſſary War, an exhauſted Treaſury, and a Crown of Troubles and Thorns. Of which we may be more particular, when, in another Volume, we come to trace the ſeveral Steps, and lay open the various Springs of thoſe tumultuous and calamitous Times.

THE

(As Printed to the Firſt Edition of the Second Volume.)

TO do real Juſtice, and to be truly faithful to myſelf at this Time, I muſt begin after the ſame Manner I did in the Preface to my Firſt Volume, and declare, That it was with the Advice, and at the Inſtance of ſeveral conſiderable Friends and others, that I undertook the Continuation, as well as the former Part of the Hiſtory of England: Not then ſo clearly foreſeeing the numerous Difficulties and Diſcouragements I was to meet with, from the Rage and Blindneſs of Parties, the nice Taſte of ſome, and the wrong Taſte of others, the Scantineſs of my own Fortunes, my Diſtance from Books and able Aſſiſtants, and from other Impediments and Obſtructions, the Inconveniencies of which I have ſufficiently felt ſince this Continuation was begun, and may expect to feel more now it is going into the World. I was indeed inſenſibly led on, and drawn into a Work that appear'd ſo plainly beneficial to the Publick, and in no long Time I found myſelf irretrievably ingag'd. After which, without regarding any of theſe Difficulties, I proceeded with a full Reſolution to go through with it; and without Fear or Concern for any Objections that cou'd be made to the Work in General, whatever might be rais'd as to Particulars. But to ſay ſomething with Relation to Both.

The main Reaſon given for writing of the Firſt Volume was, to ſave an Engliſhman the Trouble of reading over a Library inſtead of a ſingle Hiſtory, which he muſt have done in effect to be Maſter of his Subject. The Reaſon will hold ſtronger in this Second Volume, of which the Materials and Writings were ſo various and numerous, that I was two or three Years in Procuring, Collecting, and Peruſing of them: And ſtill I am not certain whether I have got all that are material. However, above two hundred Writers, of all Sorts, have been us'd in this Volume; which, for the ſmall Number of Years, contains more ſurpriſing Variety than the Hiſtory of any other Nation known to this Part of the World.

To name ſome of the chief of theſe Authors; For thoſe call'd Hiſtories and Chronicles, I had the Hiſtory of the Civil Wars, by J. D. a judicious Writer us'd ſometimes by the Lord Clarendon himſelf, The Complete Hiſtory of England, lately written without a Name, the Lord Clarendon, Sanderſon, Fuller, Heylyn, T. May, Sprigge, Clem. Walker, Ham. Leſtrange, Philips, Heath, Vicars, Fowlis, Temple, Walſh, Borlace, Cox, La Vaſſor, and Salmonet. For the leſſer ſort, I had Sir William Dugdale, Sir Roger Manley, Dr. Bates, Florus Anglicus, Standford, Mercurius Ruſticus, Coke, Hobbs, Price, Davies, and Father Orleans. For Collections, I had Ruſhworth, Nalſon, Whitelock with Manuſcript Additions, Frankland, Sir Edward Walker, Bibliotheca Regia, Scrinia Sacra, Crew, Prynne, Husbands, and Scobel. For particular Memoirs, which were of ſingular uſe in this Work, I had Sir Thomas Herbert, Sir Philip Warwick, Mr. Denzil Hollis, Major Huntington, Col. Bamfield, E. Cooke, H. Firebrace, Sir John Berkley, the Lord Fairfax, Sir John Bowring, D. Lloyd, Biſhop Guthry, Dr. Burnet, E. Ludlow, J. Locke, and Dr. Welwood. Beſides theſe I had many Lives of particular Perſons, as of Williams, Laud, Uſher, Bramhall, Heylyn, Tromp, Monk, Hacket, &c. together with Tryals, Journals, Miſcellanies, and innumerable Pamphlets of all Kinds; beſides ſeveral Manuſcripts and particular Informations that never yet appear'd in the World.

I have likewiſe made it my particular Care and Buſineſs to enquire and examine into all that has been ſaid for and againſt King Charles the Firſt, his Reign, and Adminiſtration; and, as far as it was poſſible, have read over and conſider'd all the Vindications, Apologies, and Defences on one Side, and the Charges, Accuſations, Reflections, and Libels on the other, that were publiſh'd either in thoſe Times, or ſince the great Revolution in 1688. Upon which Subject greater Number of Books and Pamphlets have been written, than upon the Life and Actions, perhaps, of any one King or private Perſon ſince the Creation. To name a few of theſe Writers; on the one Side, we have the old Earl of Briſtol, the Lord Falkland, Sir Edward Hyde, Sir Robert Holborn, Sir Edward Walker, Sir Philip Warwick, Sir Thomas Herbert, Sir William Dugdale, Sir Roger Manley, Biſhop Laud, Biſhop Hacket, Biſhop Guthry, Mr. Henderſon, Dr. Perrinchief, Dr. Heylyn, Dr. Ryves, Dr. Bates, Mr. Symmons, Dr. Burnet, Dr. Nalſon, Dr. Hollingworth, Mr. Tyrrel, Mr. Barron, Mr. Wagſtaff, &c. together with Salmatius, Du Moulin, and ſome Foreigners. On the contrary Side, beſides the Declarations and Remonſtrances of the Long Parliament and Army, the Originals from whence moſt of them have Copy'd, we have Prynne, May, Milton, Peyton, Goodwin, Withers, Lilly, Nevil, Ludlow, Baxter, Calamy, Welden, Coke, Walker, Oates, and Toland; beſides ſeveral Secret Hiſtorians, and innumerable others who have not thought fit to oblige the World with their Names.

The Trouble I had in Collecting, Ranging, and Digeſting theſe Materials, tho' great, and not eaſy to be judg'd of, was ſtill ſhort of what I met with from my ſedulous Application to Living Aſſiſtants. For at my firſt entring upon this Volume, I was infinitely deſirous to receive the beſt Advice and Inſtructions, and to obtain any unpubliſh'd Memoirs, Letters, Records, and other Papers, that were likely to improve and enrich the Work. Accordingly I did, as much as I cou'd with Decency, get into the Acquaintance of thoſe in London and the two Univerſities, beſides others, that appear'd moſt capable of aſſiſting me; and, ſo far as I durſt, or could meet with Opportunity, I apply'd myſelf to Men of all Ranks and Parties; ſometimes to argue and debate upon particular Points and Difficulties, other times to get a Sight of uncommon Books and Manuſcripts, and at all times to acquire new Lights and Supports for the clearing and eſtabliſhing the Truth. To arrive at which, I made no Scruple as to their Opinions and Perſwaſions, but endeavour'd to enter into the Converſation of all that were ſenſible and knowing in my Buſineſs; without conſidering what Notions they taught, or what Profeſſions they made either as to Religion or Politicks.

From ſome of all theſe I have gain'd conſiderable Helps and Advantages, of different kinds; ſometimes proper Hints, remote Directions, and awakening Notions; other times direct Informations, and more particular Lights and Diſcoveries, and ſometimes curious Books, valuable Letters, and other Manuſcripts. I am ſorry to ſay, that among thoſe to whom I offer'd myſelf and Service, I met with a ſtrange Variety of Treatment, as well as Variety of Diſappointment; ſome being ſo very frank, communicative, and couragious, and others ſo extreamly ſhy, reſerv'd, and apprehenſive, that it was ſurpriſing, to almoſt any but a Hiſtorian, to find ſo much Difference in the Natures and Circumſtances of Mankind. However, I acknowledge with all Gratitude that I have receiv'd a proportionable Knowledge from the major Part of thoſe from whom I expected it; and more from ſeveral of them, than to whom I know how to make a ſuitable Return. And here I deſire to teſtifie and declare my hearty Thanks to all that really did, or but endeavour'd to add Light to this Work, without preſuming to mention their Names: For to publiſh the Names of thoſe that aſſiſted and wiſh'd well to me, may be thought as vain and impertinent, as it wou'd be invidious and ill-natur'd to publiſh thoſe that refus'd and ſuſpected me. Indeed, if I had known of any Perſon of either Side that deſired it, he ſhou'd not have fail'd of being gratify'd.

AFTER ſuch a pompous Account of the Work as this, it is poſſible that the Reader's Imagination may have been too much rais'd, and ſo far as to expect at once to ſee the plenary Effects and Products of it: But here——with no little Concern, I muſt let him know, that the greateſt Part of this tedious and deep-founded Fabrick lies unhappily bury'd under Ground; and that moſt of that Expence of Time, Money, Labour, and Application, is, and muſt be ſtill inviſible to the World; and that from the outward Appearance of the Work, too little of the Contrivance, Pains, and Charges is to be diſcern'd even by curious Examiners, much leſs by tranſient Obſervers.

But to let the Reader know what is viſible, and what he may expect to ſee, if he pleaſes to peruſe the Work in Order as it was written, and not by Leaps, Starts, and diſtant Parcels;

Parcels ; It is a regular, uniform, and clear Account of about thirty five Years of the moſt important and wonderful Part of the Engliſh Hiſtory ; and if not ſo large and voluminous, yet more full and complete than any one Author that has written before upon the ſame Subject. As this Period was very difficult and unweildy, as well from the Form and Mould into which it was to be caſt, as from the Contrariety and Redundancy of the Materials ; ſo I took particular Pains as to the due Modelling and Ranging the ſeveral Parts, and have actually improv'd the Method us'd in my former Hiſtories, in a more exact Diſtribution of the ſeveral Stages, and a more clear Diſtinction between the greater and the leſſer Periods; which I thought had been too little regarded by former Writers. Connection and Diſtinction, as well as Tranſitions and Diviſions, are highly conducing to the working up a regular Piece, by which the Reader inſenſibly finds the Light and Advantage, even before he knows the Cauſe, or from whence they ſpring : All which conſpire to produce the Majeſty and Simplicity, no leſs than the Beauty and Uniformity of a valuable Hiſtory.

As to the firſt of theſe Qualifications, tho' I always kept it in View, and I hope ſo as to make it generally conſpicuous ; yet, to render the Whole more Complete, and to anſwer the Expectations of a numerous ſort of Readers, curious in ſome Particulars, I have ſeveral times deviated and deſcended from the Dignity of an Hiſtorian, and voluntarily fallen into the lower Claſs of Biographers, Annaliſts, &c. more eſpecially in Catalogues of Mens Names, particular Deſcriptions of publick Solemnities, Proceſſions, Entries, &c. which I have been often aſſur'd, and am fully ſatisfy'd, wou'd be acceptable and uſeful to the Generality of the Nation. I have endeavour'd to provide Entertainment for the Weaker, as well as the Stronger Conſtitutions. But to the Former, I have diſpos'd of it in ſuch Portions, and at ſuch Seaſons, that I hope I may acquire the Pardon of the Judicious, at the ſame time that I obtain the Thanks of the Vulgar. And after all, it has been too uſual for Hiſtorians of the higheſt Claſs, and largeſt Views, frequently to omit and overlook Things little and trivial in Themſelves, only becauſe they are ſo in Themſelves ; without conſidering how neceſſary, and even ornamental, the pooreſt Materials are in the nobleſt Buildings, when they are put in their proper Places, and by the Hands of a ſkilful Workman.

This ſeems often to have been the Caſe of our noble and beſt Hiſtorian, whoſe Work ought to continue as long as the Name of the Engliſh Nation: And becauſe I may be thought too much to have trodden upon the Heels of that great Man, I ought to be a little particular, and ſay ſomething of what I have done with relation to Him ; and the rather, becauſe I know it is almoſt generally expected. In the firſt Place, I have taken a great deal of Pains to underſtand him throughly, and to compare him with my other Materials, which was no eaſy Task: I found uncommon Difficulties, and unaccountable Omiſſions, amidſt innumerable Beauties and Excellencies, beſides the glorious Marks of an Impartial and Extenſive, of a Penetrating and Profound Writer, who ſeem'd to have known Mankind above the beſt of Hiſtorians : So that the Work, tho' it has often given me the greateſt Eaſe and Light, it has much oftner occaſion'd me more hard Labour, and ſearching Pains, than if I had never ſeen or heard of it. And now I ſhall be ſo free with the Reader as to tell him, That I have made bold with that great Man upon all Occaſions, as well to skreen and vindicate, as to enrich and ennoble my own Work ; for the Benefit of which I have declin'd no Kinds of Liberties. As I have ſometimes copy'd, ſo I have oftner abridg'd him : I have ſometimes new-modell'd and methodiz'd him ; othertimes clear'd and explain'd him. Sometimes I have confirm'd and vindicated him ; and a few Times deſerted and contradicted him : And moreover I have often ſupply'd, and ſometimes improv'd him. ------ I ſpeak the laſt with the Pardon of my Readers, who, after theſe Commendations, may, if they think fit, add, That in ſome Places I have mutilated and debas'd him : Only, I may ſafely declare, That I never unhandſomely treated, or blackned him, as has been done by ſeveral Inſolent or Ignorant Writers of late. His Work indeed has been inhumanly ſtruck at by bold and deſperate Hands : Which not only confirms what is more generally known, That the nobleſt Writers can never be free from Faults or Cenſure ; but diſcovers ſuch a Malignancy, as if once let looſe, is ſufficient to darken the very Intellects, as well as infect the Morals of the Nation. If he be thus treated, how ſhall I expect to eſcape? ------ In ſuch Caſes nothing can protect an Author but Contempt and Obſcurity.

But however, I ſhall not be afraid here to ſpeak for myſelf, and without Bluſhing to declare, That whatever Faults I have committed, and whatever Qualifications I have wanted, in the Writing of this Hiſtory, I never was deſtitute of Honeſty and Courage. I am ready to acknowledge as much Ignorance and Inadvertency as the moſt Ill-natur'd can demand of me, but I will give up no Part of my Integrity. I have had long Experience of the Heats and Fury, the Oppoſition and Wilfulneſs, as well as the Short-ſightedneſs and contracted Notions of Parties. I have often look'd into the Infirmities as well as the Enormities that were intermix'd and abounded on both Sides ; and have writ boldly, without any Views of Obliging or Provoking any Man, or any Party of Men. I have conſider'd nothing more than the Enlightning of the Publick, and Poſterity, to whom I hope this Work, till a better appears, will be acceptable ; and, perhaps, when my Life is at an End, and ceaſes to be any longer uſeful to the World. Impartiality has always been my great Aim, a Thing not ſo hard to be Maſter of as the Generality of the World takes it to be: Error is much more difficult to deal withal, which oftentimes cauſes Ignorance to paſs for Partiality in a Writer: And yet ſtill the Charge of it as often ariſes from the Ignorance, or even Partiality of the Reader, as from the Author Himſelf. Impartiality is thought to be ſtrange, and almoſt incredible by thoſe whoſe Underſtandings are in the Poſſeſſion of a Party: But, as I hinted in my former Preface, I may venture to affirm, That, notwithſtanding the ſtrong Biaſs in Human Nature, it is ſtill as eaſy to be an Impartial Hiſtorian, as to be an Impartial Judge in Weſtminſter-Hall; and the One, as well as the Other, can certainly and unqueſtionably give juſt Judgment, tho' it ſhould prove never ſo much againſt his Intereſt and Inclination. However, it is a miſerable Miſtake to charge a Perſon with Partiality, becauſe he determines on one Side. There is ſometimes one great Difficulty indeed, which is to know how to judge Righteouſly; and another oftentimes as great, and that is, to make the World believe it: And he that is caſt in a Cauſe, too rarely believes that he has had Juſtice done him.

But Aſſertions, Aſſeverations and Proteſtations of a Man's Probity in this Caſe, are to little purpoſe: Therefore I ſhall briefly alledge two Particulars, which I think will carry ſome Conviction along with them. Firſt, I alledge, it is now about eleven Years ſince this Volume was begun, when the Introduction was ſubmitted to the ſtricteſt Scrutiny; during which Time, as every one knows, there have been ſeveral material Changes in the Government and Miniſtry, to which a deſigning Man might have been tempted to have caſt a ſquinting and malevolent Eye: Notwithſtanding which, neither before, nor at the Time it went to the Preſs, did I alter a ſingle Paſſage upon the Account of the Times, for the ſake of Parties, or with Reſpect to any particular Perſon, as may appear from the Manuſcript Copy: Which is ſome ſort of Proof that I have writ without Views, and clear from Expectations; tho' I ought not to preſume to think myſelf above Acknowledgments.

Tho' I have not deſigned to exaſperate any, yet I fear that I have innocently offended many: Therefore, in the Second Place I alledge, That whereas it is more than probable, That through my own Short-ſightedneſs, Errors, or Negligence, I have ſometimes given juſt Offence either to particular Parties, or to private Families; I declare in all ſuch Caſes, both in this and the following Volume, upon due Information, and a reaſonable Proof of the Miſtake, I ſhall be ſo far from being tenacious in the wrong Notions of Honour and Humour, that I ſhall moſt readily and publickly recant and retract my Error; either in the next Edition of this Work, if it ſhou'd ſhortly come to a Second, or in a particular Appendix, on purpoſe to be annex'd to it. And this free Offer I make out of a true Senſe of Honour and Conſcience, and of what a Writer is obliged by the ſtricteſt Tyes of Juſtice and Religion; and no ways out of Dread, Apprehenſion, or Regard to the Uſage I may meet with from any Man Living. I have all along writ with an honeſt and faithful Intention, without Fear or Reſerve, and without courting or engaging Friends or Enemies; and if I had obſerv'd and kept up to the Caution of ſome wiſe Men, I ſhou'd have made better Proviſion for my own Safety, but have render'd the Work much more Inſipid and Uſeleſs than it is at preſent.

In Sum, if any Perſon, either in Print or otherwiſe, will generouſly inform me of my Miſtakes and Errors, I ſhall be heartily thankful to him, and will act accordingly; But if any Man ſhall publickly reproach me with them, I ſhall as much deſpiſe and contemn him. I ſhall look upon the Former as a worthy Benefactor to the Publick; and on the Latter, as a poor Diſcourager of all uſeful and laudable Deſigns.

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

THE

INTRODUCTION,

(To the Second Volume as Firſt Printed.)

Giving ſome Account of the State of the Nation, and the Seeds of Publick Diſcontents, before the Acceſſion of King CHARLES the Firſt.

The Preface. I. TO give a clear and comprehenſive Account of ſuch a remarkable and melancholy Reign as that of King Charles the Firſt, it is highly requiſite to trace the main Steps, and lay open the chief Springs of thoſe Actions and Events, that at length not only prov'd uncommon, but even prodigious, and beyond the Reach of the moſt penetrating Foreſight: All which, without excluding the deep Mazes of Divine Providence, we ſhall modeſtly attempt, as far as our human Lights will direct us. In order to compaſs a Work of ſuch ſurpriſing Variety, it may be very proper, Firſt to take a tranſient and impartial View of human Nature in general, as it has been uſually diſcover'd, and Experimentally found in all Ages of the World: To conſider that great and extenſive Maſs, with all its various Mixtures, with its numerous Frailties, Corruptions, and Deviations from the Dignity of its firſt Creation; and to look upon the Majority of Men of all Nations, as Men, not as Saints, much leſs as Angels.

Human Nature conſider'd. As ſuch then we are to view the vaſt Body of Mankind; a Body liable to all the Imperfections and Misfortunes of a laps'd State, and a degenerate Condition; of which innumerable Members either have not been taught, or elſe cannot, or will not learn, much leſs practiſe their Duties. Some of them we find to be exorbitantly proud and imperious, ever imagining that no Reſpect or Rewards can be equal to their Merits and Abilities: Others to be implacable and revengeful, inſatiably thirſting after the Blood of their Enemies, and ſacrificing all rational Intereſts to their Reſentments: Another Sort are ſwell'd and inflam'd with Vanity and Popularity, conceitedly affecting to ſway the Power of the Multitude. Many are exceſſively covetous and rapacious, indefatigably working for their own private Intereſt and Profit: Others we find voluptuous and luxurious, impatient under any Oppoſition, and inrag'd with the leaſt Reſtraint of their Pleaſures and Humours: Several are ſubtle and deſigning, skilful in Diſguiſes and Artifices, and ready upon every Occaſion to propagate Lies and Calumnies: Great Numbers are found to be ſo light and credulous, as well as jealous and ſuſpicious, as to be deluded by every Repreſentation, and outward Appearance: Some are Chimerical and Romantick, whoſe prolifick Imaginations cannot keep within the Compaſs of Truth and ordinary Facts: And others are over-grown with Superſtition and Enthuſiaſm, and govern'd by unaccountable, as well as unintelligible Viſions and Impulſes. Moſt Men are apt to take firſt Impreſſions, and are by Nature partial, and have a mortal Averſion to hear well of their Enemies, or ſuch againſt whom they have any Prejudice. More ſtill are miſerably ſhort-ſighted, and exceedingly unacquainted with the Reaſons and Myſteries of State Affairs: And all Men have different Apprehenſions of many Things, whether Matters of Right, or Matters of Fact: Yet every Man is better qualify'd to diſcover Miſchiefs, than to cure them; frequently knowing what they wou'd not have, but very rarely what they would. So that conſidering theſe, and infinite other Alloys and Qualities almoſt inſeparable to human Nature, whether they may be term'd Mixtures or Defects, Infirmities or Enormities, there is no Nation in the Univerſe but abounds with ſuch Numbers of Men, as are ſufficient and diſpos'd, by Nature or Accident, to overthrow the moſt Flouriſhing Kingdom in the World; and that without an Univerſal Apoſtacy from Religion and Allegiance. Eſpecially after ſuch a Surfeit of Peace, Pleaſures and Opulency, as England had receiv'd at the Death of King James the Firſt; and much more when there appear any Miſmanagements or Miſcarriages in the Government; which tho' of no threatning Conſequence in themſelves, are liable to be made fatal by the Aggravations and Miſrepreſentations of deſigning Men.

The State of England.

As theſe unfortunate Circumſtances are ever incident to all Kingdoms, States and Sovereignties on this ſide of Heaven, ſo they began to appear and operate in a particular Manner in England at the Time of the Acceſſion of King Charles the Firſt; about which Period of Time, it may be proper and inſtructive to conſider the State of the Nation in two main Capacities, Civil and Religious: In each of which we find ſome remarkable Misfortunes, in relation to the Fears and Apprehenſions of the People; more particularly in the firſt Arbitrary Power, and in the ſecond Popery; both which, together with ſome inferior Matters, dependant or coincident, prov'd extraordinary Diſturbers of the Quiet and Happineſs of the Kingdom.

The Civil State.

To begin then with the Civil State at this Time: Neither the Prerogative of the King, nor the Liberties of the People, were ſo fully fix'd and known, nor ſo effectually examin'd and canvas'd, as they have been in latter Times. The ancient Sovereignty of Engliſh Kings, either by inherent Right, frequent Practice, or meer Accident, was then more unlimited and uncertain; which caus'd the Power of Parliaments to be more precarious and reſtrain'd. For to ſay nothing of Divine and Original Claims, which have occaſion'd endleſs Diſputes in former Times by reaſon of the lage Revenues of Crown Lands, and Fee Farms, the Court of Wards, Knights Service, and other Emoluments as well as Privileges, the Kings were naturally more Independent, and conſequently the Parliaments were more Subſervient; excepting in tumultuous and neceſſitous Times, when the Badneſs of the Kings Titles, or their urgent Occaſions, accidentally encreas'd the other's Power and Authority.

Under Q. Elizabeth.

But to omit more ancient Practices, and to look back no further than the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, whoſe Name and Memory is ſtill ſo fragrant and glorious: We find ſeveral Inſtances of ſovereign Power on one ſide, and Subjects Submiſſion on the other, of which in our Times would neither be approv'd, nor allow'd. During her long and wonderful Reign, ſhe had but ten Parliaments, and thirteen diſtinct Seſſions, the longeſt of which continu'd but a little above four Months, and the ſhorteſt not much more than one; yet never was publick Buſineſs more happily diſpatch'd and concluded. She neither gave 'em Time to combine, nor Leave to examine her Prerogative, cenſure her Miniſters, or queſtion her Actions, whether they related either to Civil or Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction. The Houſe of Commons, as Naunton obſerves, then generally conſiſted of grave and diſcreet Perſons, not factious and ambitious of Fame; ſuch as came not with a malevolent Spirit of Contention, but with Minds prepar'd to conſult the publick Good. Neither did the Houſe ever capitulate, or prefer their private Intereſt to the Neceſſities of the Queen and Publick, but waited their Times, and in the firſt place gave their Supplies, according to the Exigency of her Affairs, yet fail'd not at laſt to obtain their Deſires; ſo that the Queen and her Parliaments had ever the good Fortune to part in Love and Affection. All which ſeem'd not only owing to the happy Diſpoſition of the Members, but likewiſe to the Wiſdom and Penetration of the Queen, who knew ſhe could ſafely exert her Authority to the utmoſt, and even beyond common and perhaps unqueſtionable Limits, becauſe ſhe had entirely the Hearts of her People, who were aſſur'd ſhe would never uſe it to their Detriment. And herein conſiſted the admirable Wiſdom of her Government, that by founding her Dominion in the Affections of her Subjects, and by nicely husbanding her Treaſure and Revenues, ſhe was able by her ſingle Authority to diſperſe all Fears and Jealouſies, and ſtifle the Malignity of all State Factions, without leaving juſt Room for Murmurings and Diſcontents. Her Puniſhments and Severities, as well as her Rewards and Encouragements, were the Reſult of a profound and politick Head, continually join'd in the common Good. As to the Former, in her Courts of the Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, and others, we find very bold Sallies upon the Liberty and Property of the Subject, and perhaps ſuch as might equal any Inſtance in ſucceeding Times; but ſtill the Art, Order, and Gravity of thoſe Proceedings, together with the apparent End, ſecur'd 'em from becoming the Ground of publick Complaint. For tho' they were often exorbitant upon the Compariſon, yet they were always deſign'd and manag'd, ſo as to puniſh the Offender, not to grieve the Subject; in ſhort, to eradicate the Miſchief, not to ruin the Agent. On the other ſide, her Rewards and Promotions were conſtantly diſtributed with a ſparing, but a ſkilful Hand, with a nice and diſcerning Judgment, ſo that they might never become cheap, but always retain their full Force, and ſhine with their true Luſtre. No Prince ever preſerved the Dignity of the Nobility, and the Honour of Knighthood, more than her ſelf; and, as Sir Edward Walker obſerves, during her whole Reign ſhe created but ſix Earls and eight or nine Barons; ſo that at her Death the whole Number of Lords conſiſted but of one Marquiſs, nineteen Earls, ten Viſcounts, and about thirty Barons. Thus, with her own continu'd Steadineſs and Magnanimity, and the Wiſdom and Bravery of her Miniſters, ſhe became the Delight of her Subjects, and the Terror of her Enemies; and the Spots that were in her Government, prov'd rather like thoſe that uſually ſet off Beauties, than thoſe that diſcover Deformities.

Under King James the Firſt.

In the calmer Reign of her Succeſſor King James the Firſt, the Reins of the Government began gradually to be relax'd, or held with a very unequal Hand; and probably they became more difficult to manage, by reaſon of the Addition of a new Kingdom, then various in Laws and Conſtitutions, as well as oppoſite in Intereſts and Affections; ſo that it would naturally require great Time, and Management, to extinguiſh the ordinary Prejudices and Reſentments between both Nations. This King was very ſagacious and diſcerning, and of a nice Underſtanding in the Nature of Government, but was leſs remarkable for Vigour and Action; and ſeem'd not ſo well to conſider Queen Elizabeth's great Maxim, That the People of England were more governable in Times of War, than in Peace. Tho' he had ſeveral valuable and amiable Qualifications, and his Reign may be term'd a Complication of Peace, Plenty, and Pleaſure, yet he cannot be clear'd from ſome apparent Miſmanagements, and Flaws in Policy, which laid a Foundation for preſent Diſcontents, and future Miſfortunes. He unqueſtionably acted wiſely in employing the Miniſters of his glorious Predeceſſor; but they prov'd not immortal, and the Want of theſe Heads perhaps was never fully ſupply'd: However in a ſhort time he deviated from her uſual Practice, and became profuſe both in his Treaſure, and his Promotions; the Former of which caus'd him to be more dependant upon his Commons, and the Latter more diſtaſteful to his Nobility. His extraordinary Bounties, eſpecially to his Country-men and Favourites, occaſion'd his Commons to diſpute his Requeſts, and to queſtion his Expences and Management, as well as his Authority and Prerogative. So that of the four Parliaments he held in his Reign, he had the ill Fortune to part with only one upon amicable Terms. Tho' at the ſame time, the Parliaments were not without Blame, which generally conſiſted of younger and hotter Heads, than thoſe in the laſt Reign; who being indulg'd by the King's Reaſonings and Harangues, ſometimes took Advantage of his Lenity, as well as Neceſſities, and proceeded to unuſual Liberties, both in Speech and Action. Theſe caus'd the King to be more out of Love with Parliaments, inconſiderately tho' not unprecedently to impriſon ſeveral Members, and to give Occaſion to his Enemies to pretend he deſign'd to govern arbitrarily; and after that to raiſe Mony by Loans, Privy-Seals, Benevolences, Monopolies, and other Ways, moſt diſpleaſing to the Generality of the Nation. So that the People, who could bear the Extremities of Prerogative, when it was apparently for 'em, would ſcarce endure any Part of it, when they thought it turn'd againſt 'em. And this probably might occaſion that new unfortunate Diſtinction of Court and Country Party, which in Time prov'd ſo fatal to the Kingdom; and likewiſe introduc'd that weak Practice of State, of Buying off and Promoting the moſt troubleſome Oppoſers; which tho' ſometimes neceſſary, uſually ſerves to multiply factious Spirits, and is the common Symptom of an infirm Government, unable to exert a juſt Authority.

The Promotions of this Prince were as exceptionable as his Expences, which he ſeem'd to diſtribute with an unreſtrain'd Hand, increaſing the Nobility to double the Number to what he found them: Which diſcontented the ancient Lords, and Gentlemen of great Families and Fortunes, and caus'd the People neither to reverence Nobility ſo much as when the Numbers were leſs, nor the King who conferr'd the Honour: This prov'd one great Diminution to the Authority of the Crown; for the King being unable to ſatisfie them all, many of them became both factious and popular; contrary to the Methods of preceding Ages, when the Nobility not being numerous, did all at proper Times ſhare the Royal Favours, and ſtood as a Wall between the King and People, for the Benefit of both. And as this Bounty weaken'd the Monarchy, ſo the new Degree of Baronets amongſt the Commons, did as much diſguſt ancient Families; eſpecially when they found ſuch

Titles were conferr'd principally, if not ſolely, for Mony. But nothing ſeem'd more to incenſe the Nation, than the profuſe Favours he heap'd upon ſome particular Perſons of obſcure Fortunes, ſuch as Somerſet and Buckingham, to whom he manifeſted a Fondneſs, not eaſily accounted for by the Rules of Reaſon and Policy. Theſe Particulars, together with his unfortunate Attempt for the Recovery of the Palatinate, his Eagerneſs for the Spaniſh Match, and ſome others that croſs'd the Humours of the People, unhappily rais'd Diſcontents and Jealouſies, eſpecially amongſt turbulent Spirits of all Ranks, who began to inſinuate the Fears of Lawleſs and Arbitrary Power in a King, who they thought rather purſu'd his own private Intereſts and Projects, than the publick Good, and Benefit of the whole Nation. Yet after all, if we come coolly and candidly to conſider the pacifick Temper, as well as religious Diſpoſition of this Prince, together with the uncertain Limits of the Prerogative at that Time, we may juſtly, as well as charitably believe, That the Miſmanagements of his Government ought rather to be called Misfortunes and Infirmities, than real Crimes and Enormities. However, of this we are certain; That his Failings have been unreaſonably repreſented, and unmeaſurably aggravated, by the Tongues and Pens of ignorant, as well as malicious Men.

The Religious State and Eſtabliſhment.

II. Thus Affairs ſtood in reſpect of the Civil State of the Nation; but ſtill the Fears ariſing from thence, ſeem'd not to be ſo infectious, as thoſe proceeding from Religion, ſuch as the general Apprehenſions of Popery, and the Hatred of many to the preſent Eccleſiaſtical Authority and Conſtitution. For the more clear underſtanding of which, it will be proper to take a backward View, and conſider the Beginning and the Riſe of the Legal Eſtabliſh'd Church of England. This Eſtabliſhment was a Performance of infinite Labour and Difficulty, begun in the Reign of King Henry the Eighth, and attended with ſurpriſing Accidents and Changes; but not compleatly perfected 'till the Beginning of Queen Elizabeth's Reign, after thirty Years various Struggles through innumerable Oppoſitions and Impediments: And conſidering the prodigious Alterations it occaſion'd, and the wonderful Effects it produc'd, in remote as well as neighbouring Parts, it ſeems next to a Miracle that it caus'd no greater Bloodſhed and Convulſions in the State. The Beginnings and Progreſs of this mighty Work were attended with ſome unaccountable, and perhaps unjuſtifiable Proceedings, as are often incident to the moſt laudable Deſigns; but if we examine the whole Fabrick, with all ſurrounding Inconveniencies, we find that it was erected and model'd with the profoundeſt Wiſdom, carry'd on with the calmeſt Temper, and moſt natural Fervour, and likewiſe cemented with the Blood of the moſt pious and learned Men in the Kingdom. At laſt, excepting ſome Precariouſneſs in the Revenues, it was eſtabliſh'd by the utmoſt of human Authority, Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil, and receiv'd its finiſhing Stroak under the moſt glorious Queen then known in the World; when it ſoon ſhone with that Splendor, that it became the Envy of one Part of Chriſtendom, and the Wonder of all the reſt.

The Enemies to it.

The Church of England, thus flouriſhing under the Influence of a vigilant and powerful Mother, was ſoon attack'd by Enemies of different Kinds, particularly Roman-Catholicks, and Puritans, the former charging it with Schiſm and Apoſtacy, and the latter with Superſtition and a Want of a thorough Reformation. The Roman Religion, which was ſtill far from being extirpated in the Nation, was at this Time extreamly odious and terrible to the Generality of the People; not ſo much, as we may conceive, from the Burthens attending it, as from the barbarous Severities practis'd in the preceding Reign, which gave it one of the moſt fatal Wounds it receiv'd; but when the Church was eſtabliſh'd almoſt beyond their Hopes of Retrieve, for the firſt ten Years of the Reign, the Romaniſts, tho' numerous and powerful, were for the moſt part moderate and peaceable, were frequently employ'd in publick Affairs, and often conformable to the new Eſtabliſhment; 'till the Court of Rome thought it neceſſary to prohibit their Occaſional Compliances, leſt they might gradually cauſe a general Defection. And when the Puritans, who were fond of foreign Models, and a novel Diſcipline, began to appear in conſiderable Numbers, then the Papiſts, by means of new Orders from Rome, proceeded to open Hoſtilities, and not only acted in publick and audacious Attempts, but likewiſe privately fomented the new Diviſions; which they effected by ſubtle Diſguiſes, and a ſupercilious Imitation of a Sanctity and Purity, then ſtrangely growing into Faſhion. And tho' it cannot be ſaid, that they were the real Founders of Puritaniſm, which had its Cauſe and Riſe in foreign Countries, yet certainly they were indefatigable Promoters of That, and thoſe Sects that follow'd It, and likewiſe blew up ſuch Flames in the Church, as could never yet be extinguiſh'd. Of which Truth we have inconteſtable Evidence from ſome Inſtances in Nalſon and others; where it appears, That the firſt Independent Congregation in England was gather'd by a Popiſh Dominican Frier; to which Camden adds other Reaſons of the Encreaſe of this Party, 'as their reſolute 'Temper, the Negligence of ſeveral Biſhops, and the Fa'vour of ſome Noblemen, who thirſted after the Patrimo'ny of the Church, which at that time was not out of the 'Reach of Alienations. Their Numbers by theſe means encreaſing, they gradually fell into Subdiviſions, and different Denominations, ſuch as Presbyterians, Browniſts, Anabaptiſts, Familiſts, Goſpellers, and ſeveral others; which at length occaſion'd innumerable Heats, Conteſts and Commotions in the Kingdom.

The State under Queen Elizabeth.

But while the triumphant Queen reign'd, neither Theſe, nor the Romaniſts could gain any ſuch Ground as might prove fatal to her Government, or the Peace of the Nation. She underſtood the Secret, and knew the beſt Means to give Happineſs to her Kingdom, and how and when to exert her Authority; which ſhe manag'd with no leſs Diſcretion than Vigour. She was an exact Obſerver of two Maxims of State; the One was, Never to force Men's Conſciences, the Other, Never to ſuffer Factious Practices to go unpuniſh'd. And no Perſon perhaps knew better how to diſtinguiſh between the one and the other; between a ſincere Zeal, and a turbulent Flame. And as ſhe was ſenſible that all religious Factions, how oppoſite ſoever to each other, did continually threaten her Prerogative and Authority, and the Peace and Proſperity of her Subjects; ſo ſhe effectually oppos'd their Encroachments by her vigilant Adminiſtration, and her new-erected Court of High Commiſſion, and involv'd both Romaniſts and the other Diſſenters under the common Title of Recuſants. Still this was her particular Felicity, that tho' ſhe was ſevere upon thoſe Diſſenters that were the moſt declar'd Enemies to the Church of Rome, even in ſome Caſes to the taking of Life it ſelf; yet ſhe never gave the Nation the leaſt Jealouſie or Apprehenſion of favouring the Romiſh Religion; which to many People in England was then more formidable than the greateſt Tyranny upon Earth, and was by them look'd upon with as much Deteſtation as Mahometaniſm or Paganiſm.

Under King James the Firſt.

Upon King James's Acceſſion to the Throne, all Parties under Reſtraint began to conceive ſome new Hopes; and likewiſe began to make ſome little Struggles and Efforts, tho' with no great Succeſs. This Prince, in the Beginning of his Reign, acted very laudably, and with great Reputation in reſpect of the eſtabliſh'd Church; both as to the Settlement of the Revenues, and as to the famous Conference with the Diſſenters at Hampton-Court. But being of a frank and converſable Diſpoſition, which more induc'd him to argue with, and convince encroaching Men, than to ſuppreſs them by legal Methods, he was not in the Event ſo fortunate as his Predeceſſor, nor could he long maintain a Power ſo ſteady and uniform, as was agreeable to her Maxims; for it was his uſual Practice, through the whole Courſe of his Government, to ballance one Extream by the other; countenancing the Papiſts againſt the Puritans, and the Puritans againſt the Papiſts, the better to preſerve the Church of England in Safety between both Oppoſites. A Practice that ſhew'd much of Policy, but leſs of Authority; and which ſeem'd to declare that he wanted more Courage and Power, than Will and Inclination to extinguiſh thoſe Religious Factions. In his Speech to the Firſt Parliament, ſome Perſons took Offence at his acknowledging The Roman Church to be our Mother Church, tho' defil'd with ſome Infirmities and Corruptions; and his declaring, That if the Papiſts would lay aſide King-killing, and ſome other groſs Errors, he would be content to meet them half Way. But the horrid Powder-Plot ſhortly after threw them much out of his Eſteem, eſpecially the Jeſuits; 'till towards the latter End of his Reign, his great Earneſtneſs to marry the Prince his Son with Spain, and afterwards with France, both contrary to the main Bent of the Nation, oblig'd him to ſhew ſuch Favours to the Roman Catholicks, as rais'd new Jealouſies and Apprehenſions of Popery: So that he was thought no true Proteſtant, that would not believe that the Proteſtant Religion was like to be undermin'd.

The loudeſt Outcries came from the Puritan Party, who daily gather'd Strength under the Remiſsneſs, if not Indulgence of ſome whoſe Buſineſs was to diſcourage them. And about this time began that popular Name and Charge of Innovations, as alſo that unhappy Diſtinction of Arminian and Calviniſt, which ſo intoxicated the Heads of the Vulgar, that every ſtrict Church-man was call'd an Innovator, and an Arminian accounted as dangerous as a Papiſt. Theſe Circumſtances and Accidents, the Conteſts of Preachers, together with The Book of Sports, which gave Offence to many worthy and pious Perſons, ſoon blew up the Fears of the Multitude; inſomuch that at King James's Deceaſe, Popery was as much apprehended from ſome, as Arbitrary Power was from others. Yet after all, ſetting aſide ſome few warm Proſecutions, both the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Government were either ſo infirm, or ſo unactive, that every very Man declar'd his Thoughts, as if they had been under the Power of no Reſtraints; ſo that it ſeems probable, that notwithſtanding ſome Incroachments of the Prerogative, the Nation ſuffer'd more real Detriment from this unfortunate Prince's Lenity, than from all the Exceſſes of his Authority.

Both States conſider'd.

III. And now at laſt, to conſider both the Civil and Religious State of the Nation, at one View, we find moſt of the Seeds of the following Diſcontents and Troubles ſown and planted in the Reign of King James the Firſt; occaſion'd chiefly on one ſide by ſeveral Failures in the Government, and on the other in a great meaſure by the Licentiouſneſs of many Perſons, too much cover'd with the Ruſt of Peace and Wantonneſs: Both which meeting, and croſſing each other, by the Intervening of new Accidents and Materials, ſuch a Flame was at length blown up, as more than endanger'd the whole Kingdom. Moſt of the publick Complaints and Grievances, which afterwards ſwell'd to ſo vaſt a Bulk, had their Beginnings, or at leaſt their ill Appearances, in this Reign; ſuch as Diſſentions with Parliaments, Impriſoning of Members, Loans and Privy-Seals, Benevolencies, Monopolies, unequal Severities to ſome, and profuſe Favours to others, the Indulgence towards Papiſts, The Book of Sports, the Advancement of the Clergy's Grandeur, and ſome other Things, diſtaſtful to a jealous and ſagacious Nation. On the other ſide, beſides the Diſguſts and Waverings of the Nobility and great Men, the People proceeded to unprecedented Liberties, which naturally led them into many Errors, and dangerous Paths and Precipices, ſo that they aſſum'd to themſelves a Power of cenſuring and intermedling with ſuch Matters of State and Religion, as were unqueſtionably above their Sphere and Capacity. Beſides all theſe, one ſignal Misfortune to the Nation, as it afterwards prov'd, was owing wholly to the laſt Parliament, fir'd chiefly by the ſpecious Pretences of the Duke of Buckingham, which was a precipitated War with the King of Spain, and the Emperor, contrary to the Will and Judgment of King James, who wiſely foreſaw that he ſhould not be ſufficiently ſupported under ſuch a mighty Expence. To which we may add another Miſchief and falſe Step in Politicks, ſtrongly oppos'd by the King, which was a violent Promoting of Impeachments, and principally owing to the Power of the Duke, and not without the Concurrence of the young Prince; and this in a ſhort Time encreas'd to an Exorbitancy, that prov'd more formidable to good Miniſters, than terrible to bad.

The Concluſion.

If, after all, we carefully conſider the Conjunction of all theſe ſeveral Grievances, Troubles and Accidents, together with thoſe innumerable Miſchiefs, Infirmities and Depravities attending human Kind, as were formerly hinted; we may eaſily conceive what mighty Difficulties and Diſcouragements attended King Charles the Firſt at his Acceſſion to the Crown; and we may modeſtly conclude, That his Father unhappily left him entring upon an expenſive and perhaps unneceſſary War, with a broken and exhauſted Treaſury, a divided and factious Miniſtry, a Nobility diſoblig'd and watching for Advantages, a People ſuſpicious both of Arbitrary Power and Popery, and in a Word, a Crown environ'd with Troubles and Thorns: So that he ſeem'd not ſo much to aſcend a Throne, as to enter upon a Theatre, to wreſtle with all the Misfortunes of a State, which at the ſame Time was both enervated with Pleaſures, and awaken'd with Surmiſes and Jealouſies.

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK I.

Conſiſting of the calmer Part of the Reign of King CHARLES the Firſt: From his Acceſſion to the Throne, to the Beginning of the LAST and LONG PARLIAMENT.

Containing the Space of 15 Years, and about 7 Months.

CHAP. I.

From the King's Acceſſion to the Throne, to the Diſſolution of the Third Parliament, when thoſe Aſſemblies began to be diſcontinued.

Containing the Space of almoſt Four Years.

1625. Car. I. CHARLES the Firſt.

I. 1. IT was with all the forementioned Inconveniencies and Difficulties, that the Hopes of the Nation, Prince Charles, the ſole ſurviving Son of King James the Firſt, aſcended his Imperial Throne, to govern three Kingdoms, in ſeveral Degrees different in Laws and Conſtitutions, as well as Intereſts and Perſuaſions. He was now in the Flower and Vigour of his Youth, about four Months above twenty four Years of his Age, of a grave Aſpect and manly Behaviour, chaſte and temperate beyond Exception, clear from all known perſonal Vices, and uninfected with thoſe licentious Exceſſes, which are not only incident to that Age and Fortune, but in ſuch Caſes almoſt thought excuſable; as Mr. May, and ſome other Enemies, acknowledge.

His Birth and Childhood. This Prince's Birth and Childhood are ſaid to have been attended with ſome very remarkable Preſages, both of his future Greatneſs and Misfortunes. Yet in his younger Days he was ſubject to ſeveral Infirmities as to his Conſtitution, which were accompany'd with an appearing Obſtinacy in his Temper: For the Weakneſs of his Body at firſt inclining him to private Receſſes, and ſome Imperfections in his Speech cauſing Diſcourſe and Converſation to be tedious and unpleaſant, he was ſuſpected to be ſomewhat perverſe in his Nature; but more Age and Strength qualifying him for manlike Exerciſes, and the publick Hopes inviting him from his Retirements, he gradually freed the Nation from all ſuch Apprehenſions. So that after that, ariſing to an eminent Proficiency in Learning, he proceeded to a more active Life, and became ſo perfect in Vaulting, Riding the Great Horſe, Running at the Ring, Shooting with Croſs-Bows, Muskets, and ſometimes Great Guns, that if Soveraignty had been the Reward of Excellencies in thoſe Arts, he would have acquir'd a new Title to the Crown; being accounted the moſt celebrated Mark's-Man, and the moſt perfect Manager of the Great Horſe, of any in the three Kingdoms.

1625. Car. I.

His Youth and Exerciſes. As to publick Affairs, he choſe rather to entertain himſelf with theſe healthful and martial Exerciſes, than to be at the Head of any political Meaſures; he quietly enjoy'd his Privacies and Reſervedneſs in the very Court, and left the Management of State Affairs entirely to his Father, and his Favourite Council. And, except his joyning with the Duke of Buckingham in the laſt Parliament, he had never yet declared himſelf of any Party or Faction, or had ſcarce interpoſed in any publick Proceedings, tho' ſome Things had been tranſacted with great Detriment to his own preſent and future Fortunes. What appear'd moſt conſpicuous with relation to Government, was an inviolable Steadineſs and a hearty Zeal for the Proteſtant Religion, as at this Time eſtabliſh'd by the Laws of England; from which no Artifices nor Arguments, either of Papiſts or of other Diſſenters, could ever move or divert him. So that upon the whole, no Prince ever came to the Throne with fewer Blemiſhes, as to his Morals; or fewer Prejudices, or Objections againſt his Perſon.

His Acceſſion to the Crown. 2. With theſe Qualifications and Accompliſhments, the young Prince ſucceeded his Father upon the 27th Day of March, in the Year 1625; and notwithſtanding the diſcouraging Circumſtances before-mentioned, it was with the u-niverſal Satisfaction of the People, and at one happy Conjuncture, when all the other Parts of Chriſtendom, being engag'd in War, were very ſollicitous for his Alliance. As ſoon as King James had departed this Life on a Sunday Morning, this Prince was ſolemnly proclaim'd King before the Court Gate at Theobalds, the Place where his Father dy'd; and the News of his Death flying to London, it rais'd a melancholy Damp and Sorrow among Many, and no ſmall Commotion and Thoughtfulneſs in the Minds of all Men. The Sermon was interrupted at White-Hall, and immediate Orders were ſent from the Privy-Council to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London to appear in their Robes on Horſe-Back in order to proclaim the new King. Which Solemnity was begun at White-Hall by all the Nobility in Town with the joyful Sound of Trumpets; and being afterwards join'd with the City Magiſtrates and Officers, they compleated it with a Pomp and Magnificence not inferior to any in former Reigns. On the ſame Evening the young Monarch remov'd from Theobalds, and came privately to St. James's in a cloſe Coach; but the Corps of his deceaſed Father remain'd in the ſame Place, attended by all the Servants in Ordinary.

His Care of the Publick.

The next Morning King Charles was waited on by all the old Privy-Counſellors and chief Officers of State; and the whole Day was buſily employ'd in various Conſultations, in adminiſtring of Oaths, in preparing of Proclamations, and iſſuing out Commiſſions for Authorizing the Great Seal, Privy Seal and Signet, till new ones cou'd be finiſh'd, and for continuing the Powers of Judges, Sheriffs, Juſtices, and other Civil Officers, whoſe Truſts were legally determined by the Deceaſe of King James. A particular Proclamation was publiſh'd, in which the young King ſignify'd his Father's Death, together with his own undoubted Right of Succeſſion to the Crown Imperial of this Realm; finally declaring; 'That as He, for his Part ſhou'd, 'by God's Grace, ſhew Himſelf a moſt benign and gracious 'Sovereign to all his good Subjects, in their lawful Suits 'and Cauſes; ſo he doubted not but They, on their Parts, 'would ſhew Themſelves to Him, their natural Liege 'Lord, moſt loving, faithful and obedient Subjects.' And thus far all Things had a fair and pleaſing Proſpect to the Nation.

His Wants.

3. The new King being thus enter'd upon his Throne, he ſoon diſcover'd his moſt preſſing Inconveniency; he found his greateſt Concern was immediately to ſupply an exhauſted Treaſury, which was to furniſh out Money for three extraordinary and ſolemn Occaſions, namely a Funeral, a Marriage, and a Coronation, beſides a new projected War, likely to be more expenſive than all the other joyn'd together. For which Reaſons a Parliament was determined to be call'd, in which the King was ſo urgent that he thought of ſummoning the laſt that met in his Father's Reign, till the Lord-Keeper Williams inform'd him, 'That it was inconſiſtent with the Conſtitution of the 'Kingdom, which diſſolv'd all Parliaments upon the De'ceaſe of a King.' Upon which he commanded the Lord Keeper immediately to iſſue out his Writs, and not to loſe one Day; to which the other modeſtly alledg'd, That ſuch a haſty Summons would turn to his Majeſty's Diſadvantage, ſince his beſt Friends and Servants wou'd want ſufficient Time to make their Intereſts in their reſpective Countries, and ſo miſs of their Elections. But the King anſwer'd, It was high Time to have Supplies granted for maintaining a War with the King of Spain, for which purpoſe the Fleet muſt ſet out in the Summer. To this the Keeper gave an unwilling Conſent, as well in relation to the War, as to the Parliament; for which he was diſmiſs'd with an unuſual Coldneſs from the King, which, together with the Duke of Buckingham's Behaviour towards him, became evident Prognoſticks of the Declenſion of this great States-Man.

After the Writs for a new Parliament, and Preparations for other Matters of great Moment, the chief publick Concern was for a magnificent Funeral for the late King. In order to which Solemnity, on the 23d Day of April, the Body was remov'd from Theobalds to London, with a pompous Attendance of Nobility and Perſons of Quality, who by the Light of Torches conducted it to Somerſet-Houſe, where a royal and glorious Herſe was erected, daily viſited and view'd by infinite Multitudes of People, who came from all Parts to be Spectators of the unuſual Sight.

King James's Funeral.

The ſeventh of May was the appointed Day of Burial, when the Body and Herſe, with a lively Statue of the deceaſed Monarch, were brought in extraordinary Pomp and Solemnity to Weſtminſter Abbey. The new King, to expreſs his filial Piety, and willing to diſpenſe with Majeſty, and the Niceties of State, follow'd his Father's Herſe; being ſupported by the Earls of Arundel and Pembrook, and having his Train born up by twelve Peers of the Realm. This was the third Funeral he had attended as principal Mourner; which, as Heylyn ſays, gave ſome Occaſion to preſage, 'That he ſhou'd prove a Man of Sorrows, and 'that his End ſhou'd bear Proportion to theſe mournful 'Beginnings.' The Sermon was deliver'd by the Lord-Keeper, Biſhop Williams, which was adorn'd with high Strains of Rhetorick and Commendations of the Preacher, and accompany'd with no ſmall Sighs and Lamentations of the People. Thus the pacifick King, who always held the Title of Peace-Maker, was peaceably lodg'd in his Grave, at a Time when War reign'd in all Neighbouring Nations, and unexpected Storms began to riſe and threaten his own Dominions.

Preparations for the King's Marriage.

II. 1. During theſe Funeral Preparations and Solemnities, a Matter of more immediate Moment to the Publick was tranſacting abroad; which was the Conſummation of the Marriage between the young King and Henrietta Maria, younger Siſter to Lewis XIII, the preſent King of France, and Daughter to the famous Henry the Fourth. The whole Deſign was projected, and well nigh concluded in the late King's Reign: The Pope's Diſpenſation was obtain'd, the Marriage Articles were ſign'd, and nothing remain'd but the Ceremony of the Eſpouſals in the French Court; to compleat which the King had appointed, for his Ambaſſadors and Commiſſioners, the Earls of Holland and Carliſle, and likewiſe ſent over his Procuratorial Letters for the Duke of Chevereux to act in his Name; that Duke being of the Houſe of Guiſe, from which Houſe his Majeſty deriv'd himſelf by his Great Grand-Mother, Wiſe of King James the Fifth of Scotland. Upon Sunday the eleventh Day of May, the grand Solemnity began with all the Marks of Joy and Triumph, when the Royal Bride was conducted from the Louvre by the King, Queen, and all the Court of France, all in glorious Attire, to a magnificent Theatre purpoſely erected before the Front of the Cathedral of Notredame, where the Ceremonies were perform'd by the famous Cardinal Richlieu, who upon this Occaſion obtain'd the Superiority of the Archbiſhop of Paris. Here the Duke of Chevereux, adorn'd with Gold and Diamonds, ſtood between the Earls of Holland and Carliſle, clad in beaten Silver, under a rich Canopy plac'd upon the Scaffold; into whoſe Hands the King of France, and Monſieur his Brother, conſign'd the Queen of Great Britain their Siſter; and the Marriage was ſolemniz'd according to the ordinary Ceremonies of that Church. Which being perform'd, they repair'd in the ſame Order and Solemnity to the Choir of Notredame, and after Maſs to the Hall of the Archbiſhop's Palace, where the Royal Feaſt was celebrated with as noble Exultations and Magnificence as can well be expreſs'd. And that all ſorts of Perſons might partake of theſe publick Triumphs, Priſoners for Debts were ſet at Liberty, and Pardon was granted to ſeveral Criminals, as an Earneſt of the King's Affection to his Siſter, and his Reſpect to the new Alliance. The News of which was not confin'd to the Walls of Paris, but in a few Days reſounded through all the Streets in London, where it was generally receiv'd with unuſual Expreſſions of the moſt dilated Joy and Satisfaction.

The Ceremony at Paris.

The Duke of Buckingham's Appearance there.

Not long after, the Feſtivals and Triumphs in Paris were renew'd and multiply'd, by the Arrival of King Charles's prime Favourite, the Duke of Buckingham, who with the Earl of Montgomery, and other Engliſh Lords, came to conduct the Royal Bride home to her new Spouſe. The Pomp and Splendor of the Court, and the Entertainments was very great and ſurpriſing, eſpecially the Feaſt made by Cardinal Richlieu; yet nothing equall'd the glorious Appearance of the Engliſh Duke, who was adorn'd with all the Luſtre that Wealth and Vanity could produce; and his charming Face, and graceful Mein, attracted the Eyes of all People to a ſort of an Adoration of his Perſon. This ſo inflam'd his ambitious Spirit, that he aſpir'd ſo far as to dedicate his moſt violent Affection to a Lady of ſublime Quality, generally believ'd to be the Queen of France, and to purſue it with ſuch importunate Addreſſes, that when the King had brought the Queen his Siſter as far as he had deſign'd, and deliver'd her into the Hands of the Duke, in his Journey he once more took a Reſolution to make a Viſit to the Lady, which he thought might be effected with ſufficient Privacy: But it was early diſcovered, and ſuch Proviſion made for his Reception, that had he purſu'd his Attempt, he muſt have been aſſaſſinated; of which he had juſt ſo much Notice as ſerv'd him to eſcape the Danger. Upon this Diſappointment he boldly ſwore, That he would ſee and ſpeak with that Lady, in ſpight of the Strength and Power of France: And from that Time he took all Opportunities of affronting and exaſperating that Court and Nation; and never deſiſted, till he had involv'd the King his Maſter in an unreaſonable and unfortunate War, which prov'd fatal to Himſelf, and diſhonourable to his Country: To ſuch unwarrantable and exorbitant Practices will ſome Mens Luſt and Ambition tranſport them.

His Preſumption.

The ſecond Day of June was the Time appointed for the new Queen's Departure, when with a noble Retinue they left Paris, and arriv'd at Amiens, where with great

Splendor

1625. Car. I.

Splendor ſhe was entertain'd for fourteen Days. King Charles having Notice that ſhe had left that City, ſent a Royal Fleet of above twenty large Ships to tranſport her from Bologn, which gave a lofty Salutation with a Hundred Pieces of Cannon. Here among other great Ladies the Dutcheſs of Buckingham was ſent to kiſs her Majeſty's Hand, as from the King her Husband, propoſing to her To chuſe her own Time for her Paſſage, with moſt Conveniency to her Perſon. Accordingly on the twenty ſecond of June new Stile, having taken leave of Monſieur her Brother, and other Friends and Relations, ſhe ſet ſail from Bologn, and ſafely arriv'd at Dover after a ſhort but dark tempeſtuous Paſſage; which being ſignify'd to the King then at Canterbury, with the choiceſt of his Nobility he repair'd to her the next Morning, and receiv'd her with all the Tranſports of Joy and Affection, profeſſing, That he could be no longer Maſter of Himſelf, than while he was a Servant to Her. The ſame Day he conducted her to Canterbury, where receiving her from the Hands of the Duke of Chevereux, he conſummated the Marriage, and ſurrender'd himſelf to thoſe Embraces, which he ever preſerv'd with ſuch a Conjugal Purity, that on the Day before his Death he commanded his Daughter the Princeſs Elizabeth to declare to her Mother, That his Thoughts had never ſtray'd from her, and that his Love ſhould be the ſame to the laſt. On the other ſide the new Queen, in Teſtimony of her Love and Reſpect, made the firſt Suit to her Royal Spouſe, 'That 'he would not be angry with her for her Faults of Ignorance, before he had firſt inſtructed her to avoid them; 'for being young, and arriving in a ſtrange Country, both 'might occaſion her to commit many Errors: And ſhe 'begg'd of him, In ſuch Caſes to uſe no third Perſon, but 'by Himſelf to inform her when he found ſhe acted any 'thing amiſs.' The King readily granted her Requeſt, and thank'd her for it, deſiring her To uſe Him, even as ſhe deſir'd Him to uſe Her. Which ſhe moſt willingly promis'd to obſerve.

The new Queen arriv'd.

The Marriage conſummated.

From Canterbury the Royal Pair advanc'd by eaſy Stages to Graves-End, attended by a glorious Concourſe of Lords and Ladies, and all the Knights, Gentlemen and Train-Bands of Kent. Here with an Encreaſe of new Multitudes from London and other Places they enter'd their Imperial Barge, and paſſed up the River in a triumphant Manner; being entertain'd with continual Peals of Ordnance, from the Men of War, Merchant Ships, and the Tower of London, till they ſafely arriv'd at their Palace of White-Hall. Extraordinary Preparations were made in the City of London for the Reception of her Majeſty, but moſt of the Show and Appearance was omitted, by reaſon of the Plague, which now daily encreas'd in the City and Suburbs, and ſoon prov'd the greateſt that had been known in the Nation. This gave a great Damp to the Joy and Glory of the Court, which notwithſtanding was very ſplendid. The Queen was ſetled with her Family in Denmark or Somerſet-Houſe, which was particularly furniſh'd for her Reception, with a Chapel for Popiſh Service, according to the Articles of Marriage; and afterwards with a Convent of Capuchin Friars, who had Permiſſion to walk abroad in their Religious Habits. From thenceforward, it was obſerv'd, That greater Numbers of Seminary Prieſts and Jeſuits repair'd out of Foreign Parts into England, to the great Uneaſineſs of many zealous Proteſtants.

A great Plague.

2. The Queen herſelf was now in the Bloom of her Youth and Beauty, about ſixteen Years of Age; a Lady of excellent Air and Preſence, of a warm Zeal and great Spirit, and of no leſs Vivacity in her Looks, than Activity in her Motions and Behaviour. Her Perſon was not altogether unknown to the King, who when he was Prince ſaw her at Paris in his Paſſage to Spain; upon which Occaſion we are inform'd that ſhe ſaid, The Prince need not have gone ſo far as Spain for a Wife: And when afterwards ſhe receiv'd two Letters at the ſame Time, one from King James, and the other from the Prince, ſhe put the Former into her Cabinet, and the Latter into her Boſome. The Account of which extreamly pleas'd King James, who declar'd, That he took it for a happy Omen, That ſhe wou'd preſerve his Name in her Memory, and lodge Charles in her Heart. However auſpicious this Marriage appear'd to Him, and many others who promoted it, it prov'd one great Occaſion of the future Calamities of the Nation, and againſt the main Bent and Genius of the People: notwithſtanding it was carried on with the unanimous Conſent of the laſt Parliament, as L'Eſtrange aſſures us. For almoſt all the Proteſtants took the Allarm, as if the Marriage had been only made to introduce the Roman Catholick Religion; King James having in effect condeſcended to ſo many Particulars in favour of the Queen's French Domeſticks, and the Engliſh Papiſts, and taken ſo little Care for the Education of the Children to be born of this Marriage, in the Proteſtant Religion, that unleſs he was reſolv'd to break his Word, the Articles of the Contract were to be judg'd a Deſign to ſtrengthen the Romiſh Party in England. So that they brought a peculiar Misfortune upon King Charles, which attended him during the greateſt Part of his Reign, and much hinder'd him from being thoroughly known to his Subjects. For being in his Opinion inviolably ſteady to the Principles of the Church of England, and yet at the ſame Time neceſſitated by theſe Articles ſometimes to comply with things not agreeable to his Sentiments, he fell into ſuch Difficulties as to be accus'd by two oppoſite Parties; the French and their Party continually charging him with Breach of Faith, in not duly obſerving theſe Articles; and the Puritan Party with Affection to Popery, in conſenting to them at all. But to return to the Perſon and Behaviour of the Queen, who afterwards had ſo prevailing an Aſcendant on her Husband, we cannot pretend to give her Character in full Length, ſince all the beſt Writers have in a great Meaſure declin'd it, and have only told us in general of her Beauty, Wit, Spirit, and ordinary Qualities and Accompliſhments. Therefore ſince we have juſt brought the young King to his Settlement, both in his Kingdom and Family, we think it very convenient and uſeful to proceed to the Characters of ſome few Perſons of Quality, who at this Time had the greateſt Influence upon the Publick both in the Church and State, reſerving others to a more proper Place. Theſe at preſent were the Duke of Buckingham, Doctor Abbot Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Doctor Williams Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal and Biſhop of Lincoln, and Doctor Laud Biſhop of St. Davids; Men more differing in their Intereſts and Deſigns, than their main Principles and Opinions.

An Account of the Queen.

The Match unfortunate.

1625. Car. I.

George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, may well be rank'd among the Prodigies of Fortune, and the Miracles of Favourites; who from a bare Gentleman of twenty one Years of Age, and no viſible Eſtate, was by twenty ſeveral Steps hurried and mounted to the higheſt Degrees of Honour and Power, far above all the Nobility of the Kingdom, and all within the Space of twelve Years. For not to enumerate all his Offices and Titles, he was made a Knight of the Garter, a Baron, a Viſcount, an Earl, a Marqueſs, a Duke, Maſter of the Horſe, Conſtable of Windſor Caſtle, Maſter of the King's-Bench-Office, Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Lord High Admiral of England, and intirely diſpos'd of the King's Favours, in conferring all the Honours and Places of three Kingdoms without a ſingle Rival. So that if any Courtiers did but venture to withdraw themſelves from their abſolute Dependance upon him, as the Lord-Keeper Williams and the Earl of Middleſex did, they uſually met with inevitable Ruin. Yet all his Offices and Dignities, as Sir Henry Wotton obſerves, were but the Facings and Fringes of his Greatneſs, in compariſon of that Truſt which his Maſter repos'd in him, by putting into his Hands the Hopes and Heir of all his Dominions, in a hazardous if not romantick Journey into Spain; in which Affair, tho' he broke all the King's Deſigns, yet he met with a ſtrange Turn of Succeſs from both Houſes of Parliament, who gave him the higheſt Applauſes, and proceeded to ſuch Flights of Compliment, that ſome blaſphemouſly call'd him The Saviour of the Nation. All theſe Honours and Advantages, which like a Torrent came flowing in upon him, might naturally ſwell the Ambition of an older and better Man; and it is no wonder if at ſome Times he was intoxicated with ſuch a mighty Scene of Proſperity, and that his Preſumption ſhould ariſe to that Height as to affront, and to offer to ſtrike Prince Charles. Tho' this Indignity was not ſoon forgot, yet when this mild Prince came to his Throne, being rivetted by an inviolable Friendſhip and Familiarity, and charm'd by ſome Qualifications that were really very wonderful, he took him into the ſame Degree of Favour with his Father, and preſerv'd an equal Tenderneſs and Intimacy to the Day of his Death. So that all Preferments in Church and State were given by him; all his Relations and Friends promoted as he thought fit, and all his Enemies and Oppoſers diſcountenanc'd as he appointed. And his Power and Intereſt had ſuch an Aſcendant, that the Queen, notwithſtanding all her Spirit and Activity, could have no Influence as to publick Affairs while he liv'd. And towards her Majeſty, he often manifeſted a Rudeneſs contrary to his affable Diſpoſition, and once proceeded to that Degree of it, that upon an Imagination of a ſlight Diſreſpect ſhewn to his Mother, he told her, That there had been Queens of England who had loſt their Heads. Yet his Compoſition ſeem'd to have been made up of all the Elements of Affability, Courteſie, Generoſity and Munificence; and tho' his Paſſions were impetuouſly ſtrong, ſo as to bear no Oppoſition from the Greateſt, yet he never endeavour'd to guard himſelf with that Degree of Diſſimulation, as is thought neceſſary for Men in his Station; but whenever he deſign'd any ill Offices, he without Reſerve told the Parties what they were to expect. In this Place we ſhall enter no further into his Character and Behaviour, but leave it to the Imagination of the Reader to conceive what Numbers of Enviers and Enemies would naturally ariſe againſt ſuch a prodigious Favourite, and how much a young and good-natur'd Prince may ſuffer in the Opinion of ſuch, as know not how to make candid Allowances for the Heights of Friendſhip, and the Neceſſities of rewarding extraordinary Services. Therefore we proceed to

Of Archbiſhop Abbot,

Doctor George Abbot, who had been now fourteen Years Archbiſhop of Canterbury; a Perſon who had been Maſter of Univerſity College in Oxford, and Dean of Wincheſter in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth; and after that ſucceſſively Biſhop of Litchfield and London; and all without ever being a Curate, Vicar or Rector of any Pariſh; which many believe gave him a Tincture of too little Reſpect towards thoſe who had the immediate Cure of Souls, and to make him generally favour the Laity above the Clergy in all Caſes brought before him. Yet he was a celebrated Preacher both in England and Scotland, and of a grave and voluble Eloquence; he was painful, ſtout, ſevere againſt bad Manners, very hoſpitable, zealous againſt the Roman Church, and no leſs againſt thoſe call'd Arminians, which latter gave him great Diſquiets. He had built and endow'd a beautiful Hoſpital at Guilford, the Place of his Nativity; he had ſent what Succour he could ſpare to King James's Daughter, the Queen of Bohemia; was an active Counſellor for the Defence of the Palatinate; was generally acceptable to the Nobility and Gentry, and highly in Favour with King James's Queen Anne, and by her Intereſt became a great Inſtrument in the Riſe of the Duke of Buckingham. This prov'd contrary to the natural Inclinations of that good Queen, who like a Prophet foretold him, That his Benefactors would be the firſt whom that young Man would undermine. This plainly appear'd in no long Time, ſo that this Prelate began ſenſibly to decline in Power and Intereſt; and afterwards his bodily Infirmities, and his accidental killing of a Man, gave him ſuch a Blow as he could never fully recover in the late Reign. The Vigour of his Body and Mind ſeem'd much to decreaſe, and he was by many thought a better Man than an Archbiſhop, and that he was better qualified with Merit for the Dignity, than with a Spirit anſwerable to the Height of the Office; in the Exerciſe of which he was conceiv'd too eaſie and yielding, and was ſo very remiſs in exacting Conformity to the fix'd Orders of the Church in point of Ceremony, that he ſeem'd to reſolve thoſe legal Determinations into their firſt Principle of Indifferency; ſo that the very Reſtitution of them afterwards was termed all Innovation. His ſuppos'd Favours to the Puritan Party, his Zeal againſt the Arminian Opinions, his growing Diſtempers, and uncourtly Behaviour, gave ſufficient Occaſion to his active Oppoſers to have him ſoon laid aſide in this preſent Reign. Yet ſtill he was both pitied and reſpected by many of eminent Note, and Age and Hardſhips might naturally ſour his Temper againſt a then prevailing Party; ſo that his Doors were moſt open to Puritanical Perſons and Malecontents, who had a particular Veneration for his Piety and Gravity. By which Means, and the Fame of his Moderation, a Faction was preſerv'd and encreas'd, which diſturb'd both Church and State; and indeed both were real Sufferers by the Management and Misfortunes of one, who had both a Predeceſſor and a Succeſſor ſo differing from him in Actions and Opinions.

Of Biſhop Williams,

Doctor John Williams, a Welſhman by Birth, and of a noble Family, had been advanc'd to many conſiderable Preferments, firſt by the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, and then by the Duke of Buckingham, till he came to be Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal, and Biſhop of Lincoln; which firſt was an Honour and Office not held by any Clergyman ſince the firſt Year of Queen Elizabeth's Reign. He was a Man without Queſtion of a very ſublime and towering Genius; of a ready Wit, great and aſpiring Spirit, and of a general Learning and Knowledge of Things and Men. He may alſo be ſaid to be one of infinite Subtlety and Sagacity, of great Inſight in Politicks and the Affairs of a Court, and admirably qualified for Buſineſs and Diſpatch, which caus'd him to be highly in Favour with King James, and to be employ'd in the moſt nice and difficult Affairs. And what gave a ſingular Advantage to his Activity and Induſtry, was the great Happineſs of his Conſtitution, which never requir'd above three Hours Sleep in twenty four. He had a moſt generous and munificent Diſpoſition, which he ſignally diſplay'd upon all Occaſions; but his Grandeur, Benefactions and Hoſpitality, have ſometimes been thought to have been allay'd with too much Oſtentation and Vanity. This great Man in the late Reign, continued a prime Miniſter of State for four or five Years, without any conſiderable Rubs, but what aroſe from the Reſentments of the Lawyers, who were highly diſoblig'd that ſo noble an Office ſhould be transferred from their Profeſſion. Till at length the Duke of Buckingham, whoſe Power was almoſt as unlimited as his Ambition, finding him unmanageable in ſome Particulars, reſolved to ſet him aſide; which by Degrees he effected under this preſent King: So that during much of the happy Part of this Reign, he was not only neglected by the Court, but alſo overwhelm'd with Clouds and Diſhonour. Yet ſtill his Intereſt and Abilities ſo far prevail'd upon the Minds of the Nation, that upon his Account a Faction was rais'd and blown up, which prov'd longer, and had more powerful Effects than that in favour of Archbiſhop Abbot, whoſe Cauſe he ſeem'd earneſtly to eſpouſe. For Biſhop Laud, to whom he had been a particular Benefactor, unhappily joining towards his firſt Declenſion, there ſoon aroſe a fatal Oppoſition between theſe two eminent Prelates, rais'd by mutual Diſtruſt and Emulation, and ever after kept up and fomented by reciprocal Injuries, and falſe Repreſentations on each ſide. So that they ſeemed never rightly to have known each other, but both expreſt a Temper which became neither of them, and carried on a Conteſt which prov'd of infinite Miſchief to the Publick. By Means of this Oppoſition, Williams has been frequently charg'd with Puritaniſm, and being a Lover of that Party, as alſo Laud was with Popery, and being a Favourer of that Religion; both which Accuſations we believe were really and equally falſe, but neither of them groundleſs. For had not this, and ſome extraordinary Accidents hapned, it is highly probable, that the Orthodoxy of their Principles would no more have been called in queſtion, than the Sobriety of their Lives, in which they were both unqueſtionably eminent.

And of Bi-ſhop Laud.

Doctor William Laud, a Native of Reading, and of creditable Parentage, had by his own Induſtry and Abilities raiſed himſelf through all the Offices of the Univerſity, and almoſt all the Dignities of the Church, till by the Intereſt of the Duke of Buckingham, and the immediate Interceſſion of the Lord-Keeper Williams, he was made Biſhop of St. Davids, about four Years before this preſent King's Acceſſion to the Throne. He was now about fifty two Years of Age, which was nine more than his preſent Rival Biſhop Williams; having been for the moſt part reſident in the Univerſity of Oxford, where he was Preſident of St. John's College, and a moſt active Oppoſer of Puritaniſm, and that call'd Anti-Arminianiſm. He was a Man of great Parts, and good Learning, of an elevated Thought and vigorous Mind, of a diffuſive, generous and heroick Spirit, and adorn'd with unqueſtionable Honeſty and Integrity; yet ſo unhappily allayed with ſome unpopular Infirmities of Nature and Education, that he could not be Maſter of the nice Meaſures and Maxims of a Court, where there are ſo many Windings and Intricacies as to Politicks. Theſe Failures were ſoon diſcover'd by the famous Judge Whitlock, who, before his chief Advancements, was uſed to ſay, That he was too full of Fire, tho' a juſt and a good Man, and that his Want of Experience in State Matters, and his too much Zeal for the Church, and Heat, if he proceeded in the Way he was then in, would ſet this Nation on Fire. His ſtrict and poſitive Zeal for the Honour of God and the eſtabliſh'd Church, was apt to tranſport him into paſſionate Proceedings, which caus'd him to believe that Innocence and Fidelity were ſufficient Guards to a Man in his Journey through the World, in whatever Company and Ways he travelled. This alſo cauſed him to fail in thoſe Cautions and Prudences, which belong to a great Miniſter of State, who like a nice Phyſician is to conſider Times and Seaſons, as well as Perſons and Diſeaſes, and to regard their Complications, which are uſually mix'd in ill Habits of Body; and particularly to beware of removing an old and ſettled Diſtemper by ſtrong Medicines, when Time and Alteratives are to work the Cure. As he had great Courage and Reſolution, ſo being aſſur'd that he propoſed no End in all his vigorous Deſigns, but what was pious and juſt, he never ſtudied the moſt refined Ways to attain thoſe Ends; ſo that he courted Perſons too little, and did not enough value the Friendſhip of ſome great Men. In ſhort, the Rectitude of his Nature render'd him an unfit Inſtrument to ſtruggle with the Obliquity of theſe Times: And he had alſo this peculiar Infirmity, that he believ'd thoſe forward Inſtruments, which he employ'd, followed the Zeal of their own Natures, when they did but obſerve that of his; ſo that upon the firſt Emergency they generally vaniſh'd, and ſhew'd from whom they borrow'd their Heat. This fervent and vehement Temper ſeems to have been well known to King James, who had entertain'd ſome Prejudices againſt him, eſpecially for an unjuſtifiable Marriage, and was very averſe to the giving him the Biſhoprick of St. Davids; but at length was conquer'd by the Importunity of Biſhop Williams, who by reaſon of this Backwardneſs ſaid, He wou'd never deſire to ſerve that Maſter, who could not forgive one Fault in his Servant. However, by the Favour of the Duke of Buckingham, he gain'd ſome Ground in that Reign; but much more in this; in which he ſucceeded ſo far, as at length to govern without a Rival, in all Spiritual and Eccleſiaſtical Affairs.

A Compariſon of Williams and Laud.

We ſhall have Occaſion to ſay much more afterwards of this eminent Man: But becauſe the violent Differences between Him and Biſhop Williams had ſuch a baleful Influence upon the publick Tranquility, it may be very proper to make a ſhort Compariſon of theſe two great Perſons, who by ſeveral Writers have each been repreſented more like Monſters than Men. Upon the ſtricteſt Examinations, we ſincerely believe that both were great and pious Men, zealous Chriſtians, and hearty Lovers of the ornamental, as well as the eſſential Parts of the eſtabliſh'd Church of England: But by reaſon of the Diſſentions formerly hinted at, and the continual Increaſe of them, they never cou'd come to a juſt Underſtanding and Knowledge of each other; but One ever believ'd Something of the Opinions and Deſigns of the Other, which really was not true. They had both great and aſpiring Spirits, which probably might occaſion them ſooner to differ in their Opinions as to the Management of the Church, and all its Oppoſers. Laud was a ſtrict and rigid Aſſerter of the Church-Diſcipline, and wou'd not yield by any Means in the leaſt Punctilio's; for his Maxim was, There is no End of Yielding. The Temper of Williams was much more complying and inſinuating; and his Policy was to let Neceſſity govern in Matters of leſs Moment, and in ſuch Things to bend his Private Inclinations to the Prevalency of the Times. Laud believ'd that Compulſion and Authority was more prevalent, and Williams judg'd that Perſuaſions and Inſinuations wou'd more effectually reduce the Diſſenters. The former was like a bold Pilot who wou'd ſteer his Veſſel directly into the Port, tho' there were many Rocks and Shelves in the Way; but the Other knew better how to avoid thoſe hazardous Places, and by proper Windings and Turnings, cou'd more ſafely arrive in the Harbour. In ſhort, Laud's rigid Honeſty made him fit for Primitive Times, but Williams's Policy taught him how to manage the Infirmities of his own; the One being fit to govern Saints, the Other to deal with Men, which is by far the more difficult Task. To conclude all in the Phraſe of the Scriptures, which is proper for the Characters of Church-Men, Laud had always the Innocence of the Dove, but not ſo much the Wiſdom of the Serpent: Williams had very much of the Latter, but we have reaſon to fear not the full Perfection of the Former.

The FIRST PARLIAMENT.

The King's Speech.

The Keeper's Speech.

III. 1. The Treaties with Spain being broke in the laſt Reign, and a War projected for the Recovery of the Palatinate, the young King had taken all poſſible Care for the raiſing of Soldiers, and other Preparations: But now the critical Time arriv'd, when he muſt try the Love and Affections of his Subjects in Parliament; which he had the more Reaſon to expect, becauſe he had never perſonally diſoblig'd Them. The laſt Parliament had heartily join'd with Him in this intended War, when he was Prince, tho' contrary to the Inclinations of his Father; wherefore he might naturally hope for their Compliances; and had nothing more to do, than to deſire Supplies proportionable to ſo mighty an Undertaking, without which he cou'd not be conſiderable either at home or abroad. This Parliament prov'd ſo much the ſame with the former, that we are aſſur'd, that not ten of the old ſurviving Members were omitted in the Election. Theſe met upon Saturday the 18th of June, which hapned ſeaſonably for the French Lords, who ſaw with what Royal Magnificence the King was attended to the Houſe by the Prelates, Peers, and other Officers of State. His Majeſty open'd the Seſſion with a modeſt and obliging Speech, in which he declar'd, 'That their Meeting was upon no new Affair, but what was begun by his Father of bleſſed Memory; therefore hoped they wou'd maintain the Cauſe as freely as they adviſ'd his Father to undertake it. In which juſt and glorious Work, it was his Wiſdom not to begin, till he found Means to ſupport it; but when he found himſelf abus'd abroad, he follow'd their Advice; and the Aſſiſtance of thoſe in Germany, the Fleet ready for Action, and the other Preparations, did all ſufficiently prove that his Father enter'd into this Undertaking. He hoped therefore they wou'd remember That they employ'd him to break off the Two Treaties then on foot; and tho' he might poſſibly enter upon it like a raſh young Man, yet it being begun by their Advice, and the Eyes of all Europe being now fix'd upon Him, it wou'd be a great Diſhonour to Him and Them, if it ſhould fail for want of their Aſſiſtance. Then he mov'd for Expedition and Diſpatch, by reaſon of the infectious Seaſon, which by their long Continuance might endanger their Lives. Laſtly he ſolemnly declar'd his firm Adherence to the true eſtabliſh'd Religion, againſt all the Aſperſions of ſome malicious Men.' He concluded with an unuſual Condeſcenſion, the Veiling his Crown; and his Speech was ſeconded by the Lord-Keeper Williams, who with his uſual Eloquence addreſs'd himſelf to the venerable Body, and declar'd, 'That his Majeſty's main Reaſon of ſummoning Them was, to mind them of his great Engagements from them for the Recovery of the Palatinate, which was the very Center of all the ſeveral Treaties, Alliances and Preparations. And then recommended three Circumſtances to their Conſiderations, Firſt the Timing of it, in which his Majeſty deſir'd them to beſtow this Meeting upon Him, and the next ſhou'd be Theirs: Secondly, the Supply, which laſt had already been expended: Thirdly the Iſſue of the Action, which being the firſt, highly concern'd his Majeſty's Honour and Reputation, for which he rely'd upon their Love with the greateſt Confidence that ever King had in his Subjects.

Debates of the Houſe of Commons.

At this Time there were many Reaſons to diſpoſe the Hearts of the People to a general Concurrence and Satiſfaction; and it cannot be deny'd but here were all the wiſe and juſt Meaſures, that a new Prince cou'd take to render himſelf acceptable to his People, and conſiderable to the World. The Houſe of Commons preſented Sir Thomas Crew, Serjeant at Law, for their Speaker; and his Majeſty's Acceptance of him was thought the more agreeable, becauſe he had been Speaker in the very laſt Parliament, and ſo better acquainted with the Affairs at this Time depending. The Houſe began with various Debates, but what retarded the main Buſineſs was, their having by them two Petitions, one concerning Religion, the other againſt Grievances; which, having been model'd in King James's Time, and preferr'd to him in the Cloſe of the laſt Seſſion of Parliament, had never been anſwer'd. Some call'd for an immediate Account of the laſt Subſidies granted for the Recovery of the Palatinate: Others were for putting the Laws in Execution againſt Prieſts and Jeſuits, and ſuch Papiſts as reſorted to the Chappels of Foreign Ambaſſadors: And others declaim'd againſt the Dangers of Arminianiſm, and the Spreading of thoſe Tenets, eſpecially by means of Mr. Richard Montague's Book, intitled An Appeal to Cæſar. On the other ſide it was calmly urg'd by the King's Friends, 'That the Grievances at preſent were ſo few and inconſiderable, that they were not yet worth a Complaint; deſiring them to remember That his Majeſty, when Prince, had been very inſtrumental in ſoliciting the Cauſe of Parliament and People with his Royal Father, and had yet done nothing but in purſuance of the Meaſures taken in that former Reign; therefore it wou'd be the Wiſdom of the Houſe to expreſs their Duty by an effectual Supply, and with it to offer nothing but a humble Petition for the Honour and Safety of Religion.

Several Complaints.

Subſidies granted.

But ſtill the Houſe inſiſted, 'That it was the ancient, and as they conceiv'd a moſt prudential Practice, to preſent their Petitions at the beginning of a Parliament, ſo that the King might have Time to return a full and deliberate Anſwer: That they were reſolv'd to purſue the ſame Courſe, and give Priority of Diſpatch to thoſe Petitions, before any other Buſineſs whatſoever.' Accordingly they appointed ſeveral Committees, Tonnage and Poundage was conſider'd, and the Impoſition upon Wine was voted a Grievance. Mr. Montague was likewiſe brought to the Bar of the Houſe for his forenam'd Appeal, which Book he had dedicated to the King, who by his legal Delegates was the proper Judge of it. However they took the Liberty to vote it contrary to the Articles of the eſtabliſh'd Religion, and his Majeſty's Honour, and took Two Thouſand Pounds Bond for Montague's Appearance, which remain'd uncancell'd. Which new way of Proceeding caus'd the King to intimate to the Houſe, That he was not pleas'd with what they had done againſt one of his Chaplains, for he conceiv'd That his Servants were as free from Arreſts and Impriſonments, as the Servants of the Knights and Burgeſſes, therefore he had taken the Matter into his own Hands; at which the Commons ſeem'd much diſpleas'd. However to the ſeveral Heads of Grievances his Majeſty gave a diſtinct and ſatisfactory Anſwer, and gave a full Promiſe to their Petition for Religion; and the better to induce them to a Supply, he laid before them the ſeveral Diſburſements, relating both to the Army and Navy; a Condeſcenſion rarely practis'd by his Predeceſſors; which had ſo good an Effect, that the Laity frankly gave him two Subſidies, voting the Papiſts to pay double; and the Clergy three. The Lord Conway related to both Houſes, 'That the King graciouſly accepted of their Offers, but the Neceſſities of the preſent Affairs ſtill requir'd their further Counſels: That the late King was provok'd beyond his Nature to undertake a War, the Charges of which amounted to ſeven hundred Thouſand Pounds a Year, to ſupport the Netherlands; and to prevent the Emperor's Deſigns in Germany, he levy'd an Army under Count Mansfield, the Kings of Denmark and Sweden another; and to ſuſtain the Netherlands, the Charge of Mansfield's and Denmark's Armies muſt ſtill continue.

Theſe inſufficient Levies, amounting to about a hundred and fifty thouſand Pound, were all that the King cou'd obtain from this Parliament; whoſe Proceedings after this, for the moſt part, prov'd diſguſtful both to Him and his Miniſters, The firſt Diſguſts.

ſters, eſpecially the Duke of Buckingham. For, beſides ſome other Deſigns, the Commons prepar'd a Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, which they limited to one Year, whereas it had been uſually given for the Life of the Prince, eſpecially from the Time of Henry the Seventh. This Reſtraint was thought hard and unſeaſonable, tho' the Reaſon for it ſeems to be, becauſe King James had rais'd ſome new Impoſitions on ſeveral imported and exported Commodities; which Prerogative was eſteem'd a juſt and neceſſary Flower of the Crown; becauſe the Rate upon Merchandize cou'd not well be perfectly fix'd, in regard foreign Princes cou'd impoſe in their Countries what Rate they pleas'd; therefore in all Nations ſuch Rates on foreign Commodities were caſually vary'd by every Prince, that they might ballance and hold Proportion to other Duties on their own Commodities: Which thing had been done by Queen Elizabeth in the Currants, and other Goods. This Bill was the Baſis on which the People built much of the future Diſcontents; but however the Limitation appeared either ſo unkind, or ſo unreaſonable to the Lords, that they utterly refus'd the whole.

A Conſultation about an Adjournment.

The Plague at this Time raging in London and Weſtminſter, the King was reduc'd to a great Uncertainty, as not knowing well how to detain, nor how to diſmiſs the Parliament. He was very deſirous of trying them in ſome other Place, and propos'd to adjourn to Oxford at a Council held at Hampton-Court. The Duke of Buckingham zealouſly promoted the Deſign, but the Lord-Keeper Williams appear'd againſt it, declaring, That it was not another Place, but another Time that muſt do his Majeſty's Buſineſs. Which firſt he ſhew'd from the 'Uneaſineſs which wou'd happen 'to the Lords and Commons, for being forc'd to travel 'in ſuch a dangerous Seaſon; which might cauſe them to 'vote out of Diſcontent, and look upon ſmall Offences as 'great in the Beginning of a Reign. Secondly it was to 'be conſider'd, that the Parliament had already given two 'Subſidies; and tho' they remov'd to Oxford, yet it being 'the ſame Seſſion, they wou'd probably inſiſt upon the Cu'ſtom of not giving twice in one Seſſion, which was too 'great a Hazard for his Majeſty to run at that Time.' To all which the Duke reply'd, That publick Neceſſity ought to preponderate one Man's Jealouſie. Hereupon the Keeper begg'd the Favour to ſpeak with the King in private, where he particularly inform'd his Majeſty, That the Duke had Enemies in the Houſe of Commons, who had prepar'd Complaints againſt Him, and wou'd waſte the Time at Oxford upon that Subject: Therefore it wou'd be a Weakneſs to continue a Seſſion, that had no other Proſpect, but to bring the Duke upon the Stage. But if his Majeſty thought, that this was like a Hectick, ſoon known but hardly cur'd, his humble Motion was, that this Miſchief might be laid aſleep till after Chriſtmaſs; for by that Time he hoped to give ſuch an Account, by managing the chief Sticklers, that they ſhould recede from their Bitterneſs againſt his great Servant; and ſo the Paſſage to his weighty Counſels be made ſmooth and peaceable. Here the King ask'd him, Why he conceal'd this from Buckingham? To which the other warmly reply'd, He wou'd gladly begin at that End, but He wou'd not hear him with Moderation. This Diſcovery, as it was believ'd, compleated the Duke's Hatred againſt the Keeper, and haſtned his Ruin: For his Grace, now grown jealous, bad Defiance to Him and his Confederates, and urg'd that the Parliament might be continu'd, that he might clear himſelf. So dangerous is it to ſhew a great Man his Ruin, tho' never ſo near it; becauſe he is apt to look upon the firſt Diſcoverer, as the Author of it.

The Parliament adjourn'd to Oxford.

Thus the Duke carried his Deſign, and on the 11th Day of July, after a Seſſion of three Weeks and two Days, the Parliament was adjourn'd to meet at Oxford, on the firſt Day of Auguſt.

Ships lent to the French.

2. During this Receſs, there began a certain Action at Sea, which, through the Aggravations of ſome, and Miſunderſtandings of others, afterwards turn'd much to the Diſadvantage of the King. This was founded in the Reign of King James, who during the Marriage-Treaty with France had agreed to lend one Man of War to the French King, and to permit ſeven Merchant Ships to be hir'd of the Owners, upon a particular Promiſe, That they ſhould not be employ'd againſt the Proteſtants of France, but only againſt the King of Spain, or his Allies in Italy, particularly Genoa. But the Proteſtants intimating their Suſpicion, that the Deſign was to fall upon the Rochellers, and others of their Religion, which were then in Arms, King James directed that the greater Part of thoſe that ſerv'd in the Ships ſhou'd be of the Engliſh Nation. To perform this Ingagement, Captain John Pennington was now ſent in the Vauntguard, a principal Man of War, with ſeven large Merchant Ships, to ride upon the Coaſt of France, for the Service of that King; who, inſtead of employing them againſt the common Enemy, had now reſolv'd to make uſe of them againſt his Proteſtant Subjects at Rochelle, and for the ſame End had borrow'd twenty Ships of War from the Hollanders. Captain Pennington was ſenſible of this Deſign, and therefore ſent back a Memorial to the Duke of Buckingham, Lord High Admiral, to decline the Service, and to return in Honour and Safety; but he ſoon receiv'd Letters from the Duke, and a Warrant from Secretary Conway in the King's Name, to command him to deliver up the Ships to ſuch Frenchmen as his Chriſtian Majeſty ſhou'd appoint, but not to deſert his own Charge over them. Theſe Orders were deliver'd to him near Dieppe by the French Ambaſſador, together with a Letter from the French King, requiring him to receive his Soldiers, and his Admiral the Duke of Montmorancy, and join with his Fleet againſt his rebellious Subjects. Pennington very briſkly refus'd; upon which a Diſpute ariſing, the French Ambaſſador's Secretary came two ſeveral times to the Captain's Ship, to proteſt againſt him as a Rebel to his King and Country: But at the making the laſt Proteſt, inforc'd both by Threats and Promiſes, the Soldiers and Seamen flew into ſuch a Fury, that they got up their Anchors and ſet ſail for England, declaring, That they had rather be hang'd at home, than be Slaves to the French, and fight againſt the Proteſtant Religion.

The Soldiers Reſolution.

The French obtain their Ends.

When they came to Anchor in the Downs, Captain Pennington ſent an Expreſs to the Duke of Buckingham, to inform him of what had happen'd, and to aſſure him, That his Seamen wou'd rather die than return again to France. All this while the whole Body of the Council knew of no other Deſign than that of Genoa; tho' they receiv'd ſome Intimations to the contrary from the Duke of Rohan. However the King, that he might not break the Ingagement with his Brother-in-law upon an uncertain Conſequence, ſent an Expreſs and ſtrict Order to Pennington, to put his former Inſtructions in execution; to reſign the Vauntguard, with all her Furniture, into the Hands of the Marqueſs D'Eſfiat; and to require the ſeven Merchant Ships to put themſelves into the Service of the French King, under the utmoſt Penalty. Upon which Pennington ſail'd back to Dieppe, and put the Vauntguard into the abſolute Power of the French King, and for the ſame Purpoſe deliver'd up the other Ships, who were weighing Anchor, and making their Way, but upon a Shot from Pennington they came in again, only Sir Ferdinando Gorge ſtoutly brought off his Ship, call'd the Neptune. The Companies in the reſt unanimouſly declar'd againſt ſerving the French, and quitted their Ships all but one Gunner; and Pennington himſelf came away for England. This Expedition, with the Miſapplication of the Engliſh Ships by the French, afterwards produc'd great Miſchiefs, not only from the Clamours of ſome Perſons againſt the King and Duke, but alſo for laying a Foundation for a War againſt France, which prov'd diſhonourable to the one, and fatal to the other.

The Second Seſſion of the Firſt Parliament.

3. After an Adjournment and Receſs of three Weeks, the Parliament met at Oxford, where the Divinity School was appointed for the Houſe of Commons, and the Galleries above for the Houſe of Lords. The Speaker being plac'd in or near the Divinity Profeſſor's Chair, was thought ſo much to inſpire ſome of the Members with controverſial Knowledge, that from thence no Parliaments in this Reign were without a Committee for Religion, that ventur'd to determine the abſtruſeſt Points in Divinity. Here Mr. Montague was ſummon'd to appear, and his Book again appointed to be examin'd. His Cauſe was recommended to the Duke of Buckingham, by the Biſhops of Rocheſter, Oxford, and St. David's, as the Cauſe of the Church of England, alledging, That ſome of the Opinions in his Book were the reſolv'd Doctrines of the Church, and others Scholaſtical Points, wherein learned Men were left at their own Liberty. They likewiſe inſiſted upon the Judgment of King James, who approv'd of the Opinions in this Book; and that Matters of Differences in the Church ought to be determin'd only by the King and the Biſhops in a National Synod. However the Debates run high, Grievances were alledg'd, and heavy Complaint was made by Sir John Elliot, of ſix Romiſh Prieſts being lately pardon'd, which the Duke had prevail'd upon the King to be done in his Preſence at Hampton-Court.

The King moves for further Supplies.

The King finding a general Neglect of his main Buſineſs, upon the fourth Day of Auguſt ſummon'd both Houſes to Chriſt-Church Hall, where 'he reminded them of adviſing 'his Father to break the Treaties with Spain, and leading 'him into an expenſive War; and earneſtly urg'd them to 'give ſufficient Supplies, which at preſent were very much 'wanting.' His Speech was ſeconded by the two Secretaries, the Lord Conway, and Sir John Cooke, who urg'd new Reaſons, 'and declar'd the preſent State of Affairs 'with reference to Germany, France, the Low-Countries, 'Denmark, Sweden, and Italy; and then laid open the pre'ſent Condition and Neceſſities of the Fleets and Armies.' After this the Lord Treaſurer laid open 'the Debts of 'King James, which amounted to above three hundred 'thouſand Pounds; next the Debts and Expences of the ‘present King, amounting to near two hundred thouſand Pounds; and beſides, the Navy wou'd require, for the intended Expedition, at leaſt three hundred thouſand Pounds.

Warm Debates in the Houſe of Commons.

Theſe preſſing Occaſions for Supply caus'd ſome Members of the Houſe of Commons to take Advantage of the King's Neceſſities, and aggravate the popular Diſcontents, which then probably might have been allay'd by ſoft Words, and ſome Promotions: But finding the Court bent wholly upon Supplies, they flew into higher Pretenſions, and complain'd, ‘That the Treaſury was miſapply'd, and that evil Counſels guided the King's Deſigns; alledging that the Nation's Neceſſities were owing to a wrong Management; and tho' the former Parliament did engage the late King in a War, this was not oblig'd to be carry'd blindfold by the other, where ſound Counſels were wanting; and that it was not uſual to grant Subſidies twice in one Parliament, and no Grievances redreſs'd. That all Miſcarriages were chiefly owing to the Potency of the Duke of Buckingham, whom they condemn'd for the Match with Spain, and that with France, and other Particulars; reaſſum'd the Buſineſs of Mr. Montague; reſolv'd that Religion ſhou'd firſt be debated, next the Kingdom's Safety, and then Supplies: That the King be deſired to give his Anſwer in full Parliament to the Petition for Religion, and concerning the Impoſition upon Wines. They enquir'd whither the new Fleet and Army were intended, after the great Sums of Money given for Places; and if the Money deſign'd for the Palatinate, did not maintain the Ships lent againſt Rochelle;' with other popular Matters which gave the Court no ſmall Uneaſineſs. In theſe Debates none was more high and furious than Sir John Elliot; eſpecially where the Duke was immediately concern'd, to whom he was an implacable Enemy.

A Petition about Religion.

A Conference was held between the Lords and Commons upon the Subject of theſe Debates, and more eſpecially upon the eſtabliſh'd Religion. After which both Houſes were order'd to meet at Chriſt-Church, to receive an Anſwer to their famous Petition concerning Religion; in which they ſhew'd the King the Dangers that threatned the Church and State by the more than ordinary Increaſe of Popery: They inſiſted upon eight ſeveral Cauſes, and propos'd ſixteen diſtinct Remedies for this outragious Miſchief; to every Clauſe of which his Majeſty anſwer'd in a Parliamentary way, with ſo much Fairneſs and Satisfaction, that nothing cou'd be deſir'd more; as may be ſeen at large in Ruſhworth, Frankland, and others. The Petition ſhew'd that the Jealouſies of Popery were then very high and formidable; and the Anſwer aſſur'd them, that the King wou'd effectually ſuppreſs thoſe Fears and Apprehenſions. And for a more full Conviction, at the Time of reading the Petition and Anſwer, it was farther intimated to the Commons, ‘That as his Majeſty was pleas'd with their minding him of the Care of Religion, ſo he wou'd have acted and granted the ſame things, if they had not petition'd for them. And what he had done in this Particular, aroſe from thoſe two Fountains, Conſcience and Duty to his Father, who in his laſt Speech recommended to him the Perſon, but not the Religion of his Queen.

The King's Anſwer.

But ſtill the main Grievance of ſome of the Commons was, to ſee the Duke of Buckingham ſo highly in Favour with the King, whoſe prevailing Aſcendency had caus'd very ſevere Speeches and Replies. Therefore the Duke thought it proper to make ſome Apology and Defence for himſelf; and took the Opportunity to do it when both Houſes had juſt receiv'd his Majeſty's obliging Conceſſions. He acquainted them, ‘That by his Maſter's Command he came to give them an account of the Fleet and the Preparations made: That when he had laſt the Happineſs to ſpeak in that Auditory, it was of the Spaniſh Match, and then he was ſo fortunate as to be applauded by both Houſes; and he made no Queſtion, but ſpeaking now with the ſame Heart, he ſhou'd be no leſs acceptable to them.' He farther requeſted the Favour of the Houſe of Commons, and proceeded to ſum up the ſeveral Objections againſt himſelf and his Proceedings, and gave particular Anſwers with ſuch Grounds of Reaſon, that many of the Houſe of Commons were for giving a preſent Supply; and urg'd, ‘That it was not for the King's own particular Wants, but for the Honour and Defence of the Kingdom; and that it might prove dangerous not to comply with his Majeſty in ſuch a juſt and modeſt Deſire.' But Sir John Elliot, with other diſſatisfy'd Members, were of a contrary Inclination, and declar'd, ‘It was rather their Duty to preſent to the King how he might live glorious at home, and be fear'd abroad, by having his Deſigns better manag'd; and that they ought to be better ſecur'd from Domeſtick Foes, before they engag'd againſt Foreign Enemies: That the great Sums given for Honours and Offices, wou'd go far in ſetting out the Fleet.' Then again they excepted againſt the Greatneſs of the Duke, endeavouring to diveſt him both of his Honours and his Riches; and thus the Debate was adjourn'd 'till another Day.

The Duke of Buckingham*'s Defence.*

It has no Effect.

This unexpected Treatment might have provok'd the Indignation of a milder Man than the Duke; for it muſt needs be a ſhocking Diſappointment, to find thoſe Men, who had flatter'd him with the Title of Our Saviour, for bringing the Prince ſafe from Spain, now to call him the Corrupter of the King, and the Betrayer of the People, without imputing any Crime to him but what was as well known to them then, as at this time. In the midſt of this Perplexity and Uneaſineſs, the Keeper Williams, tho' much fallen in his Favour, ventur'd to give him this friendly Advice, To wind up the Seſſion quickly; having this reaſonable Pretence of two Colleges and eight Houſes being viſited by the Plague: To let the Members be calmly and fairly promiſed, that they ſhall meet again after Chriſtmas: To requite the Injuries done to him with Benefits, not Revenge; ſince no wiſe Man wou'd ſhew himſelf angry with the People of England: To confer one or two of his greateſt Places upon his ſafeſt Friends; which wou'd make him grow leſs in Envy, but not in Power: And at the Cloſe of the Seſſion to declare himſelf forwardeſt to ſerve the King and Commonwealth, and to give the Parliament Satisfaction. Then he promiſed him to undertake the Care of the reſt, ſo that he ſhou'd receive no future Detriment. But the Duke, inſtead of thanking him, reply'd in a Paſſion, I will look whom I truſt to, and departed with ſuch a Countenance as ſufficiently foretold the other's Declenſion. However the King was more mild, and ſent a courteous Meſſage to the Houſe of Commons, ‘To deſire them to conſider his Affairs, which required a ſpeedy Diſpatch, and indeed a quick Supply. He offer'd, upon his Royal Word, that the Parliament ſhou'd meet again in Winter, at what time they pleas'd; and then ſit till they had perfected all Things for the Common Good:' And, in Concluſion, he deſir'd them to conſider, that this was the firſt Requeſt he had ever made to them.

The Keeper's Advice to the Duke.

The King's Meſſage to the Commons.

Upon this Meſſage ſome Members earneſtly preſſed ‘the granting of two Subſidies, and two Fifteens, in Regard to his Majeſty's Honour, and the Neceſſity of the Publick Affairs.' But others warmly reply'd, ‘That Neceſſity was a dangerous Counſellor, and liable to be us'd as a continual Argument for Supplies in all Parliaments: That thoſe Miniſters, who had thrown the King and Kingdom into ſuch Neceſſity, ought to anſwer for it: That there was as much Neceſſity for redreſſing of Grievances, as for the granting more Subſidies.' However they unanimouſly agreed to ſend a ſhort Declaration to his Majeſty, in which ‘They thank'd him for his gracious Anſwer concerning Religion; and declar'd their loyal Intentions to ſerve him in due Time, and a Parliamentary Way; and alſo beſeech'd him to reſt aſſured of their true and hearty Affections, and to eſteem the ſame to be the greateſt Reputation and Security a juſt King can have, and to account all ſuch Enemies and Slanderers of the Commonwealth, who ſhall dare to ſay the contrary.

The Commons Declaration.

Had the Keeper's Advice been follow'd, and this Declaration receiv'd in the moſt favourable Senſe, 'tis probable the King had obtain'd his Ends, and parted amicably with his Parliament. But inſtead of uſing Lenitives in this nice Juncture, at Woodſtock, where the Court reſided, the Commons were cenſur'd as ſpiteful and ſeditious; therefore not fit to continue, but to be diſſolved. The Keeper hearing this, us'd his utmoſt Endeavours by Arguments, Tears and Supplications, to put a ſtop to ſuch Proceedings; begging his Majeſty to remember, That in his hearing his bleſſed Father had charg'd him to call Parliaments often, and continue them, tho' their Raſhneſs might ſometimes offend him. But chiefly, let it never be ſaid, that he had not kept good Correſpondence with his firſt Parliament. The Keeper had almoſt all the Lords of the Council of the ſame Opinion with him in this Point; but Buckingham being intirely againſt it, the King ſent a Commiſſion, directed to ſeveral Lords, for the Diſſolution of the Parliament. Accordingly, the Uſher of the Black Rod was ſent to call the Commons up to the Lords Houſe; but they being reſolv'd into a Grand Committee, and knowing the Deſign of the Meſſage, refus'd to admit the Meſſenger, or ſuffer the Speaker to take the Chair, 'till Mr. Glanvil, Chair-man of the Committee, had made a Report in Form of a Proteſtation. Then the Houſe went up, and hearing his Majeſty's Commiſſion, it was accordingly executed, and the Parliament diſſolv'd, upon the twelfth of Auguſt, after a ſhort and troubleſome Seſſion of ten Days. Thus abruptly and tumultuouſly ended the Firſt Parliament; which much turn'd to the Diſreputation of the King and Nation abroad: For Foreigners ſaw how little the King cou'd do without his Parliament, and how little the Parliament was like to do for him; therefore Spain and the Emperor apprehended no great Danger in their Diſpoſal of the Count Palatine's Dominions; and France and Holland knew, if the King wou'd purſue a Spaniſh War, he muſt proceed under them.

The Keeper's Advice to the King.

The Firſt Parliament diſſolv'd.

Here began the firſt Miſunderſtandings between the King and his People; and here he might well remember his Father's Prophetick Words, when he warn'd him againſt the War with Spain, and his Proſecution of Noblemen. But tho' this abrupt Diſſolution was contrary to good Policy, upon ſeveral Accounts, yet it cannot be deny'd but this Parliament, tho' it had Reaſon for Complaints, was really hard and unkind in ſome Particulars in reſpect both to the King and the Duke.

An Account of Sir John Elliot*'s Reſentments.*

But becauſe the Duke's Proſecution had ſuch unfortunate Effects, and was in a great meaſure inflam'd by the Fury and Activity of Sir John Elliot, it may be proper here to lay open the Spring of that violent Reſentment, in this remarkable Account. This Elliot was a Gentleman of a new Family, but a fair Eſtate in Cornwall; was formerly a Fellow-Traveller, and an intimate Companion with the Duke before his Riſe; and after that as obſequious, and as great a Flatterer of him as any Man. Within his own Pariſh there liv'd one Mr. John Moyle, a Gentleman of very good Note and Character in his Country, who, together with his Son, had afterwards the Honour to ſerve in Parliament. Whether out of Rivalſhip, or otherwiſe, Mr. Elliot, having upon a very ſlight Occaſion entertain'd a bitter Grudge againſt the other, went to his Houſe under the Shew of a friendly Viſit, and there treacherouſly ſtabb'd him, while he was turning on one ſide to take a Glaſs of Wine to drink to him. And now ſuppoſing he had perfected his Revenge, he immediately haſten'd to London to addreſs himſelf to his ſure Friend the Duke of Buckingham, in order to get his Pardon; which, to his great Diſappointment, he could not obtain, without firſt advancing a conſiderable Sum of Money into the Exchequer. But as ſoon as his Pardon was ſeal'd, and the Money paid, he receiv'd Intelligence that Mr. Moyle was unexpectedly recover'd. Upon the happy Aſſurance of this, he again apply'd himſelf to the Duke to procure the Repayment of the Money; but that being ſwallow'd up in the Occaſions of the Court beyond any Recovery, all that he could obtain in lieu of it was to be Knighted: Which, tho' it might have allay'd the Heat of his Ambition, was ſo heinouſly taken at the Hands of a Perſon once his Equal, that after that he never ceas'd to be his Mortal Enemy, but help'd to blow up ſuch a Flame in the Houſe, as was never extinguiſh'd: A remarkable Conſequence of a reſtleſs and indefatigable Malice, when mix'd with the plauſible Appearance of a publick Good. Mr. Moyle out-liv'd this baſe Attempt above Forty Years, who, with ſome others of his Family, often told the Particulars to his Grandſon Dr. Prideaux, the Dean of Norwich, and other Relations, from whom I had this particular Account.

A War with Spain.

The King in Want.

A Proclamation againſt Papiſts.

IV. 1. After a proſperous Calm of twenty three Years Peace and Traffick with all Europe, a War now began with Spain and the Emperor; which being enter'd on with weak Supplies, ended with ſmall Succeſs. The great want of Mony did gradually drive the King to ſome Meaſures that were extraordinary; but that of borrowing from Subjects by their own Conſents was firſt try'd, as the leaſt liable to Exception. To which Purpoſe the King directed his Letters to the Lord-Lieutenants in the ſeveral Counties, deſiring them to join with their Deputy-Lieutenants, and return the Names of all ſuch Gentlemen as were of Ability to lend, and the Sums they thought they might ſpare. Accordingly Privy-Seals were ſent to the ſeveral Perſons, obliging the Repayment of the Money in eighteen Months; and the Collectors were order'd to return the Names of ſuch as diſcover'd a Diſpoſition to delay or excuſe the lending the Sums requir'd of them. This Project did not ſo much anſwer the King's Occaſions, as it open'd the Mouths of the People; it being attended with ſome invidious Circumſtances and Marks of Compulſion, that gave great Uneaſineſs to many. On the contrary his Majeſty obliged the Generality of the Nation, by iſſuing out his Proclamation 'to command the Return of all Engliſh 'Youth educated in Foreign Schools and Seminaries: 'That no Biſhop or Prieſt of the Church of Rome, ſhall 'preſume to confer Eccleſiaſtical Orders, or exerciſe his 'Function or Juriſdiction towards any of his natural Subjects; and that all Statutes againſt Prieſts and Jeſuits ſhall 'be put in Execution.' Warrants were alſo iſſu'd out for diſarming of Popiſh Recuſants; and Letters were directed to thirteen Lords of that Communion, to deliver up their Arms accordingly. And the Council being inform'd from the Lords-Lieutenants, That there was a great and unaccuſtomed Reſort to the Houſes of Papiſts, they authoriz'd them to enquire into the Reaſons and Occaſions of ſuch Aſſemblies; and whether there were any Preparation of Arms, or other Practices among them.

A League made with Holland and other Potentates.

In order to carry on the great War, a few Days after the Parliament's Diſſolution, the King enter'd into a League Offenſive and Defenſive with the States of Holland; in which was mainly promoted the Re-eſtabliſhment of the Prince Palatine to his Paternal Eſtate and Dignity. 'The 'League was to continue fifteen Years at leaſt, and each 'Party to keep up an Army of twenty five or thirty thouſand 'Foot, and four or five thouſand Horſe, againſt the King 'of Spain and his Adherents, till he ſhou'd be reduc'd to 'Reaſon and Juſtice.' Notwithſtanding which, the King made a particular Proteſtation, 'That it ſhou'd not prejudice the Right of his Subjects againſt the Dutch Eaſt-'India Company, for the Torture and Execution of his 'Subjects at Amboyna; for which, if the States-General 'gave not Satisfaction in eighteen Months time, it ſhou'd 'be lawful for them to take it by Repriſal.' All which was concluded on the 25th Day of Auguſt at Southampton. Shortly after the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Holland were ſent Ambaſſadors to the United Provinces, where, with Sir Dudley Carleton, they met the Ambaſſadors of France and Denmark at the Hague, and concluded a League with them and the States, both for reſtoring the Elector Palatine, and the Liberties of the German Empire. All things ſeem'd to have a good and promiſing Aſpect, and honourable Preſents were made by the States to the Engliſh Ambaſſadors at their Return; and particularly the Duke of Buckingham's Preſent, of a Gold Baſon with the Caſe, was valu'd at two thouſand Pounds.

Preparations for the War.

In purſuance of this League, the King of Denmark, having receiv'd conſiderable Promiſes both from England and Holland, readily took up Arms; but prov'd unfortunate in the Event: Which he afterwards imputed to the Engliſh King's Non-performance of what was promiſed on his Part; and which was really occaſion'd by the Parliament's Failure of granting ſufficient Supplies. And for the ſame Reaſon, the Fleet, which ſhou'd have been ſent out in the Beginning of Summer, to make Attempts upon the Coaſts of Spain, was not ready till the Month of October. In which Expedition, Sir Edward Cecil, now made Viſcount Wimbleton, had the Command of the whole Fleet; and the Earl of Eſſex was made Vice-Admiral under him. This Sir Edward came more with the Reputation of a Land Soldier, than a skilful Sea-Man; and his being a Stranger to the Navy was the more reſented, becauſe, in the Choice of Officers for this Service, Sir Robert Manſel, an old Sea Commander, was neglected, which much diſguſted the common Seamen, who had great a Eſteem for him.

The Expedition againſt Cadiz.

It is unſucceſsful.

The Fleet, which with the Addition of ſome Dutch Veſſels, conſiſted of eighty good Ships, at their firſt ſetting out were met by ſuch a violent Storm, that the greateſt part of them were diſpers'd for ſeven Days; and a brave Ship of Ipſwich was loſt, with a hundred and ſeventy Men. After this great Impediment, the Fleet met at the Southern Cape, where they formally conſulted where to make their Attempt: The Earl of Eſſex, being inflam'd by the Glory obtain'd by his Father at Cadiz, propos'd the attacking the Spaniſh Fleet, then in that Harbour; but there appear'd ſo many Difficulties in the Enterprize, and ſo much Time was ſpent in the Debate, that the whole Coaſt of Spain was alarm'd, and the Inhabitants had Opportunity to prepare for their Defence; ſo that when they arriv'd near Cadiz, they landed their Men with great Danger and Oppoſition. The firſt Place they attempted was Puntol Caſtle, under the Shelter of which rode the Spaniſh Ships; in order to reduce it, twenty Engliſh and five Dutch Ships were employ'd; but, after they had ſpent two thouſand great Shot againſt it with ſmall Effect, they retir'd. This not ſucceeding, the General ſent Sir John Burroughs, with a ſelect Regiment of Foot, to attack the Fort by Land; who, at their firſt Appearance, were encounter'd by ſome Spaniſh Forces, which were drawn together for the Defence of the Country; and after a ſharp Engagement they defeated the Spaniards in the Sight of the Caſtle; upon which the Commander within beat a Parly, and ſurrender'd the Place, with fifteen Barrels of Powder and eight Pieces of Cannon. While the Parly was concluding, the Spaniards hal'd moſt of their beſt Ships under the Port-Royal; ſo that Sir Samuel Argale, who was ſent to fire the Ships, was wholly diſappointed. But that which might have been very fatal, was the Miſmanagement of the Soldiers, who, by the Avarice or Negligence of their Commanders, were permitted ſo to gorge themſelves with the Wine they found in the Place, that they became more like Beaſts than Men, and might have been made an eaſy Prey to the Spaniards; and being thus ungovernable, the General fearing the Conſequence, ſpeedily caus'd them to be embark'd, and left behind him only the Hopes of Fame and Victory. From thence they ſail'd to the Southern Cape, where they continu'd twenty Days in Expectation of the Plate Fleet; but the Inclemency of the Air, and the Intemperance of the Sea-men, caus'd ſuch a Contagion in the Navy, that they wanted Men to manage the Tackling. And becauſe ſome Ships were more infected than others, they invented a pernicious Courſe, which was to order every Ship by Lot to take two Sick in exchange for ſo many ſound Men; which propagated the Peſtilence, and forc'd the General to an untimely Return, four Days before the Plate-Fleet arriv'd. Thus inauſpicious was the firſt War, as well as the firſt Parliament, and tho' many were blam'd, none were puniſh'd. Only Wimbleton was for ſome time forbid the King's Preſence; but excus'd himſelf by laying a great Part of the Miſcarriage upon the Stubbornneſs of the Earl of Eſſex.

Williams diſplac'd.

Sir Thomas Coventry made Keeper.

2. During the time of this unfortunate Expedition, the King was making Preparations for two ſolemn Occaſions, his Coronation, and another Parliament; one for Grandeur, and the other for Buſineſs. To make the way eaſie to the latter, the former was thought ſubſervient; and to prepare for their more amicable Meeting, his Majeſty enjoyn'd the Archbiſhops and Biſhops to proceed againſt Popiſh Recuſants by Excommunication and other Cenſures, and to endeavour to unmask thoſe diſaffected to Religion, tho' no profeſs'd Papiſts; and by Proclamation requir'd all convicted Papiſts to remain confin'd to their dwelling Places, or within four Miles, unleſs ſpecially licens'd: The King deſign'd alſo to leave Mr. Montague and his Cauſe to the Parliament; which being told by the Duke to Biſhop Laud, he ſaid, with a Sigh, He ſeem'd to ſee a Cloud ariſing, and threatning the Church of England. But the Storm fell ſooneſt upon Biſhop Williams, who, tho' he us'd all Arts and Methods to preſerve his Intereſt, cou'd not withſtand the mighty Power of the Duke, who cou'd bear no Diminution as to his own Grandeur; therefore caus'd him to be ſequeſter'd from the Council-Table, and the Preſence of the King, and upon the 25th of October the Great-Seal to be taken from him, which was given to Sir Thomas Coventry, his Majeſty's Attorney-General. His Enemies acknowledge that his Diſgrace proceeded from the private Diſpleaſure of the Duke; with whom the Lawyers are ſaid to have join'd, out of a Deſire to get that high Station once again into their own Poſſeſſion. As this great Stateſman declined, ſo Biſhop Laud aſcended; and from that time grew as much in the King's Favour, as before he had been in the Duke's; becoming as it were his Majeſty's Secretary for all Eccleſiaſtical Affairs.

Preparations for the Coronation.

The Plague ceaſes.

The King had declar'd his Intentions to be crown'd upon Candlemaſs Day; and requir'd all Perſons, who, by reaſon of their Offices and Tenures, were oblig'd to any Duties at that Solemnity, to pay their Attendance, and perform their reſpective Services. For a Preparation, ſeveral Biſhops were appointed to conſult and draw up a Form of the Service and Ceremony then to be us'd. But becauſe Biſhop Williams, as Dean of Weſtminſter, was to have a chief Part in thoſe Ceremonies, the Duke's Intereſt ſo prevail'd, that he was order'd not to appear, but to have his Place ſupply'd by Biſhop Laud: A double Diſappointment to this Prelate, to have his Preſence deny'd, and his Office executed by one whom he believ'd to be his Enemy. Orders were made for the creating ſeveral Knights of the Bath; and Precepts were directed to all Sheriffs, commanding them to proclaim, That all ſuch as had forty Pounds a Year of Lands and Revenues, and were not yet Knights, ſhou'd at their Perils preſent themſelves in his Majeſty's Preſence by the 31ſt of January, to receive the Order of Knighthood. Which being an obſolete Law and Cuſtom, the Revival of it, when the Value of Eſtates bore ſo little Proportion to the Quality of Knights, was afterwards exploded as a legal Oppreſſion. Before the time of the Solemnity, the Plague, which had rag'd for near a Year, abated; for which a general Thankſgiving was appointed both in London and in the Country. London had been ſtrangely abandon'd, and Michaelmaſs Term was adjourn'd to Reading; yet within the City and Suburbs, there dy'd above thirty five thouſand People.

The King's Coronation.

Two Things obſerv'd.

Upon Thurſday the ſecond of February was the grand Solemnity of the King's Coronation; in the external Pomp of which, his Majeſty, according to his Father's Example, omitted the ancient and triumphant Cavalcade through the City from the Tower to Whitehall; partly to ſave a Charge of ſixty thouſand Pounds, and partly to prevent the Danger of popular Concourſe, ſince there were ſtill ſome Remainders of the Peſtilence. In the Sacred Part there was a particular Clauſe added, which had been omitted ever ſince the time of Henry the Sixth, namely, 'Let him obtain Favour of the People, like Aaron in the Tabernacle, 'Eliſha in the Waters, Zacharias in the Temple; give him 'Peter's Key of Diſcipline, and Paul's Doctrine.' Which Clauſe had been ſet aſide in the time of Popery, as intimating more Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction to the Kings of England, than the Court of Rome wou'd allow. The Coronation Oath, tho' the contrary was ſuggeſted, and Biſhop Laud particularly condemned for it, was the very ſame which had been taken by the King's Predeceſſors, as appears by the Records of the Exchequer. The Day prov'd bright and glorious; and it was obſervable, that amidſt an incredible Concourſe of People, nothing was loſt, or broke, or diſorder'd; the Theatre was clear, and free for the King, the Peers, and the Ceremony; and the Nobility obſerv'd that they never had ſeen any Solemnity, tho' much inferior to it, perform'd with ſo little Noiſe, and ſo great Order. Yet two things were remarkable this Day, which were thought to have ſomething of Preſage. Senhouſe Biſhop of Carliſle, who preach'd upon this Occaſion, had choſen a Text more proper for a Funeral than a Coronation, viz. I will give thee a Crown of Life: Which was rather thought to put the new King in mind of his Death, than his Duty in Government; and to have been his Funeral Sermon when he was alive, as if he was to have none when he was bury'd. It was obſerv'd alſo, that his Majeſty on that Day was array'd in White, contrary to the Cuſtom of his Predeceſſors, who uſually wore Purple: And this not out of Neceſſity, as ſome thought, but out of Choice, to declare that Virgin Purity with which he came to be eſpous'd to his Kingdom. And this was alſo look'd on as an ill Preſage, that the King laying aſide the Robe of Majeſty, ſhou'd cloath himſelf in the Robe of Innocence; as if it was foreſignified, that he ſhou'd diveſt himſelf of that Regal Majeſty, which might have been his continual Security, to rely wholly on the Innocence of a virtuous Life, which finally expos'd him to Ruin.

The Death of Sir John Davies,

Mr. Barlow

Dr. Chaloner,

Dr. Richardſon,

Serjeant Finch,

Dr. Lodge,

Mr. Fletcher,

And Dr. Gibbons.

Having brought the young King to the moſt compleat Settlement, we ſhall deſcend a little to Biography, and conclude the firſt Year of his Reign, as well as all the reſt, with embalming the Memories of a few of the moſt noted Men deceaſed. And firſt, Sir John Davies, a Perſon celebrated both for his valiant Exploits abroad, and his excellent Skill in the Mathematicks; who having been deeply involv'd with his Maſter, the unfortunate Earl of Eſſex, with great Difficulty obtain'd his Pardon, and ſpent the Remainder of his Days in a retired and ſtudious Courſe of Living, which this Year he peaceably concluded at his Houſe in Barkſhire. Next, Mr. William Barlow, Arch-Deacon of Saliſbury, a very learned Divine, but ſtill more diſtinguiſhable by his extraordinary Diſcoveries made in the Loadſtone, which was known to him twenty Years before the famous Dr. Gilbert publiſh'd his Book upon that Subject: He found out ſo many curious Magnetical Secrets, and ſo happily reduc'd his Experiments to Practice, that Poſterity will ever be oblig'd to his worthy Labours. After him there died Dr. Edward Chaloner, Principal of St. Alban's Hall in Oxford, and Chaplain to two ſeveral Kings; a moſt eminent Divine for his Age, having nothing in his Compoſition ſo mean, which the greateſt Men did not eſteem; but in the thirty fourth Year of his Age he was ſnatch'd away by the Plague, to the great Affliction of many of his Acquaintance. Dr. John Richardſon was another celebrated and worthy Divine that dy'd this Year, who was ſucceſſively Maſter of Peter-Houſe and Trinity College in Cambridge, and for his Learning had particularly the Honour to be employ'd in the laſt Tranſlation of the Bible, appointed by King James himſelf. Sir Henry Finch, Serjeant at Law, ought likewiſe to be remember'd, a Perſon in great Eſteem for his Knowledge in his Profeſſion, which Knowledge ſtill was not confin'd to the Law; who left behind him a Son that came to be Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, of whom more hereafter. Dr. Thomas Lodge, the Phyſician, ſhou'd not be forgotten; who, having improv'd himſelf by travelling into Foreign Countries, became eminent not only for his Skill in Phyſick, but alſo for his peculiar Talent in Poetry, for which he has been celebrated by the chief Wits of the Age. Nor muſt we forget that charming Dramatick Poet, Mr. John Fletcher, Son to Biſhop Fletcher of London, a Perſon of a moſt luxuriant Wit and Fancy, who, for the moſt part joyning with the judicious Mr. Beaumont, produc'd ſuch a Body of Plays, as will remain perpetual Monuments of their refined Parts, and moſt extenſive Knowledge of Mankind: He out-liv'd his Friend Beaumont ten Years, and the great Shakeſpear nine; and, leaving no Equal or Rival behind him beſides Ben. Johnſon, he dy'd of the Plague in the forty ninth Year of his Age. And becauſe the Memory of Men excelling in all Profeſſions ought to be preſerv'd, we ſhall laſtly mention Dr. Orlando Gibbons, the moſt admirable Muſician and Organiſt of that Time, exceeding all Men of that Age in Skill and Practice; who being order'd to adorn and improve the Nuptial Solemnities between the King and the Queen at Canterbury, there unexpectedly dy'd, to the ſenſible Trouble and Concern of the whole Court.

The SECOND PARLIAMENT.

VI. After an Intermiſſion of about ſix Months, the Time arriv'd that the King ſhou'd a ſecond time try the Hearts and Affections of his People aſſembled in Parliament. Theſe by the Court began now to be meaſur'd by a miſtaken Survey of the Inſolence and Ambition of particular Perſons; and by the ſame Standard the People began to conſider the Honour and Piety of the Court. In which the King was the greateſt Sufferer, who had the Miſfortune to harbour Perſons about him, who with their utmoſt Malignity repreſented the Faults and Infirmities of the Court to the People; and at the ſame time us'd the greateſt Endeavors to render the People diſtaſteſul to the King. As the Duke of Buckingham had been very much threatned, ſo he us'd his utmoſt Intereſt to model this new Parliament, but with little Succeſs. Biſhop Williams, tho' now in Diſgrace by his means, ſtill us'd his Endeavours to ſerve him, and to his violent Enemies he frequently us'd the ſubtle Similitude of a Beaſt got into the midſt of a Field of Wheat, if the Neighbours ran in and hunted it about with their Dogs, they wou'd tread down more Corn than five more cou'd devour. But to his Friends he freely declar'd, That the Duke in Policy ought to remove himſelf by ſome great Embaſſy, till the firſt Seſſion was ended; and as far as Vienna, if he durſt truſt the King of Spain's greateſt Friend and neareſt Ally. But this Advice did not pleaſe thoſe of the Duke's Intereſt, who thought their Party ſtrong enough to ſecure him; and as he uſed to boaſt himſelf, That he wou'd make his Majeſty the greateſt Monarch in Europe; ſo he had thoſe who wou'd as highly extol and flatter him. Even the Earl of Holland in a Letter to him has theſe Words, I hope nothing will light upon your Lordſhip but what you deſerve, who, to my Knowledge, are of more Value and Eſteem than any Man in the World could, or ever can merit from this Kingdom. Several Methods were us'd to hinder the Elections of the Duke's Opponents, but Sir John Elliot ſtill was choſen. Some were pevented, or ſo deſign'd, by being made High-Sheriffs of their reſpective Counties, as Sir Edward Coke for Buckinghamſhire, Sir Robert Philips for Somerſetſhire, and Sir Thomas Wentworth for Yorkſhire. The like Hardſhip was us'd towards ſome Members of the Houſe of Lords, as the Earl of Briſtol and the Biſhop of Lincoln, both left unſummon'd; which ſtrange Proceedings did him more Injury than real Advantage.

The Keeper's Speech.

On Monday the ſixth of February the Parliament met after the uſual Manner, but with this Difference, that his Majeſty now declin'd to open it with a Speech in Perſon, but referr'd them wholly to the Lord-Keeper Coventry, who mention'd nothing of Supplies, but ‘ inſiſted upon the Benefits and Conſtitution of Parliaments, and the King's Affection to them; particularly his ſtriving whether he ſhou'd be major or melior, a greater King or a better Man: That the Cauſes of calling them, were to make good Laws, and to execute Juſtice; and that his Majeſty was reſolv'd to confine this Meeting to a ſhort Period of Time.' Two Days after the King approv'd of the Speaker, Sir Heneage Finch, Serjeant at Law and Recorder of London, who in an elegant Oration ‘ extoll'd the Goodneſs and Greatneſs of his Majeſty, and celebrated the Excellencies of Monarchy, Parliaments, Prelates, Lords, Commons, Laws, Judges, and all that were then in Place; and inveigh'd againſt Popery, and the King of Spain: And concluded with the uſual Petition, That his Majeſty wou'd allow them the Privilege of Parliament, Freedom of Debates, and Acceſs to his Royal Perſon.

The Speaker's Speech.

The Commons Complaints.

The Commons began with Thanks to his Majeſty for his late gracious Anſwer to the late Petition for Religion; and then a Bill was brought in to adminiſter an Oath for rendring a true Account of all general and publick Taxes, Rates and Collections; and another againſt ſcandalous Miniſters. A Committee was appointed for Religion, another for Grievances, and another for Secret Affairs, to ſit upon particular Days. They highly complain'd of the Miſcarriage of the Fleet at Cadiz, of Evil Counſellors about the King, of the Miſemployment of the Publick Revenue, of favouring of Papiſts, of Loans, Tonnage and Poundage, with ſeveral other Political Diſorders. They likewiſe exhibited Articles againſt Mr. Montague's Book, which they deſir'd might be ſuppreſs'd and burnt; which ended with a formal Conference among ſome ſelect Divines, without any poſitive Determination. They proceeded to farther Enquiries and Grievances, while the Privy-Council requir'd the Biſhop of Durham to apprehend ſuch of his Majeſty's Subjects as ſhou'd be preſent at Maſs, and to commit them to Priſon; and the King's Attorney ſent Letters to the Judges, to direct their ſtrict Proceedings againſt all Recuſants in their Circuits. Which Proceedings occaſion'd ſome to complain, and a Member of Parliament to ſay, That there were many Ginns and Snares ſet for the Papiſts, but not one Mouſe-trap for the Puritans; for which Conceit he was expell'd the Houſe.

A Supply demanded.

Farther Complaints.

While the Commons were proceeding in their own way, after a conſiderable Time, Mr. Secretary Cook deliver'd them a Meſſage from the King, declaring his Majeſty's Occaſion for a Supply; which was ſeconded by a Conference with the Lords, where the Earl of Pembroke in particular urg'd ſeveral Reaſons for an immediate Aſſiſtance. But inſtead of complying, the Commons proceeded farther upon Grievances, and made ſeveral Complaints, namely, ‘ The Diminution of the Kingdom's Strength and Honour: The Increaſe and countenancing of Papiſts: The ill guarding of the Narrow Seas: Pluralities of Offices in one Hand: Sales of Honours and Places of Truſt: The Delivery of Ships to the French; and the Miſemployment of former Subſidies. They order'd alſo that the Duke, on whom theſe Miſcarriages chiefly reflected, ſhould have Notice of their Intention, ſuddenly to reſume the Debate of theſe Particulars.' And Mr. Clement Coke, Son to Sir Edward, in his Speech upon this Subject, boldly declar'd, That it was better to die by an Enemy, than to ſuffer at home; which Saying was highly reſented by the Court. The Lords ſeem'd more complying with the King's Deſires, and appointed a Committee to conſider of the Defence of the Kingdom, and Safe-guard of the Seas. The Committee adviſed one Fleet to be immediately ſet out againſt the King of Spain, and another to guard the Engliſh Coaſts and Merchants; all which was ſent to the Houſe of Commons, but ill reſented by them.

Car. 2.

The King's Letter.

2. After the Houſe of Commons had ſat above a Month, without doing any of the King's Buſineſs, his Majeſty ſent a warm Letter to the Speaker for a Supply, in which he declar'd, That as he preſs'd for nothing beyond the preſent State and Condition of his Subjects, ſo he would accept no leſs than what was proportionable to the Greatneſs and Goodneſs of the Cauſe; and promis'd Redreſs of Grievances, if preſented in a dutiful and mannerly way. This was further urg'd in a Meſſage from Sir Richard Weſton, who after ſeveral Reaſons, propos'd to know, without farther Delay of Time, what Supply they wou'd give to his Majeſty. To this the Commons return'd a general Anſwer, promiſing Supplies, but ſtill complaining of Grievances. This laſt provok'd the Patience of the Court; ſo that the King in reply told them, He wou'd be as willing to hear their Grievances as any of his Predeceſſors, if they wou'd apply themſelves to redreſs Grievances, and not to enquire after them. And farther ſaid, I will not allow any of my Servants to be queſtioned amongſt you, much leſs ſuch as are of eminent Place. I ſee you eſpecially aim at the Duke of Buckingham, I admire what has ſo alter'd your Affections towards him. Then he declar'd, That his Service to the Publick had rather impair'd than improv'd his Eſtate; and concluded thus, I deſire you wou'd haſten for my Supply, or elſe it will be worſe for your ſelves; for if any Evil happens, I think I ſhall be the laſt that ſhall feel it.

A Second.

Dr. Turner*'s Queries.*

This was thought to be too much like ſtemming a popular Torrent, which cauſes it to overflow the Banks, and adds Strength and Reputation to the Complainants. Thus it prov'd in the Conſequence, for the Majority of the Houſe now fell directly on the Duke, as the chief Cauſe of all publick Miſcarriages. And an inconſiderable Court Dependant, call'd Dr. Turner, brought in a new-faſhion'd Charge againſt him, by way of Six Queries, namely, ‘ Whether the Duke, being Admiral, had not caus'd the Loſs of the King's Royalty in the Narrow Seas? Whether the late ill Succeſſes of the Fleet had not happened by the Admiral's not having perſonally executed his Place? Whether the Duke had not engroſs'd all great Offices, and preferr'd his undeſerving Kindred? Whether he had not ſold Places of Judicature, &c.? Whether his Mother was not Patroneſs of the Popiſh Party? And whether immenſe Liberality, &c. had not waſted the King's Treaſury?' Hereupon two other Queſtions were mov'd in the Houſe, ‘ Whether theſe ſix Heads, that were grounded upon Common Fame, ſhou'd be debated in Parliament? And whether an Accuſation upon Common Fame, by a Member of the Houſe, be a Parliamentary Way?' Upon the Opinions of Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Noy, Mr. Selden, and others, the Houſe voted, That Common Fame is a good Ground of Proceeding for the Houſe of Commons.

The King's reſenting Meſſage.

The Heats encreaſe.

All this ſtill widen'd the unhappy Breach, and the King ſent a ſecond Meſſage to the Houſe by Sir Richard Weſton, in which he took Notice of the ſeditious Speech of Mr. Coke, and Dr. Turner's Queries againſt the Duke of Buckingham, which in reality were againſt the Honour and Government of himſelf, and of his Father. That he cannot ſuffer an Inquiry on the meaneſt of his Servants, much leſs againſt one ſo near him; and wonders at the fooliſh Impudence of any Man, that can think he ſhou'd be drawn to offer ſuch a Sacrifice, much unworthy the Greatneſs of a King, and Maſter of ſuch a Servant. He deſires the Juſtice of the Houſe againſt the Delinquents, that he might not be conſtrain'd to uſe his Royal Authority to right himſelf againſt theſe two Perſons. Upon this Meſſage Dr. Turner ſtood up and explain'd himſelf, and juſtify'd his Proceeding upon Common Fame by the Imperial Laws, and Canons of the Church; and the next Day, being indiſpos'd, he wrote a Letter to the Speaker in his farther Vindication. And this Reſentment of the King did but encreaſe the Ferment againſt the Duke: So that on Monday following, Sir William Walter repreſented to the Houſe, that the Cauſe of all Grievances was that which happened in the Court of Lewis the Eleventh of France, namely, That all the King's Council rode upon one Horſe. And the furious Sir John Elliot made a bold and ſevere Speech upon the Subject of the Duke's Miſmanagements and the Publick Grievances. But to qualify theſe Heats, with all Reſpect to his Majeſty, and with a Deference to the Neceſſity of Publick Affairs, on March the twenty ſeventh the Commons voted three Subſidies, and three Fifteens; to which they ſoon after added a fourth Subſidy; but the Act was not to be brought in, till the Grievances were preſented to his Majeſty, and anſwer'd by him.

The King's ſevere Speech to both Houſes.

This laſt Reſtriction, together with their general Proceedings, caus'd the King to ſummon both Houſes to attend him at Whitehall, where he declar'd to them, That he call'd them for ſeveral and diſtinct Reaſons; the Lords, to thank them for their Care of the Publick; the Commons, to ſhew them their Errors: And ſo referr'd them to the Lord-Keeper, who, in a long Speech, aſſur'd the Commons, 'That after the great Affairs were ſettled, and Satisfaction 'given to his Majeſty's Demands, he wou'd hear and an'ſwer their juſt Grievances. Then he told them, That 'his Majeſty excepted againſt their not puniſhing Mr. Coke 'and Dr. Turner; and prais'd the Duke, concerning whom 'his Majeſty knew the Sincerity of his Proceedings, and muſt 'believe that their Aim at him is to wound the Honour 'and Judgment of himſelf and Father. That as to the 'Supply voted, it was dilatory and ſcanty; for the Meaſure 'of it, ſo far from making him ſafe at home and fear'd a'broad, that it wou'd expoſe him both to Danger and to 'Diſeſteem; and for the Manner of granting it, very diſ'honourable and full of Diſtruſt. Therefore commands 'them to go together, and by Saturday next return their 'final Anſwer what they will give, and that without Con'dition: Which if they did, his Majeſty was ready to for'get whatſoever was paſt.' The Keeper ending, the King ſpoke again; and after mentioning the Parliament's cauſing him to break with Spain, he proceeded thus: Now that you have all Things according to your Wiſhes, and that I am ſo far engag'd, that you think there is no Retreat; now you begin to ſet the Dice, and make your own Game. But I pray you, be not deceiv'd; it is not a Parliamentary Way, nor is it a Way to deal with a King. Mr. Coke told you, It was better to die by a Foreign Enemy, than be deſtroy'd at home: Indeed I think it more Honour for a King to be invaded, and almoſt deſtroy'd by a Foreign Enemy, than to be deſpis'd by his own Subjects. Remember that Parliaments are altogether in my Power for their Calling, Sitting, and Diſſolution; therefore as I find the Fruits of them good or evil, they are to continue, or not to be. And remember, if now, inſtead of mending you perſiſt in your Errors, you make them greater and irreconcileable; but if you go on chearfully to mend them, and look on the diſtreſſed State of Chriſtendom, and the Affairs of this Kingdom, you will do your ſelves Honour, and encourage me to go on with Parliaments, and I hope all Chriſtendom will feel the Good of it.

Buckingham's mollifying Speech.

Theſe ſevere menacing Expreſſions, which were ſuppos'd to proceed from the Duke of Buckingham, ſet the Houſe of Commons into a Flame; and immediately reſolving themſelves into a grand Committee, order'd the Doors to be ſecurely lock'd, and all other Proceedings to ceaſe, till the Houſe ſhould come to a Reſolution in this Matter. The King being inform'd of the great Exceptions taken at his late Speech, to mollify the Heat, commanded the Duke to give Satisfaction at a Conference to be held between both Houſes: In which 'he endeavour'd to excuſe his Majeſty's 'preſcribing a ſhort Day for their granting a Supply; and 'aſſur'd them that they ſhou'd have a larger Time, if the 'Buſineſs did require their further Conſideration. He let 'them underſtand, that the King's inſiſting upon a larger 'Aid than what they had already voted, was owing to the 'great Neceſſity of his Affairs, and the Benefit of being 'enabled to carry the War to the Enemies Doors. That 'his Majeſty did not deſign to interrupt their Proceedings 'upon Grievances; but only hop'd that they wou'd not 'ſo much ſeek Faults, as the Means to redreſs them. 'At the ſame time he made an Addreſs to both Houſes in 'his own Behalf; in which he gave them an handſom Ac'count of his Negotiation in the Low-Countries, and the 'Management of the Fleet; and concluded with a cour'teous intreating their charitable Opinion of him and his 'Actions.' Then the Lord Conway ſtood up, and made a formal Vindication 'of the Duke from the ſeveral Sug'geſtions and Jealouſies rais'd againſt him; and alſo laid 'before them an Account of the Sums of Mony diſburs'd 'for the War, before the fifteenth of June, 1625, which 'amounted to near three hundred thouſand Pounds.

The Commons Remonſtrance.

Tho' the Duke's Apology ſeem'd a little to allay the Heat, yet it cou'd not divert the Commons from proceeding in their Enquiries into publick Grievances: And in Anſwer to the King's and Lord-Keeper's Speeches, they drew up a humble and ſolemn Remonſtrance, 'in which 'they in a great Meaſure deny the Words to have been 'ſpoken by Mr. Coke; they excuſe the Behaviour of Dr. 'Turner, and avow their Proceedings againſt the Duke, 'or any other Subject, to be according to the Rights of 'all Parliaments; and in Concluſion they pray his Majeſty 'not to give Ear to officious Reports of private Perſons 'for their own Ends.' Upon the Delivery of this Remonſtrance, they expected a preſent Anſwer, which poſſibly might have had a happy Effect: But the King, either conſcious of his own Integrity, and the Duke's Fidelity, or being perfectly averſe to all Meaſures that might retard the War, only told them, That he cou'd give no preſent Anſwer; but deſir'd the Houſe to adjourn for a Week, as the Lords had done; and accordingly they adjourn'd. So both Houſes had a ſhort Reſpite and Receſs, after a troubleſome Seſſion of about two Months.

A Week's Adjournment.

Some Diſcontents in the Houſe of Lords.

3. The Troubles and Jealouſies of this Parliament were not wholly confin'd to the Commons, but likewiſe took their Turns in the Houſe of Lords. For tho' the King in his laſt Speech had diſtinguiſh'd them from the Commons by his particular Thanks and Approbation; yet ſome Occaſions of Offence did ſoon offer, which rais'd unhappy Diſguſts in that high and honourable Body. They thought it an Intrenchment on the Liberties of Peerage, as well as a Breach into the Legiſlature, that Writs were not iſſu'd to ſome of their Fellow-Peers; and when by Importunity obtain'd, were ſtill attended with expreſs Orders that they ſhou'd not appear in Perſon. Another Grievance was, that ſome of the Scotch and Iriſh Nobility pretended to claim a Precedency of the Engliſh Lords; which they reſented as an Indignity and Affront to their Quality and Honour; concerning which they by Petition obtain'd a favourable Anſwer from his Majeſty. Another Offence was taken at the infringing of their Liberties, by the King's committing of the Earl of Arundel to the Tower, in the Time of Parliament, without expreſſing the Cauſe. It was conceiv'd to be for the Marriage made between the Lord Maltravers, the Earl's eldeſt Son, to the Siſter of the young Duke of Lenox, a Relation of the King's. The Earl having been committed in March, the Lords enter'd into a grand Debate concerning their Privileges; when the Lord-Keeper deliver'd a Meſſage to the Houſe, That the Earl of Arundel was reſtrain'd for a Miſdemeanor that was perſonal to his Majeſty, and had no relation to Matters of Parliament. But the Lords, upon ſearching of Precedents, unanimouſly reſolv'd, That it is the Privilege of the Parliament, that no Lord, during the Seſſion, is to be impriſon'd without Sentence of the Houſe, unleſs it be for Treaſon, Felony, or Breach of the Peace. Upon which they order'd a Remonſtrance, or Petition, claiming the Privileges from Arreſts, &c. which on the nineteenth of April was preſented by the whole Houſe to his Majeſty; and the next Day the Lord-Preſident deliver'd the Anſwer from the King, That the Buſineſs being of ſome Conſequence, his Majeſty ſhou'd be thought raſh, if he ſhou'd give a ſudden Anſwer; therefore he wou'd adviſe, and give a full Anſwer in convenient Time. This Anſwer being deferr'd ſeveral Days, on the ſecond of May their Lordſhips order'd the Lord-Keeper to move his Majeſty for a ſpeedy Anſwer to their Petition: To which the King reply'd, He had been interrupted with Buſineſs, but wou'd with all Conveniency return them an Anſwer. On the ninth of May, the Lords ſuſpecting the Delay to be a Denial of Juſtice, drew up a ſecond Petition; to which they received this Anſwer from his Majeſty, That he little look'd for ſuch a Meſſage from the Houſe; therefore when he receiv'd a Meſſage fit to come from them to their Soveraign, they ſhou'd receive an Anſwer. When the Lords deſir'd to know at what Part of their Petition his Majeſty took Exception, the Lord-Preſident reported to them, It was at the Peremptorineſs of the Term preſent Anſwer: That the King wonders at their Impatience, ſince he has promis'd an Anſwer in a convenient Time. However their Lordſhips ſtill purſu'd their Petitions, till at the Beginning of June the Earl of Arundel was reſtor'd to his Liberty; but with ſo much Reluctancy, that the Favour was rather deſpis'd than duly acknowledg'd.

The Earl of Arundel's Caſe.

The Conteſt between the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Briſtol.

But what principally fomented the Diſcontents, and the Factions in the Houſe of Lords, was the famous Conteſt between the Duke of Buckingham and the Earl of Briſtol; the former ſupported by the greater Power, and the latter guarded by the deeper Policy. They had begun their Emulation in the Court of Spain, where the Duke had been moſt officious to oblige the Perſon of the Prince, and the Earl had thought himſelf more ſerviceable in aiming at the Honour of the Nation. At the Earl's Return, upon the Suggeſtions of the Duke, he was forbidden Acceſs to his Majeſty; was ſtrictly examined by a ſelect Number of Lords; was kept under Reſtraint, and was deny'd his Writ to Parliament: And when, by the Interceſſion of the Lords, he obtain'd his Summons, yet he receiv'd it with a particular Order not to make his Perſonal Appearance. It was indeed allow'd to him, Whether he would ſit ſtill and enjoy the Benefit of the late King's Pardon, or to wave it, and put himſelf upon Tryal for his Negotiation in Spain. But he ventur'd to ſend a Petition to the Houſe, ſetting forth the Injury done to him, deſiring to be heard, that he might clear himſelf, and prefer his Accuſation againſt the Duke of Buckingham. This ſo highly offended the King, that he ſent this Meſſage by the Lord-Keeper to the Houſe of Lords: His Majeſty has heard of a Petition prefer'd by the Earl of Briſtol, ſo void of Duty and Reſpect to his Majeſty, that he has great Cauſe to puniſh him.---- His Majeſty commands that the Earl be ſent for as a Delinquent, to anſwer in this Houſe his Offences committed in his Negotiations before his Majeſty's being in Spain, and his Offences ſince his Majeſty's coming from Spain, and his ſcandalizing the Duke of Buckingham immediately, and his Majeſty by Reflection.

Articles againſt the Earl of Briſtol.

Upon this Meſſage the Lords order'd that the Earl of Briſtol ſhou'd be brought to the Bar of their Houſe on the firſt of May; where Sir Robert Heath, Attorney-General, exhibited againſt him eleven Articles of High Treaſon, and other Miſdemeanors, under three ſeveral Head, viz. 1. Offences committed before his Majeſty's going into Spain, when he was Prince. 2. Offences committed during the Time of the Prince's being in Spain. 3. Offences committed after the Prince's coming from Spain. Of which the moſt criminal Part of the Charge was, 'That he had aſſur'd King James, that the Palatinate ſhou'd be reſtor'd, and the Prince's Match effected, when neither was intended: That he deſign'd only to make his own Fortune by the Treaty: That he intended to introduce Popery in England, and in Spain perſuaded the Prince to change his Religion.' The Articles being read, and Mr. Attorney being ask'd by the Earl who was his Accuſer, he ſaid that the King had commanded the Proſecution. To which the Earl reply'd, 'That he wou'd not contend with his Soveraign; but it might be of dangerous Conſequence, if the King ſhou'd be Accuſer, Judge, Witneſs, and have the Confiſcation: Therefore he deſir'd that their Lordſhips wou'd firſt receive his Charge againſt the Duke and the Lord Conway, and not ſuffer his Teſtimony to be invalidated by a contriv'd Impeachment.' So he tender'd to the Houſe his Articles againſt the Duke, which were receiv'd: And ſhortly after the Earl, at the Bar of the Houſe, made a long and eloquent Speech, 'charging the Duke with many ill Counſels and arbitrary Actions, and defending his own Innocence and Honour; particularly inſiſting upon the very dying Opinion of King James, who declared that Briſtol was an honeſt Man.' After which, upon a Promiſe to anſwer the Attorney-General's Charge as ſoon as might be, he was remitted to the Cuſtody of Mr. Maxwell, the Gentleman-Uſher.

The Earl's Articles againſt Buckingham and Conway.

Then were read the Articles againſt the Duke of Buckingham, which were twelve in Number; the moſt conſiderable Part of which was, 'That he had plotted with Gondamor to bring the Prince into Spain, to change his Religion: That in Spain the Duke had frequented the Popiſh Service, and ador'd their Sacrament: That the Pope had ſent a Bull to the Duke, to incourage him in the Perverſion of the Prince: That he had broken the Match out of his own particular Ends and Indignation; and that he had abus'd King James, and both Houſes of Parliament, by a ſiniſter Relation of thoſe Affairs.' The Articles of the ſaid Earl againſt the Lord Conway, deliver'd and read at the ſame Time, were eleven in Number; 'all tending to prove the Lord Conway to be the Duke's Servant and Creature, and a Promoter and Abetter of all Miſcarriages committed by the Duke.' After reading the ſeveral Articles, the Lords order'd, that the King's Charge againſt the Earl of Briſtol ſhould be firſt heard, and then the Charge of the Earl againſt the Duke; yet ſo that the Earl's Teſtimony againſt the Duke ſhou'd not be prevented or prejudic'd. This occaſion'd a new Meſſage from the King by the Lord-Keeper to this Effect; That the Articles exhibited againſt the Duke were ſuch, as the King of his own Knowledge cou'd teſtify his ſincere Carriage in them; that they had been kept in the Earl's own Breaſt for two Years, contrary to his Duty, and were now vented by way of Recrimination; and that therefore they ſhould put a Difference between his Majeſty's Charge againſt one that appears as a Delinquent, and the Recrimination of the ſame Perſon againſt his Majeſty's Witneſs.

The King interpoſes for the Duke.

Now the Majority of the Lords were more inclined to eſpouſe the Cauſe of the Earl, having a better Opinion of his Character and Perſon, than they had of the Duke; and being more ready to commiſerate his Misfortune, who had incurr'd the King's Diſpleaſure by oppoſing the other's Ambition. Upon Appearance of this Inclination in the Houſe, a new Deſign was promoted, to remove the Earl's Cauſe out of the Cognizance of the Lords, and proceed againſt him by way of Indictment in the King's Bench. But this Attempt did only gain the Earl more Friends in the Upper Houſe, and made them ſenſible, that taking the Cauſe out of their Hands wou'd infringe their Authority, and leave an Imputation upon their Honour and Juſtice. Therefore they ſtopt the Revocation of it; and a Fortnight after the Earl's Impeachment, they receiv'd his formal Anſwer, which he introduc'd with a plauſible Oration: Wherein he firſt aſſerted his conſtant and ſtrict Adherence to the Proteſtant Religion; and then inſiſted upon his Honour and Integrity in his Negotiations in Spain. After which he exhibited his large and full Anſwer to the ſeveral Articles preferr'd againſt him: 'In which he produc'd ſeveral Letters of Thanks for his Care concerning the Palatinate, and anſwer'd punctually to every Particular concerning the Match with Spain, eſpecially where any Attempts were made upon the Proteſtant Religion. In ſpeaking of which, he mention'd a Saying often in King James's Mouth, That he was the true Martyr, that ſuffer'd more for his Religion than all the Princes in Chriſtendom; particularly that he cou'd not match his Children with Kings of their own Rank, without the Pope's Leave. In the Concluſion of his long Defence, he hop'd their Lordſhips would find him a faithful Servant to his late and preſent Majeſty; and that therefore they wou'd take ſuch Courſe as they in their Wiſdom ſhould think fit, not only for ſupporting the Honour of a Peer of this Realm, but likewiſe for becoming humble Suitors to his Majeſty, that he may be reſtor'd to his Favour, which above all worldly Things he moſt deſir'd.

The Earl's Anſwer and Vindication.

The Commons Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham.

4. The Conteſts and Accuſations between theſe two great Men, was a Matter of Sport to ſome, and Concern to others: But before either cou'd be brought to a final Iſſue a greater Storm appear'd; which was a ſolemn Impeachment of the Duke of Buckingham by the whole Body of the Commons, which had been long in modelling; and now upon the eighth Day of May was brought to Perfection, and deliver'd at a Conference between both Houſes, which laſted two Days. It was manag'd by ſix of the ableſt Lawyers of the Houſe, namely Glanvile, Herbert, Selden, Pym, Wansford and Sherland; the Prologue was made by Sir Dudley Diggs, and the Epilogue by Sir John Elliot. The Articles were thirteen in Number, introduc'd by Sir Dudley Diggs with a lofty and pompous Oration, 'comparing England to the World, the Commons to the Earth and Sea, the King to the Sun, the Lords to the Planets, the Clergy to the Fire, the Judges and Magiſtrates to the Air, and the Duke of Buckingham to a prodigious Comet, from whoſe malignant Influence aroſe all the Misfortunes of the Nation.' Then the Articles were read, which in Subſtance were, 'Firſt, His engroſing of Offices, and Multiplicity of Places: Then his buying of the Office of Admiral, as likewiſe the Offices of Warden of the Cinque-Ports, and Conſtable of Dover, with the Neglect of the Duty and Truſt repos'd in him by theſe Offices. Next, his illegal ſtopping of a Ship call'd Peter of Newhaven, by which he got twenty thouſand Pounds; and his extorting ten thouſand Pounds from the Eaſt India Merchants, by ſtaying their Ships. Then his procuring the Vaunt-Guard, and ſix Merchant Ships, to be put into the Hands of the French King, which were employ'd againſt Rochelle. Next, the Sale of Honours, in which he oblig'd the Lord Roberts to give ten thouſand Pounds for his Title; ſold the Office of Treaſurer to the Lord Mancheſter for twenty thouſand Pounds, and the Office of the Maſter of the Wards to Sir Lionel Cranfield for ſix thouſand Pounds. Next, his procuring Titles and Penſions for his Kindred, and Grants of Crown Lands of a great Value for himſelf. Laſtly, the Playſter and Potions given to King James in his laſt Sickneſs, which was declar'd a tranſcendent Preſumption of a dangerous Conſequence.' Theſe were all laid open, and enlarg'd with all the aggravating Circumſtances that the Wit and Rhetorick of the ſix great Lawyers cou'd ſuggeſt. And for a Concluſion, Sir John Elliot made a furious Speech, 'in which he compar'd the Duke to a Beaſt call'd Stellionatus, ſo blurr'd, ſo ſpotted, ſo full of foul Lines, as they knew not how to deſcribe it: One who intercepted, conſum'd and exhauſted the Revenues of the Crown, not only to ſatisfie his own Luſts, but the Luxury of others; and by emptying the Veins of the Kingdom, had caſt the whole Body into a high Conſumption.' After other Marks of an implacable Hatred, he concluded with a particular Compariſon of him to one of the worſt of Miniſters in the Reign of King Richard the Firſt. For which bitter Reflections, he was afterwards ſent to the Tower, as alſo Sir Dudley Diggs, who made the Prologue to this Impeachment.

The Subſtance of their Accuſation.

Elliot and Diggs impriſon'd.

It was wonder'd at by many, that, conſidering the Duke's Power and Influence in the Government, greater Offences were not objected againſt him: But whatever Hardſhips his Friends thought he ſuſtain'd, it cou'd not be deny'd but he had brought the ſame upon the Earl of Middleſex in the laſt Reign; which open'd a wide Paſſage for the Commons to treat him and others after the ſame Manner. The King, who had alſo promoted the ſame Impeachment, was now, if not before, made ſenſible of his Error, by a Letter wrote by an eminent Hand, which made an ingenious Recital of the ſeveral Intereſts and Affections united againſt the Duke, proving, 'That theſe Parliamentary Diſcourſings were never ſuffer'd ſince the Time of Henry VI. as being the certain

A private Letter to the King.

'certain Symptoms of ſubſequent Rebellions, Civil-Wars, and the dethroning of our Kings.-------- That never any Nobleman was queſtion'd in Parliament, except by the King himſelf in Caſe of Treaſon, but in the Nonage and tumultuous Times of Richard II. Henry VI. and Edward VI. which prov'd to the Deſtruction both of the King and Kingdom. Of later Years, in the Time of Henry VIII. Wolſey's exorbitant Power and Pride, and Cromwell's Contempt of the Nobility and Laws, were not yet permitted to be diſcuſs'd in Parliament, tho' moſt odious and grievous to all the Kingdom. Under Queen Elizabeth, Leiceſter's undeſerv'd Favour, and Faults; Hatton's Inſufficiency, and Rawleigh's Inſolence, far exceeded what yet has been objected againſt the Duke; yet no Lawyer durſt abet, nor any other begin any Invectives againſt them in Parliament.------It therefore behoov'd his Majeſty to ſupport the Duke againſt them; for if he be but decourted, it will be the Corner-Stone on which the Demoliſhing of his Monarchy will be builded. If they prevail in this, they have form'd a thouſand other Demands to pull the Feathers of the Royalty; they will appoint him Counſellors, Servants, Alliances, Limits of Expences, Accounts of his Revenue; but chiefly, if they can, they will now dazle him in the Beginning of his Reign.' The Truth of theſe notable Predictions afterwards appear'd by the Event.

The King vindicates the Duke.

The Commons in a Heat.

Diggs and Elliot releas'd.

On the eleventh of May, the King went to the Houſe of Lords, where in a ſhort Speech he vindicated the Duke of Buckingham, and ſaid, That he cou'd clear him of every one of the Matters whereof he was accus'd. But the Commons, by a Meſſage to the Lords, deſir'd that the Duke might be committed; and the Duke in the Lord's Houſe deſir'd that his Tryal might be haſtned. The quick Reſentments of the King, and the ſeeming Defiance of the Duke, did but irritate the Commons to a more importunate Proſecution. And being incens'd at the Commitment of their Members, they turn'd themſelves into a grand Committee, lock'd up their Doors, and wou'd not proceed in any other Buſineſs till they were righted in their Liberties. In which Committee Sir Dudley Charlton made a very reconciling Speech, 'and mov'd the Houſe not to intrench upon his Majeſty's Prerogatives, leſt it ſhou'd make him out of love with Parliaments: He urg'd the Neceſſity of a good Correſpondence to be kept up between the King and his People: And laid ſome Blame on Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot, and inferr'd that they had ſpoke beyond their Commiſſion: The former ſpeaking of the Plaiſter apply'd to King James, ſaid He did forbear to ſpeak further, in regard of the King's Honour, which his Majeſty conceiv'd to be to his Diſhonour; and the latter uſing ſo many uncivil and bitter Reflections upon the Duke, that the King thought fit to commit them both.' Hereupon every Member made a Proteſtation, That he did not give conſent that Sir Dudley Diggs ſhou'd ſpeak the Words charg'd upon him; and thirty ſix Lords proteſted, that they did not hear thoſe Words. Sir Dudley Diggs being releas'd, proteſted that he never ſpoke the Words, in which the King was alſo ſatisfy'd: Shortly after Sir John Elliot was releas'd, who excus'd and juſtify'd the Paſſages of his Speech, objected againſt him; and by a Vote the Houſe juſtify'd him and Sir Dudley Diggs, and all the reſt of the Managers of the Impeachment.

The Duke elected Chancellor of Cambridge.

5. While the Duke was preparing to give in his Anſwer, and while he lay under the Scandal of his Impeachment, he was unexpectedly elected Chancellor for the Univerſity of Cambridge; which appear'd much to his Advantage at this Time, becauſe his other Honours did rather help to ſink him, while this was like to add to his Support. This Place became void by the Death of the Earl of Suffolk; and the Univerſity, to ſhew their Reſpect to the King, and their Diſlike to the Commons, made Choice of the Duke, in Oppoſition to the Earl of Berkſhire, ſecond Son of the deceas'd Chancellor, who loſt it but by five Votes. It was obſervable, that almoſt all the Doctors and Seniors were for the Duke; and that the Houſe of Commons, thinking themſelves affronted, wou'd have interpos'd by their Letter againſt him. But the King by a Meſſage forbad the ſending it, challenging thoſe Matters to belong ſolely to himſelf, juſtify'd the Duke to the Houſe, and by an obliging Letter to the Univerſity applauded their new Election.

The Duke's full Defence.

Shortly after, on the eighth of June, the Duke made his Defence before the Houſe of Lords, and with an ingenious Speech uſher'd in his Anſwer to the Impeachment of the Commons, whom he handſomly courted, yet juſtify'd himſelf, alledging, That his Accuſer, Common Fame, was too ſubtle, and the Houſe of Commons too great for him to conteſt withall; but he doubted not but in Time it wou'd be found, that Common Fame had abus'd both them and him. Then he gave in diſtinct Anſwers to the thirteen Articles againſt him, moſt of which had a fair and plauſible Aſpect. The chief Strength of them lay 'in the Knowledge of the King and his Father, and their Direction of the particular Paſſages; with his Obedience to Orders, and his following the Advice of the Privy Council. He deny'd his direct purchaſing the two great Offices of Admiral and Warden of the Cinque-Ports. He deny'd that he receiv'd the Benefit of thoſe great Sums of Mony charg'd upon him, but part was paid into the Exchequer, and part diſpos'd for his Majeſty's particular Service; As to the Grants and Favours ſhewn to himſelf and Family, he own'd them to be the Bounty of two ſeveral Kings. But in the laſt Place he abſolutely deny'd his applying the Plaiſter, or giving the Potion to King James in his Sickneſs; but the King knowing that the Duke had been cur'd of an Ague by thoſe Medicines, he deſir'd to try them, and took them in the Preſence of his Phyſicians, who taſted of the Potion. He concluded his Defence with acknowledging how eaſie it was for him in his younger Years to fall into thouſands of Errors, but hop'd he had been preſerv'd from running into any high and heinous Crimes. But in what he had unwillingly offended, he claim'd the Benefit of his late and preſent Majeſty's Pardon.

A ſurpriſing Spectacle.

The Anſwer that the Duke made to his Impeachment, was a kind of a new Grievance to his Adverſaries; for it was contriv'd with ſo much Art, and intermixt with ſo much Modeſty and Humility, that it was like to have a powerful Influence towards the Converſion of many, who expected a Defence of another Spirit, and a more diſdainful Nature. Tho' many of the better ſort were thus diſappointed, yet an Accident at this time happened which was thought very portentous by the Vulgar; which was a ſtrange prodigious Spectacle upon the Thames, which after a turbulent Motion of the Waters aroſe like an Exhalation, and appear'd in a circular Form of about ten Yards diameter, and as many Foot elevated from the River. This Cataract, or Spout of Waters, was carry'd impetuouſly croſs the River, and made a furious Aſſault upon the Garden Walls of York-Houſe, where the Duke then reſided; after which, it broke aſunder with a fuliginous Smoak, like that of a Furnace, and gradually aſcended, till it quite vaniſh'd, to the great Admiration of the Spectators. At the ſame Inſtant there happened in the City ſuch a dreadful Storm of Rain and Hail, with terrible Claps of Thunder, that a great Part of the Church-Yard Walls of St. Andrew's Church in Holborn fell down; and ſeveral Graves were laid open, and many Coffins tumbled into the midſt of the Street.

The King's laſt Meſſage to the Houſe.

The Commons prepare a Remonſtrance.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

The Day after the Duke's Defence, the King, reſolving to try the Commons once more, ſent a Letter to the Speaker to quicken them about the Subſidies; in which he told them, That now he gave them his laſt and final Admonition, and that he wou'd account all further Delays and Excuſes to be expreſs Denials. Inſtead of an Anſwer they preſented an humble Petition againſt Popiſh Recuſants, in which they nam'd thoſe in Places of Government and Truſt; and pray'd that they might be turn'd out. After which they deſir'd to attend his Majeſty, where by their Speaker, and in Writing, 'they profeſs'd their Affection and Loyalty to the King; but withal deſir'd that his Majeſty wou'd not permit the Duke to have any more Acceſs to him.' But not receiving a favourable Anſwer, they agreed to prepare a formal Remonſtrance againſt the Duke of Buckingham, and againſt the taking of Tonnage and Poundage; which after ſome high Conteſt, was allow'd by the Houſe to precede the Bill of Subſidy. Upon which the King was ſo extreamly incens'd, that he reſolv'd upon an immediate Diſſolution; which being made known to the Commons, they order'd every Member to have a Copy of their Remonſtrance. But the Lords proceeded more calmly, and petition'd his Majeſty not to diſſolve the Parliament at preſent: But he declar'd his Reſolution not to receive any ſuch Petition; and ſo by a Commiſſion he diſſolv'd the Parliament upon the fifteenth Day of June. Thus ended this great, warm and ruffling Parliament, as Whitlock calls it, after it had ſat above eighteen Weeks, without paſſing one ſingle publick Act; a Period of Time greater than the longeſt Parliament in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The King's Declaration, &c.

On the ſame Day of the Diſſolution, the Earl of Briſtol was again committed to the Tower, and the Earl of Arundel confin'd to his Houſe; which, with many other Marks of Diſtinction, unhappily improv'd the general Diſcontent: To remove which his Majeſty publiſh'd a Declaration of the Cauſes of diſſolving the two laſt Parliaments, in which he charg'd the Misfortunes chiefly upon the violent and ill-advis'd Paſſions of a few Members of the Commons for private and perſonal Ends, ill beſeeming publick Perſons truſted by their Country. This was ſeconded by a Royal Proclamation, taking notice of the Remonſtrance drawn up by the Commons, and commanding all Perſons who had any Copies of it to burn the ſame, that the Memory thereof might be utterly aboliſh'd. But notwithſtanding all the Reaſons alledg'd in theſe publick Appeals, and the unreaſonable Violence of ſome Members, this Diſſolution was thought precipitate, and contrary to true Policy; and that it did not only prove unfortunate to his Majeſty, but at length fatal to his Favourite.

Several Projects for raiſing Money.

VI. 1. The publick Affairs being now in Diſorder, and Perſons heated with Paſſion, it cou'd not be expected, that Counſels ſhould be very ſound, or well weighed; Neceſſities corrupting Mens Judgments, and Dangers forcing them to graſp at ſomething, which either was too weak for a Support, or too thorny to be held long. Accordingly ſeveral Projects were ſet on foot to ſupply the King's Occaſions: And for a Foundation, the Privy-Council advis'd his Majeſty to take Tonnage and Poundage, by an Inſtrument under the Great Seal, till it ſhou'd be paſs'd in Parliament; declaring it 'a principal 'and neceſſary Part of the Revenue of the Crown, which 'had been conſtantly continu'd for many Ages, and de'ſigned to have been ſettled by the two laſt Parliaments, 'had not their Diſſolution intervened:' All which was declar'd illegal by ſucceeding Parliaments. And becauſe the late Parliament had voted the King four Subſidies and three Fifteens, the Sums which the King requir'd by his Privy-Seals were according to the Proportion of the Subſidies, viz. about two hundred and twenty thouſand Pounds. But to prevent Miſunderſtandings, it was declar'd, 'that 'the Supplies now demanded were not the Subſidies in'tended to be given by the Parliament, but merely a free 'Gift from the Subject to the Soveraign, upon ſuch weigh'ty and preſſing Occaſions of State.

They are all diſlik'd.

This was as much condemn'd as the laſt; and indeed all the Court Inventions became liable to the Exceptions of the Nation. One Method was to improve the Forfeitures ariſing from the Laws againſt Popiſh Prieſts and Recuſants; and this was by appointing Commiſſioners to compound with the ſaid Recuſants under ſuch Conditions and Immunities as they ſhould think convenient, his Majeſty rather deſiring their Converſion than Deſtruction. But this was ſuſpected as a Toleration of Popery in thoſe who cou'd purchaſe it, and as a Power of diſpenſing with the Penal Laws. A Proclamation was likewiſe publiſh'd declaring the King's Reſolution to make his Revenue certain, by granting his Crown Lands, as well Copy-hold as otherwiſe, to be henceforward holden in Fee-Farm. This alſo was diſlik'd, as an Impoveriſhment of the ſtated Revenue of the Crown by raiſing preſent Fines. The King's Letters were ſent to the Nobility and Gentry, that according to former Precedents on the like Occaſion, they would grant him their private Aſſiſtance, by way of Contribution, or Loan; expecting ſuch a large and chearful Teſtimony of their Loyalty, as may be acceptable to Himſelf, and exemplary to his People. But this was reſented as a Way of asking by Authority, which ſavour'd more of Extortion than Requeſt. Beſides all, a peculiar Charge was laid upon the ſeveral Ports and Maritime Counties, to furniſh and ſet out Ships for the preſent Service, in ſuch and ſuch proportionable Numbers; particularly twenty for the City of London. This Project alſo met with great Oppoſition and Complaint. The Deputy-Lieutenants and Juſtices of Dorſetſhire preſented a Plea of Excuſe to the Council-Table, alledging, 'That this was an Impoſition without Prece'dent.' The Lord-Mayor and Commonalty of London made a like Petition, and pleaded for an Abatement at leaſt of the Number of Ships requir'd of them; but the Council gave a general Anſwer, 'That Petitions and Pleadings 'againſt a neceſſary Command did but obſtruct the publick 'Service, and therefore were not to be admitted.

A Proſecution againſt Buckingham.

Theſe Times being very uneaſy, and the Kingdom expos'd to Danger both foreign and domeſtick, a ſolemn Faſt was appointed, to implore a Bleſſing upon the Endeavours of the State, and divert the Judgments due to the Sins of the Nation. A Proclamation was alſo publiſh'd to prohibit the Preaching and Diſputing about the Arminian Controverſies; which now began to be manag'd with ſuch Heat and Faction, as to threaten the Peace both of the Church and Kingdom. And becauſe the Duke of Buckingham had been ſo obnoxious to the Hatred of moſt People, an Information was preferr'd by the King's ſpecial Command againſt him in the Star-Chamber, for high Offences and Miſdemeanours, and in particular for the Plaiſter apply'd to King James, according to the laſt Article preferr'd againſt him by the Commons. The Duke put in his Anſwer, and ſeveral Witneſſes were examin'd; but it came to no judicial Determination: So that it ſerv'd only to gratify the ill-natur'd Surmiſes of ſome of his Enemies.

The King of Denmark's Misfortunes.

2. About this Time there hapned new Matters to encreaſe the King's Troubles; and he daily found Himſelf ingag'd in Foreign, as well as Domeſtick Conteſts. For his Uncle the King of Denmark had taken up Arms againſt the Emperor, in Alliance with the Princes of the Lower Saxony, and therein claim'd the Aſſiſtance of the King of England for the Reſtitution of One ſo near related to both Him and the Elector Palatine. Hereupon the King ſent a Fleet to be join'd with the Daniſh Ships to ſecure the Entrance of the River Elbe, and ſo prevent the Tranſportation of Commodities for the Service of the Spaniards. And beſides this Aid by Sea, the King was ſending over ſix Thouſand Land-men, under the Command of Sir Charles Morgan; but before they cou'd arrive, the King of Denmark and his Confederates, unfortunately meeting with Count Tilly the Emperor's General near Luttern, upon the 27th of Auguſt, were forc'd to an unequal Battel, and entirely defeated.

Letters for a General Loan.

The News of this Diſaſter was a great Affliction to the King of England, who finding himſelf under various Difficulties, advis'd with his Council by what Means and Ways he might be ſpeedily furniſh'd under theſe Emergencies. After ſeveral Days Conſultation, they came to this Reſolution, 'That the Urgency of Affairs not admitting the 'Way of Parliament, the moſt ſpeedy, equal, and con'venient Means were by a General Loan from the Sub'ject, according as every Man was aſſeſs'd in the Rolls of 'the laſt Subſidy. Upon which Reſult, Letters of Commiſſion were iſſu'd out, bearing Date the 13th of October, directed to certain Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen in their ſeveral Counties: In which they were requir'd to acquaint the People, 'That his Majeſty's Uncle the King of Den'mark was brought into great Diſtreſs; That without pre'ſent Succour the Sound wou'd be loſt, his Garriſon in 'Stoad reduc'd by the Emperor's Forces; the Eaſt-land 'Trade, and the Staple of Hamburgh wou'd be gotten from 'him: As alſo that the two great Kings of Spain and 'France, together with the Pope, were join'd to root out 'our Religion: That the French and Spaniſh Admirals 'were before Rochelle, endeavouring to block it up; and 'that there were Store of Land-Men ready in the Court of 'Bretaign, with other Forces to invade England. Upon 'which Grounds, and the Urgency which wou'd not 'give leave to the calling of a Parliament, they were re'quir'd to pay their ſeveral Proportions; which ſhou'd all 'be faithfully repaid, and ſhou'd not be made a Precedent 'to charge them or their Poſterity.

The Ways of promoting it.

Complaints againſt it.

This Loan being General, and to go thorow the whole Nation, various Methods and Endeavours were us'd to render it effectual: For, beſides the ſtrict and private Inſtructions given to the Commiſſioners, divers Lords of the Council were order'd to repair to their ſeveral Counties for the Advancement of the Cauſe. Biſhop Laud was alſo appointed to reduce into Form ſome Inſtructions, partly Political, partly Eccleſiaſtical, to ſhew the Urgency of the King's Occaſions; which were ſent to the two Arch-Biſhops, to be diſpers'd among the inferior Clergy, and to be publiſh'd in all the Pariſhes of the Realm. But no Art nor Intereſt cou'd ſtop the Mouths of a great many Murmurers upon this Occaſion; for there being plauſible Reaſons on both Sides, the Diviſion prov'd the greater: And in ſuch Diſputes the higheſt Authority has uſually the moſt Diſadvantage; for few can diſcern the juſt Provocations and Neceſſities of a Prince, but all can ſee that their Liberty of not being tax'd, without their Repreſentatives, is due to them; and their keeping their own Money, tho' to the Hazard of all the reſt, is an eligible Thing. The Reluctancy of private Perſons made the Government more ſevere in the Execution of the Project, and the Severity made the People more averſe to it; ſo that the Steps taken to promote the Deſign, caus'd it to have leſs Succeſs, and to appear more odious.

Promoted by Dr. Sibthorp.

And Dr. Manwaring.

As the Clergy had been earneſtly excited from above, to promote and advance this Deſign, ſo ſome of that Body were judg'd more officious than became their Function in ſuch a ſecular Affair; and a few ſo indiſcreet, as to make it a Doctrine of their Pulpits to urge the Duty of anſwering whatever the King demanded. In particular, Doctor Robert Sibthorp, Vicar of Brackley in Northamptonſhire, preach'd an Aſſize Sermon upon this Subject, which was afterwards publiſh'd, and dedicated to the King under the Title of Apoſtolick Obedience. 'The whole Scope of 'it was to advance the Loan, and to juſtify the King's 'impoſing publick Taxes, without Conſent of Parliament; 'and to prove that the People, in Point of Conſcience, 'were bound to ſubmit to the Royal Will and Pleaſure.' Doctor Roger Manwaring promoted the ſame Cauſe in two Sermons, preach'd before the King and Court, and publiſh'd under the Title of Religion and Allegiance; in which he advanc'd theſe Doctrines, 'That the King is not bound 'to obſerve the Laws of the Realm concerning the Sub'jects Rights and Liberties, but his Royal Will and Com'mand in impoſing Loans and Taxes, without Conſent of 'Parliament, does oblige the Subjects Conſcience, upon 'Pain of eternal Damnation: That thoſe who refus'd to 'pay this Loan, offended againſt the Law of God, and 'the King's Supreme Authority, and became guilty of Im'piety,

'piety, Diſloyalty and Rebellion.' For which Doctrines, he was afterwards cenſur'd in Parliament; which occaſion'd ſome hard Reflections upon the Clergy in general; when in ſo large a Body only Two were found to run into ſuch Extreams. And of thoſe, Sibthorp has this Character given him by Wood, a zealous Loyaliſt; A Perſon of little Learning, and of few Parts, only made it his Endeavours, by his Forwardneſs and Flattery, to gain Preferment.

Great Oppoſition againſt it.

Many Sufferers.

But neither theſe Doctrines, nor the urgent Neceſſities of the King, did ſo far prevail among the People, but that the Commiſſioners for the Loan met with greater Oppoſition than they expected. Many, who had been Members in the two late Parliaments, oppos'd it with their utmoſt Power, and drew a conſiderable Number of Others to the like Refuſal. The Benchers of Lincolns-Inn, demurring upon it, as not in due Form of Law, receiv'd a Letter of Reproof from the Lords of the Council, with a Command to return the Names of the Refractory. The common Sort of London, who deny'd the Rates requir'd of them were, by the Council's Warrant directed to the Commiſſioners of the Navy, impreſt to ſerve in the Ships ready for his Majeſty's Service. And others of them were made to appear before the Lieutenant of the Tower, to be enroll'd among the Land-Forces; with this Reaſon declar'd, That they who refus'd to aſſiſt with their Purſes, ſhou'd ſerve in their Perſons, for the Common Defence. The Gentry in ſeveral Counties, refuſing to ſubſcribe, were bound over by Recognizance to appear at the Council-Table; and upon refuſing to comply, were many of them committed to Priſon, without Benefit of their Habeas-Corpus. They were generally confin'd to diſtant Counties from their own; of whom the principal were Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Mr. George Ratcliff, of Yorkſhire; Sir Walter Earl, and Sir John Strangeways, of Dorſetſhire; Sir John Hevingham, and Sir Nathaniel Bernardiſton, of Suffolk; Sir Thomas Grantham of Lincolnſhire, Mr Richard Knightly of Northamptonſhire, Sir Harbottle Grimſtone of Eſſex, Mr. John Hampden of Buckinghamſhire, and Sir John Elliot of Cornwall. Theſe and others were branded as Puritans, while the Papiſts, who were moſt liberal in this Affair, were careſs'd by the Courtiers; which ſtill added to the popular Diſguſts.

Sir Randolf Crew One.

Among thoſe that ſuffer'd, Sir Randolf Crew, ſhewing himſelf diſſatisfy'd, was remov'd from his Place of Lord Chief Juſtice, and Sir Nicholas Hide was put in his Room; a Perſon of ſufficient Abilities; but being a Creature of the Duke's, and ſucceeding a Perſon ſo well belov'd, he enter'd upon his Place with great Prejudice. The politick Biſhop of Lincoln cou'd not wholly eſcape in this critical Juncture; who delivering his Thoughts concerning this Loan, a Complaint was ſent up to the Lords of the Council; and upon this Occaſion an Information of other pretended Matters was afterwards preferr'd againſt him in the Star-Chamber.

Biſhop Laud further promoted.

As this great Prelate daily declin'd in Intereſt and Favour with the Court, ſo another aſcended, and began to ſhine with unuſual Splendour; which was Biſhop Laud, who this Year was tranſlated from the Biſhoprick of St. Davids, to that of Bath and Wells. His great Activity and Services in the ſame Year brought him into another honourable Poſt of great Nearneſs to his Majeſty's Perſon, and this was the Deanery of the Royal Chappel. At his Entrance upon this Office, he prevail'd with his good Maſter to break one ill Cuſtom, that obtain'd at Court ſince the Acceſſion of King James: And this was, that whenever the King came to the Chappel, the Divine Service then depending was ſuddenly broke off, and an Anthem ſung, to make immediate Way for Sermon. Which Cuſtom having an Appearance of Prophaneneſs, or Contempt of the Liturgy, this new Dean did very honourably repreſent the Scandal of it to the King, who piouſly comply'd with a Redreſs of it. Shortly after, the Duke of Buckingham, attended with ſeveral Lords, took him to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was ſolemnly incorporated into that Body; and the whole Company treated with Splendor and Satisfaction.

The Death of Biſhop Lake,

Biſhop Andrews,

To make way for theſe two new Preferments, there dy'd two great Men, whoſe Memories ought to be carefully recorded, Dr. Arthur Lake, and Dr. Lancelot Andrews. The former was Biſhop of Bath and Wells; a Perſon of ſingular Learning and Temper, and of exemplary Piety and Hoſpitality; worthy of his high Office, and of true Fame in Hiſtory. The latter was Biſhop of Wincheſter, a Perſon ſtupendouſly profound, as L'Eſtrange expreſſes it, ſurpaſſing in Languages and Theology, whoſe excellent Works breath nothing but the Faith of the ancient Fathers; nor can we read thoſe great Men, more than we ſhou'd have done in his very Aſpect, Geſture and Actions; ſo venerable in his Preſence, ſo grave in his Motions, ſo pious in his Converſation, ſo primitive in All. Fuller ſays that the World wanted Learning to know how learned he was; ſo skill'd in all Languages, that ſome conceiv'd he might have almoſt ſerv'd as an Interpreter General at the Confuſion of Tongues: To which we muſt add, that he converted many Papiſts; and, beſides great Sums in his Life-time, he left four thouſand Pounds for the Maintenance of poor Men and Widows.

The Lord Bacon,

Serjeant Davies,

Dr. Goſlyn,

And Mr. Gunter.

In the ſame Year there dy'd another wonderful Man, Francis Lord Bacon, a Prodigy of Knowledge, and of as ſublime and univerſal Genius, as the Nation ever produc'd; His capacious Soul had ſoar'd above all the Riches of the World, yet by means of his Condeſcenſion, and Indulgence to his Dependants, he became unaccountably ſully'd and debauch'd by them; and ſhewing a melancholy Example of Human Frailty, he ſuddenly fell from the higheſt Poſts, and dy'd in great Poverty, in the ſixty ſixth Year of his Age. To conclude the Year, we ſhall mention three other Men of Note and Worth, as Sir John Davies, Serjeant at Law, a Perſon celebrated by the Wits of the Age for his ſhining Parts and Learning, as well as his Skill in his Profeſſion; who ſuddenly dy'd in the fifty ſeventh Year of his Age, when he was juſt nominated Lord Chief Juſtice of England. Dr. John Goſlyn, Maſter of Caius Colledge in Cambridge, and the King's Profeſſor of Phyſick; a general Scholar, an admirable Phyſician, and a publick Benefactor to his Colledge; who dy'd when he was a ſecond time Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity. Laſtly, Mr. Edmund Gunter, Aſtronomy Profeſſor of Greſham Colledge, a Perſon fam'd for his Skill in the Mathematicks, and juſtly to be remember'd by late Poſterity, for his many uſeful Inventions, as well as practical Performances.

An unfortunate War with France.

The Cauſes of it.

VII. I. The King had been unſucceſsful in all his main Deſigns, eſpecially in the War againſt Spain; but this Year, when all Means ought to have been us'd to extinguiſh that Flame, he found himſelf involv'd in a new and precipitate War againſt France: So that at once he was ingag'd with the two great Monarchs of Europe, when his own Monarchical Government ſeem'd to be in diſpute at home. There were ſeveral remote Steps and Cauſes of this War; but it was chiefly hurry'd on by the Power and Paſſion of the Duke of Buckingham, who had great Reſentments againſt the French Court, and againſt Cardinal Richlieu in particular, who had caus'd the French King to deny him Admittance as an Ambaſſador. Upon which the Duke, having alſo been diſappointed in his high Amour, is ſaid to have ſworn in a Rage, That ſince he was hinder'd entering France in a peaceable Manner, he wou'd force his Paſſage with an Army. The King's firſt Diſobligation to France was the Miſ-employing the ſeven Engliſh Ships againſt the Proteſtants of Rochelle, when by ſolemn Treaty they were lent only to aſſiſt upon the Coaſts of Italy; which caus'd his Majeſty to demand a Reſtitution of the Ships, and a Reaſon why they were employ'd againſt the Rochellers. The French King juſtify'd his Proceedings by the Neceſſity of his Affairs, and made peculiar Excuſes againſt a preſent Reſtitution. The Ships having been diſhonourably employ'd, and injuriouſly detain'd, the Duke, as Lord Admiral, by Command, made a Repriſal, by ſeizing the St. Peter of Newhaven, and other French Merchants; which provok'd the King of France not only to refuſe the Return of the ſeven Ships, but to lay an Arreſt upon the Engliſh Merchants Goods in his Dominions, to the Value of three hundred thouſand Pounds. Theſe Feuds were thought to be induſtriouſly improv'd by the Emulation between the two prime Miniſters of both Nations, the Duke and the Cardinal. But however upon Reaſons of State, the two Kings and Brothers were reconcil'd; and ſome Satisfaction being made to the French Merchants, the Engliſh Ships were reſtor'd, and the Goods releas'd the laſt of May, 1626; which ſeem'd to make up a perfect Amity between the two Crowns.

The Inſolence of the Queen's Family.

But ſeveral Diſtaſtes and Jealouſies were ſtill remaining; and both Courts were diſpos'd to a Rupture upon every ſmall Occaſion. Theſe caus'd the King and the Duke to be more jealous of the Queen's Family, as ſending Intelligence, and ſpreading Reports, and doing other ill Offices between the two Nations. It had been unhappily agreed by the Articles of Marriage, that the Queen ſhou'd chuſe her own Servants, of her own Country and Religion; and in particular, ſhou'd have a certain number of Prieſts for her Houſhold Chaplains, together with a Biſhop, who ſhou'd exerciſe all Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in Matters of Religion. Theſe being courted by the Engliſh Papiſts, and ſtrongly ſupported by the Queen's Favour, had Opportunities of being highly ſerviceable to their own Country, and the Romiſh Religion; which increas'd to ſuch an inſolent Forwardneſs, as excited the Queen to ſuch Courſes as created great Diſtaſtes and Unkindneſſes between the King and herſelf. For which his Majeſty repreſented his Uneaſineſs to his Brother of France; imputing all to the crafty and evil Counſels of the Queen's Domeſticks, contrary to her own Inclinations; therefore declar'd, 'he ‘ wou'd no longer bear with the known Cauſers and Fomenters of this Diſturbance : That he cou'd give many Inſtances of their rude Behaviour, but thought one might ſuffice, That without his Knowledge they had made his Royal Conſort walk to Tyburn, there to pay her Devotions ; an Action that cou'd have no greater Invective, than the bare Relation. In ſum, they had ſo much abus'd his Patience, and affronted his Perſon, that he wou'd no longer ſuffer it.

Theſe behaving themſelves more like Miſſionaries than Domeſticks, they caus'd great Diſorders, and rais'd no ſmall Clamours among the Diſaffected to the Court. Therefore, not long after the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, the King, attended by the Duke, and ſeveral of his Nobility, repair'd to Somerſet-Houſe, and commanding the Appearance of all the Queen's Servants, he freely told them, He was driven to that Extremity, as perſonally to acquaint them, that he deſir'd their Return into France : That tho' the Deportment of ſome had been inoffenſive, yet others had ſo abus'd and affronted him, that he neither cou'd nor wou'd any longer endure it. The Biſhop of Mende and Madam St. George, who had been the greateſt Offenders, began to make their Apologies; but the King turn'd from them, ſaying only, I name none, but I tell you my Reſolution. As ſoon as the Queen heard of this ſudden Change, ſhe fell into a furious Paſſion, upbraided his Majeſty with the utmoſt Diſaffection to her, and flew into great Indecencies in Words and Actions. He us'd the moſt tender and obliging ways to pacifie her; but when he had try'd all gentle Perſuaſions, he inſiſted upon his Authority, and bad her be ſatisfied, for it muſt be ſo. About a hundred and twenty were diſmiſs'd, and ſent into France ; which, with other Matters, was ſo reſented by the Dutcheſs of Chevreaux, a ſubtle and intriguing Lady, that joining with Cardinal Richlieu, ſhe afterwards became one of the greateſt Embroilers of the Engliſh Affairs, even to the Ruin of the King, as the French themſelves acknowledge. This was thought ſome Indignity to a Daughter of France, and a great Hardſhip upon the Servants, tho' they receiv'd Wages and Gratuities to the Value of twenty two thouſand eight hundred Pounds; but, beſides the Juſtneſs of the Provocation, it was no more than what the French King had done before in diſcharging all the Spaniſh Courtiers which his Queen had brought with her. However there was this happy Conſequence, that, after this Set of Creatures were remov'd, the Queen, who really had been a very ill and troubleſome Wife, became much more obliging and obedient ; ſo that at length no Couple were more mutually endearing than they.

The King diſmiſſes all the Queen's Attendants.

Theſe Inlets towards a Breach with France were much widen'd by an Abbot, now in Diſ-favour with Cardinal Richlieu ; but the King ſent over the Lord Carleton to the French Court, to give Notice of this Action, and to prevent all hard Conſtructions of it. The French King immediately declar'd his ill Reſentments of it, and complain'd of an expreſs Violation of the Marriage-Articles ; and for a preſent Act of Hoſtility, ſeiz'd upon a hundred and twenty Engliſh Ships that then were in his Ports and Havens. Upon which the King of England publiſh'd a Declaration of War againſt France, which, as the Lord Clarendon intimates, had only the Name of the Duke of Buckingham to it, who was both Admiral and General. The Grounds expreſs'd were, 1. ‘ That the Council of France had obſtructed the Landing of Count Mansfield's Army, contrary to Promiſe ; with whom the French ſhou'd have join'd for the Recovery of the Palatinate. 2. That the King of France, contrary to the Articles with his Proteſtant Subjects, had block'd up their Towns, Garriſons and Forts. 3. That the French King had committed an Example of great Injuſtice in full Peace, by ſeizing the Engliſh Ships, with all their Merchandize and Artillery.’ Thus an unhappy War began with France, in a moſt unhappy Seaſon, the preceding Year ; but did not forceably break out 'till the preſent Year 1627.

The Declaration of War againſt France.

2. The War againſt Spain had been manag'd without immediate Hazard to the Duke of Buckingham, but this againſt France was left wholly to his own perſonal Command ; which caus'd the People to be more indifferent as to the Succeſs. He had only one Advantage againſt many Impediments ; and this was the plauſible Pretext of fighting for the Proteſtant Religion, which gave him a fair Proſpect of retrieving what was loſt in the Expedition againſt Cadiz. For which Purpoſe he was made Commander in Chief over the Fleets and Armies, to conduct and employ them according to the private Inſtructions he ſhou'd receive from the King, and to advance to the Order of Knighthood ſuch Perſons as he in his Diſcretion ſhou'd think fit.

Buckingham made Chief Commander.

His Expedition for the Relief of Rochelle.

With theſe full Powers the Duke ſet Sail from Portſmouth upon the twenty ſeventh Day of June, with a Fleet conſiſting of a hundred Sail of Ships, Men of War and others, and ſix or ſeven thouſand Land-Soldiers. Towards the End of the next Month he appear'd with great Show before the Town of Rochelle, and ſent a Meſſage to the Inhabitants to have them join with him in the Relief of the oppreſs'd Proteſtants in France. But the Rochellers, who had been ſo importunate for the coming of the Engliſh, were now afraid of their Appearance, and unexpectedly ſhut their Gates againſt them. Upon this Surpriſe the Duke ſent Sir William Beecher, accompany'd by the Duke of Sobiez, who with ſome Difficulty were admitted into the Town. The Magiſtrates, for their more ſolemn Reception, call'd an Aſſembly, in which Sir William repreſented to them, ‘ That the Duke of Buckingham was arriv'd with a great Fleet and Army, which his Royal Maſter out of Commiſeration had ſent to their Aſſiſtance, to require from the French King the Performance of the late Articles made by his Mediation, on Behalf of the Proteſtants of France. Declaring, if they refus'd this Deliverance, he proteſted before God and Man, his Maſter was clear'd of all Engagements for their Relief, both upon Honour and Conſcience.’ This was ſeconded by the earneſt Solicitations of their Friend and Country-Man, the Duke of Sobiez ; but the Magiſtrates and chief Men were ſo poſſeſs'd with the Fear of the French King's Army, them marching againſt them, and many ſo aw'd by a Party in the Town, that they durſt give no other Anſwer than, ‘ Rendering their hearty Thanks to his Majeſty of Great-Britain, and the Duke of Buckingham ; but they were bound by Oath of Union to act nothing without the common Conſent of the reſt of their Proteſtant Brethren in France. Therefore, after repeated Thanks and Prayers, they deſir'd Suſpence and Forbearance, 'till they had ſent to the reſt of the Proteſtant Towns, who were in Union with them.’ This was the main Step towards their own Deſtruction ; and the French Hiſtorians obſerve, That the want of Union among themſelves, was one of the principal Cauſes of the Ruin of the Proteſtant Party.

The Rocheller's ill Management.

Before the Departure of Sobiez from the Engliſh Fleet, it was debated upon which of the two Iſlands the Duke of Buckingham ſhou'd land his Men, Oleran, or Rhee. It was determin'd for the former, as moſt feaſible, tho' the latter was moſt conſiderable, and better provided. However in his Abſence, the Duke alter'd his Reſolution, directed his Courſe to the Iſle of Rhee, and upon the thirtieth of July ſtood near the Shore. The next Day he order'd a Squadron of twelve Ships to lye before the Mouth of Port Brelen, falling down with the reſt of the Fleet to the Port de la Pree ; againſt which they thunder'd with their Cannon, ſtill making their Approaches nearer to the Land. Thoiras, Governor of the Iſle, highly alarm'd, march'd out from the Cittadel of St. Martin, with his whole Power, to prevent the Engliſh from landing: But under the Cover of their own Cannon, the braveſt of the Engliſh Officers, Sir John Burroughs, Sir Alexander Bret, Sir Charles Rich, with Monſieur St. Blanchard, went firſt on Shore, follow'd and ſupported by twelve hundred Men. The Enemy having a thouſand Horſe and Foot, beſides Voluntiers, immediately advanc'd towards the Engliſh ; there began a very warm Encounter, in which were ſlain Sir William Heyden, and many of the Engliſh, with Monſieur Blanchard, a Proteſtant Agent from the Duke of Rhoan ; and on the French Side the Governor's Brother, the Baron of Chuntal, and ſome others. The total that fell on both Sides were reckon'd at about nine hundred, of which the Enemy bore the greateſt Share.

The Duke lands in the Iſle of Rhee.

By ſeveral Advances at length the Engliſh forc'd the Enemy to retreat, and gain'd room for their whole Army to land. The Governor retir'd with his wounded Men to the Cittadel of St. Martin's ; and if the Engliſh had immediately purſu'd, in probability they had been ſoon Maſters of the Place, and the whole Iſle. The Fort la Pree near the Landing-place, and meanly provided, was alſo ſlighted or neglected, when the eaſie Reduction of it wou'd have beſt prevented the landing of French Succours, and was moſt proper to ſecure a Retreat for the Engliſh. But five Days being unaccountably ſpent before the Engliſh Army mov'd, Thoiras had opportunity both to fortifie the Cittadel of St. Martin's, and to ſend to the French Court for Supplies. It is certain the Court was in a great Conſternation upon this Engliſh Invaſion : The King fell ſick, as if by the Impreſſion of the ill News, and ſent Orders to give the Proteſtants honourable Terms, if they wou'd not join with the Engliſh ; inviting the Head of their Party, the Duke of Rhoan, with great Offers of Money and Honour, to ſecure him from falling in with this great Juncture of Deliverance to his oppreſs'd Brethren. In the mean time the Duke of Buckingham debark'd all his Land-Forces, and ſent Sobiez and Sir William Beecher to Rochelle to ſolicit for Recruits; who by their Intereſt ſoon return'd with five hundred Foot. Upon which the Duke in two Days March advanc'd with his Army before St. Martin's, and publiſh'd a Manifeſto, declaring ‘ his Royal Maſter's Care and Zeal to reſtore the ancient Liberty and Splendor to the Reformed

The French in Conſternation.

‘ed Churches of France; which laudable Deſigns had been ‘perverted near to their Ruin, by a Breach of Promiſe in ‘the French King, who had employ'd the Engliſh Ships ‘againſt Rochelle, &c.

The Duke beſieges St. Martin's

Upon the formidable Approach of the Duke, the French quitted the Town of St. Martin's, and retir'd into the Cittadel, which the Duke cloſely inveſted: And raiſing Intrenchments, and Batteries, he fir'd upon the Fort, and continu'd the Siege for about three Months together; when it's believ'd he might have ſtarv'd it in leſs Time, if he had ſtop'd up a Well within his Trenches, from which the Enemy had their ſecret Draught of Water, during the whole Siege. Before this unfortunate Place the Engliſh endur'd great Fatigue and Loſs; and more eſpecially ſuffer'd in the Death of that great and gallant Soldier Sir John Burroughs, who was ſlain on the twentieth of September, with a Muſquet Ball from the Cittadel, while he was viewing the Engliſh Works. His Body was brought over, and honourably interr'd at Weſtminſter.

Sir John Burroughs ſlain.

Murmurs at home.

3. This Siege, proving tedious and ineffectual, occaſion'd many Cenſures and clamorous Reports in England. Some murmur'd that the Duke had receded from the Opinion of Sobiez, and landed in the wrong Iſland; others ſaid his Landing was more a Feint than a hearty Attempt; that he was not expeditious in his Motions, nor did he take the Fort la Pree; nor was he now in earneſt beſieging St. Martin's, ſince many Preſents and Compliments had continually paſs'd between him and the Governor. Some freely declar'd their Minds, and cry'd There muſt be a Parliament; That ſome muſt be ſacrific'd, and Biſhop Laud as ſoon as any. Theſe threatning Speeches caus'd that Prelate to acquaint the King with them, who made this Reply to him, I deſire you not to trouble your ſelf with any Reports, till you ſee me forſake my other Friends. But under theſe Perplexities the King reſolv'd to ſend a Squadron of Ships with Recruits of Men, Ammunition and Proviſions to the Army at Rhee; and appointed the Earl of Holland to take them into his Charge, tranſport and conduct them to the Iſland, and deliver them to the Duke of Buckingham. Some Recruits indeed, to the Number of ſixteen hundred Engliſh and Iriſh, were ſent before, and arriv'd about the End of September, but before that Time the French had got into the Harbour, and reliev'd the Cittadel with Proviſions in ſight of the Engliſh Fleet and Army; which ſupported them for ſome Time.

Recruits ſent.

The Arrival of the freſh Recruits of the Engliſh extreamly diſcourag'd the Governor Thoiras, who was in great Pain how to ſend Intelligence to the French Court. At laſt one Sandgrine ventur'd out, and eſcaping the Guard, got ſafe to the King; but to repair his Miſcarriage Thoiras prevail'd with three of his Garriſon to ſwim over to the main Continent; of whom one got ſafe to Land, and deliver'd his Meſſage of the low Condition of the Garriſon.

The French King comes againſt Rochelle.

The French King at this Allarm drew down his Army toward Rochelle, forming a ſort of a Blockade, as if he deſign'd to take that Town; when his preſent Intention was by that Means to land Forces in Rhee, and throw in Proviſions into the Cittadel of St. Martin's. This formidable Approach open'd the Eyes of the Rochellers, and caus'd them to ſee their former Error in refuſing to join with the Engliſh at firſt. So that now they publiſh'd a Manifeſto, and declar'd for England; and the Duke of Rhoan gave Commiſſions to raiſe Forces to aſſiſt the Engliſh in Preſervation of the Edict of Peace lately granted, and ſince violated by the King of France. On the other Side the King made publick Declaration, That he wou'd on his Part obſerve the ſaid Edict of Peace; and proclaim'd the Duke of Rhoan, and his Brother Sobiez, to be Traytors, and offer'd Rewards to ſuch as ſhou'd kill them.

By this Time the French had obtain'd a great Supply of Shipping from the Spaniards, which with their own, amounted to above a hundred Sail. This was ſuperior in Number to the Engliſh, yet ſtill they declin'd Engaging, and only propos'd to throw ſufficient Proviſions into the Cittadel, and tire out the Beſiegers. To carry on the Deſign, Thoiras ſeem'd to enter into a Treaty of Surrender upon honourable Terms; and prevail'd with the Duke for ſafe Conduct for a Meſſenger to be ſent to the French King for leave to retire with Honour. The Duke conſented, upon Condition that an Engliſh Gentleman ſhould accompany the ſame Meſſenger, and be allow'd to paſs through France into England; but arriving at the Court, in open Breach of Faith, the Engliſh Gentleman was ſecur'd, while the Agent of Thoiras perform'd his Meſſage effectually. Thoiras manag'd this Sham-Treaty, and protracted Time, till he gain'd the Point of receiving a conſiderable Relief of Men and Proviſions; and then broke off the Treaty in Deriſion, ordering his Men upon the Walls to advance their Pikes with Mutton and Fowl upon the Heads of them, to reproach the Beſiegers with their unexpected Plenty. And they were further animated with News of the French landing more Forces at a Place call'd the Meadow-Caſtle, which had been fatally neglected by the Engliſh; againſt whom the Duke ſent out a ſtrong Detachment, leaving his Trenches unguarded. Upon which Advantage the Enemy ſally'd out of the Citadel, and got Poſſeſſion of the deſerted Trenches; ſo that when the Engliſh, after ſome Succeſs, had forc'd the new Recruits to ſhelter themſelves under the Cannon of the Citadel, upon their Return they were oblig'd to diſpute the Recovery of their Trenches, to the Loſs of many Lives, before they cou'd regain them.

Succours ſent into St. Martin's.

Under theſe diſcouraging Circumſtances, in the Middle of October the Duke call'd a Council of War, and thought it convenient to decamp and re-imbark for England; and communicated his Reaſons to Sobiez, That the Seaſon was declining, his Army diminiſh'd, his Proviſions conſum'd, and his Officers inclinable to retire. But Sobiez earneſtly diſſuaded the Duke, alledging, that the Relief brought to the Beſieged was inconſiderable; the Earl of Holland's Fleet was advancing with Supplies; and the Retreat wou'd draw after it the Loſs of Rochelle, and bring an irreparable Diſhonour to the King of England. Upon which Inducements the Duke continu'd the Siege, and ſhortly after reſolv'd to ſtorm the Citadel and Outworks: Accordingly on November the Sixth, for a laſt Effort, a general Aſſault was made; but after the Loſs of many Men, the Place was found provided and inacceſſible. This Repulſe, with the News of more French Forces continually pour'd into the Iſland, made the Duke reſolve to raiſe the Siege, and return home. So on the eighth of the ſame Month he was conſtrain'd to break up the Siege, to the great Detriment of his Reputation; and the French Writers ſay, that he had three Months beſieg'd a Fort, which before a well-commanded Army wou'd not have held out eight Days.

The Siege rais'd.

The Duke retreats.

But the Duke cou'd not eſcape with a bare ſingle Retreat; For upon the firſt Motions of ſuch a Deſign, the Enemy appear'd, equal in Foot, and far ſtronger in Horſe, ready to fall upon the Engliſh Rear. The Duke ſeveral times drew up the Army in their March, and bravely made a Stand to offer Battel; but the cautious French declin'd an open Battel, having projected a greater Advantage with leſs Hazard. For when the Engliſh in their Retreat had enter'd a narrow Cauſe-way, lin'd on both ſides with Salt-Pits and deep Ditches, which had been too much neglected by the Engliſh, the French took this Advantage, and fell with great Fury upon the Engliſh Horſe, who preſs'd their Foot into extraordinary Diſorder, and made the Crowd ſo tumultuous upon the Bridge, that great Numbers were drown'd in the River, beſides many that were plung'd into the Salt-Pits, and many falling by the Sword. Yet the Engliſh, who had paſs'd the Bridge with great Reſiſtance and Courage, rally'd again, and drew up to fight their purſuing Enemy; who being afraid of any equal Terms, barely repaſs'd the Bridge, which the Engliſh guarded with a ſelect Party all Day, and burnt it down at Night; and, without farther Impediment from the Enemy, were put on Board the next Day. The Engliſh are ſaid to have loſt fifty Officers, near two thouſand Common Soldiers, thirty five Priſoners of Note, and forty four Colours, which were hung up as Trophies in the Church of Noſtre Dame in Paris. Sanderſon makes the Loſs to be leſs, but L'Eſtrange gives us this Account; who farther adds, That the King of France in a Bravery diſmiſt the Priſoners, as a kind Token to his Siſter the Queen of England: And when the Lord Mountjoy offer'd a large Sum for his Ranſom, the King told him, his Redemption ſhould only be a Couple of Engliſh Hounds; which was thought to be a Slight upon his Lordſhip, who had got more Diſhonour in the Retreat than any other Commander: For having his Troops charg'd in the Rear, he broke in upon the Engliſh, and made ſuch terrible Confuſion, that Sir Charles Rich is reported to have cry'd out, Kill him! kill him! tho' he be my Brother.

The Engliſh Sufferers.

Upon the Duke's weighing Anchor to retire, the French with an Air of Serious̄neſs ſaid, Tho' the Duke cou'd not take the Citadel of St. Martin's, yet it was odds but he wou'd take the Tower of London. However the Duke ſent a civil Promiſe to the Rochellers, that he wou'd come again to their Relief; and immediately ſet Sail for England, where he met the Earl of Holland juſt coming out of Plymouth; who excus'd his Delay with many reaſonable Allegations. But the Duke himſelf had greateſt need of Apologies, who was thought to have behav'd himſelf more like a gallant Courtier than a diſciplin'd Soldier, and who had gone out a hated Favourite, and return'd an unfortunate General. All he had to plead, was his acting by the Advice of a Council of War, and his want of timely Supplies. Yet ſome ſay he behav'd himſelf bravely: But whatever others ſaid of him, the King receiv'd him with full Favour and Affection, and only told him, He was glad to find the Loſs not ſo great as Sir Sackvil Crow had repreſented in a Letter to him. But the King's Indulgence augmented the popular Reſentments; ſo that all Tongues and Pens were ſharpned againſt this inglorious Expedition; and the Pulpit it ſelf could not be reſtrain'd from ſome Reflections upon it. And indeed the Loſs and Diſhonour produc'd ſuch a general Conſternation over the Face of the Nation, as if all the Armies of France and Spain were united together, and had cover'd the Land. The Cry of the People was ſo great, and the King's Neceſſities ſo preſſing, that every Man ſaid a Parliament muſt be call'd, to prevent the Powers of two neighbouring Kings, who were ready to over-run them. The Citizens murmur'd againſt a viſible Decay of Trade; the Merchants were diſcourag'd from building of Ships; the Mariners came in Multitudes to White-Hall clamouring for their Pay; Land-Soldiers were kept up, Soldiers were billeted, and Martial Law exercis'd. In ſum, the Duke was univerſally deteſted; and upon his Account every Grievance or Misfortune was aggravated, and repreſented in the moſt hideous Manner.

Loud Clamours againſt this Expedition.

Other Diſcontents.

4. During the time of this unhappy Expedition abroad, ſeveral unpopular things were tranſacted at home, which added to the general Diſcontent. Many Gentlemen ſtood committed for refuſing to comply with the Demands of the Loan; and being brought before the Council, were re-manded to ſeveral Priſons. In particular, Sir John Elliot, a Priſoner in the Gate-houſe, had his Petition for Diſcharge rejected. Sir Peter Hayman, upon refuſing Complyance to the Loan, was commanded by the Council to go upon his Majeſty's Service in the Palatinate, to which he was obedient. Many of the like Sufferers, upon Return of a Habeas Corpus, were deny'd Bail; which occaſion'd great Struggles, and Variety of Pleadings.

Archbiſhop Abbot diſgrac'd.

But what particularly increas'd the Diſguſts of one Party, was the Diſgrace of Archbiſhop Abbot, who was ſequeſter'd both from his Office and Juriſdiction. Being grown very infirm and unactive, and, as many thought, uſeleſs and unfit for his Station, Advantage was taken againſt him upon the Account of Dr. Sibthorp's Sermon, formerly mention'd; which was preſented to the Duke, and recommended to the King, to incourage the Publiſhing of it. The Biſhop of London politickly declin'd the Licenſing, or purpoſely threw the Temptation upon the Archbiſhop, to whom a Copy was brought by Mr. Murrey, requiring his Approbation and Licence in the King's Name. The Archbiſhop made Exceptions to ſeveral Paſſages, and begg'd of the Meſſenger to acquaint his Majeſty with the Reaſons why he cou'd not give his Imprimatur. A few Days after, Mr. Murrey return'd, and told the Archbiſhop, His Majeſty wou'd inſiſt upon it; and upon his ſtill waving the matter, another Meſſage was brought him by the ſame Perſon, That if he did not diſpatch it, the King wou'd take ſome other Courſe with him. Upon this his Grace put his Objections into Writing, and ſent them to the King, which were communicated to Biſhop Laud, and three other Biſhops, in whoſe Names an Anſwer to the Exceptions was drawn up, and ſent by Mr. Murrey to Lambeth: But no Arguments or Authority cou'd prevail with him to licence the Sermon; which was ſoon after licenced by the Biſhop of London. This was ſo far reſented at Court, that on July the fifth the Lord Conway was ſent to Croyden, to inform him, It was his Majeſty's Pleaſure he ſhou'd withdraw himſelf to Canterbury, and ſhould not hereafter meddle with the High Commiſſion. The Archbiſhop deſir'd he might rather retire to his Houſe at Foard; which the King readily aſſented, and allow'd convenient Time for his Removal. The Report of this Hardſhip brought him more Viſiters to take their leave of him, to ſuch Degrees of Popularity, that the Court was further incens'd againſt him; and making no Submiſſion in his Retirement, he was upon the ninth of October ſequeſter'd from his Juriſdiction, and his Authority transferr'd to the Biſhops of London, Durham, Rocheſter, Oxford, and Bath and Wells. The Reaſon alledg'd was his Inability of Perſonal Attendance; but the Archbiſhop publiſh'd a particular Narrative of his Diſgrace and Circumſtances, from whence this is taken; in which he bears very hard both upon the Duke of Buckingham and Biſhop Laud.

His Authority transferr'd.

What further increas'd the Troubles of the Nation, and the Perplexities of the King, was the deplorable Condition of the Rochellers, who after the Departure of the Engliſh were ſoon reduced to great Staits both by Sea and Land; who made piteous Complaints, and ſent moving Petitions for preſent Relief. But alas! they were not reduc'd to much greater Neceſſities by their Prince, than the Engliſh King was by his People, and his exigent Affairs. In this unhappy State, Sir Robert Cotton, the famous Antiquary, was call'd before the King and Council to deliver his Opinion in point of Hiſtory and Law, upon the preſent Juncture, which he did in a judicious Speech, concluding with the Neceſſity of calling a Parliament. Upon which, and the like Conſiderations, repreſented to the King, on the twenty ninth of January, it was reſolv'd in Council for a Parliament to meet on the ſeventeenth of March. And to prepare the way, Warrants were ſent into all Counties to releaſe the impriſon'd Gentry for the Buſineſs of the Loan; by which there were ſet at Liberty twenty four Knights, fifteen Eſquires, and thirty two Gentlemen and Citizens, that were confin'd to ſeveral Priſons, or in the Hands of Meſſengers. One Effect of their Liberty was, that as ſoon as the Writs came down to the Counties and Boroughs, theſe Sufferers were moſt in the Peoples Eſteem to be elected Members, as the beſt Patriots for their Country's Rights and Liberties. The like gracious Orders were iſſu'd from the Council to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, to uſe great Moderation in demanding the Loans from thoſe Citizens who had deferr'd a Compliance with it. And among other ſoftning Methods, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury was reſtor'd, and with him the Earl of Briſtol, and the Biſhop of Lincoln, who had lain under peculiar Hardſhips, had by expreſs Direction their Writs ſent to them to ſit in the Houſe of Peers this enſuing Parliament.

A new Parliament reſolv'd upon.

Some diſobliging Meaſures.

Notwithſtanding theſe ſmooth Preparations, the Nation being in a Ferment, and Things not like to be well weigh'd, ſome unhappy Meaſures were taken, that ſerv'd to renew the Popular Fears and Jealouſies: For immediately after the Parliament Writs, a Privy-Seal was granted to Philip Burlemach, a Dutch Merchant, to receive thirty thouſand Pounds from the Treaſury, to be return'd into the Netherlands to Sir William Balfour and John Dalbier, for the raiſing of a thouſand German Horſe, with Arms, to be ſent into England within a Month; which, tho' a neceſſary Preparation for the King's Foreign Engagements, was ſuſpected by the People as a Deſign of a ſtanding Army: And the more, becauſe the King, near the ſame Time, granted a Commiſſion to twenty three Lords and others, to raiſe Money by Impoſitions in the Nature of Exciſe. And the levying of Ship-Money upon the ſeveral Counties was then under Debate in the Council; as if Methods were concerted to ſubſiſt without Parliaments, if the next ſhou'd refuſe to grant Suplies.

A ſet of Jeſuits diſcover'd.

An Accident happen'd alſo about this time, which occaſion'd great Rumous, which was a Diſcovery of a Society of Popiſh Recuſants at Clerkenwell, moſt of them Jeſuits; among whoſe Papers was found a Copy of a Letter written to their Rector at Bruſſels, upon the Subject of the enſuing Parliament; in which they thus expreſs themſelves--- We hope as much in this Parliament, as ever we fear'd any in Queen Elizabeth's Days------We have made great Uſe of this Anarchical Election, and prejudicated and anticipated the great One, that none but the King's Enemies and His are choſen of this Parliament.-------Now we have planted that Sovereign Drug Arminianiſm, which we hope will purge the Proteſtants from their Hereſie------The Materials are the Projectors and Beggars of all Ranks, to introduce a new Form of Government which is Oligarchy--------We have ſo handled the Matter, that both Duke and Parliament are irreconcilable.----- I cannot but laugh to ſee how ſome of our own Coat have accoutred themſelves: You wou'd ſcarce know them if you ſaw them, and 'tis admirable how in Speech and Geſture they act the Puritans. The Senſe of the Letter was to ſhew their Hope of Diviſion among the Proteſtants; and the Diſcovery of it did unhappily ſerve to promote the Argument of it: For it encreas'd the Apprehenſions between Church-man and Puritan, and between the Court and Country.

Thus ſtood the Publick Affairs before the Meeting of the new Parliament; but for a Concluſion of this Period, beſides Sir John Burroughs formerly mention'd, we ſhall take Notice of the Deaths of four Men worthy of Remembrance; as firſt, Dr. Nicholas Felton, a Cantabrigian and Biſhop of Ely, a particular Friend of the great Biſhop Andrews, a profound Scholar, and painful Preacher, ſufficiently conſpicuous for his Hoſpitality and Charity, and happy in the wiſe Choice of all his Curates and Chaplains. After him follow'd Mr. John Day, a venerable Divine, Miniſter of Thirlow in Suffolk, a Perſon of great Reading, and admirably well vers'd in the Fathers, School-men and Councils; a plain Man, a primitive Chriſtian, and as it were wholly compos'd to do good in his Function. Next was Dr. Matthew Gwinne, Medicine Profeſſor of Greſham, and one of the College of Phyſicians, a conſiderable Traveller and Linguiſt, and noted for Poetry, Philoſophy, and Humanity, as well as Skill in his own Profeſſion of Phyſick, which render'd him highly valuable in the City of London. Laſtly, Sir John Hayward, Doctor of Law, and King James's Hiſtoriographer at Chelſea-College, a Perſon learned, and better read in Theological Writings, than in thoſe of his own Profeſſion; yet ſtill is to be remember'd here for his Writing the Reigns of King Henry the IVth, and King Edward the VIth, with ſome other Tracts, tho' his Stile is thought to be a little too pungent and dramatical for an Hiſtorian.

The Death of Biſhop Felton,

Mr. Day,

Doctor Gwinne,

And Sir John Hayward.

The King's Speech.

Months, the King's Third Parliament met at Weſtminſter upon Monday the ſeventeenth Day of March. Biſhop Laud preach'd the Sermon upon Unity; and his Majeſty in his Speech to both Houſes in clear Terms told them, ‘ That theſe Times were for Action, therefore hop'd they wou'd not ſpend their Time unneceſſarily, not to ſay dangerouſly; ſince now tedious Conſultations were as hurtful as ill Reſolutions. That common Danger was the Cauſe of this Parliament, and Supply the chief End of it; and if the true Religion, Laws, and Liberties of the State, and the juſt Defence of true Friends and Allies, be not ſufficiently perſuaſive, then no Eloquence of Men or Angels will prevail. That it was his and their Duties to ſeek the Maintenance of the Church and Commonwealth; and there never was a Time, in which this Duty was more neceſſarily requir'd than now. He judg'd a Parliament to be the ancient, ſpeedieſt and beſt way by Supplies to ſecure Themſelves, and to ſave their Friends from immediate Ruin; wherefore if they fail'd in their Duties, he muſt in Conſcience uſe thoſe other Means which God had given him, to ſave what the Follies of particular Men might otherwiſe hazard to loſe. He bad them not to take this as a Threatning, for he ſcorn'd to threaten any but his Equals; but as an Admonition from him who had moſt Care of their Preſervations; and hop'd their Demeanour wou'd be ſuch as ſhou'd oblige him in Thankfulneſs to meet often with them. One thing more he wou'd add, which was, To remember a Thing, to the end we may forget it. That he ſhou'd gladly forget and forgive what was paſt, ſo they wou'd leave the former Ways of Diſtractions, and follow the Counſel lately given them, To maintain the Unity of the Spirit in the Bond of Peace.' This Speech was ſeconded by a longer from the Lord-Keeper Coventry, ‘ Who chiefly labour'd to lay before them the formidable Power of the Houſe of Auſtria, the mighty Preparations made by the King of Spain, the Diſtractions at the preſent in the Low-Countries, the Dangers threaten'd by the French King to the Proteſtants in his Dominions, and the Neceſſity that lay upon his Majeſty to provide for the Support of them, as well as for the Peace and Preſervation of his own Nation: Concluding with ſeveral Reaſons to invite them to aſſiſt their Sovereign with a bountiful and ſpeedy Supply, according to the Exigency of his Affairs.

Sir John Finch Speaker.

The Commons made Choice of Sir John Finch to be their Speaker, who being preſented to the King on the nineteenth of March, made a cuſtomary Speech to be excus'd; but the Choice of the Houſe was approv'd by his Majeſty. Before the Commons enter'd upon any Debates, there was a long bold Letter communicated to the Members, directed To his noble Friends of the Lower Houſe of Parliament, reciting and inveighing againſt many Grievances; and was induſtriouſly diſperſt under the Title of a Speech without Doors, to the augmenting of the preſent Flames. But on the twentieth of March, the Houſe ſettled their grand Committees for Religion, Grievances, Courts of Juſtice and Trade; and alſo drew up a Petition for a ſolemn Faſt, to which the Lords conſented.

Grievances debated.

Two Days after they enter'd upon the Publick Grievances, which were warmly debated; ſuch as Billetting of Soldiers, Loans by Benevolence and Privy Seals, Impriſonment of Men refuſing to lend, and denial of Releaſe upon a Habeas Corpus. The Houſe inclin'd not to ſupply his Majeſty, 'till theſe Grievances were redreſs'd; to which Purpoſe many ſevere Speeches were deliver'd by Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Robert Philips, and others. Sir Benjamin Rudyard ſpoke as a Moderator between King and People, and told them, That this was the Criſis, when they ſhou'd know if Parliaments liv'd or dy'd; wherefore he advis'd, To truſt his Majeſty, and to breed a Truſt in him, by giving him largely, according to his Wants; then humbly proſtrating their Grievances at his Feet. The chief Advocate for the Prerogative was Sir John Cook, Secretary of State, who inſiſted, That they were all as Inhabitants of one Houſe, where each ought to amend ſomething; but if all the Houſe be on Fire, wou'd they then begin to amend, and not rather quench the Flame. He confeſs'd, That illegal Courſes had been taken, and that a Redreſs ſhou'd be made: But he reſolv'd thoſe Courſes into the Law of Neceſſity; declaring, That to offer Grievances before a Supply, wou'd ſeem to Condition with his Majeſty, a wiſe King, jealous of his Honour.

Shortly after the ſame Perſon renew'd the Motion for Supply, as preparatory to the Conſideration of Grievances; inſiſting upon the Neceſſity of Union, by acquainting Them, That the Ambaſſador of France had told his Majeſty, That in the laſt Parliament he had wrought Diviſions between the King and People of England, and was rewarded for it. Other Members argu'd for preferring the Matter of Grievances, declaring, They cou'd have no Thanks for giving, till his Majeſty might ſee they had a Right to give. The next Day the Secretary preſented to the Houſe ſome Propoſitions from the King concerning a Supply; and inform'd them, That as to Aid and Grievances, his Majeſty wou'd not ſtand on Precedence in Point of Honour; but the ſame Committee might conſider both in what Order they pleas'd. Upon which the Houſe reſolv'd Themſelves into a Committee, and made Sir Edward Littleton the Chair-Man. They debated the Grievances relating to the Perſon of the Subject, under ſix Heads; and after many learned Speeches by Mr. Creſwell, Sir Robert Philips, Sir Edward Coke, Mr. Hackwell and Mr. Selden, they unanimouſly Reſolv'd, ‘ 1. That no Free-Man ought to be Impriſon'd, without Cauſe ſhewn, either by the King or Council. 2. That a Habeas Corpus, in that Caſe, ought not to be deny'd. 3. That if no Cauſe of Commitment be return'd, the Party is to be bailed.' Then as to the Property of the Subject in his Goods, they made this grand Reſolve, ‘ That no Tax, of what kind ſoever, ought to be levy'd upon the Subject, without an Act of Parliament.

Reſolves of the Commons.

2. The Commons had proceeded thus far, before the King's Propoſitions for Supply were receiv'd and read, which was upon the twenty ſixth of March. Theſe conſiſted of fourteen in Number, and were all the Particulars of his Majeſty's Wants both by Sea and Land, with all Arrears. But the Debate concerning them was poſtpon'd; and the Commons had a Conference with the Lords about a Petition againſt Popiſh Recuſants, in which both Houſes agreed. This Petition being prepar'd, the King appear'd at the Houſe of Lords, and in a Speech to the whole Parliament he freely declar'd his Approbation of the Thing, and his inviolable Adherence to the Proteſtant Religion; but at the ſame Time urg'd them to a ſpeedy Supply, elſe he ſhou'd not be able to put one Ship to Sea that Year. After this the Clerk read the firſt Article of the Petition, and the Lord-Keeper read his Majeſty's Anſwer to it, and ſo through the whole, which conſiſted of eight Articles, all repreſenting the Dangers of Popery. To all which the pious King gave them direct and full Satisfaction, concluding and declaring, That his Mildneſs towards thoſe of the Popiſh Religion, had been in hopes that Foreign Princes wou'd have us'd the like Moderation to the Proteſtants: But not finding the Fruits of it, he was reſolv'd to add ſome further Severity to what the Petition deſir'd.

A Petition againſt Popiſh Recuſants.

The King's Anſwer.

Upon the ſecond Day of April, the King's Propoſitions for Supply were debated, and Speeches on that Occaſion were made by Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Nathaniel Rich, Sir John Elliot, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir Henry Martin, who ſpoke moſt with ſome Reflexion on the late Managements of War, and ſeem'd averſe to any new Foreign Expeditions. After which the Houſe proceeded to Grievances, and took into Conſideration two other Heads of the Liberty of the Subject in his Perſon, namely Confinement, and Deſignation to Foreign Imployment; and came to this Reſolution, ‘ That no Free-Man ought to be confin'd by the King, Council, or Others, but by Act of Parliament, or due Courſe of Law.' The Day following Mr. Secretary Cook deliver'd a Meſſage from the King, ‘ in which he clear'd the Duke of Buckingham from ſome Words ſuppos'd to have been ſpoken by him in Council, and declar'd, That the Duke was the firſt who perſuaded him to this Parliament; and afterwards declar'd, He counted it his greateſt Glory to be a King of Free-Men, and not of Villains.' After ſome Debates of this Meſſage, the Houſe acknowledg'd that his Majeſty had put a three-fold Obligation upon them, of Satisfaction, Aſſurance and Advice; and therefore promis'd to carry Themſelves like their Progenitors, who were never mark'd for ſtepping too far on the King's Prerogative.

A farther Reſolve.

The next Day Mr. Secretary Cook deliver'd another gracious Meſſage from his Majeſty, to aſſure them of all their Rights and Liberties: And after ſome Debate, the Houſe came to this unanimous Reſolve, That five Subſidies be given to the King; and Mr. Secretary was appointed to acquaint his Majeſty with this Reſolution. This caus'd great Joy and Satisfaction in the Court, and the Duke of Buckingham made a magnificent Speech upon this Occaſion, owning That now the Commons ought to be the Favourites, and He no longer. Three Days after the Secretary reported to the Houſe, ‘ That his Majeſty accepted of the Subſidies, and was pleas'd to ask by how many Voices they were granted? I ſaid but by One; his Majeſty ask'd how many were againſt Him? I ſaid None; for they were voted by one general Voice and Conſent. His Majeſty was much affected with it, and call'd the Lords in Council, where I gave them an Account of what had paſs'd. Beſides it gave his Majeſty no ſmall Content, that tho' five Subſidies be inferior to his Wants, yet it is the greateſt Gift that ever was given in Parliament. And now he ſees by this he ſhall have the Affections of his People, which will be beyond all Value to him. He ſaid he lik'd Parliaments at the firſt, but ſince, he knew not how, he was grown to a diſtaſte of them; but was now where he was before:

Five Subſidies voted.

The King's Satisfaction.

'He loves them, and ſhall rejoyce to meet with his People often.' Mr. Secretary farther acquainted the Houſe with the Duke's Speech, upon the Report of the five Subſidies; which was very pleaſing and popular. Only Sir John Elliot expreſs'd his Diſlike, that the Duke's Name ſhou'd be intermingled with the King's, contrary to the Cuſtom of our Fathers, and the Honour of our Time.

A Conference with the Lords.

3. The Commons having thus far expreſs'd their dutiful Affection towards his Majeſty, now prepar'd to tranſmit their Reſolves to the Lords for their Concurrence; and ſeveral Members were appointed to manage a Conference about the Liberties and Properties of the Subject. Sir Dudley Diggs open'd the whole by way of Introduction; Sir Edward Littleton ſpoke at large upon the Subject of Perſonal Liberty; Mr. Selden inſiſted upon the Precedents in that Matter; and Sir Edward Coke maintain'd the Argument as to the Rational Part of the Law. In ſum, they inſiſted 'That their Reſolutions were confirm'd by Magna Charta and ſix Acts of Parliament, by twelve Precedents in Terms, and thirty one more.' After this, other Grievances were debated in the Houſe of Commons, and a new Diſpute aroſe concerning their Right of Adjournments, occaſion'd by his Majeſty's deſiring them to make no Receſs upon the Eaſter Holydays, That the World might take Notice how earneſt he was for the publick Affairs in Chriſtendom. Secretary Cook mov'd for Expedition in the Vote of Subſidies, and to turn it into an Act: Sir Dudley Diggs ſeconded the Motion; but Sir Thomas Wentworth propos'd a middle Way, which paſs'd into a Reſolution of the Houſe, That Grievances and Supply go hand in hand.

A Supply again urg'd.

The Speaker's Repreſentation.

The next Day Mr. Secretary Cook deliver'd another Meſſage from his Majeſty to haſten the Supply; in which this Paſſage more eſpecially gave Offence, I muſt with ſome Grief tell you, that Notice is taken as if this Houſe preſs'd not upon the Abuſes of Power only, but upon Power it ſelf: This touches the King and Us, who are ſupported by that Power. He was bid to explain what he meant by the Word Power: He anſwer'd, I cannot deſcend to Particulars, or go from that his Majeſty gave me Warrant to deliver. About two Days after he again quicken'd the Buſineſs of the Supply; and after ſome Debate it was order'd 'That a ſpecial Committee of eight Perſons ſhou'd immediately conſult upon the Subſtance of a fair Repreſentation to the King, to be deliver'd on Monday next in a Speech by the Speaker, together with a Petition againſt Billeting of Soldiers. Accordingly on Eaſter Monday the Commons were admitted to the King's Preſence, where the Speaker endeavour'd to ſatisfie his Majeſty in the Manner of their Proceedings, 'That whereas, according to ancient Cuſtom, Parliaments took into Conſideration the common Grievances of the Nation, before they enter'd upon the matter of Supply; yet, for a full Expreſſion of their Zeal and Affection, this Aſſembly, contrary to ordinary Proceedings, had given Precedency to the Supply before the preſent Grievances; only joyning it with thoſe fundamental and vital Liberties of the Kingdom, which give Subſiſtance and Ability to the Subject. Towards the End of his Speech he introduc'd the Petition of the Commons concerning the Billetting of Soldiers. To the Speech and Petition his Majeſty made Reply, That they ſhou'd go on ſpeedily with their Buſineſs, without more Apologies: And to what concern'd their Petition, he wou'd give Anſwer in convenient Time.

The King's Reply.

Debates towards a Petition of Right.

From this Day to Friday the twenty fifth of April, the Houſe in a grand Committee ſpent moſt of their Time in debating about Martial Law; and in holding two Conferences with the Lords, concerning ſome Reſolves in Order to a new Law call'd a Petition of Right, tranſmitted from the lower Houſe to the Upper. Againſt which the King's Serjeant Aſhley argu'd, That the Propoſal of the Commons tended to Anarchy; and that they muſt allow the King to govern by Acts of State; for which the Lords committed him, and he made a Recantation. Another Conference was likewiſe held between the Lords and the Commons; in which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury made a ſmooth and ſoftning Speech, to introduce ſome new Propoſitions from the Upper-Houſe, of the ſame Nature with the Commons Petition of Right, only more reſpectful and ſubmiſſive to the King. Theſe were communicated to the Commons; but they were not ſatisfy'd with them.

The Keeper's Speech.

4. The King finding his Ends and Purpoſe not ſufficiently anſwer'd, on the twenty eighth of April came to the Houſe of Lords, and ſending for the Commons, the Lord-Keeper made a Speech to them to urge a Diſpatch of the Supply without Interruption; and inform'd them That his Majeſty commanded him to let them know, That he held Magna Charta, and other ſix Statutes inſiſted upon, to be all in Force; and aſſures them he will maintain all his Subjects in the juſt Freedom of their Perſons and Eſtates: That he will govern according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm; and that they ſhou'd find as much Security in his Royal Word and Promiſe, as in any Law they cou'd make. This Declaration rais'd ſome Difficulties in the Houſe of Commons, ſome thinking if over-nice to be rigidly debated. Mr. Secretary Cook made a Speech for Reliance on his Majeſty's Royal Word and Promiſe. Sir Benjamin Rudyard mov'd that the Effect of the King's Promiſe might be put into a Bill; and accordingly it was order'd 'That a Committee of Lawyers do draw up a Bill, containing the Subſtance of Magna Charta, and the other Statutes that concern the Liberty of the Subject;' which Buſineſs took up two whole Days. But while this Bill was preparing, Mr. Secretary deliver'd a ſhort Meſſage from his Majeſty, To know whether the Houſe wou'd reſt on his Royal Word or no? Which if they did, he again aſſur'd Them, it ſhou'd be Royally perform'd. This rais'd new Difficulties, and caus'd a Silence in the Houſe, and then two Days Debate; in which Sir Robert Philips freely ſaid, That they were now come to the end of their Journey; and an Anſwer to this Meſſage wou'd give Happineſs or Miſery to the Kingdom. In Concluſion, Sir Thomas Wentworth declar'd, That ſince there had been a publick Violation of the Laws by the King's Miniſters, nothing cou'd ſatisfy but a publick Amends. Which ſo well agreed with the Senſe of the Houſe, that they made it the Subject of a Meſſage to be deliver'd to the King.

A Meſſage to the Commons.

Their Anſwer.

Another Meſſage.

Amidſt theſe Debates, another Meſſage was deliver'd from his Majeſty, 'That Publick Affairs wou'd not endure long Debate or Delay; ſo that this Seſſion muſt continue no longer than ten Days: But upon Diſpatch and good Correſpondence, there ſhou'd be another Seſſion at Michaelmas next, for the perfecting ſuch Things as cou'd not be now done.' Upon this, after a new Debate, the Commons agreed upon an Anſwer to all preceding Meſſages, to be preſented to the King by their Speaker; who humbly beg'd his Majeſty's Leave to lay hold of his gracious Offers, which gave them Aſſurance, That if they thought fit to ſecure themſelves in their Rights and Liberties by way of Bill, he wou'd be graciouſly pleas'd to give way to it. His Majeſty's Reply was deliver'd by the Lord-Keeper, that He expected an Anſwer by their Actions, and not Delay by Diſcourſes. He was content that a Bill be drawn for a Confirmation of Magna Charta, and the other ſix Statutes inſiſted upon, ſo as it be without Additions, Paraphraſes, or Explanations.

The Commons Anſwer.

The King's Reply.

The Commons finiſh their Bill.

On the ſixth of May, Mr. Secretary Cook by another Meſſage preſs'd the Houſe to rely upon the King's Word. This caus'd the Doors to be lock'd up, and was now the more diſpleaſing, becauſe they thought it a little retracting from the late Intimation of the King's good Pleaſure for a Bill. However in two Days the Bill for Petition of Right was finiſh'd, and a Clauſe about Martial Law added to it; which was deliver'd in a Conference to the Lords for their Concurrence. Soon after their Lordſhips deſired another Conference, in which the Lord-Keeper inform'd the Commons, That they had propos'd ſome ſmall Matters to be alter'd, to make the Bill more ſweet and paſſable to his Majeſty; and then he communicated a Letter from the King to the Lords, in which he inſiſted upon ſome Caſes of Commitment ſo tranſcendent as might not be diſcover'd, and which were above the Capacity of the Judges; but ſtill promis'd to govern by Law, and deſir'd Expedition. The Commons were much diſſatisfy'd with this Letter, conceiving the Deſign of it was to defeat their Petition of Right. Shortly after their Lordſhips had another Conference with the Commons, and being more intereſted in the Prerogative, they propos'd an additional Clauſe to be added to the End of the Bill, which was Not to infringe the Sovereign Power. This was chiefly brought in by the Biſhop of Lincoln; but was totally diſlik'd by the Commons, who were againſt any Saving in the Bill, and in a high Debate declar'd, 'That Sovereign Power was no Parliamentary Word, and that there cou'd be no ſuch Thing diſtinct from the Power of the Law, or a legal Prerogative.

They diſagree with the Lords.

Several Conferences.

After this, ſeveral Conferences were held; wherein the Lords offer'd Reaſons for their Amendent, and the Commons for not conſenting to it; upon which Subject Mr. Glanvile and Sir Henry Martin made remarkable Speeches. However, upon the twenty ſixth of May, the Lords at another Conference agreed with the Commons in the Petition of Right, with ſome ſmall Amendments; which being agreed to by the Commons, the Bill was ingroſs'd, read a Third Time, and order'd to be preſented to the King. And in another Conference, two Days after, both Houſes agreed That no Addition or Preface be us'd to the King, but that upon the Preſenting of the Petition, his Majeſty be deſir'd, for the Satisfaction of his People, he will be pleas'd to give his gracious Anſwer in full Parliament. Thus after numerous Debates and Struggles, both Houſes perfected their great Work, the Petition of Right, at the End of ten Weeks.

The Lords and Commons agree in the Petition of Right.

5. The grand Affair being brought to this Iſſue, and the Supply in great Forwardneſs, upon Monday the ſecond of

June

The King's Speech.

June the King came to the Parliament, and made this ſhort Speech to both Houſes: I am come hither to perform my Duty: I think no Man can think it long, ſince I have not taken ſo many Days in anſwering the Petition, as you have ſpent Weeks in framing it. And I am come hither to ſhew you, That as well in formal Things, as in Eſſential, I deſire to give you as much Content as in me lies. Then the Lord-Keeper, recommending the King's Favour to them, deſir'd them to hear their own Petition read; the greateſt Part of which conſiſted of Complaints of great Hardſhips, and References to Magna Charta, and ſeveral former Acts of Parliament. But the Petitioning Part, which was to continue for ever as a Law, runs in theſe Words, ———

The Petition of Right.

That no Man hereafter be compell'd to make or yield any Gift, Loan, Benevolence, Tax, or ſuch like Charge, without common Conſent by Act of Parliament; and that none elſe be call'd to make Anſwer, or take ſuch Oath, or to give Attendance, or be confin'd, or otherwiſe moleſted or diſquieted concerning the ſame, or for Refuſal thereof. And that no Freeman, in any ſuch Manner as is before mention'd, be impriſon'd or detain'd. And that your Majeſty will be pleas'd to remove the ſaid Soldiers and Mariners, and that your People may not be ſo burdened in Time to come. And that all Commiſſions for proceeding by Martial Law, may be revok'd and annull'd; and that hereafter no Commiſſions of like Nature may iſſue forth to any Perſons whatſoever, to be executed as aforeſaid, leſt by colour of them, any of your Majeſty's Subjects be deſtroy'd or put to Death contrary to the Laws and Franchiſe of the Land.

The King's Anſwer to it.

The whole being read, the King's Anſwer was deliver'd in theſe Words: The King willeth, That Right be done according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Realm; and that the Statutes be put in due Execution, that his Subjects may have no Cauſe to complain of any Wrong or Oppreſſion, contrary to their juſt Rights and Liberties, to the Preſervation whereof, he holds himſelf in Conſcience as well oblig'd, as of his Prerogative.

The Commons not ſatisfy'd.

Dr. Manwaring's Puniſhment.

If this had been taken as a free and full Anſwer, it might have caus'd a happy Union of King and Parliament; but ſome of the Members, from the Prefatory Speech, conceiting it to be an extorted Compliance, believ'd the Anſwer to be ſomewhat ſcant and dubious. Therefore when it was read the next Day in the Houſe, many Complaints were made, and Sir John Elliot fell afreſh upon the publick Grievances, and mov'd that a Remonſtrance of them might be made to the King. This was held unſeaſonable by ſome; yet it was ſeconded by Others, and a Committee appointed accordingly. They began with Dr. Manwaring, for his Sermons formerly mention'd, againſt whom Mr. Rouſe had before made very great Complaints to the Houſe. A formal Declaration was made againſt him, and Sentence by the Lords was given, ' That he ſhou'd be impriſon'd, and ' fin'd a thouſand Pounds; That he ſhou'd make a publick Submiſſion; That he ſhou'd be ſuſpended for three ' Years, and be diſabled from holding any Eccleſiaſtical ' Dignity, or Secular Office, and from Preaching at Court; ' and that his Books ſhou'd all be burnt at London, and the two ' Univerſities. According to part of the Sentence, he with Tears in his Eyes upon his Knees humbly crav'd the Pardon of the Lords and Commons, for the Errors and Indiſcretions he had committed in the ſaid Sermons.

High Debates.

The Speaker enjoyns Silence.

In the mean Time the King ſent two Meſſages to the Houſe of Commons, ' prefixing the eleventh of this Month ' as the End of the Seſſion, and requiring them not to enter upon new Buſineſs, which may ſpend Time, or lay ' any Aſperſion upon the Government or Miniſtry. This laſt ſerv'd but to augment their Fears and Jealouſies; and they were put into a new and greater Ferment in their Debates. When Sir John Elliot came to that Part of the Meſſage which imply'd their laying Aſperſions upon ſome Miniſters of State, the Speaker roſe from his Chair, and apprehending Sir John was aiming at the Duke, he enjoyn'd him Silence, telling him, There was a Command laid upon him not to proceed. Upon which Sir John ſat down; and Sir Dudley Diggs, in a great Concern, cry'd, Muſt we not proceed? Let us ſit in Silence: We are miſerable, and know not what to do. And there was a profound Silence in the Houſe for a while; till Sir Nathaniel Rich ſaid, We muſt now ſpeak, or for ever hold our Peace. Some objected, That the Speech lately ſpoken by Sir John Elliot had probably given Offence to his Majeſty. Upon which the Houſe voted, ' That every Member was free from any undutiful Speech, from the Beginning of the Parliament to that ' Day: And order'd the Houſe to be turn'd into a Committee, to conſider what is fit to be done for the Safety ' of the Kingdom, and that no Man go out upon Pain of ' being ſent to the Tower; and Mr. Whitby was put in the ' Chair. Only the Speaker obtain'd leave to retire. In this Committee Mr. Wandesford mov'd, That they ſhou'd not fear to make a Remonſtrance of their Rights; and Sir Edward Coke ſpoke out, Let us palliate no longer; if we do, God will not proſper us. I think the Duke of Buckingham is the Cauſe of all our Miſeries; and till the King be inform'd of that, we ſhall never go out, or ſit with Honour. That Man is the Grievance of Grievances. The Houſe agreed upon ſeveral Heads for a Remonſtrance; but while they were putting the Queſtion, Whether the Duke of Buckingham ſhou'd not be declar'd the principal Cauſe of all the preſent Evils, the Speaker brought this Meſſage from the King, That his Majeſty commands for the preſent they adjourn the Houſe till to Morrow Morning, and that all Committees ceaſe in the mean Time. And the Houſe was accordingly adjourn'd; and likewiſe the Houſe of Lords obey'd the ſame Command.

A ſudden Adjournment.

The next Day the Speaker brought a more acceptable Meſſage from the King, declaring his Majeſty's Intentions not to bar them from what has been their Right, but only to avoid all Scandals on his Council and paſt Actions. After ſome Debate, the Commons ſent a Meſſage to the Lords, ' That they wou'd joyn in a humble Requeſt, That a clear ' and ſatisfactory Anſwer be given by his Majeſty, in full ' Parliament, to the Petition of Right. The Lords agreed to it; and the King very obligingly came the next Day to receive it in full Parliament: Which being read, his Majeſty graciouſly reply'd, The Anſwer I already gave, was made with ſo good Deliberation, and approv'd by ſo many wiſe Men, that I concluded it wou'd have given you full Satiſfaction. But to avoid all ambiguous Interpretations, and to ſhew there is no Doubleneſs in my Meaning, I am willing to pleaſure you as well in Words, as Subſtance. Read your Petition, and you ſhall have an Anſwer that I am ſure will pleaſe you. The Petition or Bill was read, and Anſwer was given, Soit droit fait comme il eſt deſire. Then his Majeſty proceeded, This I am ſure is full, yet no more than I granted you in my firſt Anſwer; the Meaning of which was to confirm your Liberties; knowing that you neither mean nor can hurt my Prerogative. My Maxim is, That the People's Liberties ſtrengthen the King's Prerogative, and the King's Prerogative is to defend the People's Liberties. I have done my Part: Wherefore if the Parliament have not a happy Concluſion, the Sin is yours; I am free from it.

The King paſſes the Petition of Right.

A general Joy.

Thus, after many Difficulties and Windings, was obtain'd that famous Law call'd The Petition of Right; a Law eſteem'd next to Magna Charta, yet, as the Earl of Clarendon ſays, of no Prejudice to the Crown; tho' the Court Endeavours to evade it, ſhew'd it was not pleaſing there. Upon the paſſing of it, the Houſe teſtify'd their Joy with a mighty Shout, and immediately the Bells rung, and Bone-Fires were kindled all the City over; every one partaking of the general Satisfaction. And it was ſaid that, upon this happy Agreement, the Lords made Suit to the King to receive into Grace thoſe Lords who were out of Favour, to which he readily comply'd; and admitted the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, the Biſhop of Lincoln, the Earls of Eſſex, Warwick, Briſtol, and the Lord Say to kiſs his Hand.

The Commons make a Remonſtrance.

6. And now there was thought ſuch a fortunate Harmony between the King and Parliament, that Nothing cou'd defeat the Happineſs of either; but it ſeems this laſt Conceſſion, inſtead of cooling the preternatural Heat, inflam'd many of the Houſe of Commons to preſs a little further, and to proceed to finiſh an intended Remonſtrance. And Sir John Strangeways, afterwards a great Royaliſt and Sufferer, unhappily ſaid, Let us perfect our Remonſtrance; for King James was wont to ſay, He knew that by Parliaments, which otherwiſe he could never have known. So in a few Days they compleated their Deſign, and drew up a long Remonſtrance of Grievances, conſiſting of ſix Branches. Impeachments and Remonſtrances are double-edg'd Weapons, which have been always the Diſturbers of Parliaments; and in this it was obſerv'd, that moſt of the Abuſes complain'd of, were either ſecur'd to the Nation, or elſe paſt Remedy, ſuch as the Defeats at Rhee and Rochelle. Yet in Concluſion they ſay, ' Of all theſe Evils and ' Dangers, the principal Cauſe is the Duke of Buckingham's exceſſive Power, and Abuſe of that Power. Therefore they humby ſubmit to his Majeſty's Wiſdom, whether it can be ſafe for Himſelf, or his Kingdom, that ſo ' great Power by Sea and Land, as reſts in him, ſhou'd be ' truſted in the Hands of any one Subject whatever.

The King diſoblig'd.

This prov'd very diſobliging to the King, who having heard it in the Banquetting Houſe, with ſome Indignation told the Commons That he little expected ſuch a Remonſtrance, after he had paſs'd the Petition of Right: However, as to their Grievances, he wou'd conſider of them as they ſhould deſerve. It is ſaid that ſoon after the King order'd a formal Anſwer to be drawn up in Writing to the ſaid Remonſtrance, denying or excuſing the ſeveral Charges in it. But in the mean Time he ſent a peremptory Meſſage by Sir Humphry May that he deſign'd to end the Seſſion on the twenty twenty ſixth Day of June. And that he might appear ready to redreſs every juſt Grievance, he order'd the Lord-Keeper to report in the Upper Houſe, That his Majeſty had cancell'd the Commiſſion of Exciſe, and the Warrant for putting the Seal thereto. And a Meſſage was alſo ſent to the Commons, to ſhew them the ſaid cancell'd Commiſſion and Warrant. This did not ſo ſatisfie, but the Commons proceeded to prepare a Bill for Tonnage and Poundage; and prepare another Remonſtrance, in which they declar'd theſe two main Things, 'First, That there ought to be no Impoſition laid upon the Goods of Merchants, without common Conſent by Act of Parliament. Secondly, that the receiving of Tonnage and Poundage, and other Impoſitions, not granted in Parliament, is contrary to the late Petition of Right.

A ſecond Remonſtrance.

The King's laſt Speech to both Houſes.

When the King was inform'd of this ſecond Remonſtrance, he was reſolv'd to prevent the Delivery of it: Therefore on the appointed Day, June the twenty ſixth, before the Lords cou'd put on their Robes, while the Remonſtrance was reading in the lower Houſe, he ſent for the Speaker and the Commons, and after this Manner ſhew'd his Reſentment. It may ſeem ſtrange I ſo ſuddenly end this Seſſion, before I give my Aſſent to the Bills. I will tell you the Cauſe, tho' I muſt avow, I owe the Account of my Actions to God alone. Not long ago the Houſe of Commons gave me a Remonſtrance, how acceptable any Man may judge; for I am ſure no wiſe Man can juſtifie it. Now ſince I underſtand that a ſecond Remonſtrance is preparing for me, to take away my Revenue of Tonnage and Poundage, one of the chief Maintenances of the Crown, by alledging I have given away my Right to it by my Anſwer to your Petition: This is ſo prejudicial to me, that I am forc'd to end this Seſſion ſome few Hours before I meant it; being unwilling to receive a Remonſtrance, to which I muſt give a harſh Anſwer. And ſince the Houſe of Commons already begins to make a falſe Conſtruction of what I ganted, I will now declare the true Intent of it. The Profeſſion of both Houſes, while they were hammering this Petition, was no ways to trench upon my Prerogative, ſaying they had neither Intention or Power to hurt it: Therefore it muſt be conceiv'd, that I granted no new, but only confirm'd ancient Liberties. Yet to ſhew I neither repent, no mean to recede, I declare, that thoſe things that were done, and were the true Ground of the Petition, ſhall not hereafter be drawn into Example for your Prejudice; and upon the Word of a King you ſhall not have the like Cauſe to complain. But for Tonnage and Poundage, it is a thing I cannot want; and was never intended by you to ask, nor meant by me to grant. I command you all therefore to take Notice of my true Intent and Meaning in granting your Petition; eſpecially you, my Lords the Judges, to whom alone, under me, belongs the Interpretation of Laws: For neither Houſe of Parliament, either joint or ſeparate, have any Power to make or declare a Law, without my Conſent. Then paſſing the Bill of five Subſidies given by the Temporality, and as many given by the Clergy, with above twenty more, publick and private, the Lord-Keeper declar'd this Seſſion to be ended, and that the Parliament be prorogu'd till the twentieth Day of October.

The Parliament prorogu'd.

Thus abruptly did the Parliament break up, after a Seſſion of fourteen Weeks and three Days: In which were ſome of the greateſt mutual Obligations between King and People; yet unfortunately no Satisfaction given on either Side. The King had made the greateſt Conceſſions, and the People had given the greateſt Supplies; yet, by reaſon of the Struggles and Miſunderſtandings between both, the one was left with Uneaſineſs, and the other fill'd with Jealouſies; and all departed with a preſaging Heat and Ferment.

A Fleet ſent to Rochelle,

IX. 1. During this famous Seſſion of Parliament, the diſtreſſed Rochellers were more and more ſtraitned, and almoſt block'd up by the French King and the Cardinal. Still they had a Dependance upon the Word of the Duke of Buckingham, and an Expectance from the Engliſh King and Council, to whom they had made very moving Applications. Upon this Occaſion a Fleet of about fifty Sail were early fitted out, under the Command of the Earl of Denbigh; who, beſides the Mariners, took in, for the Service of a Deſcent, two thouſand two hundred able Land-Men; who ſetting Sail from Plymouth, after the middle of April, came to Anchor at Charleboy in the Road of Rochelle on the firſt of May. He found there twenty Sail of the French King's Ships, riding before the Harbour; and being much ſuperior in Strength and Number, he ſent Advice into the Town, that he wou'd ſink the French Ships, as ſoon as the Wind turn'd Weſt, and caus'd a higher Flood. About the eighth of the ſame Month the Wind and Tide ſerv'd accordingly, when the Rochellers earneſtly expected and ſolicited for that Seaſon of Deliverance. But the Earl, for ſome unknown Reaſon, without taking Advantage of the Opportunity, weigh'd Anchor and ſail'd away, permitting four of the French Ships to purſue as it were the Engliſh Fleet, that arriv'd at Plymouth towards the end of the Month.

With no Succeſs.

Great Complaints.

The Duke of Buckingham blamed.

This other inglorious Expedition ſtruck an exceeding Damp to the diſtreſſed Rochellers, and increas'd the popular Fears and Jealouſies of a Popiſh Intereſt at home: So that many concluded the whole Deſign to be a Feint, and meant rather by the Court Party to reduce Rochelle than relieve it. Some clamour'd againſt the Earl of Denbigh, and ſaid no better Succeſs cou'd be expected from the Brother-in-Law of the Duke of Buckingham. Others imagin'd it to be a Plot in one Clark, a Bed-chamber Man, who had been chief Commiſſioner in both the Expeditions; and being a reputed Papiſt, was ſuppos'd to be imploy'd for an Inſtrument of Miſcarriage. A French Captain in the Engliſh Fleet, call'd La Brun, gave in Depoſitions before the Mayor of Plymouth, which argu'd Treachery, or apparent Cowardiſe, in the Management of the Expedition. Which Account was certify'd by the Mayor to the Burgeſſes of that Town in Parliament, by whom it was communicated to the Council-Table; from whence a Letter was directed to the Duke of Buckingham, as Lord High-Admiral, 'to ſignify his Majeſty's Pleaſure, that the Earl of Denbigh ſhou'd return back to relieve the Town of Rochelle, with the Fleet under his Command, with other Ships prepar'd at Portſmouth and Plymouth. But notwithſtanding this Order of Council, we find no ſuch Return made, nor any Enquiry into the Obſtruction of it. Some of the French Writers are very open and free in charging this, and ſome other Miſcarriages, upon the Duke of Buckingham; and all upon the Account of his extraordinary Amour with Anne of Auſtria, the preſent Queen of France. Between theſe two there was thought to have been a ſecret Correſpondence; and that, either out of Affection to his Perſon, or a Deſign of cauſing Delays in the Expedition, that Princeſs gave him Grounds to hope, that if he wou'd wait with Patience, he might one Day become a happy Lover. But in this nice Affair we cannot preſume to determine poſitively. However the King was moſt earneſt in Behalf of the Rochellers; and in one of his Letters to the Inhabitants he has theſe Words: Aſſure your ſelves, that I ſhall never abandon you; and that I ſhall employ the whole Power of my Kingdom for your Deliverance, until God aſſiſt me to obtain for you an aſſured Peace.

The People's Hatred againſt the Duke.

The City fin'd.

2. Theſe Misfortunes abroad did more and more awaken the Duke of Buckingham's Fate at home, which was now hurry'd on to a black and ſpeedy Determination. The People's Hatred began to be univerſal; ſo that when the Joy was firſt publiſh'd for the paſſing of the Petition of Right, many hop'd that the King had deliver'd up the Duke to be ſent to the Tower, and were ready to pull down the old Scaffold on Tower-Hill, ſaying, His Grace ſhou'd have a new one. A few Days after, one Dr. Lamb, a ſuppos'd Creature of the Duke's, was barbarouſly ſet upon in the Streets of London by the Rabble, and ſo roughly beaten, that he dy'd of his Bruiſes the next Day: And ſome of them were heard to ſay, That were his Maſter the Duke there, they wou'd give him as much. This riotous Murder was the unhappy Cauſe of a wider Breach between the Court and City. For ſoon after the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen were conven'd and examin'd before the Council, and threatned with the Loſs of their Charter, if they did not diſcover and deliver up the principal Criminals; and in Concluſion had a Fine of ſix thouſand Pounds impos'd upon them. The Sufferer was a Man of an impudent ſcandalous Converſation, a reputed Magician, who had been publickly arraigned for practiſing his Infernal Arts upon the Body of the Lord Windſor: And tho' he had no ſpecial Acquaintance with the Duke, yet being aſſaulted upon his Account, he became more apprehenſive of the popular Rage againſt him. And ſome thought it more ominous, becauſe on the ſame Day the Duke's Picture fell down in the High Commiſſion Chamber at Lambeth: Which being related to the Lady Davis, as foreboding ſome Fatality to the Duke, ſhe reply'd, No, his Time is not come till Auguſt.

The Duke's Fears.

Preſages of his Death.

However the Duke, in the latter Part of his Life, began to be fill'd with preſaging Fears and Apprehenſions; which, being incident to Men of his extraordinary Circumſtances, might have render'd him the Object of Men's Pity, rather than their Envy. Sir Henry Wotton tells us, that while he was in the Iſle of Rhee, and at Bed disburdening his Mind to his Secretary Dr. Maſon, he paſſionately proteſted, that neither his Diſpatches to Princes, nor the great Buſineſs of a Fleet, an Army, a Siege, a Treaty of War or Peace, all of them filling his Head at the ſame time, did ever ſo much break his Repoſe, as an Imagination, that ſome about the King at home, of whom he had well deſerv'd, were now content to forget him. The ſame Author alſo, as well as others, doth mention ſome ominous Predictions of this great Man's Fate; but no Story was more remarkable than that related by by the Lord Clarendon, concerning the Appearance of his Father's Ghoſt to an Officer of the King's Wardrobe at Windſor, engaging him three ſeveral times to forewarn his Son of the Dangers that threatned him; at length adding ſome private Tokens, as infallible Credentials of the Certainty of the Apparition. The Story is long and entertaining, and is confirm'd by ſome others, with a few differing Circumſtances. But to gratify and inform the Reader in this uncommon Affair, we ſhall relate the Subſtance of what is ſtill more Authentick, namely, the Account given by Mr. Edmund Windham, a Gentleman of Somerſetſhire, in the Year 1652, and carefully enter'd in a Book then in the Herald's Office in London, chiefly to confute William Lilly's falſe and defaming Narrative of that Matter. The principal Perſon was Mr. Nicolas Towſe, who for ſome time had an Office in Windſor Caſtle, tho' his Houſe was in Biſhop-Gate-ſtreet in London; a virtuous, religious and well-diſpos'd Gentleman, a fine Muſician, and a very good Companion, who gave this Account to the aforeſaid Mr. Windham.

An Account of the Ghoſt that foretold his Death.

One Night, being in Bed, and perfectly awake, with a Light by him, as he uſually had, there came and ſtood by the Bed-ſide an old Gentleman, in ſuch a Habit as was worn in Queen Elizabeth's Time: At whoſe firſt Appearance he was extreamly ſurpris'd; but after a little Recollection, he demanded of him in the Name of God What he was? He was anſwer'd, The Ghoſt of Sir George Villers, Father to the Duke of Buckingham, whom he might well remember, ſince he went to School with him at ——— in Leiceſterſhire. Upon which, Mr. Towſe found that he had the perfect Reſemblance of his old Friend, Sir George Villers, and the ſame Habit he had often ſeen him wear in his Life-time. The Apparition proceeded to tell him, that he cou'd not but remember the great Kindneſs he had expreſs'd to him, while he was his Fellow-Scholar in Leiceſterſhire; upon which Conſideration, he believ'd he lov'd him; therefore he had made Choice of him to deliver a Meſſage to his Son, to prevent ſuch Miſchiefs, as wou'd otherwiſe prove his inevitable Ruin. Then inſtructing him in the Meſſage he was to deliver, Mr. Towſe ſhew'd a great Averſion to appear upon ſuch an ungrateful Errand, by which he ſhou'd gain nothing but Reproach and Contempt, and the Name of a wild Enthuſiaſt; therefore deſir'd to be excus'd from the Employment. But the Apparition earneſtly preſs'd him to undertake it, aſſuring him, That the Circumſtances, and the Diſcoveries he ſhou'd make of ſuch Paſſages, as were only known to the Duke, wou'd make it appear, that the Meſſage was not the Fancy of a diſtemper'd Brain, but a perfect Reality: And thus the Apparition took his Leave for that Night, telling him, He wou'd give him time to conſider, till the next Night, and then receive his Anſwer, whether he wou'd undertake the Meſſage or no.* Mr. Towſe ſpent that Day in great Trouble and Perplexity, earneſtly debating with himſelf, whether he ſhou'd venture upon this ſtrange Undertaking; but in Concluſion, he reſolv'd to perform it; and the next Night he gave his Anſwer to the Apparition accordingly, and ſo receiv'd his full Inſtructions.

After which, Mr. Towſe repair'd to the Court, and found out Sir Thomas Bludder and Sir Ralph Freeman, by whom he was brought to the Duke of Buckingham, and had ſeveral private and long Audiences with him. And Mr. Windham, the Relator, by the Favour of his Friend Sir Edward Savage, was once admitted to ſee him in private Conference with the Duke; where, tho' he heard not their very Words, he obſerv'd great Earneſtneſs in their Actions and Geſtures. After which Conference, Mr. Towſe told him, that the Duke wou'd not follow the Advice that was given him, which intimated 'the caſting off, and the rejecting 'of ſome Men who had great Intereſt in him, and his 'performing ſome Popular Acts in the enſuing Parliament; 'for which Parliament the Duke deſir'd him to ſtand Bur'geſs: But he utterly refus'd it, alledging, that unleſs his Grace wou'd follow his Directions, he muſt do him hurt, if he ſat in the Houſe. The Duke confeſs'd indeed, That he had told him thoſe things which no Creature knew but himſelf, and which none but God or the Devil cou'd reveal to him; and offer'd to have the King Knight him, and to give him Preferment. But he ſtill refus'd all Offers, declaring, that unleſs he wou'd follow his Advice, he wou'd receive nothing from him. Mr. Towſe having finiſh'd the Relation, freely told Mr. Windham, that the Duke wou'd inevitably be deſtroy'd before the End of Auguſt. He likewiſe inform'd him, that he had written down the ſeveral Diſcourſes he had with the Apparition, whoſe coming was now as familiar to him as the Viſits of a Friend, and particularly declar'd to him theſe ſtrange Prophetick Words, That --- ſhou'd by his Counſels be the Author of great Troubles to the Kingdom, by which it ſhou'd be reduc'd to the Extremity of Diſorder and Confuſion; and that it ſhou'd ſeem to be paſt all Hope of Recovery, without a Miracle: But when all People were in Deſpair of ſeeing happy Days, the Kingdom ſhou'd ſuddenly be reſtor'd and re-ſettled again in a moſt happy Condition. Among other Particulars, ſufficiently remarkable, Mr. Towſe alſo foretold the very Time of his own Death, which hapned not long after that of the Duke, as his Wife afterwards aſſur'd the aforeſaid Mr. Windham.

The Duke's Expedition.

But to return to the Duke, who had certainly a firm Belief of his approaching Fate, and a particular Apprehenſion upon the Account of his intended Expedition, which was reſolv'd upon for the Relief of the diſtreſſed Rochellers: But he found that he cou'd not with any Degree of Honour decline an Expedition, that had been projected and fix'd, both by His Maſter and himſelf. He readily reconcil'd himſelf to the Biſhop of Lincoln, which put the other in great Hopes of being re-eſtabliſh'd in the King's Favour; and ſo haſtned towards the Fleet, which was great and powerful, and was the third that had been prepar'd for the Relief of Rochelle and the diſtreſſed Proteſtants of France. Being to take leave of Biſhop Laud, whom he knew well plac'd in the King's Affection, after ſome kind Expreſſions, he ſaid, I know your Lordſhip has good Acceſs to the King our Sovereign, pray put his Majeſty in mind to be good to my poor Wife and Children. Which Words he ſpoke with ſuch a boding Countenance, as gave the Biſhop no ſmall Concern for his Friend. Going towards Portſmouth, the very Day before his Death, after much ſerious and private Diſcourſe with the King himſelf, he embrac'd his Majeſty at his departing in a very unuſual and paſſionate Manner; and did the ſame to his Friend the Earl of Holland, as if his Soul had been aſſur'd he ſhou'd never ſee them more.

His laſt Leave.

The Deſign againſt him

Saturday the twenty third of Auguſt was the fatal Period of his Life, which was brought about by John Felton, late Lieutenant under Sir John Ramſey, a Man obſcure in his Perſon, tho' of a good Family in Suffolk; who having been refus'd a Company by the Duke, when his Captain had been kill'd in the Iſle of Rhee, threw up his Commiſſion, and retir'd from the Army at the Time that the Houſe of Commons had declar'd the Duke the principal Cauſe of all the Evils the Kingdom ſuffer'd. This, and a libellous Book of Dr. Eggleſton's againſt the Duke, ſo far wrought upon this melancholick Gentleman, that he thought in killing the Duke he ſhou'd do God good Service, and therefore reſolv'd to effect it. Accordingly before nine in the Morning, he repair'd to the Room where the Duke was dreſſing and preparing to eat, which was fill'd with Perſons of Quality, and Officers of the Army, and particular Monſieur Sobiez, Brother to the Duke of Rohan, and ſeveral French Gentlemen, who were all urgent with him for the Departure of the Fleet deſign'd for Rochelle, which as the Duke was then inform'd, had reliev'd it ſelf from the Siege. Theſe Gentlemen much inſiſted upon the Impoſſibility that the Intelligence cou'd be true, and that it was contriv'd by their Enemies to abate that Zeal us'd for their Relief: Which Diſcourſe was held with ſo much Heat and Vehemence, that the Company who underſtood not French, thought they were angry, and that they offer'd Rudeneſs to the Duke; who underſtanding that his Breakfaſt was ready, drew near the Door, where the Hangings were held up; and in that Paſſage, turning himſelf to ſpeak to a Colonel, Sir Thomas Fryar, he was in an Inſtant ſtruck over Sir Thomas's Shoulder upon the Breaſt with a Knife, which pierc'd him to the very Heart. Upon which amazing Stroke, without any more Words than The Villain has kill'd me! he pull'd out the Knife himſelf, and the ſame Moment expir'd with a Stream of Blood upon the Floor.

He is ſtabb'd by Felton.

There immediately ſucceeded a great Hurry and Confuſion; his Dutcheſs above was thrown into an Agony, the Company into a Conſternation, and the Town into a Hubbub. No Man had ſeen the Blow, or the Perſon who gave it; ſo that the French were in moſt imminent Danger, for every Man was ready to conclude them guilty from their late warm Diſcourſes. But ſo diſtracted were the Thoughts of the Company, that they, who juſt before crowded to be of his remoteſt Followers in a few Minutes forſook his dead Body, which was laid upon the Table; and ſcarce any of his Domeſticks were left to attend him: So ſoon does the Shadow vaniſh from the gilded Dial, when the Sun is gone. In the Crowd near the Door a Hat was found upon the Ground, having ſew'd in the Inſide a Paper with a few Lines of the Declaration of the Houſe of Commons againſt the Duke, and one or two ſhort Ejaculations towards a Prayer. All readily concluded that the Hat belong'd to the Murderer, but cou'd not imagine who was the Perſon; till at length a Man was ſeen walking very compoſedly before the Door without a Hat. Upon which one crying out Here is the Man that kill'd the Duke, and others demanding which is he! he calmly anſwer'd I am he: And when ſome of the moſt Furious were running violently upon him to kill him, while others, of equal Concern but more Diſcretion, defended him, he with open Arms invited ther Swords, deſiring rather to fall by the Precipitation of their Rage, than be reſerv'd to the Terrors of a deliberate Execution. Being carry'd into a private Room before Perſons of the beſt Condition; in order to a Diſcovery, they firſt alledg'd That the Duke was only much wounded, but not without Hopes of Recovery. Upon which Felton ſmil'd, and ſaid, He well knew he had given ſuch a Blow, as had determin'd all their Hopes. Then being demanded at whoſe Inſtigation he had committed that execrable Fact, he reſolutely anſwer'd, That their Enquiry was needleſs; That no Man living had Intereſt enough with him to diſpoſe him to ſuch an Action; That it proceeded meerly from the Impulſe of his own Conſcience; That he had fix'd his Motives to it in his Hat, becauſe he thought he might probably periſh in the Attempt. Then he proceeded to the Particulars of the Fact, as they have already been related. It is wonderful, that at the ſame Inſtant that the Duke was Stabb'd, Mr. Towſe, before mention'd, being at Windſor-Caſtle with his Wife, ſuddenly ſtarted up from his Chair, and cry'd out, Wife, the Duke of Buckingham is ſlain! as we find it in the forementioned Book, in the Heralds-Office.

Thus fell this great Peer in the thirty ſixth Year and Bloom of his Age, in the midſt of a numerous Concourſe of Friends, Suiters and Dependents, and within four Miles of the Court at Southwick; to which the ſurpriſing Account was immediately carry'd by Sir Thomas Hippeſly to his Majeſty, who was then at Divine Service. Sir Thomas enter'd the Room with a troubled Countenance, and without Reſpect to the Office then performing, went directly to the King, and whiſper'd the ſtrange Accident in his Ear. His Majeſty continu'd unmov'd, without any Change in his Looks or Actions, till Prayers were ended; when ſuddenly he retir'd to his Chamber, and with extream Paſſion threw himſelf upon his Bed, with a Flood of Tears lamenting the Loſs of an excellent Servant, and the horrid manner of being depriv'd of him; and continu'd in this diſconſolate Condition for many Days. Yet his even Manner of receiving the News in Publick, caus'd many, who knew not the Paſſion he expreſs'd in his Retirement, to believe the Accident not very ungrateful to him; as being freed from a Favourite ſo ungracious to the People, and ſo prejudicial to all Overtures made in Parliament for his Service. But, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, ſuch as proceeded upon this Belief, took very ill Meaſures: For from that Time the King admitted very few into any Degree of Truſt, whom he believ'd to have been Enemies to the Duke, and no Prince ever expreſs'd a more tender Concern to the Family, and all that was dear to this great Man, than his Majeſty; who was nicely careful in diſcharging his numerous Debts, which in reality had all been contracted for his Service, tho' there remain'd no Evidence of it. Yet by reaſon of the Favours of two Kings, his many Places, and the extraordinary Fortune of his Lady, the Jewels he left were valu'd at three hundred Thouſand Pounds. His Bowels were interr'd at Portſmouth, by his beloved Siſter the Counteſs of Denbigh, and a handſom Memorial erected there; and his Body was brought to York-Houſe, where for ſome time it lay in State, and was then intomb'd in the Abbey Church in Weſtminſter, where it was adorn'd with a glorious Epitaph, in honour of his invincible Fidelity to his two gracious Maſters.

The News carry'd to the King.

His Majeſty'sConcern.

The Duke's Interment.

Much has been already ſaid concerning the Fortune and Character of this great Man, which ſhews ſomething very glaring, if not ſhining in both. We ſhall now only obſerve, That his great Miſfortune was the Want of a wiſe Friend, ſufficient to ſtem the Current, or rather Torrent of his impetuous Paſſions; and then probably he had committed as few Faults, and done as worthy Actions, as any Man in his Sphear. But theſe being let looſe, and without Bounds, he was hurry'd on to ſeveral Exorbitancies, both as to Luſt and Revenge, and to a blood-thirſty Spirit, that ſeldom goes unpuniſh'd in this World. This ſufficiently appear'd in his violent promoting the two Wars againſt Spain and France; from whence his Ruin took its Date, and never left purſuing him, till this execrable Act upon his Perſon. The Malice of this was contracted by that evil Spirit of the Time, and the Venom of that Seaſon increas'd and gather'd Strength, till from one Licence to another, the Nation was corrupted to that monſtrous Degree, that it grew ſatiated and weary of the Government it ſelf; tho' it had enjoy'd a greater Meaſure of Felicity under it, than any People were ever poſſeſs'd of before, and which could never be ſecur'd to them without it.

A ſhort Account of him

As to Felton, the Duke's Murderer, being made a Priſoner at London, there was a frequent Concourſe of People about him, ſome to ſee the reſolute Man, and others to diſcover his Inducements to ſo bold an Attempt. Being examin'd before the Council, and clearing all Perſons but himſelf, he was threatned with the Rack; upon which he told Biſhop Laud, He could not tell whom he might nominate in the Extremity of Torture. But the Queſtion being put to the Judges, they declar'd it to be no legal way of proceeding. He never made any other Confeſſion, 'But 'that he had long believ'd the Duke to be an evil Inſtru' ment in the Commonwealth, of which he was finally ' convinc'd by the Remonſtrance of the Parliament.' He was a Man of that ſtout and violent Spirit, that upon receiving an Injury from a Gentleman, he cut off a piece of his little Finger, and ſent it to him with a Challenge, to let him know he valu'd not his whole Body, ſo he might obtain his Revenge. But upon his Tryal he behav'd himſelf with all Humility, Acknowledgment and Repentance; and ſo far, as to beg of the Judges, that before his Execution, his Hand might be cut off, that committed the Fact; which Requeſt was determin'd to be illegal. He was hang'd at Tyburn, and his Body was from thence remov'd to Portſmouth, and there hung in Chains.

Felton's Character and Puniſhment.

3. Notwithſtanding the Death of the Duke, the King purſu'd the Deſign of relieving Rochelle, now miſerably diſtreſs'd by the French King and Cardinal Richelieu; and a Fleet under the Command of the Earl of Lindſey ſet ſail on the 8th Day of September; but was very defective in the Store of Victuals and Tackle, as Information was afterwards given to the King and Council. When they came before Rochelle, they found no French Fleet to oppoſe them, only the immenſe Barricado croſs the Entrance of the Fort was now compleatly finiſh'd. Many brave Attempts were made by the Engliſh to break through, but all ineffectual. The Inhabitants were now in a deplorable Condition, labouring under all the Miſeries of Want and Famine, and reduc'd to that Extremity, that above fifteen Thouſand periſh'd for want of Suſtenance; and the Remainder were ſo thin and pale, that they rather reſembled Skeletons than living Perſons. At length finding no Relief, in Deſpair the Inhabitants implor'd the King's Pardon; and having with Difficulty obtain'd ſome Articles, on the 8th of October the Place was given up, and with it, as it is believ'd, the Liberties of France; of which the Mareſcal de Baſſompierre was ſo ſenſible, that tho' he was in Perſon againſt it, he ſaid, I think we ſhall be ſuch Fools at laſt, as to take Rochelle. It is ſaid, that upon the Surrender of the Place, Guiton, the valiant Mayor, told the Cardinal, It was far better to yield to a King, who knew how to take Rochelle, than to another who knew not how to relieve it.

The miſerable State of Rochelle.

It ſurrenders.

Thus it was that the Cardinal ſubdu'd Rochelle to the Deſpotick Power of France; a Deſign in which he ſpent vaſt Sums, and ſacrific'd the Lives of above forty Thouſand of his Maſter's Subjects, as well of one Religion as the other. After which the French Proteſtants in all other Parts were ſo ſeverely treated, that they cou'd not but reſolve upon ſome laſt Efforts for Self-Preſervation; and ſent again to the King of England to implore his Aſſiſtance, with this pathetical Expreſſion, that what they now wrote was with their Tears, and with their Blood. But the King was in no Condition to proſecute the War with any probable Succeſs, but aim'd at a Peace with France; tho' he had been before told in Council, 'That it was leſs prejudicial to England to loſe the Kingdom of Ireland, than to ' ſuffer the Reduction of Rochelle, and the Ruin of the ' Proteſtant Religion in France.' And yet, humanly ſpeaking, the Rochellers not ſuffering the Engliſh at firſt to enter their Town, and the want of Union among the Proteſtant Party, was the chief, if not the ſole Cauſe of their Ruin, which cou'd never after be retriev'd.

The ſad State of the French Proteſtants.

From this Epocha, or Period of Time, Sir P. Warwick ſeems juſtly to date the entire, tho' encreaſing Greatneſs of France, both as to her Land, and naval Powers. The great Inconveniencies of which gave ſufficient Occaſion for the Complaints of the King's Enemies at home, and the Proteſtant Sufferers abroad; as if the King and his Favourite had deſignedly neglected, if not betray'd the Cauſe, tho' it is more natural to ſuppoſe it proceeded from the Miſmanagement in France, and the Inabilities in England, and from the Miſfortunes of both. It is plain from the Duke of Rohan's Memoirs, that the King was ever hearty in their Cauſe; and that unfortunate Nobleman declares how, that in Order to protect Them, he had promis'd to employ all his Kingdoms, and his own Perſon, in ſo juſt a War. And by way of Apology he has theſe Words, I refer it to all the World, if I can juſtly be call'd the Author of this War, conſidering I was ſolicited to it by the King of Great Britain. Other Writers think the War againſt France one of the falſeſt Steps in King Charles's Reign, and the Duke's Promoting of it one of his greateſt Crimes. And ſome go yet farther, and ſay That the King by aiding thoſe of Rochelle, train'd up his own Subjects in the School of Rebellion, and taught them to confederate with Foreigners, and at length brought down the Judgments of Heaven upon his own Head.

Reflections upon their Fate.

4. But to return to the Affairs of England, where before this Time was a great Change in the Miniſtry, and ſeveral new Promotions. The Earl of Marlborough was remov'd from the Treaſury, as a Man in Years, and too cautious in advancing the King's Revenue; and Sir Richard

Sir Richard Weſton made Lord Treaſurer.

Weſton,

1628.
Car. 4.

Weſton, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was made Lord Treaſurer, as a Miniſter more acute and active, and fit for the Neceſſities of raiſing Money. Chief Baron Walter was for the like Reaſon diſplac'd, tho' he complain'd that he ought not to be remov'd but by a Scire facias. Biſhop Laud ſtill encreas'd in the King's Favour, and was tranſlated to the See of London; Mr. Montague was made Biſhop of Chicheſter, and Dr. Manwaring was pardon'd and preferr'd. Weſton the new Treaſurer had a great Power after the Duke of Buckingham's Death, tho' inferior to his; and finding an increaſing Emulation between the two famous Speakers in the Houſe of Commons, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir John Elliot, he reſolv'd to make the Diviſion irreconcileable, and bring Sir Thomas into the King's Favour, who in the laſt Seſſion of Parliament had particularly been diſoblig'd by the Advancement of his continual Competitor Savill into a Barony. The Treaſurer ſo far prevail'd, as to gain this great Man over to the King, and not only procur'd him to be one of his Majeſty's Privy-Council, but to be made Lord Preſident of the North, and advanc'd into the Title of Viſcount Wentworth; to the great Envy and Mortification of the furious Sir John Elliot. Being thus gain'd, he became the moſt devout Friend to the Church, the greateſt Zealot for advancing the Monarchy, and the ableſt Miniſter of State, that any of our former Hiſtories can ſhew. Coming to a right Underſtanding with Biſhop Laud, they two enter'd into ſuch an inviolable League of Friendſhip, that nothing but Death cou'd ſeparate.

Sir Thomas Wentworth advanc'd.

Theſe Alterations and Promotions were not generally pleaſing to the People, but to ſoften their Minds before the next Seſſion of Parliament, which was now prorogu'd from the twentieth Day of October to the twentieth of January, ſome Popular things were done by the Court. As to the Horſe levy'd in Germany, which many ſuſpected was for a Standing Force in England, the Privy-Council wrote to Dalbier to diſpoſe them into the Service of his Majeſty's two Allies, the King of Sweden and the Duke of Savoy. Archbiſhop Abbot, the more popular for his late Diſgrace, was ſent for to Whitehall, and from his Barge receiv'd by the Archbiſhop of York and the Earl of Dorſet, and by them ſolemnly introduc'd to the King, who gave him his Hand with a particular Countenance of Favour, bidding him not fail the Council-Table twice a Week. Dr. Potter, a great Anti-Arminian, was made Biſhop of Carliſle, and Montague's Appeal was call'd in by Proclamation; and other pleaſing Orders were given againſt Popery and Arminianiſm, at this time the two Terrors of the Common People.

Softning Methods.

Yet before the Parliament met, ſome things were tranſacted which adminiſter'd further Occaſions of Diſputes and Conteſts. The Merchants and Traders were in great Diſturbances about the Payment of Tonnage and Poundage; for upon the late Declaration of the Commons, and concurrent Opinion of the Lawyers, many had declar'd, and even refus'd to pay the Impoſitions: For which Contempt they were ſummon'd before the Council-Table, and committed to the Fleet and Marſhalſea, and not ſet at Liberty without entering into Bonds for the Payment of what was demanded. This was the Caſe of Mr. Chambers, Mr. Vaſſal, Mr. Rolls, and other Merchants; which caus'd many Pleadings, and Complaints of Grievances, and the Diſcouragement of Trade. To remedy theſe probable Obſtructions, as the meeting of the Parliament drew nigh, the King conſulted with a ſelect Committee of the Privy-Council, how thoſe of them who were Members of Parliament, ſhou'd demean themſelves there. It was propos'd, 'That if the Commons ſhou'd ſtrongly inſiſt upon the Delivery of the Merchants Goods, which had been ſeiz'd, before they proceeded to the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, the Anſwer ſhou'd be, That if they deſign to grant it, as it had been to his Predeceſſors, it wou'd end all Diſputes: But if not, then the King was to tell them, If they wou'd paſs the Bill to him as his Anceſtors had it, he wou'd declare he claim'd it not but by Grant in Parliament; but if this did not ſatisfy, then to avow a Breach.' They adviſ'd alſo, 'That the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage be prepar'd in the ſame Form that it had paſs'd for King James, adding Words to give it from the firſt Day of the King's Reign, and that it be preſented at the firſt Sitting of the Parliament; and thoſe of the Privy-Council to move for a ſpeedy Anſwer, whether they will paſs the Bill or not.' It was farther adviſ'd, 'That if they proceeded to cenſure the late Duke of Buckingham, to accuſe the King's Servants, to aſperſe his Counſellors, to handle Matters of Religion improper for them, to raiſe Objections againſt his Majeſty's laſt Speech, and the like Matters, then they of the Privy-Council were to intimate, That thoſe Debates tended to a Breach, and the King immediately to declare, that he wou'd not ſuffer ſuch irregular Proceedings.

Some diſobliging.

Preparations for the Parliament.

1628/9.
Car. 4.

Thus were Matters prepar'd for the ſecond Meeting of the Parliament; but for a Concluſion of the Year, we ſhall firſt take notice of the Deaths of ſome conſiderable Perſons, as Dr. Tobie Mathew, who by his Merits was rais'd through many Preferments to the Archbiſhoprick of York, in which laſt Station he dy'd; having been highly admir'd for his Learning, Eloquence and Preaching, and no leſs belov'd for his pleaſant Converſation and facetious Wit, and all without any Treſpaſs upon the Epiſcopal Gravity. Next, was Dr. George Carleton, Biſhop of Chicheſter, a Perſon who for his various Learning and profound Judgement, was ſelected by King James to be one of the five Engliſh Divines ſent over to the Synod of Dort, where he behav'd himſelf highly to the Honour and Credit of the Engliſh Nation. We ought alſo to take Notice of Dr. John Preſton, the moſt celebrated Divine and Head of the Puritan Party, an exquiſite Preacher, a ſubtle Diſputant, and a deep Politician, who once was highly in Favour with the Duke of Buckingham, ſo that his Friends ſay he might, if he had pleas'd, have been made Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal. Sir Thomas Ridley is likewiſe to be remember'd, who was Vicar-General to the preſent Archbiſhop Abbot, a Perſon of general Learning and Knowledge, and eminent for his Skill in his Profeſſion, the Civil Law, of which he was juſtly honour'd with the Title of Doctor. Mr. Samuel Purchas was a Perſon of another Genius, fam'd for his indefatigable Induſtry; who ſo diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by his large and various Collections of Voyages, Travels and Pilgrimages, that he obtain'd the Name of The Engliſh Ptolemy. Beſides theſe, we are to remember three other great Men, as that worthy Lawyer and Judge, Sir John Doderidge, who by his great Parts and unwearied Labours became not only eminent in his own Profeſſion, but in Arts, Divinity and Civil Law; ſo that it was hard to determine, in which of theſe Faculties he excell'd. Next, Sir Fulk Grevil, afterwards Lord Brook, a Favourite of Queen Elizabeth, an intimate Friend of the renowned Sir Philip Sidney, a very fine Gentleman, and a polite Scholar; who in the 74th Year of his Age was ſtabb'd by Haywood, a Servant of his, who immediately after murder'd himſelf. Laſtly dy'd Sir James Ley, whoſe ſingular Learning and Abilities rais'd him thro' all the great Poſts of the Law, till he came to be made Earl of Marlborough, Lord High Treaſurer, and Lord Preſident of the Council.

The Death of Archbp. Mathew,

And the Earl of Marlborough.

X. I. After a Receſs of near ſeven Months, the Parliament met according to Prorogation upon the 20th Day of January. The Duke of Buckingham being now dead, it might have been hop'd that this Seſſion wou'd have entirely bury'd thoſe Jealouſies, which had ſo much prejudic'd his Majeſty's Honour abroad, and his Subjects Felicity at home. But it ſoon appear'd that his Removal wou'd not anſwer the Expectation of ſome, nor the Pretenſions of others: But the Commons reſolv'd to begin at the ſame Point where they ended laſt Seſſion, namely, the Buſineſs of Tonnage and Poundage, the enforcing of which was thought a Violation of the late Act, the Petition of Right; tho' there wanted not many Precedents for it in former Reigns. They complain'd that the Petition of Right had been printed with the Addition of the King's laſt Speech, and that fifteen hundred Copies without, were ſuppreſs'd by Warrant from the Attorney-General; but Tonnage and Poundage was their main Grievance, which they deſign'd to declare illegal; eſpecially upon the Account of the late Conteſts with the Merchants, particularly Mr. Rolls, a Member of the Houſe, to whom it was ſaid by ſome of the Cuſtom-Houſe Officers, If all the Parliament were in you, we wou'd take your Goods.

The Second Seſſion of the Third Parliament.

The Commons Complaint.

The Queſtioning this neceſſary Part of the Crown Revenue, was a tender Point on the King's Side; and had been thought the unkindeſt, if not moſt blameable Attempt of the Commons in the firſt Parliament, when contrary to the Will of the Lords, they wou'd have confin'd it to a ſingle Year. Therefore after ſome warm Debate concerning this Matter, his Majeſty ſent a Meſſage to the Commons, willing them to deſiſt till the next Day, when he wou'd ſpeak with them at the Banqueting-Houſe at Whitehall. Where in a full Aſſembly of Lords and Commons, he told them in a gentle Manner, 'That the particular Occaſion of his calling of them together at that Time, was a Complaint made in the Lower-Houſe for ſtaying Men's Goods that deny'd Tonnage and Poundage: Which might receive an eaſy and ſhort Concluſion, if he was rightly underſtood. For by paſſing the Bill as his Anceſtors had it, his former Actions wou'd be included, and his future Proceedings authoriz'd. That he took not thoſe Duties as appertaining to his Hereditary Prerogative; for his Meaning was ever to enjoy them by the Gift of his People, not challenging it as of Right, but de bene eſſe; for the Neceſſity, not for the Right he had to take it, as he ſhew'd them by his laſt Speech, being aſſur'd they then wanted Time, not

'Will to give it him. He therefore expected, that without 'Loſs of Time, they by paſſing the Bill wou'd put an End 'to all theſe Queſtions; and was glad that by their Actions 'he found them Complainers, not ſeeking Complaints, as 'there was ſome Reaſon to ſuſpect from the largely penning their Order on Wedneſday laſt. Laſtly he aſſur'd 'them, That the Houſe's Reſolutions, not particular Men's 'Speeches, ſhou'd make him judge well or ill; not doubting 'but this Seſſion, beginning with Confidence, might end in 'perfect good Underſtanding.

Not receiv'd with Approbation.

Tonnage and Poundage poſtponed.

This Speech was, by many, thought very healing and affectionate, and the main Propoſal likely to be embrac'd; but by reaſon of former Jealouſies, and preſent Diſguſts, it had not the deſir'd Effect. For three Days after, when Mr. Secretary Cook brought a Meſſage from the King, urging, 'That the Bill for Tonnage and Poundage might 'be ſpeedily taken into Conſideration, and that no Time 'might be loſt;' a Popular Notion aroſe, That the Bill muſt not be impos'd upon them, but muſt naturally proceed from the Motions of their own Houſe. For which Reaſon they judg'd it moſt proper to ſuſpend the Bill for ſome time, while they proceeded upon other Grievances; and in the firſt Place upon thoſe relating to Religion, particularly the Danger of Arminianiſm; which Mr. Rous in a violent Speech, call'd an Error that made the Grace of God lackey it after the Will of Man, that made the Sheep to keep the Shepherd, and a mortal Seed of an immortal God; and that an Arminian was the Spawn of a Papiſt, ready to open the Gate to Romiſh Tyranny and Spaniſh Monarchy, &c. A Report was made from the Committee for Religion, that a Remonſtrance upon that Subject in the laſt Seſſion had been commanded away by the King; for want of which the Committee cou'd not proceed. Hereupon Mr. Secretary Cook brought a ſecond Meſſage from his Majeſty, 'That notwithſtanding the Remonſtrance concerning Re'ligion was call'd for, yet to avoid all Diſpute, he was 'pleas'd to deliver it back to them; hoping, nevertheleſs, 'they wou'd proceed with the Bill for Tonnage and Poun'dage, and give Precedency to that Buſineſs.' But this Meſſage being referr'd to a Committee, they came to this Reſolution, 'That the Conſideration of Religion ſhou'd 'take Place before the Bill for Tonnage and Poundage.' Upon which, warm Speeches were made by Mr. Pym, Sir Francis Seymour, and Sir Robert Philips, the latter of whom ſaid, Two Sects are damnably crept in to undermine King and Kingdom; the one ancient Popery, the other new Arminianiſm. And a Complaint was made againſt one Lewis, that ſaid, The Devil take the Parliament; which tho' ſpoken out of Parliament, was reſolv'd to be an Offence againſt the Parliament, and it was order'd he ſhou'd be ſent for.

It is earneſtly preſs'd.

But in vain.

The next Day Secretary Cook brought another Meſſage from his Majeſty, 'That if the Houſe wou'd diſpatch the 'Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, they ſhou'd not thereby 'be interrupted in Matters of Religion, provided they did 'not intrench upon that which did not belong to them.' This was thought ſo reaſonable, that Sir Thomas Edmunds preſs'd earneſtly for a Compliance, and us'd theſe Words, You your ſelves are Witneſſes, how induſtrious his Majeſty was to procure you gracious Laws in his Father's Time, and ſince, what Enlargement he has made of our Liberties, and ſtill we give him Cauſe to repent of the Good he has done: Conſider how dangerous it is to alienate his Majeſty's Heart from Parliaments. But after a Reply by Mr. Corriton, the Houſe reſolv'd to ſend an Anſwer to the King, 'That theſe Meſſages were inconvenient, and bred Debate 'and Loſs of Time; and did further reſolve, That Tonnage 'and Poundage, ariſing naturally from this Houſe, they 'wou'd in fit Time take ſuch a Courſe therein, as they 'hop'd wou'd be to his Majeſty's Satisfaction and Honour: 'And for the preſent, they wou'd proceed in Matters of 'Religion.

Sir John Elliot*'s Speech.*

The Proteſtation of the Houſe.

Upon this Occaſion Sir John Elliot deliver'd himſelf in a violent Speech, in which he had theſe Words; As to Popery and Arminianiſm, our Faith and Religion is in Danger by the King's late Declaration; for theſe, like an Inundation, break in at once upon us. It is there ſaid, If there be any Difference of Opinion concerning the ſeaſonable Interpretation of the thirty nine Articles, the Biſhops and the Clergy in Convocation have Power to diſpute it, and to order which way they pleaſe: And then for ought I know, Popery and Arminianiſm may be introduc'd by them.------We ſee ſome among our Biſhops who are not Orthodox, nor ſound in Religion, as they ſhou'd be; witneſs the two Biſhops complain'd of the laſt Meeting of the Parliament. His Speech put the Houſe into ſuch a Ferment, that they made this ſolemn Proteſtation, 'We the Commons in Parliament aſſembled, 'do claim, proteſt, and avow for Truth, the Senſe of the 'Articles of Religion, which were eſtabliſhed by Parliament 'in the thirteenth Year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which 'by the publick Act of the Church of England, and by the 'general and current Expoſitions of the Writers of our 'Church, hath been deliver'd unto us. And we reject the 'Senſe of the Jeſuites, and Arminians, and all others 'wherein they differ from us.' This Declaration was thought to be more dubious, and of greater Latitude, than any Interpreter had us'd in expounding the Articles before.

Declaration of the Commons.

Laud and Montague ſuſpected.

In purſuance of Religion, both Houſes join'd in an Addreſs to the King, to appoint a Day of Faſting and Prayer, in Conſideration of the Miſeries of the Reformed Churches abroad. The King finding his own Buſineſs delay'd, anſwer'd with ſome Diſguſt, That Fighting wou'd do them more Good than Faſting, tho' he did not diſapprove of the latter; and ſo granted it with this Note, That it ſhou'd not be brought into Precedent for frequent Faſts. Soon after the Houſe of Commons preſented a Declaration to the King, in Anſwer to his Meſſage for haſtning the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage; to repreſent, 'That they cou'd 'not without Impiety to God, Diſloyalty to his Majeſty, 'and Unthankfulneſs to thoſe who ſent them, proceed 'therein, without giving Precedency to Religion, which 'was in great Danger from Popery and Arminianiſm.' The King anſwer'd, 'That the Bill of Tonnage and Poun'dage was firſt regularly offer'd, and he muſt be ſtill in'ſtant with them, that they proceed in it with Diligence: 'And as for the Cauſe of Religion, none of them ſhou'd 'have a greater Care of it than himſelf.' And now the Spirit being rais'd, it was the Art of ſubtle Men to keep it up; therefore ſhortly after the Houſe fell into a Debate upon the King's Declaration to prohibit Diſputes about Religion; concluding the main End of it was to ſuppreſs the Puritan Party, and give Liberty to the oppoſite Side. They conceiv'd that Biſhop Laud and Biſhop Montague had advis'd the King to that Declaration; and complain'd of the King's Pardon granted to the latter; obſerving that the Warrant to draw it was for him only, yet three others were put in, Dr. Coſens, Dr. Sibthorp, and Dr. Manwaring. Upon which Account Sir John Elliot cry'd out, In this Laud is contracted all the Danger we fear; for he that procur'd thoſe Pardons, may be the Author of thoſe new Opinions.

A Member ſerv'd with a Subpœna

Mr. Noy's Speech.

London Sheriff ſent to the Tower.

2. The Parliament had ſat about three Weeks without concluding any publick Buſineſs, when an unfortunate Accident hapned which help'd to add new Flame to the former. For upon the tenth Day of February, amidſt the Debates upon Religion, the Ware-houſe of Mr. Rolls, a Merchant and a ſitting Member, was lock'd up by a Purſuivant, and he himſelf call'd forth and ſerv'd with a Subpœna. This put the Houſe into a great Ferment, tho' Sir Humphry May, a Privy-Counſellor, declar'd, That it did not proceed from the King or Council; and the Attorney-General wrote to Mr. Rolls to excuſe the thing as a Miſtake. However this Matter was referr'd till two Days after the Houſe was in a Committee upon Tonnage and Poundage; when they admitted the Complaints of ſeveral Merchants, That their Goods were ſeiz'd, and Informations preferr'd againſt them in the Star-Chamber. Upon which Occaſion Mr. Noy freely ſaid, We cannot ſafely give, unleſs we be in Poſſeſſion; for it will not be a Gift, but a Confirmation: Neither will I give, without a Declaration in the Bill, 'That the King 'hath no Right, but by our free Gift:' If it will not be accepted as it is fit for us to give it, we cannot help it; if it be the King's already, we do not give it. Upon which the Houſe order'd a Meſſage to be ſent to the Barons of the Exchequer, to vacate their Injunctions and Orders about the ſtopping of Merchants Goods. To which the Lord Treaſurer and Barons return'd an Anſwer, 'That in their ſaid 'Orders and Injunctions they did not determine, nor any 'ways touch upon the Right of Tonnage and Poundage.' But this Anſwer was ill reſented by the Houſe, as a Juſtification of the Proceedings in the Exchequer; into which they reſolv'd to make a farther Enquiry. At the ſame Time an Information againſt Mr. Chambers in the Star-Chamber, for refuſing to pay Tonnage, while his Petition was lodg'd in Parliament, rais'd another Ferment in the Houſe; which was ſo provok'd, as to ſend Sir William Acton, the Sheriff of London, to the Tower.

The Biſhop of Winchester complain'd of.

On the ſame Day the Fire was further blown up by a Report made from the Committee of Religion, about ſolliciting and obtaining the Pardons lately mention'd. And 'tis obſervable, that the Hand of Mr. Oliver Cromwell was in this Religious Feud: He was one of this warm Committee, and inform'd the Houſe, That Neile Biſhop of Wincheſter gave Countenance to ſome Divines that preach'd flat Popery; and it was by his Means that Manwaring was now advanc'd to a rich Living: Concluding, If theſe be Steps to Church Preferment, what are we ſhortly to expect? It was the Artifice, or at leaſt the Countenance of this Committee, that brought in the Bookſellers and Printers of London with a Petition, complaining of the Reſtraint of Books written againſt Popery and Arminianiſm, and the contrary Books allow'd, by the only Means of Laud Biſhop of London, who had reſtrain'd Licenſing to himſelf and his Chaplains. So that the next Day the Houſe was buſily imploy'd about the Increaſe of Popery, and made Enquiry concerning the ten Prieſts arraign'd at the King's-Bench; of which one was only condemn'd, and he repriev'd, and the other nine releas'd. Upon this Subject Sir Robert Philips complain'd, 'That five hundred at a time have been 'ſeen coming from Maſs in Somerſet-Houſe; and that there 'were nine hundred and forty, Engliſh, Scots and Iriſh, in 'Religious Houſes in the Netherlands, maintain'd by Pa-'piſts of England.' And tho' the Secretary and the Attorney-General gave fair Accounts of the King's Juſtice and Mercy in Execution of the Penal Laws, they cou'd not qualify the general Outcry.

The Encreaſe of Popery.

The King's Meſſage.

After ſome ſmaller Debates in the Houſe, a few Days after, ſeveral Officers of the Cuſtoms were examin'd, and charg'd with Breach of Privilege, in ſeizing the Goods of Mr. Rolls, a Parliament Man. But while the Houſe was debating of Reparation and Puniſhment, on Monday the twenty third of February the King ſent a Meſſage, declaring, 'That what 'the Cuſtom-Officers did, was by his own direct Order 'and Command at the Council-Board.' Upon which a Committee reſolv'd, 'That Mr. Rolls ought to have had 'Privilege of Perſon and Goods; but the Command of 'the King was ſo great, that they left it to the Houſe.' Upon which follow'd many ſevere Speeches and long Debates: Some took Occaſion to ſay, That theſe Interruptions proceeded from ſome Prelates, and others, Abettors of the Popiſh Party, who fear to be diſcover'd, and wou'd provoke to a Breach. Sir Humphry May ſaid, We all agree a Wound is given: We have Wine and Oil before us; if we go to puniſh Delinquency, there is Vinegar in the Wound; therefore think on ſome Courſe to have Reſtitution. And becauſe the Houſe was willing to make a Diſtinction between the Intereſt of the Farmers, and the Commandment of the King, his Majeſty ſent a condeſcending Meſſage to thank them for the Reſpect they had ſhewn to his Perſon, tho' he cou'd not in Honour diſavow his own Orders. Which Meſſage was no ſooner deliver'd, but in a tumultuous and diſcontented Manner they cry'd out Adjourn, Adjourn! and thereupon, without any new Exaſperation, they adjourn'd till Wedneſday following.

The Parliament abruptly adjourn'd.

Adjourn'd again by the King.

3. From this Time there was an incurable Breach between the King and the Houſe of Commons, without the paſſing of one Bill, or concluding any publick Buſineſs. At other Times the King's chief Struggles were for Supplies, but now he ſtrove only for Confirmation of what he had poſſeſs'd ſince his Acceſſion to the Crown: Therefore finding great Delays and little Hopes of Succeſs, when the Houſe met upon the Wedneſday, he immediately adjourn'd it to Monday the ſecond Day of March. Yet they found ſo much Time as to read over certain Heads and Articles agreed on concerning the Dangers of Popery and Arminianiſm; which were ſufficiently ſevere and reflecting upon ſome great Perſons.

Sir John Elliot's Speech.

The Houſe in a Ferment.

The appointed Monday being come, and the Houſe full of Fervour and Expectation, Sir John Elliot without any Reſerve exclaim'd againſt the Biſhop of Wincheſter, but more eſpecially the great Lord Treaſurer, in whoſe Perſon all Evil is contracted: I find him acting and building on thoſe Grounds, laid by his Maſter the Great Duke; and his Spirit is moving to theſe Interruptions, and they for Fear break Parliaments, leſt Parliaments ſhou'd break them: I find him the Head of the Great Party; the Papiſts, all Jeſuites and Prieſts, derive from him their Shelter and Protection.------ After a little Interruption, Sir John Finch the Speaker deliver'd a Meſſage from his Majeſty, to command them to adjourn the Houſe till Tueſday come Sevennight following. Upon which the Houſe, in a great Flame, inſiſted, 'That it was not the Office of the Speaker to de-'liver any ſuch Command to them; for the Adjournment 'of the Houſe did properly belong to themſelves: And 'after they had ſettled ſome Things, they wou'd ſatisfy 'the King.

A great Diſturbance.

Sir John Elliot proceeded to exclaim againſt the Lord Treaſurer, and others, and ſaid, That no Man was ever blaſted in that Houſe, but a Curſe fell upon them; and then he offer'd a Remonſtrance againſt Tonnage and Poundage, which was refus'd to be read either by the Speaker or the Clerk, and return'd to him again. Upon which Sir Miles Hobart ran and lock'd the Door of the Houſe, and kept the Key himſelf; and the Diſturbance was ſo great, that Mr. Coriton, after an unprecedented manner, aſſaulted and ſtruck Mr. Winterton, a Member of the Houſe. Mr. Strode cry'd out that the Remonſtrance might be read, That we may not be turned off like ſcatter'd Sheep, and ſent home as we were laſt Seſſions, with a Scorn put upon us in Print. Whereupon Sir John Elliot read out the Remonſtrance himſelf, and it was offer'd to be put to the Queſtion; but the Speaker ſaid, He was otherways commanded by the King. Then ſaid Mr. Selden, Dare not you put the Queſtion when we command you? If you will not put it, we muſt ſit ſtill, and be able to do nothing. We ſit here by Command from the King, under the Great Seal; and you before both Houſes are appointed for our Speaker; and do you now refuſe to perform your Office?

The Speaker held by Force in the Chair.

He expoſtulates with them.

Angry Words.

Upon this the Speaker declar'd He had an expreſs Command from his Majeſty, to riſe as ſoon as he had deliver'd his Meſſage; and accordingly he roſe and left the Chair: But Mr. Denzil Holles, and Mr. Valentine, with others who were prepar'd, immediately drew him back and held him in the Chair by Force. And notwithſtanding Sir Thomas Edmunds, and other Privy-Counſellors, endeavour'd to free the Speaker, Mr. Holles ſwore God's Wounds he ſhou'd ſit ſtill, till it pleas'd them to riſe. Then the Speaker, with Abundance of Tears, anſwer'd, I do not ſay I will not, but I dare not; deſiring, That they wou'd not command his Ruin, in regard he had been their faithful Servant, and wou'd ſacrifice his Life for the Good of his Country; but he durſt not ſin againſt the expreſs Command of his Sovereign. Mr. Selden reply'd, That he ever lov'd his Perſon well, but he cou'd not chuſe but condemn him now: That he being a Servant of the Houſe, ſhou'd refuſe their Commands; which Obſtinacy wou'd be a Precedent to Poſterity, if it ſhou'd go unpuniſh'd; therefore he wiſh'd him to proceed: Which he ſtill refus'd with freſh Tears, and many Intreaties. Sir Peter Hayman, a Gentleman of his own Country, told him, He was ſorry he was his Kinſman, for that he was the Diſgrace of his Country, and a Blot of a noble Family; and that Poſterity wou'd remember him with Scorn and Diſdain: And that for his Part, ſince he wou'd not be perſuaded to do his Duty, he thought it fit he ſhou'd be call'd to the Bar, and a new Speaker choſen.

The Proteſtation of the Houſe.

In the mean time, ſince neither Perſuaſions nor Threats cou'd prevail upon his Fidelity to the King, they required Mr. Holles to read certain Articles, as the Proteſtations of the Houſe, which, jointly as they were read, were allow'd with a loud Voice by the Houſe. They were as following. 'I. Whoever ſhall bring in Innovation in Religion, or by 'Favour ſeek to extend or introduce Popery or Arminia-'niſm, or other Opinions diſagreeing from the true and Or-'thodox Church, ſhall be reputed a Capital Enemy to the 'Kingdom and Commonwealth. II. Whoever ſhall coun-'ſel or adviſe the taking and levying the Subſidies of Ton-'nage and Poundage, not being granted by Parliament, or 'ſhall be an Actor or Inſtrument therein, ſhall be reputed an 'Innovator in the Government, and a Capital Enemy to 'this Kingdom and Commonwealth. III. If any Mer-'chant, or Perſon whatſoever, ſhall voluntarily yield or pay 'the Subſidies of Tonnage and Poundage, not being granted 'by Parliament, he ſhall likewiſe be reputed a Betrayer of 'the Liberties of England, and an Enemy to the ſame.

The King highly provok'd.

The King hearing of theſe ſtrange Diſorders, and that the Houſe continued to ſit, notwithſtanding his Command for an Adjournment, immediately ſent a Meſſenger for the Serjeant with his Mace, which being taken from the Table, wou'd ſtop all Proceedings; but the Door being lock'd upon him, he cou'd not attend his Majeſty. This ſo provok'd the King, that he ſent Maxwell, the Uſher of the Black Rod, to diſſolve the Parliament; but being inform'd that neither he nor his Meſſage wou'd be receiv'd into the Houſe, he in a great Indignation ſent for the Captain of the Penſioners and Guards to force an Entrance. But the Houſe, after two Hours ſitting, and an Adjournment to the tenth of March, roſe ſuddenly, and prevented the Inconveniencies or Miſchiefs that might have probably enſu'd.

Biſhop Williams trys to heal the Breach.

His Advice.

4. And now the Breach was perfected between the King and his Commons: Yet ſtill the politick Biſhop of Lincoln us'd his utmoſt Endeavours to heal theſe unhappy Diviſions. He had before this apply'd himſelf to the Lord Treaſurer Weſton, who had been his Adverſary, inform'd him what Coals were blowing up againſt him, and proffer'd himſelf to bring Sir John Elliot to him, to be reconcil'd, and be his Servant. For which he obtain'd many Thanks and large Promiſes from the Treaſurer; but at the ſame time he highly diſoblig'd the great Sir Thomas Wentworth, for offering to bring his Rival into Favour. To make up the laſt Breach, he importun'd the Treaſurer to carry this Meſſage from him to his Majeſty, 'That the 'Parliament might meet again for all this, and that there 'might be a Conference between both Houſes, to debate 'about Differences: And that he hop'd that the Lords wou'd 'check, if not cenſure thoſe Commons that were ſo rude; 'and, being aſham'd for what they had done, they wou'd 'make Amends by their Submiſſion: But if they were im-'penitently obſtinate, he did not deſire to intercede for 'them.' What the Event of this Counſel might have been, God only knows; for the King, who cou'd not moſt artfully manage his great Oppoſers, did not hearken to it. For the quieting of all Men, he had drawn up a general Pardon, which paſs'd the Houſe of Lords, but the Commons did not ſo much as read it. Therefore ſeeing little Hopes of Accommodation, he reſolv'd to diſſolve the Parliament, being chiefly induc'd to it, as is believ'd, by the Lord Weſton, and Biſhop Laud; which laſt in his Diary tells us, That this Parliament ſought his Ruin; and no doubt it was his Judgment, that they ſought the Ruin of the eſtabliſh'd Church.

Several Members queſtion'd.

A Proclamation was preparing for the Diſſolution, and the very next Day after the Tumults in the Houſe, Warrants were directed from the Council to nine leading Members, Denzil Holles Eſquire, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, John Selden Eſquire, William Coriton, Walter Long, William Stroud, and Benjamin Valentine, commanding their Perſonal Appearance the following Day. At which time Mr. Holles, Sir John Elliot, Mr. Coriton and Mr. Valentine appearing, and refuſing to anſwer out of Parliament, for what was ſaid and done in Parliament, were committed cloſe Priſoners to the Tower; and Warrants were given for the ſealing up the Studies of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and Sir John Elliot, the three moſt fiery and formidable Members; and Proclamations were iſſu'd out for the apprehending of others, who did not appear.

The King's laſt Speech.

To conclude the Parliament, on the tenth of March, his Majeſty in his Royal Throne, with his Crown on his Head, in his Robes, and the Lords in their Robes, the Commons not ſent for, tho' ſeveral appearing below the Bar; the King ſpoke thus: MY LORDS, I never came here upon ſo unpleaſant an Occaſion, it being the Diſſolution of a Parliament.------ I thought it neceſſary to come here to Day, and declare to You and all the World, That it was meerly the undutiful and ſeditious Carriage in the Lower Houſe, that hath made the Diſſolution of this Parliament; and you, my Lords, are ſo far from being any Cauſers of it, that I take as much Comfort in your dutiful Demeanor, as I am juſtly diſtaſted with their Proceedings: Yet to avoid their Miſtakes, let me tell you, That it is ſo far from Me to adjudge all the Houſe alike guilty, that I know that there are many there as dutiful Subjects as any in the World, it being but ſome few Vipers among them that did caſt this Miſt of Undutifulneſs over moſt of their Eyes. Yet to ſay the Truth, there was a good Number there, that cou'd not be infected with this Contagion; inſomuch that ſome did expreſs their Duties in Speaking, which was the general Fault of the Houſe the laſt Day. To conclude, my Lords, as theſe evil-affected Perſons muſt look for their Puniſhment, ſo you, that are of the Higher Houſe, may juſtly expect from me that Favour and Protection, that a good King oweth to his loving and faithful Nobility. And now, my Lord-Keeper, do what I have commanded. Upon which the Lord-Keeper pronounc'd the Parliament diſſolv'd.

The Parliament diſſolv'd.

Thus unhappily ended the third Parliament in this Reign, after it had been kept in Being almoſt a Year, but with a long Receſs. The firſt Seſſion continu'd above fourteen Weeks, and this almoſt ſeven; in the former ſeveral Laws were made, in the latter were none. The Diſcontents of the People were rais'd and artificially improv'd upon this Occaſion; and ſoon after two Libels were thrown about the City, one againſt Biſhop Laud, to this Effect; 'Laud, look to thy ſelf, be aſſur'd thy Life is ſought; as thou art the Fountain of Wickedneſs, repent of thy monſtrous Sins before thou be taken out of the World; and aſſure thy ſelf, neither God nor the World can endure ſuch a vile Counſellor or Whiſperer to live.' The other was as virulent againſt the Lord Treaſurer Weſton.

Diſcontents and Libels.

Upon the many Murmurs and Tendencies to Sedition, the King thought it proper to qualify the Minds of his loving Subjects by a formal Declaration of the Cauſes which mov'd him to diſſolve the laſt Parliament: 'In which he gave an Hiſtorical Account of the unreaſonable Diſturbances, and the Miſchiefs ariſing from ſome of the Houſe of Commons, which occaſion'd his laſt Subſidies to be return'd in ſuch a ſcanty Proportion, as was infinitely ſhort, not only of his great Occaſions, but of the Precedents of former Subſidies. He gave a fair Account of the Right of Tonnage and Poundage, and ſhew'd that ſeveral Kings were in actual Poſſeſſion of it, before it was granted them by Parliament. He complain'd of the exorbitant Encroachments of the Commons, in their unprecedented Searches into all Offices, not ſparing the Honour of the Council-Board it ſelf. While the Duke of Buckingham was alive, all Evils were charg'd upon his mal-Adminiſtration; but after he was dead, no Alteration was found among thoſe envenom'd Spirits, which troubled the then bleſs'd Harmony between Him and his Subjects: A manifeſt Proof that the Duke was not the only Mark they ſhot at, but as a near Miniſter, taken up in their Paſſage to more ſecret Deſigns. He did not impute theſe Diſaſters to the whole Houſe of Commons, but to ſome malevolent Perſons, who like Empericks and lewd Artiſts, ſtrove to make new Work, and to have ſome Diſeaſe on Foot, to keep themſelves in Requeſt, and to be employ'd in the Cure. Then he declar'd, that theſe Provocations had not chang'd his good Intentions to his Subjects, but he wou'd ſtill maintain the true Religion againſt Popery and Schiſm; and their Rights and Liberties, with ſo much Conſtancy and Juſtice, that they ſhall acknowledge, they live in a more happy and free Eſtate, than any Subjects in the Chriſtian World. Laſtly he appeal'd, whether, in Reſpect of the free Paſſage of the Goſpel, indifferent and equal Adminiſtration of Juſtice, Freedom from Oppreſſion, and the Peace and Quietneſs every one enjoys under his own Vine and Fig-Tree, the Happineſs of this Nation can be parallell'd by any Neighbouring Countries.

The Concluſion of this Period.

Thus, with all Simplicity and Fidelity, we have given a regular Account of King Charles's three firſt Parliaments, together with all coincident Affairs, coming within the Compaſs of the firſt four Years of his Reign: And we have been the more particular and diffuſive, that the Reader may have a clearer View of what is thought to be the moſt erroneous, or exceptionable Period of his Government. And after a cool Conſideration of all the Particulars, compar'd and weigh'd with each other, the Reader is left to judge of the Failings and Miſmanagements on both Sides; which have already been the Subject of many Treatiſes, which have weakly, or wickedly repreſented them, according to the Intereſt or Malice of the Authors. He is alſo left to decide this important Queſtion, That ſuppoſing the Errors of the Court to have been equal to the Complaints of the Commons, Whether it was not more reaſonable and healing for the Houſe to have confirm'd by Bill the Tonnage and Poundage, in immediate Return for the Petition of Right, than by an artful deferring of it, to make it the chief Subject of Debate the next Seſſion, and laſtly a Cauſe of a final Separation.

A long Calm.

I. I. HAVING got thro' the firſt four Years of this Reign, which may be call'd ruffling and ſtormy, we gradually fall into a Calm, of more than double that Space of Time; and tho' there were ſome Interruptions, and warm Struggles, as well as Seeds of direful Evils, yet for the greateſt part of twelve Years, no Nation in the World ever enjoy'd at home more Peace and Plenty, more Wealth and Felicity, than England; to the Wonder and Envy of all other Parts of Chriſtendom. And here upon the Entrance into this happy Period, it may be proper to take a ſhort View of the Court, as it continu'd for a conſiderable Time, and of thoſe great Men belonging to it, who had the principal Influence upon the Affairs of the Publick.

An Account of the Court.

Of the King.

The Court it ſelf was moſt regular and ſplendid, during the greateſt Part of this Reign; and the King ever took Care to keep up the Dignity of it, limiting Perſons to Places ſuitable to their Qualities, unleſs he particularly call'd for them. His Deportment was very Majeſtick, not receding from the Height of his Station to the greateſt Foreigners, that came to viſit him and his Court; for tho' he was naturally far from Pride, yet he was careful of Majeſty, and wou'd be approach'd with full Reſpect and Reverence. His Converſation was free and rational, his way of Arguing calm and patient; yet he wou'd diſcountenance all bold and forward Addreſſes to him: And in Suits, or Buſineſs, he wou'd permit none to enter into them abruptly, but expected that the greateſt Perſons ſhou'd, in Affairs of that Nature, addreſs to him by his proper Miniſters, or by ſome ſolemn Deſire of ſpeaking to him in their own Perſons. He ſaw and obſerv'd Men long, before he receiv'd them about his Perſon; and did not love Strangers, nor very confident Men. So that uſually Favours came ſlowly from him, and being not extreamly bountiful in his Nature, he pauſed too long in giving, which made the Receiver leſs ſenſible of the Benefit. An appearing Haughtineſs did too much prevail in the Court, and the King wanted that artificial Condeſcenſion, and exquiſite Way of ſetting off a Favour, which was ſo well known to Queen Elizabeth; ſo that he had not ſo many affectionate Admirers, nor ſo many faithful Servants, as his Innocence and Simplicity really deſerv'd. Yet this reſerv'd Grandeur in the Court was thought to be much owing to the Temper of the Queen, who was very Stately, and often profuſe in Matters of Show and Form; yet perhaps too much debaſing her ſelf to the Compliments of ſome Perſons, eſpecially in the Caſe of her Diverſions. By her Means the Court was fill'd with Maſquerades, Interludes, and ſuch Entertainments, moſt delightful to Ladies; yet beſides the Women attending on herſelf, the King admitted very few great Officers to have their Wives in the Family.

And the Queen.

After the Death of the Duke of Buckingham, the King's Favours were more ſparing and diffus'd, and the principal Conduct of Affairs he more immediately committed to three great Men, Dr. Laud Biſhop of London, the Lord Wentworth, and the Marquis of Hamilton; the firſt preſiding in the Affairs of England, the ſecond of Ireland, and the third of Scotland; and each of them thought an unfortunate Inſtrument towards his Ruin. Some Account has already been given of the Favour and Management of the firſt; therefore we proceed to the ſecond, the Lord Viſcount Wentworth, who was firſt a Baronet, of an ancient Family and fair Eſtate, in Yorkſhire.

A Character of the Lord Wentworth.

There was a current Story in thoſe Times, and acknowledg'd by his Friends, concerning ſome ſtrange Prognoſticks of the Greatneſs and Fate of this extraordinary Man, reveal'd before his Birth to his Father in a Dream, when he was adjudg'd to be at the Point of his Death. However, his ſurpriſing Abilities, accompany'd with a vigorous and haughty Temper, ſoon render'd him conſpicuous to the Eyes of the Nation: And he gave an early Specimen of the Roughneſs of his Nature, in his eager joyning with the Houſe of Commons againſt the Duke of Buckingham; whom he purſu'd with ſuch Reſentment, that when the Houſe was conſulting how to frame a particular Charge againſt him, he adviſ'd to make a general One, to accuſe him of Treaſon, and to let him get off as he cou'd. Thus he gave Counſel againſt Another, which was afterwards taken up and turn'd againſt Himſelf; and ſo preſſing upon another Man's Caſe, he awaken'd his own Fate. For a long time he heartily join'd with Mr. Pym; but deſigning to make his Peace with the Court, we are told that he ſent to meet him in private, and in a ſet Speech ſounded him about the wrong Proceedings at preſent, and the Advantages of liſtning to the Court Offers. Upon which Mr. Pym, gueſſing at his Inclinations, interrupted him with this Expreſſion, You need not uſe all this Art to tell me, That you are going to be undone: But remember, That tho' you leave us now, I will never leave you while your Head is upon your Shoulders. Being come over to the Court, he was ſo ſuddenly made Privy-Counſellor, Preſident of the North, a Baron, and a Viſcount, that the Duke of Buckingham himſelf flew not ſo high in ſo ſhort a Space of Time. The laſt Honour was conferr'd with great Solemnity at White-Hall, when the Heralds fetch'd his Pedigree from the Blood Royal of John of Gaunt; which occaſion'd the Lord Powis, who diſlik'd his Perſon and Temper, to ſwear, If ever he came to be King of England, he wou'd turn Rebel. He was unqueſtionably of extraordinary Parts and Endowments of Nature, which were excellently cultivated by Education; of a piercing Judgment and a pregnant Fancy, and ſo furniſh'd with Reaſon, that he might rather be ſaid to demonſtrate, than to argue. In ſhort, his Abilities in general were ſo eminent, that afterwards Cardinal Richelieu, by Way of Indignation againſt the Engliſh, pronounc'd him the wiſeſt Head in their Nation. But being of too high and ſevere a Deportment, of a Cholerick Diſpoſition, and too regardleſs of Ceremony, he ſoon gain'd many Enemies; for he proceeded as tho' he wou'd be juſt to all, but gracious to none, but to ſome Intimates: So that as his Friend Biſhop Laud ſeem'd too much to neglect, ſo he too much to overlook the Amity of ſuch as afterwards deſerted him. Tho' for the future he continu'd invincibly loyal to the King, and faithful to the Church; yet his active Proceedings, meeting with a ſtrange Series of Accidents, highly promoted the Ruin of Himſelf, his Friend, and his Maſter.

Of James Marquis of Hamilton.

James Marquis of Hamilton was a young Scotch Peer, his Family of a very high and noble Deſcent, and near in Blood to the Crown itſelf. In his Youth he had marry'd the Niece of the Duke of Buckingham, the Daughter of the Earl of Denbigh, who marrying the Duke's Siſter, was rais'd to this Title from a private Gentleman of the Houſe of Fielding. Not long after, upon ſome Diſcontent the Marquis retir'd into Scotland; but after the Duke's Death, he was recall'd, made Maſter of the Horſe, Gentleman of the King's Bed-chamber, and Privy-Counſellor in both Kingdoms. He was treated with great Intimacy and Affection, and had a large Proportion of his Majeſty's Favour and Confidence; and knew very dextrouſly how to manage both, advantagiouſly to accompany the King in his hard Chaces of the Stagg, and the toilſom Pleaſures of a Racket. Tho' he carry'd every Thing with great Modeſty and Warineſs, yet he had a mighty Influence upon the greateſt Affairs at Court, eſpecially when they related to his own Country-men. At his firſt Appearance there, many Courtiers took particular Notice of his remarkable Aſpect, as tho' it portended ſomething extraordinary. But the Lord Clarendon intimates, that his natural Darkneſs and Reſervedneſs in his Diſcourſe, and his ſerving under the King of Sweden afterwards, made him thought a wiſer and valianter Man, and conſequently a more dangerous Enemy, than really he was. He ſeem'd to have had a peculiar Art in Management, and naturally lov'd to gain his Point rather by ſome ſerpentine Winding, than by a direct Path. But for thoſe treacherous Actings of which he was thought to be guilty, they ſhall have a more proper Place: Only we ſhall here obſerve, That by his Influence, and the King's Fondneſs towards his native Country, the Court became fill'd with Scotch-Men, who obtain'd Places and Revenues to a Proportion that was thought againſt all the Rules of Reaſon and Policy.

A Character of other great Men.

2. Thus we have given ſome Account of the Court, and the Triumvirate that preſided, or had greateſt Influence in the Adminiſtration, during the happieſt Part of this Reign, and was thought to haſten on the Part that was moſt unhappy. But there were ſeveral others, who were very near to the King, and in Places of the greateſt Truſt, who ought alſo to be taken Notice of, as belonging more immediately to the Court; ſuch as the Lord-Keeper, the Lord-Treaſurer, the Earl Marſhal, the Lord-Steward, the Lord-Chamberlain, ſome Privy-Counſellors, and the two Secretaries of State; in which we ſhall follow the Lord Clarendon, with ſome Improvements.

Of the Lord Keeper Coventry.

The Lord-Keeper of the great Seal was Sir Thomas Coventry, a Son of the Robe, and newly made a Baron. His Skill in the Law, by a rare Aſcent rais'd him to be Recorder of London, Sollicitor-General, and the King's Attorney, before he was forty Years of Age. Upon the Removal of the Biſhop of Lincoln he was made Lord-Keeper, which Place he enjoy'd with an univerſal Reputation to his Death; having his Train and Followers ſo agreeably diſpoſ'd, as to avoid both Envy and Contempt, particularly without the Oſtentation of his two Predeceſſors. He proceeded in a regular Courſe; and beſides the Knowledge of the Law, he had a clear Inſight into the whole Policy of the Government, both in Church and State, which, through the Ignorance of well-meaning Men, had too much juſtled each other. His Preſence had ſomething venerable in it, and he deliver'd himſelf without much Ornament of Speech; ſo that tho' he wou'd frankly deny, yet it was with ſo much Candour and Condeſcenſion to the Perſons he cou'd not oblige, that few departed from him with ill Wiſhes or Reſentment. But this happy Temper rather preſerv'd him from violent Enemies, than furniſh'd him with hearty Friends; ſo that he was a Man, rather exceedingly lik'd, than paſſionately lov'd. His Security conſiſted in having but little Credit with the King; therefore he liv'd within himſelf, without venturing to oppoſe the growing Miſchiefs, which he knew he had no Power to reſtrain; and he dy'd in a happy Time, before they arriv'd to their fatal Operation.

Of the Lord Treaſurer Weſton.

Sir Richard Weſton, afterwards Earl of Portland, was Lord High Treaſurer, and advanc'd at a ſlippery Seaſon, when five of that high Office were then alive, the Earl of Suffolk, the Earl of Mancheſter, the Earl of Middleſex, the Earl of Marlborough, and himſelf. He was a Gentleman of a very ancient Family, bred up ſome Years in the Study of the Law, and at an Age fit for Obſervations and Reflections, ſent into Foreign Parts; after which he liv'd in Court with an Awe agreeable to the Modeſty of the Age, when Men were ſeen ſome Time before they were known, and well known before they were advanc'd, or durſt pretend to it. Having gain'd the Staff, he grew more ambitious, and tho' he had full Share in his Maſter's Eſteem, he ſhew'd a vehement Deſire to be ſole Favourite: So that he became more exact in prying into other Mens Duties, than in the Diſcharge of his own; and even his Vices admitted thoſe Contradictions in them, that he cou'd hardly enjoy the Pleaſure of any of them. That which firſt expos'd him to the Jealouſy of the Publick, was the Suſpicion of his Religion, his Wife and all his Daughters being profeſs'd Papiſts; and tho' he and his Sons appear'd ſometimes at Church, he was never thought a Friend to it: His moſt familiar Converſation was with thoſe of the Romiſh Perſuaſion; and yet he was ſo little in Credit with that Party, that they were the only People who did not believe him of their Profeſſion. He took a politick Care to ſupport himſelf by the Aſſiſtance of thoſe accounted Patriots, and procur'd the Advancement of old Sir John Savile, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Dudley Diggs, and the famous Mr. Noy; yet, like his Maſter Buckingham, he much oppos'd the Queen, and croſs'd her Pretences and Deſires with more Rudeneſs than was natural to him. He had not long enjoy'd his Office, before he loſt the Reputation of a ſtout, bold, magnanimous Man, which in worſe Times he had obtain'd; and after all the King's great Bounties and Honours beſtow'd on him, and after vaſt Sums of Mony gotten, and rather conſum'd than enjoy'd,

joy'd, in a few Years he dy'd unlamented by any, leaving a numerous Family, who were in a ſhort time worn out, and yet out-liv'd the Fortune he had left them.

Of the Earl of Mancheſter, Lord Privy Seal.

The next great Officer of State was Henry Mountague, the Lord Privy-Seal, who from Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench, had been made Lord High Treaſurer in King James's Reign; but in leſs than a Year, by the recalling that Favour, he was reduc'd to the almoſt empty Title of Preſident of the Council. To allay the Senſe of the Diſhonour, he was created Viſcount Mandevile, and after that Earl of Mancheſter, and made Lord Privy-Seal, which, in the midſt of many Removes and Degradations from other Offices, he enjoy'd to his Death. He was a wiſe Man, and of an excellent Temper, of great Induſtry and Sagacity in Buſineſs, in which he much delighted. But his Honours having grown quicker upon him than his Fortunes, in his old Age he became too ſolicitous to advance the latter; whereby he made himſelf leſs capable of ſerving the Publick, and expos'd himſelf to many Reproaches and Inconveniencies. Then he was often unhappily us'd as a Check upon the Lord-Keeper Coventry, and his Authority call'd for againſt the other's Objections in Law, to the frequent gratifying the unjuſtifiable Deſigns and Pretences of the Council. Yet ſtill his Virtues ſo outweighed his Infirmities, that he ever preſerv'd a good Reputation in general with the People, being eſteem'd zealous for the Proteſtant Religion, and faithful to the King; and ſo continued till near eighty Years of Age, and dy'd at a Time when no Man cou'd promiſe Security from his Religion or Fidelity.

Of the Earl of Arundel, Earl Marſhal.

Thomas Earl of Arundel was the next in Office, as being Earl Marſhal, tho' in his own Right and Quality he preceded the reſt of the Council, being of the famous Family of the Howards. His Perſon and Aſpect ſhew'd ſomething very great, which he preſerv'd in his Gait and Motion, and alſo in his peculiar Habit and Dreſs; which caus'd many to look upon him as the Image and Repreſentative of the primitive Nobility. He was generally thought to be a proud Man, and ſeem'd to live as in another Nation, his Houſe being the common Reſort of Strangers, or thoſe who affected to appear as ſuch. He ſometimes went to Court, becauſe There only was a greater Man than himſelf, and went the ſeldomer becauſe there Was a Man greater than himſelf. Sir Edward Walker looks upon him as the greateſt Aſſertor of the Splendor and Greatneſs of the Crown, and the ancient Honour of the Nobility, that liv'd in his Time. Yet he affected not Popularity nor Dependents; but by his promoting of Arts, Paintings, Sculptures and Buildings, his Expences always exceeded his great Revenues. He was thought rather to have no Concern for Religion in general, than to incline to any Party; and had little other Affection for the Nation, than as he had a great Share in it, where like the Leviathan he might ſport himſelf; from which he withdrew as ſoon as a Storm aroſe, and the Repoſe of it began to be diſturb'd, and dy'd in Italy under the Suſpicion of the Romiſh Religion.

The Earl of Pembroke, Lord Steward.

William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, was a Man of another Mould and Fame, and Reputation with all Men, being the moſt univerſally belov'd and eſteem'd of any Man of that Age: And as he had a great Number of the beſt ſort of Friends, ſo no Man had the Confidence to avow himſelf his Enemy. He was firſt made Lord Chamberlain, and afterwards Lord Steward of the Houſhold; and the Court appear'd with more Luſtre, becauſe he had the Government of that Province. And ſure never Man was planted in a Court, that was fitter for that Soil, or brought better Qualities with him to purify that Air. He was a great Lover of his Country, and of Religion and Juſtice, which he believ'd cou'd only ſupport it, his Friendſhip and Converſation lying only among Men of thoſe Principles. Yet all theſe rare Qualities were ſtrangely allay'd with Vice, and clouded with great Infirmities, which he had in too exorbitant a Proportion. He indulg'd to himſelf the Pleaſures of all Kinds, almoſt in all Exceſſes; and to Women he was immoderately addicted; but in that likewiſe he continu'd ſo much himſelf, that he was not ſo tranſported with outward Allurements, as charm'd with the Beauties of the Mind. To theſe he ſacrific'd himſelf, his Time, and much of his Fortune; and ſeveral believ'd that his natural Vivacity and Vigour began to decline, by thoſe exceſſive Indulgences. So that within two Years after the Death of the Duke of Buckingham he dy'd ſuddenly, and exceedingly lamented by Men of all Qualities.

The Earl of Montgomery, Lord Chamberlain.

His Brother Philip Earl of Montgomery, Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold, and the Earl of Dorſet, were likewiſe of the Privy-Council; Men of very different Talents and Qualifications. The former, at King James's Entrance, being ſcarce of Age, had the good Fortune by the Comelineſs of his Perſon, and indefatigable Application in Hunting, to attract the Eye of that Monarch towards him; and in a Year or two to be made Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, and Earl of Montgomery. He was paſſionate and inſolent in his Behaviour, rough and noiſy in his Converſation, and pretended to no other Qualifications than to underſtand Horſes and Dogs very well, and to be believ'd honeſt and generous, which rais'd him many Friends, and left him then no Enemy. Afterwards, when Robert Carr came into Favour, without Murmur he left all Doors open for his Admittance; which ſo highly oblig'd the King, that he ſtill gave him a ſecond Place in his Affection, and recommended him to his Son at his Death, as a Man of Honeſty and Fidelity; tho' it will appear in the Sequel, that he had not ſufficient Ballaſt to endure a Storm. The other, Edward Sackvill Earl of Dorſet, was in every Reſpect another Man; his Perſon beautiful, vigorous and graceful; his Wit pleaſant, ſparkling and ſublime; and his other Parts of Learning and Language, of that Luſtre, that he cou'd not fail in the World. The Vices he had, were of the Age, which he cou'd not tell how to contemn, or reſiſt; but gave both his Perſon and Parts their full Scope without Reſtraint, and indulg'd himſelf in all the Pleaſures, that the Seaſon of his Life cou'd ſuggeſt to him. Notwithſtanding his Defects, his great Parts, and Reputation he acquir'd, inclin'd King James to call him to his Privy-Council before his Death: And had he not given too much Way to his natural Conſtitution and Proſperity, nor been wrung by an uneaſy Fortune, he had certainly prov'd an excellent Man for Buſineſs; for he had a quick diſcerning Spirit, a generous obliging Temper, and was withal of a moſt entire Fidelity to the Crown.

1629. Car. 5.

The Earl of Dorſet.

There were two others of great Authority in the Council, being much eſteem'd in the Court, and as accompliſh'd Courtiers as any in Europe; namely, the Earls of Carliſle and Holland, both Men of Pleaſure, yet well acquainted with the Affairs of the Kingdom, and better vers'd in thoſe abroad, than any who ſat then at the Board. The former, nam'd James Hay, a Scotch Gentleman of a noble Family, who, by his fine Breeding, polite Learning, and graceful Behaviour, was through ſeveral Steps advanc'd by King James to his Earldom; and by his Means he alſo obtain'd a ſole Daughter and Heir of the Lord Denny, and with her a fair Inheritance in Land. He rather maintain'd a civil Intelligence than a real Friendſhip with the other Favourites; and having Credit enough with the King to ſecure his own Intereſt, he took no Care for that of other Men. He made no Scruple of running in Debt, and borrowing all he cou'd for the Support of his Luſtre and Luxury; for he was a Man of prodigious Expence in his own Perſon, both for Cloaths and Diet, being indeed an Original of thoſe Inventions, which others did no more than copy. He dy'd with the Reputation of a fine Gentleman, and after having jovially ſpent above four hundred Thouſand Pounds, which he receiv'd from the Crown, he dy'd in all Appearance in as much Tranquility of Mind, as a Man of a more ſevere Life and Virtue; and without leaving a Houſe or Acre of Land to preſerve his Memory. The other, Henry Rich, Earl of Holland, was the younger Son of a noble Houſe, who after ſome Experience in the Field abroad, grew very acceptable to the Duke of Buckingham; by whoſe Means, and that of a lovely winning Preſence, he found an eaſy Admiſſion into the Court and King James's Favour. Tho' his Friendſhip was more entire to the Earl of Carliſle, who was more of his Nature and Humour, he took all Care to endear himſelf to the Duke, whoſe Creature he ſtill deſir'd to be eſteem'd; and in this he ſo well ſucceeded, that the King cou'd not be more in haſte to advance the Duke, than the Duke was to promote Him. He was preferr'd by him to a Wife, the Daughter and Heir of Cope, by whom he had the Seat and Manor of Kenſington, of which he was created Baron; after which he was made Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to Prince Charles, Earl of Holland, Captain of the Guard, Knight of the Garter, and Privy-Counſellor; and likewiſe employ'd in the Queen's Marriage in France, as was formerly mention'd. After the Duke's Death, having the particular Advantage of the Queen's Favour, he was at continual Variance with the Lord Treaſurer Portland, and whoever elſe was not for aggrandizing her Authority. Thus he continu'd to flouriſh while the Weather was fair, but as ſoon as the Storm aroſe, he fell from his former Honour and Gratitude, into a Condition which there will hereafter be too much Cauſe to mention more largely.

The Earl of Carliſle.

The Earl of Holland, Captain of the Guard.

The two Secretaries, Sir John Cook, and Sir Dudley Carleton.

To conclude with the two Secretaries of State, then Officers of leſs Importance than in latter Times, who were Sir John Cook, and Sir Dudley Carleton. The firſt, of a narrow Education and narrower Soul, was at fifty Years of Age call'd to a painful Employment in the Navy-Office, upon the Reputation of his Induſtry and Diligence; and from thence remov'd to be Maſter of Requeſts, and Secretary of State, in which Office he continu'd to a very great Age. His grand Perfection was Induſtry, and his eminent Infirmity, Covetouſneſs. He was by Experience well acquainted with the State and Affairs of England; but was a perfect Stranger to all Foreign Tranſactions, and the common Intereſt of Chriſtendom. Of a quite contrary Nature and Education was his Aſſociate, Sir Dudley Carleton, who well underſtood all Foreign Affairs, but was a Stranger to the Conſtitution of his own Country, and the Nature of the People. He was a Man of Parts, and had been ſent Ambaſſador to Venice, and twice to Holland; being the laſt of the Engliſh Nation who was admitted to vote in the general Aſſembly of the States. After which he was made a Privy-Counſellor; and the laſt Piece of Workmanſhip the Duke of Buckingham liv'd to finiſh, was the making him Secretary of State, and a Peer of the Realm, when he had ſcarce any viſible Eſtate to ſupport that Honour.

and

A general Obſervation.

3. Such was the State of the Court at this Time, and for a conſiderable Space after; by which it appears that there had not been the moſt happy Choice in the Miniſtry, and that the major Part was not over capable, nor very likely to ſerve the King well. It was certainly a licentious Age, in the midſt of great Regularities; and it has been juſtly made a Wonder that the Court ſhou'd be ſo corrupt in Manners, when the King himſelf was an inconteſtable Example of Piety, Chaſtity and Sobriety. The greateſt Part of theſe Miniſters were chiefly intent upon their own Accommodations in their Fortunes, in which they did not abound, or in their Eaſe and Pleaſure, which they paſſionately affected; having no further Care of the Publick, than that no Diſturbance might break in upon them in their own Days. The reſt, who had larger Hearts, and more publick Spirits, us'd their Labour and Activity chiefly to ſecure the Empire at home by all peaceable Arts, and Advancement of Trade, which might gratify the People, and repleniſh the King's exhauſted Treaſury: Towards which they all unanimouſly Concurr'd in their Advice to the King, ‘To put the quickeſt Period he cou'd to the expenſive War againſt the two Crowns of France and Spain.’

A Proclamation concerning Parliaments.

Of ill Conſequence.

Scarce any of them had any Reaſon to be in love with Parliaments; therefore ſoon after the King had publiſh'd an appeaſing Declaration concerning the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, as was formerly mention'd, an unhappy Step was made, and a Proclamation iſſu'd out, in which it was declar'd, ‘That ſince for ſeveral ill Ends the Calling again of a Parliament was divulg'd, however his Majeſty had ſhew'd, by his frequent Meeting with his People, his Love to the Uſe of Parliaments, yet the late Abuſe having for the preſent driven his Majeſty unwillingly out of that Courſe, he ſhall account it Preſumption for any to preſcribe any Time to his Majeſty for Parliaments.’ Which Words were generally interpreted, as if no more Parliaments were to be expected, and that all Men were prohibited to ſpeak of thoſe Aſſemblies. This produc'd two very ill Effects of different Natures: It affected many good Men, even ſuch as had been Scandaliz'd at the Diſtempers that provok'd the King; and caus'd them to open their Ears to the Inſinuations of thoſe who made it their Buſineſs to infuſe an Opinion, That there was a real Intention to alter the Form of Government both in Church and State. Then this Freedom from the Danger of a Parliamentary Inquiſition did not only encourage Ill Men to all Boldneſs and Licence; but even thoſe who had leſs Propenſity, imagining themſelves above the Reach of ordinary Juſtice, learn'd by Degrees to think that no Fault, which was like to find no Puniſhment.

New Projects.

A Peace with France.

In Confirmation of this Opinion, ſome new Projects began to be ſet on foot for raiſing of Mony; the Payment of Tonnage and Poundage was ſtrictly requir'd, to preſerve the narrow Seas, and a Corporation of Starch-Makers was ſettled, in Order to bring in a yearly Revenue to the Crown. His Majeſty made a particular Declaration concerning Religion, ‘To preſerve that Unity of Doctrine and Diſcipline eſtabliſh'd in the Time of Queen Elizabeth; and likewiſe the Laws were order'd to be put in Execution againſt Popiſh Recuſants. But the main Buſineſs at preſent was to bring about a Peace with France and Spain; the former of which was compleated in a ſhort Time, and publiſh'd in England upon the tenth Day of May. The Articles contain'd nothing extraordinary, therefore are here omitted; only at the Inſtance of the Queen, in regard of a joyful Peace, his Majeſty was pleas'd that certain Prieſts and Recuſants, who were then in ſeveral Priſons, ſhou'd be releas'd, and deliver'd to the French Ambaſſador to be tranſported beyond the Seas.

A Peace deſign'd with Spain.

The King has a Son, who dies immediately.

II. 1. His Britiſh Majeſty had now happily clear'd himſelf of the moſt threatning War; and for Spain, that King, by his Loſs in Italy, was brought low enough to ſue for Peace with England. To ſolicite this Affair, Peter Paul Reubens the renowned Painter of Antwerp, Secretary and Gentleman of the Chamber to the Arch-Dutcheſs, was ſent to Court as an Agent, and ſeem'd to offer the Reſtitution of the Palatinate, which was but a Bait to bring on other Terms. Upon the Jealouſie of the Spaniards, and the Honour of the Engliſh Court, this Negotiation proceeded ſlowly, till Reubens was recall'd, and Don Carlos de Colomos was ſent over as Ambaſſador, and brought it to a Concluſion in the following Year. The Peace with France was one great Step towards the Quiet of the Court; and it was but three Days after when the Queen before her Time was deliver'd of a Son, and the Romiſh Prieſts were ſo daring in the Bed-Chamber, that they wou'd have immediately baptiz'd the Child in their Way, if the King had not ſtepp'd in, and expreſly aſſign'd that Office to his Chaplain Dr. Webb, who baptiz'd him by the Name of Charles: He dy'd about an Hour after, and was interr'd at Weſtminſter by the Biſhop of London.

Proceedings againſt the late Members of Parliament.

They refus'd to Submit to the Star-Chamber.

The Court had now ſufficient Leiſure to proſecute the impriſon'd Members, that had rais'd ſuch Commotions in the Houſe of Commons, and it was firſt reſolv'd to proceed againſt them in the Star-Chamber: Accordingly the Attorney-General propos'd ſome Queſtions to the Judges, concerning their Powers and Privileges, to which they gave diſtinct Anſwers, and expreſly declar'd, ‘That if Parliament-Men committed an Offence againſt the King or Council, not in a Parliamentary Way; or if they rais'd falſe Rumours and Slanders againſt the Lords of the Council and Judges, they were puniſhable out of Parliament, and after the Parliament is ended.’ Upon which an Information was exhibited in the Star-Chamber againſt the Members in Cuſtody: Sir John Elliot, Denzil Holles, Benjamin Valentine, Walter Long, William Corriton, William Strode, John Selden, Sir Miles Hobart, and Sir Peter Hayman, for their undutiful Speeches and Actions in the late Parliament. In Trinity-Term they ſeverally brought a Habeas Corpus, and after Pleading, a Return was made, that their Cauſe of Commitment was Special, and they ought not to be Bail'd. Yet in Michaelmaſs Term the Judges came to a Reſolution, ‘That the Priſoners ſhou'd be Bail'd, upon giving Securities for their Good Behaviour. But this Motion of Diſcharge proceeded from the King Himſelf, who had conferr'd with the Judges, and had declar'd his Willingneſs to have the Priſoners Bail'd, notwithſtanding they were ſo obſtinate, that they wou'd not by Petition expreſs, That they were ſorry he was offended with them. But the Priſoners began now to value Themſelves upon their Sufferings, and had ſo much Countenance from ſeveral of their late Fellow-Members, that they wou'd not now accept of a Deliverance, but unanimouſly refus'd to find Sureties for their Behaviour: And Mr. Holles was ſo induſtrious to be continu'd in Cuſtody, That when a Friend offer'd his own Bail, he wou'd not yield to the uſual Courſe of the Court, to be bound with him Himſelf. Alſo Mr. Long, who had actually found Sureties in the Judge's Chamber, declar'd in Court, That his Sureties ſhou'd continue no longer. Such a Merit did they place in Confinement, as to labour againſt their own Liberty; and by ſuch a glorying in Perſecution raiſe a Popularity to Themſelves, and an Odium on the King, and Court.

They are puniſh'd in the King's-Bench.

Upon this untractable Humour the King purſu'd another Method as more likely to take place, and dropping the Proceſs in the Star-Chamber, it was reſolv'd to proceed againſt them by Common-Law at the King's-Bench Bar, where in this Michaelmaſs Term an Information was exhibited by the Attorney-General, to which the Defendents put in a Plea againſt the very Juriſdiction of the Court. Yet the Court did not immediately over-rule the Plea, but gave a Day to join in Demurr that Term; when after long and learned Arguments on both Sides, the Judges agreed, ‘That the Court, as this Caſe is, ſhall have Juriſdiction, although theſe Offences were committed in Parliament, and that the impriſon'd Members ought to anſwer.’ But the Defendants pertinaciouſly refus'd to put in any other Plea: Upon which, on the laſt Day of the Term, Judgment was given againſt them upon a Nihil dicit, namely, ‘That every Defendant ſhou'd be impriſon'd during the King's Pleaſure, and none to be releas'd, 'till he gave Security in this Court for his good Behaviour, and made Submiſſion and Acknowledgment of his Offence. That Sir John Elliot, as the greateſt Offender and Ringleader, ſhou'd pay a Fine to the King of two Thouſand Pounds, Mr. Holles a Thouſand Marks, and Mr. Valentine five Hundred Pounds.’ They all refus'd to ſubmit to any Thing but the Neceſſity of a long Impriſonment, where ſome of them dy'd in Cuſtody, and others treaſur'd up a Reputation of Confeſſors for the Privilege of Parliament; and when the Times turn'd, receiv'd an ample Reward of Thanks and Mony.

The Death of Sir John Elliot.

Sir John Elliot was likewiſe diſtinguiſh'd from the reſt by being impriſon'd in the Tower, where in this or the next Year he dy'd, not without Complaints from his Friends of the Cloſeneſs of his Confinement. He was a

Man

The Earl of Totneſs,

Mr. Speed,

Mr. James,

Sir Edwin Sandys,

And Judge Yelverton.

Man of very great Parts and Activity, ſufficiently able to have done much Good; yet very wiſe Men have thought that the Proſecution of the Civil Grievances miſcarry'd, chiefly becauſe he ſtood up to manage them. For if we look upon the Pride and Turbulency of his Spirit, his treacherous Barbarity to Mr. Moyle, and both his Flatteries and his Spite to the Duke of Buckingham, we cannot help concluding him one of the greateſt Incendiaries in the Nation; and that there is no Man more pernicious and dangerous, than a diſguſted Courtier that ſets up for a Patriot. In this Year alſo dy'd three or four other Men of Note, as George Carew, Earl of Totneſs, who by his Merits was advanc'd to Places in three ſeveral Reigns; having been a valiant Commander, an honeſt Counſellor, a polite Scholar, a Lover of Antiquities, and a great Patron of Learning. Next was John Speed, a Cheſhire Man, and ſuppos'd to have been firſt a Taylor; but Sir Fulk Grevil putting him in a Condition to follow his Studies, he ſucceſsfully compil'd the Hiſtory of England, and had the Aſſiſtance of the foremention'd Carew, Sir Robert Cotton, Mr. Camden, and others: And he alſo with Reputation compos'd the Scripture Genealogies, formerly annex'd to the Bible. After him was Thomas James, a great Friend of Mr. Camden's, a famous Antiquary, and Promoter of Learning, and a terrible Scourge to the Papiſts and Romaniſts; who dy'd this Year at New-College in Oxford. Next was Sir Edwin Sandys, Son to the Archbiſhop of York of the ſame Name, a Perſon of ſingular Judgment and Ingenuity, and of a polite, copious and commanding Pen, and not leſs remarkable for Policy and State Affairs. Laſtly dy'd Sir Henry Yelverton, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, a very Religious Gentleman, and well read in the Municipal Laws of the Land, who, if the Duke of Buckingham had liv'd, wou'd in all probability have been made Lord-Keeper of the great Seal.

The Earl of Pembroke's Death.

2. The following Year was uſher'd in by the much lamented Death of a great Miniſter of State, the Earl of Pembroke, Lord Warden of the Stanneries, Governour of Portſmouth, Knight of the Garter, Lord High Steward of the Houſhold, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford, whoſe Character has already been given. His Death had been foretold both by his Tutor Stanford, and the Lady Davis, and that he ſhou'd not out-live his Birth-Day, when fifty Years of Age; for which the latter was for ſome Time impriſon'd. But being very pleaſant and healthful that Day, after he had Supt, and return'd from the Counteſs of Bedford's Table, he ſaid he wou'd never truſt a Woman Propheteſs, for the Lady Davis's Sake. He went very well to his Repoſe, but before eight in the Morning, he was ſnatch'd away by an Apoplexy; a Diſtemper that has prov'd fatal to many who have been exceſſive in their Pleaſures. He dy'd very much in Debt, but left many of his Servants and Dependents Maſters of good Eſtates, rais'd out of his Employments and Bounty. Having no Heir of his own, his Honour deſcended to his Brother Philip, Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, of whom we have already given ſome Account.

Biſhop Laud made Chancellor of Oxford.

Upon the Earl's Death, the Chancellorſhip of the Univerſity of Oxford, notwithſtanding the Oppoſition made by Biſhop Williams's Intereſt, was by a great Majority conferr'd upon Dr. Laud Biſhop of London, who now became the greateſt Patron of Learning and Religion, the greateſt Promoter of Diſcipline and Government, and the greateſt Benefactor to all publick Deſigns of Piety and Charity, and therefore the moſt fit for this Honour. The Largeneſs of his Soul may be meaſur'd by thoſe munificent Projects, which he ſet down this Year, moſt of which he finiſh'd in Time, as may be ſeen in the Particulars at the End of his Diary, publiſh'd by Mr. Wharton. All which ſufficiently ſhew'd the Greatneſs of his Undertakings, which ought to be noted by a Hiſtorian as a glorious Mitigation of his Infirmities, ſince the breaking through all Impediments, and the perfecting his noble Deſigns, were chiefly owing to that Fervour and Impetus of Mind, which prov'd the greateſt Cauſe of his Ruin.

Several Projects for Mony.

1630. Car. 6.

3. The Parliament having omitted the proper Seaſon for Accommodation after the Duke of Buckingham's Death, the Court was neceſſitated to have Recourſe to ſuch Ways of raiſing Supplies, as upon great Exigencies had been practis'd in former Reigns, tho' long diſus'd, and to revive old and obſolete Laws, to gain that as a Right and Duty, which cou'd not be obtain'd of free Will and Bounty. Several Projects were diverſly ſet on foot, particularly the Lords of the Council adviſ'd the King to put forth a Proclamation, declaring his Pleaſure to confirm to his Subjects their defective Titles in their Eſtates, as well by Colour of former Grants, as without any Grant from the Crown. Accordingly a Proclamation was iſſu'd out, to inform the People, That his Majeſty had renew'd a Commiſſion to ſome Lords, Judges and others, to ſell, grant and confirm to them all Poſſeſſions, where their Titles were defective, by making of ſuch Compoſition, as the ſaid Commiſſioners ſhou'd approve and accept. This did not turn to any good Account, but rather to a popular Notion of new Grievances; and another Attempt had leſs Succeſs. For in Order to bring in Mony, the King ſent his Letters to the Judges and Attorney-General, to frame and publiſh certain Orders for Execution of the Office of Receiver and Collector of Fines and Forfeitures, erected by the late King his Father, and by his preſent Majeſty confirm'd to particular Perſons. But the Judges after a Conſultation concluded, that the ſaid Letters-Patents were both againſt Law and the King's Profit, and ſent an Account of the Exceſſes and Irregularities in the ſaid Patent, to the Lord-Keeper and the Lord-Treaſurer. This quaſh'd the Deſign; and tho' it ſhew'd the Integrity of the Judges on one ſide, and the King's Readineſs to recede, when his Judges cou'd not pronounce a Thing ſtrictly legal, yet it was apply'd to the Prejudice of the Court, as if they were purſuing Methods not juſtifiable by Law.

That of Knighthood, &c.

Another Project was reaſſum'd, and principally aſſign'd to the Lord Wentworth's Management, which was for raiſing of Mony upon the long omitted Aid due at the King's Coronation for Knighthood; which in Edward the Second's Time was payable by every Man, that had fifteen Pounds per Annum: But then for the Eaſe of inferior Sort of Subjects, it was carry'd by Statute to twenty Pounds per Annum, which was a ſufficient Evidence of its Antiquity and Legality. But at this Time, becauſe of the different Valuations of Mony, none were charg'd that had leſs than forty Pounds per Annum; and by this Commiſſion through the Kingdom was ſuppos'd to be rais'd a hundred Thouſand Pounds, but with many ungrateful Struggles and Oppoſition. For moſt Men lookt upon it as illegal, becauſe it ſeem'd antiquated; not conſidering that former Parliaments had uſually laid it aſleep by their timely Supplies: But now the King's Neceſſities were ſo preſſing, that he ſeem'd reſolv'd to make uſe of any Authority, which his Regality by Cuſtom or Law had formerly exercis'd. And under Pretence of this Kind crept in divers Monopolies and Projects probably leſs warrantable; in which the Envy and Reproach came to the King, and the Profit to other Men. Inſomuch that of two hundred thouſand Pounds drawn in a Year from the Subject, by theſe Ways, ſcarce fifteen Hundred came to the King's Uſe, or Account.

A great Riot in London.

At this Time Diſaffection and Sedition were ſo induſtriouſly fomented in the City of London, that upon Occaſion of an Arreſt made by the Sheriffs Officers in Fleet-ſtreet, a very tumultuous Riot was made upon it; and the Lord-Mayor and Sheriffs, and Train'd-Bands, coming down to diſperſe the Multitude, did for a while meet with open and violent Oppoſition. Among the Ringleaders, one John Stamford was apprehended, and convicted of Murder; a Perſon who had been much in Favour with the Duke of Buckingham for his ſingular Activity and Strength of Body. The King out of his natural Tenderneſs had been too ready to grant Pardons to Malefactors; but now being made ſenſible by his Judges, he reſiſted his own Inclinations, and the Reſpect to his deceaſed Favourite, with all the Importunities of Stamford's Friends; which Piece of Juſtice is highly applauded and celebrated by the Pen of Sir Henry Wootton.

The Caſe of Dr. Leighton.

His Puniſhment.

About the ſame Time a Criminal of another Nature occaſion'd a new Diſturbance to the Publick, Dr. Alexander Leighton, a Scotch Divine, who had publiſh'd a furious and ſeditious Book, entitled, An Appeal to the Parliament, or a Plea againſt Prelacy; for which an Information was exhibited againſt him in the Star-Chamber. Here ſeveral Expreſſions appear'd ſo exorbitant, and ſo inſolent againſt the Government, that the two Lord Chief Juſtices, that were preſent, deliver'd their Opinion, 'That they wou'd have 'proceeded againſt him for Treaſon, if the Cauſe had come 'before them;' and other Lords declar'd it 'to be his Ma'jeſty's great Mercy and Goodneſs, that he was brought 'to receive the Cenſure of this Court, and not arraign'd 'for a Traitor at another Bar.' In Concluſion, he was ſentenc'd to Impriſonment during the King's Pleaſure, and to a Fine of ten Thouſand Pounds; to be degraded in the Eccleſiaſtical Court; to be then twice Pilloried and Whipp'd, to have both his Ears cut off, his Noſe ſlit, and his Face ſtigmatiz'd. But waiting in vain for the Penitence of the Offender, after five Months Reſpite, and the Perſon making his Eſcape, he was brought back to the Fleet, and had the Sentence executed upon him with full Severity. And tho' the Nature of the Crime, the Obſtinacy of the Offender, and the Neceſſity of ſuppreſſing ſuch a furious Spirit, ſufficiently requir'd this or the like Puniſhment; yet it had the natural Effect of moving Pity in the People, and of raiſing new Prejudices againſt the Court and Government.

Several Caſ's in Weſtminſter-Hall.

Not only the Star-Chamber, but Weſtminſter-Hall was exercis'd with ſome ſingular Caſes, that may ſerve to expreſs the Diſpoſition of the Times. Sir Henry Martyn, the Judge of the Admiralty, made a great Complaint to his Majeſty againſt the Judges of the King's-Bench, for granting Prohibitions againſt his Court. Upon which the Judges were call'd before the King, where they ſtoutly juſtify'd their Proceedings in thoſe Caſes to be according to Law, and from whence they cou'd not depart by Vertue of their Oaths. Not long after the Feoffees in Truſt for the buying in of Impropriations to be beſtow'd upon preaching Miniſters, were brought into the Exchequer for Breach of their Truſt in not augmenting poor Vicarages, but giving arbitrary Penſions to Lecturers, and diſaffected Preachers: Their Corporation was thereupon diſſolv'd, and their Fund and Stock adjudg'd to the King. About the ſame time Mr. Huntley, a Miniſter of Kent, having been cenſur'd and impriſon'd by the High-Commiſſion Court, brought his Action of falſe Impriſonment againſt the Keeper Mr. Barker, and ſome of the Commiſſioners by Name; and after a long Debate, the Judges order'd that two of the Commiſſioners ſhou'd anſwer. The Biſhop of London made the King ſenſible, That the Authority of the High-Commiſſion Court wou'd fall to Nothing, if the Judges of it muſt be thus expos'd to perſonal Actions. Upon which the King ſent his Advocate, Dr. Ryves, to the Lord Chief Juſtice, requiring him to proceed no farther in that Cauſe, till he had ſpoken with his Majeſty. The Chief Juſtice conſulted with the Judges, who came to this Reſolution, 'That they conceiv'd ſuch 'a Meſſage not to ſtand with their Oaths, as commanding 'an indefinite Stay of a Cauſe between Parties, that might 'ſtop the Courſe of Juſtice as long as the King pleas'd.' After this, upon the Importunity of the Commiſſioners, who wou'd no longer act, if thus expos'd to Suits at Common-Law, the King aſſum'd the Matter to himſelf, and ſending for the Judges, charg'd them expreſly, That they ſhou'd not put the Commiſſioners to anſwer. The Judges ſtoutly anſwer'd, That they cou'd not, without Breach of their Oaths, perform that Command. Afterwards the Matter was handled at the Council-Table in the Preſence of the Judges; where, after a long Debate, it was determin'd, 'That the Judges had done their Duty, and that the Com'miſſioners ought to anſwer.' Theſe, and other like Determinations, ſufficiently prove that the preſent Set of Judges were no ſervile Creatures of the Court, and that the King did not finally inſiſt upon their obſequious Compliance with him; but they gave their Judgments with Freedom and Courage, and the King generally acquieſc'd in their Opinion, tho' contrary to his own.

The Judges vindicated.

The Birth of King Charles the Second.

4. During theſe inferior Struggles in the Publick, a Matter of great Joy happen'd to the City and Nation; on the 29th Day of May, a little before One in the Afternoon; the Queen was deliver'd of a Son at the Palace of St. James's; for which the King rid publickly to St. Paul's Church to give Thanks to God for the great Happineſs; at which Time a Star appear'd in a clear Sky, to the Wonder of numberleſs Spectators. In Honour of this Prince's Nativity, Medals were ſtruck, repreſenting the Star at his Birth, with other Devices, and this Motto, Hactenus Anglorum nulli; ſignifying that no Engliſh Man before him was born to ſuch high Titles and large Poſſeſſions, he being the firſt Prince of Great Britain, France and Ireland. Upon the 27th of June, the Royal Infant, with extraordinary Pomp, was carry'd to the Font, and baptized Charles by the Biſhop of London, having for God-Fathers his two Uncles, the French King and the Prince Palatine of the Rhine, repreſented by their Proxies the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hamilton: The Queen-Mother of France being his God-Mother, was repreſented by the Dutcheſs of Richmond. All the Lords Spiritual and Temporal about London were invited to this grand Solemnity, only the declining Biſhop of Lincoln was deſignedly omitted; which with great Uneaſineſs caus'd him to ask the Reaſon of the Earl of Holland; who freely told him, That he muſt expect worſe than this, because he was ſuch a Champion for The Petition of Right; that there was no Room at the Table for thoſe that lik'd It.

Great Rejoycings.

The Birth of this Prince, as it gave Cauſe of great Rejoycings to the Generality of the Nation, ſo it prov'd no ſmall Diſcouragement to many of the Puritan Party, who it ſeems had laid their Line another Way, and deſir'd that the King ſhou'd have no Children. Inſomuch that at a publick Feaſt, when ſome ſhew'd great Joy at the Queen's Pregnancy, a leading Man of the Party openly ſaid, He cou'd ſee no ſuch Cauſe of Joy, and freely declar'd this Reaſon for it, That God had already better provided for them, in giving ſuch a hopeful Progeny to the Queen of Bohemia, brought up in the Reform'd Religion; while it was uncertain what Religion the King's Children wou'd follow, being to be brought up by a Mother devoted to the Church of Rome. It ſeems the Impreſſions of Religion which King James had made, had caus'd the ſtrongeſt Influence upon the Mind of his excellent Daughter; and ſhe was ſo zealous a Proteſtant, that L'Eſtrange tells us, That upon a Suſpicion that her Son ſhou'd have been educated in the Emperor's Court, and marry his Daughter, ſhe declar'd, That ſhe had rather be his Executioner, than ſuffer her Child to be bred up in Idolatry. Her Warmth and Steadineſs caus'd her to be very dear to a Party in England; and they were then prepoſterouſly endeavouring for that which Providence ſince has ſeem'd to effect, after an unforeſeen Manner.

The Queen of Bohemia's Firmneſs.

Upon the ſame Day of Prince Charles's Birth, a great Cauſe was heard in the Star-Chamber, concerning a Diſcourſe entitl'd, A Propoſition for his Majeſty's Service to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments; which after the laſt Diſſolution had given ſo much Offence and Jealouſy, that the King order'd his Attorney-General to prefer an Information againſt the Earls of Bedford, Clare and Somerſet, Sir Robert Cotton, Mr. Selden, Mr. St. John, and others, for ſpreading the ſaid Libel. Upon Examination it appear'd to be an old Diſcourſe, and lately reviv'd to caſt an Odium upon the Court: But while the Cauſe was hearing in a great Preſence of Nobility and Gentry, the King ſent a Meſſage to the Lord-Keeper, 'That in Reſpect of the great Joy, upon the Birth 'of his Son, he ſhou'd immediately order the Proceedings 'to be ſtopp'd, and the Defendents to be diſcharg'd.' Accordingly the Keeper acquainted the Court with his Majeſty's ſpecial Command; upon which the ſaid Writing was order'd to be burnt as Seditious and Scandalous, and the Proceedings were taken off the File. Tho' the ſtopping of this Proceſs was a generous Act of Favour in the Time of publick Joy, and tho' it was found to be a private Eſſay and a Foreign Project; yet ſome Perſons turn'd it to the Diſadvantage of the Court, as if the Scheme had been really form'd againſt the Uſe of future Parliaments, and therefore drop'd without a full Examination.

The Expedition of Guſtavus Adolphus King of Sweden.

5. Notwithſtanding the King's Wants at home, he this Year exerted ſome Power in Foreign Parts; for while a happy Calm was promiſing and ſettling in England, both a dreadful and deſirable Storm began to hover over the German Empire; rais'd by the famous Guſtavus Adolphus King of Sweden, who being excited by the Deſire of Glory, and by the Aſpirings of a generous Mind, reſolv'd upon a vaſt Attempt of delivering Germany from the Yoke of Tyranny, which was beginning to be twiſted about their Neck. In which the King of England was nearly concern'd, both in Honour and Tenderneſs, to take this Opportunity to relieve his Siſter, and reſtore the Palatinate to her Husband. In order to which the Marqueſs of Hamilton was commiſſion'd to tranſport an Army of ſix thouſand Men, for the Aſſiſtance of the King of Sweden, to be employ'd againſt the Imperialiſts, or any other Enemies, for reſtoring our oppreſſed Friends in Germany. Articles of Agreement, between the King of Sweden and the Marqueſs, were ſign'd in Form; and ſhortly after that warlike Prince croſs'd the Baltick Sea, and landed with an Army upon the Coaſts of Pomerania, cauſing great Wonder and Expectation throughout all Europe. To enable the Marqueſs for this Expedition, the King granted him a Leaſe of the Cuſtoms of the Wines in Scotland for ſixteen Years, ſuppos'd to amount to twenty thouſand Pounds per Annum. Upon which Fund he levy'd his Men in Scotland; and towards Winter return'd to the Court in England, to receive the King's final Orders: But here one Mackay, Lord Ochiltry, charg'd the Marqueſs with a treaſonable Deſign of raiſing this new Army to make himſelf King of Scotland. The Lord Treaſurer Weſton incourag'd this Suggeſtion, and urg'd it home to the King, who freely told Hamilton what an Accuſation was brought againſt him: But he generouſly declar'd to him, That the World might know what Confidence he had in his Loyalty, he ſhou'd lye in his Bed-Chamber that Night. And the Marqueſs did accordingly continue in the moſt intimate Acceſſes to the King, who hitherto retain'd this Principle, 'Never to ſuſpect or deſert his Friends.

The Marqueſs of Hamilton ſuſpected and clear'd.

Before this a Dyet was held at Ratisbone in Germany, to which an Ambaſſador was ſent from King Charles, and another from his Brother-in-Law, to move for the Reſtitution of the Palatinate. They met with nothing more than Compliments: For the Emperor propos'd to the Dyet to paſs an Act, That the Prince Palatine ſhou'd continue a baniſh'd Man, and that no Offers of Return ſhou'd be made to him: And many other of the Proteſtant Princes had their Lands confiſcated, and other great Hardſhips impos'd upon them. Upon which the Dyet broke up in November, leaving the Palatinate and the whole Proteſtant Intereſt in a more deſperate Condition than ever. This excited the Reform'd Princes to enter into a Conſultation for their own Safety; and by a Letter from the Duke of Saxony to the Emperor, they obtain'd Leave to hold a Dyet for themſelves at Leipſick, where they laid open their Grievances to his Imperial Majeſty; and upon Denial of their Requeſts, they enter'd into a League to redreſs themſelves. The Emperor iſſu'd out his Imperial Ban againſt them; but they ſupported their Cauſe and Courage by the powerful Advances of the King of Sweden.

A Peace concluded with Spain.

The happy Effects of it.

In the mean time, the King of Spain promiſing that he wou'd improve his utmoſt Intereſt with the Emperor towards the Reſtoration of the Prince Palatine, a laſting Peace was concluded between the Crowns of England and Spain; at a remarkable Seaſon, when the Clouds of War began to be ſpread over moſt Parts of Chriſtendom. The Articles were the ſame that had formerly been concluded between King James, and Philip the Third of Spain; and the Peace was proclaim'd on Sunday the twenty ſeventh of November, with great Solemnity by the Heralds, accompany'd by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London. Two Days after the Articles were publickly ſworn to at the Chappel at Whitehall; the King and the Spaniſh Ambaſſador went into their ſeveral Retirements while an Anthem was ſung; and the Dean, Dr. Laud, with three other Biſhops, all in their Caps, went up to the Altar with a Latin Bible, upon which the King laid his Hand. Secretary Cook having read the Oath, the King kiſs'd the Book, and ſign'd the Articles, which he deliver'd to the Ambaſſador; and from thence paſs'd to the Banquetting Houſe, where was provided a magnificent Entertainment. So that now the King was freed from two very expenſive and very ineffectual Wars, which had unhappily diſcover'd him to be too weak and indigent in his Affairs both at home and abroad. Theſe Treaties brought a great Increaſe of Trade to this Iſland; the Spaniards ſent yearly in Engliſh Bottoms, no leſs than ſix hundred thouſand Crowns in Bullion, for the Uſe of the Netherland Forces; which turn'd much to the King's Benefit in the Coinage, and no leſs to the Profit of the Merchants, moſt of the Mony being return'd into Flanders in Cloth, and other Commodities of England. And now the Dutch and Eaſterlings, being great Traders, look'd upon London to be the ſafeſt Bank not only to lodge, but to encreaſe their Treaſure; ſo that in a ſhort Time, the greateſt Part of the Trade of Chriſtendom was driven upon the River Thames.

The Death of Biſhop Dove,

Dr. Benefield,

And Mr. Briggs.

The three Sherleys.

To conclude this Year, beſides the Earl of Pembroke before mentioned, there dy'd three other conſiderable Men; as firſt, Dr. Thomas Dove, who had been thirty Years Biſhop of Peterborough, the laſt of Queen Elizabeth's Biſhops, a Perſon celebrated for his reverend Aſpect and Deportment, his good Preaching and his Hoſpitality. Next Dr. Sebeſtian Benefield, the Margaret-Profeſſor of Divinity in Oxford; a noted Calvinian Theologiſt, excellently vers'd in the Fathers and School-men, reſerv'd and moroſe in his Diſpoſition, yet highly valuable for his extraordinary Piety, Strictneſs of Morals, and unblemiſh'd Integrity. Laſtly Mr. Henry Briggs, Profeſſor of Geometry in the Univerſity of Oxford, an excellent Scholar, and one of the moſt admired Mathematicians of his Time, being particularly regarded and eſteemed by the famous Lord Neper of Scotland. In this Year we may properly mention the three famous Sherleys, all Brothers and Knights, Sir Thomas, Sir Anthony, and Sir Robert; who by their ſtrange Exploits and valiant Adventures, in many diſtant Parts of the World, became the Diſcourſe and Wonder of many Nations, and the Subject of ſeveral Poems, Plays, and Romances.

The Repairing of St. Paul's Cathedral.

III. 1. In this happy Time of Peace, Plenty and Commerce, the religious King, excited by the Zeal and Activity of the Biſhop of London, began to undertake a great Work, the repairing and beautifying the Cathedral of St. Paul's; a vaſt and noble Pile, which through Age and Accidents had fallen into a great Decay. He went himſelf in Perſon to the Church, and made a kind of Proceſſion to view it, and granted a Commiſſion to ſome Biſhops and others, to raiſe Contributions, and ſee the Work compleated. This had ſo good Succeſs, that in eight Years Time the whole Body of the Church was finiſh'd, and the large Tower ſcaffolded up to the top, in order to raiſe it to a more ſtately Height, and to add four great Pinacles to it. The publick Contributions that were brought into the Chamber of London, amounted to more than a hundred thouſand Pounds; yet there was ſomething more done in it by the Munificence of the King, and the Bounty of the private Subject: His Majeſty, to give Life to the Work, had beſtow'd above ten thouſand Pounds towards the ſaid Sum; with Part of which he caus'd a ſtately Portico to be erected at the Weſt-End of the Church, rais'd on Corinthian Pillars; which diſplay'd the Skill of that admirable Architect Mr. Inigo Jones. On the other Side the generous Sir Paul Pindar firſt repaired the Decays of the great Partition at the Weſt-End of the Choir, adorning the outward Front of it with fair Pillars of Marble, and Statues of thoſe Saxon Kings who had been Founders and Benefactors; beautifying the inward Part with Figures of Angels, Cherubims, &c. richly gilded, with the Addition of curious Hangings at the upper End; and afterwards beſtow'd four thouſand Pounds in repairing the South-Part of the Croſs-Iſle.

Offences taken at it.

It was ſcarcely to be imagin'd, that this new Structure of the Principal Church in the Metropolis of the Kingdom, cou'd have met with any Exceptions or Murmurings againſt it; yet it ſo hapned, that by means of ſome Neceſſities or Overſights in the Management of this Work, Offences were taken, and great Complaints made. For ſome Houſes and Shops adjoining to the Church were thought fit to be demoliſhed, for the greater Safety or Beauty of the Fabrick; and tho' reaſonable Compenſation was made to the Owners, yet this was call'd obtruding and extorting. Again, the Church-Yard was to be inlarg'd, and to be clear'd from the Obſtruction and Encroachment of ſome Walls and Buildings; all which had the Appearance of Waſte and Depopulation. A Vault for Burial, belonging to the Pariſh of St. Gregory's, running too near the Sides of the Cathedral, and threatning the Foundations of it, was order'd to be fill'd up with Earth. Then the Church of St. Gregory's was found neceſſary to be pull'd down by Order of Council; upon which the Pariſhioners were aſſign'd to the Weſt-End of Chriſt-Church, even againſt the Conſent of that Pariſh. After all, when further Supplies were ſtill wanting for this vaſt Expence, the Fines and Commutations in the High-Commiſſion and Spiritual Courts were commonly aſſign'd to this Uſe; and this caus'd Offenders to murmur, as if their Penalties were impos'd only for a Tax to this Church. In Reality, this noble Deſign of Biſhop Laud, tho' it might naturally have remov'd all other Prejudice againſt him, yet it unhappily ſerv'd to foment the Paſſions of many, who turn'd all the Marks of Generoſity and Magnificence, into Tokens of Pride and Ambition. So that when he fell into his Troubles, the firſt Year the Contributions fell from fifteen thouſand to fifteen hundred Pounds, and ſo to nothing; till at length, after an unheard-of Manner, the whole became a Stable for Horſes.

The Earl of Caſtlehaven condemn'd to die.

His Character.

2. But to return to the preſent Year 1631, which became noted for three remarkable Tryals, as different in their Nature, as in their Proceedings. The firſt was ſuch, as we cou'd wiſh the Laws of Hiſtory wou'd allow a Veil to be drawn over it; namely, that of Mervin Lord Audley, Earl of Caſtlehaven in Ireland, who had three Indictments found againſt him at Salisbury Aſſizes, for aſſiſting in a Rape upon his own Lady, and for Sodomy with ſeveral Perſons. For all which he was ſolemnly try'd by his Peers in Weſtminſter-Hall on April the twenty fifth, and being found guilty of thoſe deteſtable Crimes, with all the moſt ſcandalous Circumſtances, he receiv'd Sentence of Death. His Majeſty had ſo great an Abhorrence for Vices ſo unnatural, that he wou'd grant no Pardon, but only the Favour of being Beheaded, which was executed May the fourteenth on Tower-Hill. He was of noble Extraction, well qualify'd with Gifts of Nature, ſharp and quick of Apprehenſion, his Diſcourſe ſublime, and of high Conception, with great Subtilty diſguiſing his Actions from common Appearance, masking them till they became ſo foul, that the Habit of Sin took away all Senſe of Honour. Shortly after two of his Aſſociates, Mr. Broadway and Fitz-Patrick, ſuffer'd at Tyburn, for the ſame Crime.

The Caſe of Sir Giles Arlington.

His Sentence.

The ſecond Tryal was for a Crime of an inferior Nature, yet the Subject of great Diſcourſe and Speculation: This was of Sir Giles Arlington, a rich Knight, who, contrary to Admonition and Authority, had married his Niece, the Daughter of Mr. Dalton, for which inceſtuous Marriage he was queſtion'd by the High-Commiſſion Court, with which he had a long and hard Struggle. His Advocate pleaded it was not within the Levitical Interdict, where the Marriage of the Nephew and the Aunt is forbidden, but not of the Uncle with the Niece, for which they alledg'd Bellarmine's Authority. But theſe Arguments being judg'd not better than Evaſions, Sir Giles had Recourſe to the Common-Pleas, from whence he obtain'd two Rules, one requiring the High-Commiſſioners to ſhew Cauſe why a Prohibition ſhou'd not be granted; and the other intimating, that if they proceeded, a Prohibition ſhou'd follow. This was judg'd ſo great an Incroachment, that the King thought fit to interpoſe, and by the Lord-Keeper to blame the Judges, who thereupon deſiſted; and the rather becauſe the Biſhop of London proteſted He wou'd excommunicate the Judges in his Dioceſe, and denounce it himſelf at St. Paul's, in caſe the Archbiſhop of Canterbury did not do it in his Province. Upon this Sir Giles was forc'd to ſubmit to the High-Commiſſion Court, where by the Mouth of eight Biſhops and four Civilian Judges, he receiv'd a ſolemn Sentence to pay a Fine of twelve thouſand Pounds to the King, to give twenty thouſand Pounds Security never to cohabit with his Niece, and to be impriſon'd or give ſufficient Bail, till both he and his Niece had done Penance at St. Paul's Croſs, and St. Mary's Church in Cambridge.

The third Tryal was more peculiar, and of more different Proceedings; occaſion'd by the former Accuſation of High-Treaſon given againſt the Marqueſs of Hamilton; about which the Lord-Keeper and Judges, upon the twenty ſecond of Auguſt, conſulted how to examine into the Truth of that remarkable Charge. The Lord Rea, a Scotch Baron, impeach'd Ramſey and Meldrum for exciting him beyond Sea to join in this Conſpiracy ; but they poſitively denying it, and no Witneſſes being produc'd, Ramſey, who was a Soldier, offer'd to clear himſelf by a ſolemn Combat. This Challenge being accepted by Rea, the Judges declared, 'Firſt, that it was an high and horrible Treaſon, if the Matter in theſe Examinations were found true : Secondly, That the Tryal might be by an Appeal of Treaſon, after the manner of the Civil Law, wherein the Judges were not to intermeddle.' Upon which a Court of Chivalry was erected by a particular Commiſſion under the Great Seal, and a Lord High-Conſtable and Earl Marſhal call'd. And after very long and formal Proceedings, with the Nomination of Time, Place, Armour, Weapons, &c. when the Parties were juſt ready for the Combate, the King himſelf interpos'd, and ſecuring their Perſons, put an End to the long Diſpute.

The Birth of the Princeſs of Orange.

The Death of two Judges,

Archbp. Harſenet,

Biſhop Buckridge,

Bp. Howſon,

Sir Robert Cotton,

Dr. Donne,

Mr. Drayton,

Dr. Sibs,

Mr. Hilderſham, And Mr. Bolton.

The Court it ſelf afforded little this Year, only the Queen on the fourth Day of November was deliver'd of her eldeſt Daughter, the Lady Mary, who was afterwards marry'd to the Prince of Orange. Before which time, this Year there dy'd two learned Judges, Chief Baron Walter, and Sir Nicholas Hide, Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench ; the latter of whom Judge Whitlock gives this Account of, 'That he liv'd in the Place with great Integrity and Uprightneſs, and with great Wiſdom and Temper, conſidering the Ficklenefs of the Times. He wou'd never undertake, or adventure to give the King a reſolute Anſwer in any weighty Buſineſs, when the Queſtion was of the Law ; but he wou'd pray that he might confer with his Brethren : And the King ever gave way to it.' Which latter Acknowledgment from an eminent Judge, not partial to the King, is a great Argument that ſome following Opinions of the Judges were not extorted by Threats or Promiſes. Beſides theſe two, there dy'd ſeveral other eminent Men this Year, particularly three worthy Biſhops, as Dr. Samuel Harſenet, Archbiſhop of York, and a Privy-Counſellor, a learned and judicious Divine, and the firſt perhaps who us'd the noted Expreſſion of Conformable Puritans, ſuch as conform'd out of Policy, and diſſented in their Judgments : Dr. John Buckeridge, Biſhop of Ely, a Perſon of ſingular Gravity and Learning, who had formerly been Tutor to Biſhop Laud himſelf ; and Dr. John Howſon, Biſhop of Durham, a very learned Man, and plentifully furniſh'd with the Virtues and Abilities proper for the Epiſcopal Function. Here we muſt not omit that worthy and famous Antiquary, Sir Robert Cotton, a Man who had no Superior, or ſcarce any Equal in his Skill that way, and one whom the World is infinitely oblig'd to for his noble Collections preſerv'd in his Library at Weſtminſter : He was of that great and publick Spirit, that his uſual Saying was, He had the leaſt Share in himſelf, his Country and his Friends having always the greateſt Intereſt in him. Dr. John Donne is alſo to be remember'd, who after many Travels and Imployments was made Dean of St. Paul's ; a Perſon of admirable Parts and Ingenuity, who was a learned Divine, a great Linguiſt, and an excellent Poet, whoſe Memory was held in Veneration by the greateſt Wits, and moſt polite Men of his Time. To him we may join Mr. Michael Drayton, a firſt-rate Poet of this Time, a particular Friend and Country Man of the famous Shakeſpear, who by his Heroical Epiſtles, and other Poems, obtain'd the Name of the Engliſh Ovid. To conclude, we ſhall mention three noted Divines, as Dr. Richard Sibs, Maſter of Catherine-Hall in Cambridge, a pious Improver, and a worthy Benefactor to that ſame College ; Mr. Arthur Hilderſham, and Mr. Robert Bolton, two great and ſhining Lights of the Puritan Party, both juſtly celebrated for their ſingular Learning and Piety.

The Progreſs and Victories of the King of Sweden.

3. At this time the King's Thoughts were moſt abroad, where the Fate of the German Empire was depending, and where the Marqueſs of Hamilton was employ'd with ſix thouſand Men in the Service of the renowned King of Sweden. He landed in Pomerania not before Auguſt, where he ſtay'd for the Arrival of ſix thouſand Swedes to march with him through the Enemies Quarters to the King ; but that Convoy failing, he loſt the Honour of being engag'd in the famous Battel of Leipſick, to the great Regret of himſelf and his Army. The King of Sweden, in a Letter under his own Hand, gave the King of England an Account of this Victory obtain'd againſt Tilly the Imperial General ; after which ſignal Defeat he marched on with a mighty Torrent of Succeſs and Terror. In September, Sir Henry Vane was ſent Ambaſſador extraordinary to the Kings of Sweden and Denmark, and other Princes and States of Germany ; and in January he had Audience of the King of Sweden at Frankfort, where he earneſtly preſs'd that victorious Prince, That he wou'd undertake the Reſtitution of the Elector Palatine, to his Eſtates and Dignity. The King anſwer'd, 'That he cou'd not bring this about, without having a War with France and Bavaria ; which he cou'd not undertake, unleſs the King of England wou'd enter into an Alliance with him againſt Spain.' However it was concerted, That upon the Prince Palatine's Arrival at the Swediſh Camp, where he was ſpeedily expected, the Chancellor of the Swedes, and the Engliſh Ambaſſador, ſhou'd enter into a Treaty about this difficult Affair.

His Offers to the Elector Palatine.

Rejected.

The King of Sweden ſtill purſu'd his Victories with a moſt rapid Courſe, into the very Bowels of the German Empire, raiſing Terror and Wonder in all Places. And being Maſter of the Field even in the Palatinate, the Prince Elector, about the Middle of July, had his laſt Audience ; when the King, more like a Conqueror than a Friend, offer'd theſe hard Propoſals : '1. That the Elector ſhou'd hold his Country as a Donative of the King of Sweden. 2 He ſhou'd make no Martial Levies without the Swedes Conſent. 3. During this War he ſhou'd furniſh the Swedes with a ſet Number of Men upon his own Pay. 4. Two of the chief Towns ſhou'd ſtand Cautionaries for the Performance of Covenants. 5. He ſhou'd make no League nor Article with any other Prince, without the Swedes Conſent.' The Engliſh Ambaſſador knew, That his Maſter and the Prince, and all Mankind wou'd think theſe Terms diſhonourable ; and therefore he expoſtulated with the King of Sweden, in ſo much Freedom of Speech, that they both parted in a Paſſion, and the Treaty broke off. The King of England perceiving his Forces not likely to be employ'd for the Service of the Palatinate, as he deſign'd Them, wrote to the Marqueſs of Hamilton to make an Excuſe and return home. He ſent Letters alſo to the King of Sweden, charging him with obſtructing a League between them ; and ſo recalling his Ambaſſador, Inſtructions were left with his Secretary Mr. Curtius, who ſtaid behind as his Majeſty's Agent with the King of Sweden.

The King of Sweden's Death and Character.

Still the Swediſh Army paſs'd on with prodigious Succeſs againſt the Emperor : His great General Tilly had been often defeated, and at laſt wounded to Death ; and Count Walleſtein, in great Diſguſt for former Neglects, had been now forc'd to be courted to re-accept the Office of Generaliſſimo of the Imperial Army. While the Elector Palatine was again put in Hopes of his Reſtoration, by the Advances and kinder Offers of the King of Sweden, Heaven put a Stop to the great Heroe in the full Career of all his Triumphs, by a Death natural to his Profeſſion. This hapned at the memorable Battel of Lutzen, on the 6th of November ; where the brave King being too adventurouſly engag'd in the Thickeſt of his Troops, was ſlain by an unknown Hand : Yet his Death prov'd ſo ſmall a Diſcouragement to the Army, that it inſpir'd them with a new Spirit of Revenge, and redoubling their Martial Fury, they gain'd a bloody Victory. Such was the End of the moſt renowned Warrior that Europe had known for many Ages ; who in two Years time won and gain'd two Hundred and ninety ſix Cities, Forts and walled Towns, as we are aſſur'd by the impartial Priorato. He dy'd before he was thirty eight Years of Age, or Fortune had forſaken him. His Character is too copious to be drawn in this Place ; only we may obſerve, That the Majeſtick Gracefulneſs of his Preſence, and the Heroick Magnanimity of his Spirit, had made ſo powerful an Impreſſion upon all ſorts of Men, that after his Death his very Pictures were almoſt idoliz'd, as his Perſon had been before.

The Elector Palatine's Death and Character.

This King's Death was ſoon after ſucceeded by the unfortunate Prince Palatine, King of Bohemia, who was carry'd off by an Infection taken at Mentz, on the 29th of the ſame Month. To ſay a Word of his Perſon, he was of a comely and handſome Appearance, and of a fair Stature, with an Aſpect duſkiſh and inclining to Melancholy ; but his Mind ſeem'd more ſuited to the Management of his Domeſtick Affairs, than prepared for vigorous and maſculine Attempts, ſuch as were proper to ſupport a conteſted Title, and the Dignity of a Crown : So that we do not find any Thing very great in his Character, his Queen generally ſhewing a Nobler and more Heroick Spirit under all the late Misfortunes. He left a numerous Iſſue of ſix Sons and five Daughters, the youngeſt of which, the Princeſs Sophia, then two Years of Age, ſince proving the Proteſtant Heir to the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland. Shortly after his Death, the Earl of Arundel was ſent over by King Charles to his Siſter at the Hague, to condole the great Loſs of her Husband, and to invite Her and her Children into England. But ſhe ſent an Excuſe for the preſent, as being extreamly immers'd in Sorrow, and not yet able to undertake the Journey.

Of the Muſcovites and Poles.

This Year the Czar of Muſcovy, deſigning to regain the Town of Smolensko from the King of Poland, apply'd himſelf to the King of England for Leave to raiſe two Thouſand Men ; who by Conſent were rais'd, and commanded by Colonel Sanderſon, and landed and march'd to the Siege of Smolensko. Here, upon a Punctilio of Honour, Colonel Sanderſon was baſely murder'd by Colonel Leſley, for which he ſuffer'd a cruel Death. This drew the Engliſh and Scotch into Parties of Revenge and Defence ; upon which the Poles took the Advantage of this time of Diſtraction, and fell upon the Muſcovites with that Fury and Succeſs, that they forc'd them to quit the Siege, and comply with diſhonourable Terms of Peace.

The Lord Went-worth ſent into Ireland.

4. But to come nearer home, this Year his Britiſh Majeſty had great Occaſion to turn his Thoughts towards his Kingdom of Ireland, which being under the Government of Lords Juſtices, was now labouring under great Ferments and Diſtempers, owing chiefly to the powerful Encreaſe of the Papiſts, eſpecially the Clergy, who openly erected an Univerſity in Dublin, in Emulation or rather Defiance of the King's College there. To reduce the troubleſome Affairs of that Kingdom into better Peace and Order, the King ſent over the Lord Viſcount Wentworth, under the Title of Lord-Deputy, upon good Experience of that vigorous Spirit of Diſcipline and Conduct he had exercis'd as Preſident of the North. When he came to his new Government, he found all Things in great Diſorder, the Revenue ſo low that Ireland was a Burthen to the Crown of England, which by Degrees he not only remov'd, but ſo improv'd the Trade of the Nation, and the Revenue of the Crown, that that Kingdom was not only able to ſupport it ſelf, but to lend Supplies to England.

The King reſtrains the Reſort to London.

He has the Small-Pox.

At home his Majeſty this Year took particular Notice of the too great Reſort of the Nobility, Gentry, and the dignify'd Clergy to the Court and City, and thereby leaving the Country deſtitute of Hoſpitality, and other Benefits of Reſidence. For which Reaſon his Majeſty by his Proclamation in June did command, 'That before the End of 'Forty Days, all Lords, Knights, Gentlemen and Clerks, 'do reſort to their ſeveral Counties of Reſidence, there to 'keep their Habitations and Hoſpitality; except ſuch as 'were of his Majeſty's Council, or bound to Attendance 'at Court.' But the more immediate Cauſe of this Diſmiſſion, was an Apprehenſion, that the Acceſs of People from infected Places in the Country, might again endanger the City, lately deliver'd from the Plague. And therefore another Proclamation was iſſu'd out, 'To inhibit the Re'ſort of his Majeſty's People to the Court, for Cure of the 'King's Evil, and to reſtrain the Acceſs of others from 'infected Places.' Not long after the King himſelf fell much indiſpos'd, and had the Small-Pox appearing on him; but the Diſeaſe prov'd very gentle and ſafe, tho' ſo fatal to many of his Royal Poſterity.

Several Removals in the Church.

Winde-bank made Secretary.

Still Biſhop Laud's Intereſt ſtood firm with his Majeſty, or rather encreas'd; and he daily promoted the Grandeur of the Church with indefatigable Induſtry, in Oppoſition both to Popery and Puritaniſm; yet uſually reſtraining his Favours to thoſe call'd Arminians, in Oppoſition to the Calviniſts. He always proceeded by the brighteſt Integrity, tho' ſometimes clouded by the Storms of Paſſion; which was generally ſucceeded by a Shower of Tears. His great Care was to recommend ſuch Perſons to the Dignities of the Church, as he thought were of the greateſt Probity and publick Spirit. Under this View, Biſhop Neyle was tranſlated from Wincheſter to the Archbiſhoprick of York, Biſhop Curl from Bath and Wells to Wincheſter, and Dr. Pierce promoted to Bath and Wells. Biſhop White was tranſlated from Norwich to Ely, Biſhop Corbet from Oxford to Norwich, and Dr. Bancroft promoted to Oxford. Biſhop Morton was likewiſe tranſlated from Coventry and Litchfield to Durham, Biſhop Wright from Briſtol to Coventry and Litchfield, and Dr. Linſel promoted to the See of Peterborough, as alſo Dr. Juxon made Clerk of the King's Cloſet. But Biſhop Laud's Intereſt did not reſt here; for upon the Death of Dudley Lord Carleton this Year, whoſe Character we have already given, he procur'd his old Friend, Mr. Francis Windebank, to be made Secretary of State. This Perſon prov'd afterwards ſo much a Creature of the Queen's, and ſuch an Advocate and Patron to all ſuffering Prieſts and Jeſuits, that he got the Character of a Papiſt, and encreas'd the Odium againſt Biſhop Laud, who by preferring him was to anſwer to the Nation for his good Behaviour.

The Death of Judge Whitlock,

Mr. Allen,

*Dr.*Taylor,

Beſide the Lord Carleton, this Year there dy'd the famous Judge Whitlock, a Perſon not only excellent in what related to his own Profeſſion, but alſo in many others; by whoſe Deceaſe the King loſt as good a Subject, his Country as good a Patriot, and the People as juſt a Judge as ever liv'd, as his own Son teſtifies in his Memorials. Beſides him, we are to mention two Divines, and three Stateſmen: The Divines were Mr. Thomas Allen, and Dr. Thomas Taylor; the former was alſo a moſt eminent Antiquary, Philoſopher and Mathematician, highly eſteem'd and courted by great Men in England and Foreign Parts; but being delighted with Retirement and an Academical Life, he refus'd a Biſhoprick and other Preferments, and dy'd in Glouceſter-Hall in Oxford, in the 90th Year of his Age. The later, Dr. Taylor, was a Cantabrigian of Chriſt-College, and afterwards a celebrated London Preacher, where diſplaying a ſingular Excellency in opening and purſuing an Allegory, he became ſo noted and admired, as to gain the Name of The Illuminated Doctor. The Stateſmen were Sir Iſaac Wake, Sir George Calvert, and Sir Robert Naunton: The firſt had been worthily employ'd by King James in ſeveral Foreign Embaſſies; being a Man of very refined Learning and ſtrong Parts, and obſerv'd, when in Oxford, to have had a Pen more at Command in the Latin, Engliſh and French Tongues, than any of his Time in the Univerſity. The other two, Sir George Calvert and Sir Robert Naunton, were both made Secretaries of State by King James, which Places they diſcharg'd with Honour and Dexterity, and the former was particularly rewarded with the Barony of Baltimore in Ireland.

The King reſolves to be crown'd in Scotland.

IV. 1. The King being now ſurrounded with a general Tranquillity, without the Fear of Enemies from abroad, and leſs of Inſurrections at home, he reſolv'd to make a Progreſs into the North, and to be ſolemnly crown'd in his ancient and native Kingdom of Scotland, which he had never ſeen ſince the time of his Infancy. This prov'd a great Step towards the future Commotions, and conſequently his own Misfortunes; but he had many Motives to undertake this publick Solemnity. His Preſence and Coronation had been expected in Scotland almoſt ever ſince the Death of his Father, and his long Delay had been unkindly interpreted in that Kingdom; ſo that ſome Murmurs were given out, That if the King did not think the Crown of Scotland worth his Journey thither, there might be ſome other Way of diſpoſing of it.

The State of Scotland,

In Civil Affairs,

The Scots Nation, by King James's pacifick Deportment whilſt there, and his obliging Bounty whilſt in England, had with great Plenty enjoy'd a continual Peace for above forty Years; which none of their Records can give an Account of for ſo long a Time before. But notwithſtanding this extended Train of Felicity, there were now many Diſcontents in the Kingdom, both in reſpect of the Civil, as well as Eccleſiaſtical State. The Nation had for many Ages enjoy'd Kings of their own, whoſe Courts they had always preſent with them; whereas by the annexing of that Kingdom to England, their Kings reſided in England, as the more conſiderable of the two; which made them highly complain, 'That now they ſhou'd have none of their 'King's Court with them, but they who had ſo long en'joy'd their own Kings, muſt at laſt become a Province, 'and be govern'd by an Engliſh Deputy.' Yet this was not the only Reaſon of their Diſcontents, for another Matter gave them a greater Caſe of Murmuring, eſpecially to the Nobility and great Men, which was this: By the Connivance of Murray, and other Regents in the Minority of King James, thoſe Lands belonging to the Cathedral Churches and Religious Houſes, which by Act of Parliament had been convey'd to the Crown, were parcell'd and ſhar'd among the great Men of the Kingdom; who being thus poſſeſs'd of the ſaid Lands and Regalities annex'd, exercis'd an arbitrary Power over the Clergy and Peaſants under their Juriſdiction. King Charles finding little Aid from his Scots Subjects, by the Advice of his Council of that Kingdom, proceeded to the Recovery of his Right in thoſe Lands and Regalities; which he endeavour'd to effect firſt by an Act of Revocation, and that failing, by a Commiſſion for Surrendring of Superiorities. But the aſpiring Poſſeſſors of theſe Advantages choſe rather to expoſe their Country to imminent Danger, than to part with any of that Power they exercis'd on their Vaſſals; and thereupon reſolv'd to oppoſe the King in the next Parliament, which was appointed to meet ſoon after his Arrival.

And in Religious.

Epiſcopacy eſtabliſh'd.

But becauſe Religion, and the Care of that, was like to make the greateſt Impreſſion upon the Vulgar, the Name of it was much inſiſted on, and the Dangers threatning it daily aggravated. The true State of it was briefly this: The Kirk of Scotland from the Reformation in 1560, was govern'd firſt by Superintendents, and then Biſhops, till 1580 in an Aſſembly at Dundee, Epiſcopacy was condemn'd as contrary to the Word of God, and Presbytery eſtabliſh'd, firſt by Tumult, and afterwards by Law in 1592. But King James finding the encreaſing Power of the Miniſters and Preachers, which often overtop'd that of the Civil Magiſtracy, took Occaſion and Advantage from ſome of their Exorbitancies and Miſcarriages, to reſtore Epiſcopacy in the Nation by a Parliament in 1612; and accordingly nominated thirteen new Biſhops for ſo many Epiſcopal Sees as had been anciently in that Church: Which Biſhops he alſo arm'd with the Power of an High-Commiſſion, the better to curb the Spirit of the Presbyterians, the Heat and Fervour of which was hardly to be parallel'd in any other Nation. This Step being made, that King advanc'd towards an Uniformity in the Worſhip and Ceremonies of England: But in this he met with greater Oppoſition, and all that he obtain'd was, That in one Aſſembly at Aberdeen an Act paſs'd for the compoſing a Liturgy for the uſe of the Church of Scotland; and in another at Perth, the five

Articles,

Car. 9.

Other Advances.

Articles, that bore the Name of that Place, were ſettled, and afterward eſtabliſh'd in Parliament in the Year 1621. Theſe were, 'Kneeling in the Sacrament; Private Communion in Caſes of Neceſſity; Private Baptiſm in the 'like Caſe; Confirmation of Children; and the Obſervation of the Holy Days of Chriſt's Nativity, Paſſion, Reſurrection, and Aſcenſion, and the Pentecoſt.' The King alſo about that Time mov'd that a Liturgy ſhou'd be fram'd and us'd according to the Model of the Engliſh Church; but the Difficulties in obtaining theſe five Articles was one great Cauſe of laying it aſide, and the old Marqueſs of Hamilton, then Commiſſioner, aſſur'd the Parliament, That his Majeſty ſhou'd not in his Days preſs any more Change, or Alteration in Matters of that Kind, without their Conſents.

The King's Progreſs towards Scotland.

2. Such was the State of Scotland when King Charles came to the Crown, and for a few Years after; when he reſolv'd to make a ſolemn Progreſs into that Kingdom. To perform this with the greater Pomp and Regularity, in the Beginning of May, his Majeſty by Proclamation order'd, 'That competent Proviſions ſhou'd be made for his Royal 'Perſon and Attendants, in the ſeveral Parts of this Realm 'through which he was to paſs; and that the Prices of 'them ſhou'd be Rated by the Clerk of the Market of the 'King's Houſhold.' And the next Day another Proclamation was publiſh'd, 'For the better Ordering his Maje'ſty's Court and Train in his Journey to Scotland, and his 'Return from thence.' His Gueſts Stays upon the Road being fix'd as to Time and Place, on May the thirteenth his Majeſty ſet out from London with a glorious Retinue of the Earls of Northumberland, Arundel, Pembroke, Southampton, and Holland, the Marqueſs of Hamilton, the Biſhop of London, and many other Perſons of Quality, who were all to go at their own Expences. The whole Progreſs was perform'd with the moſt imaginable Grandeur and Magnificence; all Perſons of Quality and Condition, whoſe Seats border'd upon the Northern Road, receiv'd the Nobility and Attendance of the Court with a ſuitable Hoſpitality. The King accepted of many noble Entertainments by the Way, as at Welbeck from the Earl of Newcaſtle, at Raby Caſtle from Sir Henry Vane, at Durham ſeveral Days from Biſhop Morton, and at York and Newcaſtle from the Magiſtrates of thoſe Places. The greateſt Exceſs of Feaſting was then introduc'd, or at leaſt Feaſting was then carry'd on to a Height it never had attain'd before, from whence in this Reign it hardly ever declin'd, to the great Damage of the Eſtates and Manners of the Nation. The great Offices and Places in the Court, were pretty equally divided between the Engliſh and the Scots; the Marqueſs of Hamilton, and the Earl of Carliſle, with almoſt all the ſecond Rank of Attendants about his Majeſty's Perſon, being of that Kingdom: So there was a ſort of an Emulation between the two Nations who ſhou'd now appear in the greateſt Luſtre and Splendor in their Equipages; and eſpecially the Scottiſh Nobility, who exceeded themſelves, and were reſolv'd to confute all thoſe, who had believ'd their Country to be very poor.

He enters Edinburgh.

Where he is ſolemnly Crown'd.

On the twelfth Day of June the King enter'd his Native Country Scotland, when immediately all his Engliſh Officers and Servants yielded up their Attendance to thoſe of that Nation; all the Tables of the Houſe were laid down by them, and taken up again by the Scots, who kept them with the ſame Order and Splendor, and treated the Engliſh with all imaginable Freedom and Courteſy. His Majeſty was met by numerous Throngs of all ſorts of People, which daily encreas'd as he drew nearer to the capital City of Edinburgh; which he enter'd on the fifteenth Inſtant with extraordinary Pomp and Magnificence, where he was receiv'd with loud Acclamations, fine Speeches, rich Pageants, and all the Expreſſions of the moſt profound Reſpect, and dilated Exultation. Three Days after began the Solemnities of the Coronation, when his Majeſty deſcended from the Caſtle, and paſs'd with a glorious Parade of all his great Officers and Nobility, with the utmoſt State, to the Abbey Church; where the Sermon was preach'd by Dr. Lindſey Biſhop of Brechin, upon theſe Words, And all the People ſaid, God ſave King Solomon! and the chief Ceremonies were perform'd by the eminent Dr. Spotſwood, Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's. The whole Spectacle was very ſurpriſing and charming, the Concourſe of People beyond Expreſſion, and the Marks of their Joy in Richneſs of Apparel, ſumptuous Feaſtings, and loud Applauſes, nothing inferior to that Concourſe. The King was highly pleas'd with his Reception, which equall'd any Thing he cou'd expect in England: But the Debts contracted at that Time by the Nobility and Gentry, occaſion'd by the preſent Luxury and vaſt Expence, with the Wants and Temptations that ſucceeded, very much contributed to the Kindling that Fire, which not long after broke out into ſo terrible a Combuſtion.

He holds a Parliament.

3. The Nobility and great Men ſeem'd to ſtand well and equally in the King's Favour, till after the Parliament, which met on the twentieth Inſtant, and ſolemnly rode from the King's Palace to the Parliament-Houſe, the Honours carry'd, and uſual Ceremonies obſerv'd. Archbiſhop Spotſwood preach'd the Sermon, and the King made a very gracious Speech. Within eight Days Time thirty one publick Acts were paſs'd, two of which were of the Nature of Aids and Subſidies to the King, which met with no Difficulty. But at the paſſing of two Others, the King began more openly to ſee the Diſcontents of ſeveral great Men and Others, who made an unexpected Oppoſition. One was intitl'd An Act concerning his Majeſty's Royal Prerogative, and Apparel of Kirk-men; The Other, An Act of Ratification of the Acts touching Religion. The King finding this, took out a Liſt of the whole Aſſembly, and ſaid, Gentlemen, I have all your Names here, and I'll know who will do me Service, and who will not, this Day. However thirteen Noblemen, and as many Barons and Burgeſſes declar'd their Diſſent; among the former were the Earls of Rothes, Caſſils, and Lothian, and the Lords Lindſey, Porplichin, Sinclar, Balmerino, Cooper, Yeſter, and four more. Upon the paſſing all theſe Acts, on the twenty eighth of June, the Parliament was diſſolv'd, after a ſhort Seſſion of not above eight Days.

It is diſſolv'd

Several Diſcontents.

The Paſſing the Act concerning Eccleſiaſtical Habits, by which the Surplice was thought to be intended, did much perplex the diſſenting Lords and others; which occaſion'd ſome of them to publiſh a Libel in Writing reflecting upon his Majeſty's Proceedings, in which they expoſtulated, 'How grievous a Thing it was for a King in that Place, 'by making of his Subjects Votes, to Over-awe his Par'liament: And that the ſame was a Breach of Privilege, &c.' This Writing, as afterwards appear'd, was drawn by one William Hagg, who fled for it, but being found in the Cuſtody of the Lord Balmerino, who was alſo known to be diſaffected to the preſent Eſtabliſhment, that Lord, by the Inſtigation of the Privy-Council, was in a Court of his Peers found guilty of Concealing Treaſon, and therefore condemn'd to loſe his Head. But tho' he obtain'd a gracious Pardon, and made ſolemn Promiſes of Loyalty, before the Privy-Council, yet it made ſo ſtrong an Impreſſion, that he cou'd never forgive the King nor Them. Biſhop Guthry relates this Story with ſome Difference, and that the Earl of Rothes was alſo concern'd in the ſame Matter; concerning whom Sir Edward Walker tells us, he had a particular Reſentment againſt the King. For when his Majeſty went into the County of Fife, that Earl being Hereditary Sheriff, aſſembled all his Friends and Dependents in the beſt Equipage to receive Him; but the King, either by Accident or Deſign, went another Way, and miſs'd him. This was never forgot by the Earl, who became one of the Firſt and moſt active Inſtruments in the future Troubles and Commotions.

And great Complaints.

Some other Things alſo concurr'd to open a Way to thoſe fatal Diſturbances: For beſides the two Acts beforemention'd, there were two or three more paſs'd, which did much leſſen the Authority of the great Men, and the Subjection and Dependance of their Tenants; which ſerv'd to incenſe the one, and make the other more licentious. Then it alſo now appear'd, That, excepting the Marqueſs of Hamilton, the Scotch Noblemen, who had been greateſt Favourites in the Engliſh Court, had the leaſt Intereſt in their own Country; and that the Bounties, heap'd upon them by the King and his Father, were not eſteem'd as any Favour to the Nation, but as Obligations caſt upon thoſe particular Men, who by being more gracious with the King, were the more ſuſpected to the People. But laſtly, the moſt dangerous of all was the Fears and Jealouſies taken up by the Kirk Party: They were taught to be upon their Guard by the Biſhop of London's waiting upon the King; and they look'd with a worſe Eye upon him, when they heard him preach in the Royal Chappel at Edinburgh, chiefly on the Benefit of Conformity, and the Reverence due to the Ceremonies of the Church. They grew more exaſperated, when the King during his Stay had erected and endow'd an Epiſcopal See at Edinburgh, and had promoted ſome of the Biſhops to be principal Officers of State, and likewiſe committed the Framing and Compoſing of a Liturgy for the Church of Scotland to a ſelect Number of their Biſhops. Theſe ſeveral Steps were with great Indignation exclaim'd againſt, as a Project to ſubject Scotland to all the Forms and Eſtabliſhments of England, which they pretended wou'd make their Kingdom appear like a depending Province, and leave their Kirk depriv'd of all the Remainder of its own Way of Reformation.

Notwithſtanding theſe preſaging Appearances, the King was nobly receiv'd in a Progreſs he made through ſeveral Parts of the Country; who after a dangerous Paſſage over Edinburgh Frith, at length arriv'd at Berwick, upon the ſixteenth

The King's Return to Greenwich

ſixteenth of July, after he had continu'd in Scotland about five Weeks. From hence he went Poſt in four Days to his Queen at Greenwich, coming no nearer London than Black-Wall. But in this he is obſerv'd to have laid aſide the Majeſty of his Predeceſſors, eſpecially of Queen Elizabeth, who ſeldom ended any of her Summer Progreſſes, but ſhe made her Paſſage to White-Hall through a conſiderable Part of the City; not only requiring the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen to come forth and meet her, but the ſeveral Companies of the City to attend ſolemnly in their Formalities as ſhe went along: By which, and other Arts, ſhe preſerv'd the Heighth of Majeſty and Reverence, with a happy Mixture of Love and Popularity. But theſe being laid aſide by King James, and not reſum'd by King Charles, there follow'd firſt a Neglect of their Perſons, which Majeſty wou'd have made Sacred, and afterwards a Miſlike of their Government, which Popularity wou'd have made more grateful.

The Death of Archbiſhop Abbot.

He is ſucceeded by Biſhop Laud

V. I. The King being again ſettled in his chief Kingdom, the firſt Accident of Moment, that hapned after his Return, was the Death of Dr. Abbot Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who had continued twenty one Years in that high Station; whoſe Character we have formerly given with all Impartiality. The King took very little Time to conſider who ſhou'd be his Succeſſor, but the very next Time the Biſhop of London came to wait upon him, he chearfully receiv'd him with this Compellation, My Lord's Grace of Canterbury, you are very welcome! and gave Order the ſame Day for the Diſpatch of all neceſſary Forms for his Tranſlation, which were all expedited and compleated in a little above a Month's Time, at Lambeth, where he kept a moſt ſolemn and magnificent Feaſt. He had been lately made a Privy-Counſellor in Scotland, as before in England, and was now advanc'd to the higheſt Station of Honour and Truſt in the Church; and, which is remarkable, about the ſame Time he was offer'd, what in other Nations is accounted ſtill more honourable, a Cardinal's Cap. His Anſwer was, That he cou'd not accept the Offer, till Rome were otherwiſe than it was; all which he acquainted the King with, as he likewiſe did when the ſame Offer was reinforc'd a Fortnight after: Upon which ſecond Refuſal, the Tempter for ever left him. The beginning of this Grandeur was attended with an Accident, which was thought very ominous; for when he went firſt to Lambeth, the Ferry-Boat that carry'd his Coach and Horſes and Servants, after a ſtrange Manner ſunk to the Bottom of the Thames, without Damage to the Men or Goods; which he enter'd in his Diary as an Eſcape of ſignal Note.

A farther Account of Dr. Laud and his Proceedings.

We have already given the Character of this great Prelate, yet ſtill it will be uſeful to take a farther View of him in this exalted State, which continu'd in great Splendor and Envy for about ſeven Years. His Proceedings, notwithſtanding he was now Sixty Years of Age, were with the utmoſt Vigour and Activity; and while he had the Honour of God and the Church, and the Service of his Maſter in View, he did not much conſider preſent Obſtructions, or future Conſequences. He had ſtood againſt innumerable Oppoſitions, as well before as ſince he was Biſhop, relating to that diſtracting Controverſy of Arminianiſm and Calviniſm. So that when he came to great Authority, he is thought to have retain'd too keen a Memory of Thoſe who had ſo ſeverely perſecuted him before; and was ſo far tranſported with the ſame Paſſions he complain'd of in his Adverſaries, that as they accus'd him of Popery, becauſe he had ſome Doctrinal Opinions, not agreeable to theirs, tho' nothing ally'd to that Religion; ſo he entertain'd too much Prejudice to ſome Perſons, as if they were Enemies to the Diſcipline of the Church, becauſe they concurr'd with Calvin in ſome Points of Doctrine: Whereas they abhorr'd his Diſcipline, reverenc'd the Government of the Church, and pray'd for the Peace of it with a Zeal equal to any, which they did manifeſt by their Lives and their Sufferings with it and for it. Of this Sort were Dr. Davenant, Prideaux, Brownrig, Oldſworth, Shute, Udall, &c. moſt of whom had the Misfortune not fully to know, and not rightly to be known by this Prelate, till it was too late.

His promoting the Grandeur of the Church.

The Archbiſhop's Heart was entirely ſet upon the Advancement and Grandeur of the Church of England, which he brought to that Height, that it ſhew'd rather a Rivalſhip, than a Reſemblance of the Church of Rome; which rais'd more the Envy, than the Admiration of its Enemies. In this, and all his great and pious Deſigns, he had the hearty Concurrence of the King, ſo that he thought he had no Reaſon to fear the moſt powerful Oppoſers; yet for a Support, he caus'd his worthy Friend and Companion, Dr. William Juxon, to ſucceed him in the Biſhoprick of London: And not long after, upon the Death of his Enemy, Weſton Lord High Treaſurer, he was made one of the Commiſſioners of the Treaſury and Revenue, which he had Reaſon to be ſorry for, becauſe it rais'd him new Enemies, and engag'd him in Civil Affairs, and Matters of State, in which he had little Experience. And as he was thus involv'd Himſelf, ſo to enhance the Reputation of the inferior Clergy, he caus'd many of them to be advanc'd into Civil Offices; ſo that Doctors and Miniſters of Pariſhes were every where made Juſtices of Peace; and they not living with their former Condeſcenſion towards their Neighbours of Quality and Patrons, it increas'd the common Hatred, more than their own Authority. As he lov'd Pomp and Ceremony in the Church, ſo he promoted Beauty and Regularity with a fervent Zeal; he caus'd the Communion Tables to be plac'd Altar-ways, and decently to be rail'd in, and was ſo ſtrict about the Veſtments, and other inferior Matters, that had been long neglected, that all was call'd by the odious Name of Innovations. That which caus'd greateſt Heats was the eager Manner of inforcing the Practice; about which aroſe innumerable Diſſenſions, and Books were written for and againſt it, with the ſame Earneſtneſs and Warmth, as if the Life of Chriſtianity had been at Stake; and what was more dangerous, it caus'd a ſort of a Schiſm among the Biſhops themſelves, and much Uncharitableneſs among the moſt learned of the Clergy. As to theſe, and all his various Projects, Dr. Heylyn, in the Opinion of others, ſays thus of the Archbiſhop; 'That he was too ſudden and precipitate in the 'Purſuit of his Undertakings, the Fruits whereof he deſir'd 'to taſte before they were ripe; That his Embracements 'were too large and general, having more Irons in the 'Fire at once, than cou'd be well work'd in one Forge; 'not ſuffering one of his Counſels to hold on a Probationſhip, before it was retarded by another.

His Influence on the Publick.

However his preſent Greatneſs was too high for Oppoſition, and he continu'd ſome Years without a Rival in Church and State. He was a vigorous Actor, and had a ſingular Influence, in three great Juriſdictions, beſides what was properly his own, namely The Council-Table, the Star-Chamber and the High-Commiſſion; all which were afterwards made the main Subject of Grievances. Theſe were formerly look'd upon as ſo many Chanels to convey the Royal Authority to Subjects, for the Good of them and the Publick; but now, either by the Exorbitancy of the Managers, or the Obſtinacy of the Sufferers, they were accounted firſt burdenſom, and then unſufferable. Yet in the happy Reign of Queen Elizabeth, no leſs Arbitrary Power had been exercis'd in theſe Courts, but with different Effects: For, beſides the Advantage the Government had by having its Reins held by a ſtrict and ſteady Hand, there was this material Difference; That in thoſe Proceedings, they generally us'd ſo much Art, Privacy and Dexterity, that the ſuffering Party felt only the Weight of the Judgment, and not the Paſſion of the Judges; but now the long Debates, warm Speeches, and perſonal Reflections, were often thought a greater Puniſhment, or at leaſt a greater Provocation, than the Severity of the Judgment. In theſe Matters the Archbiſhop was much condemn'd, as often unable to avoid ſharpneſs of Language and Expreſſions, which was ſo natural to him, that he cou'd not debate the leaſt Thing without Commotion. This ſort of Proceedings caus'd the Parliament afterwards in a Remonſtrance to complain, That the High-Commiſſion grew to ſuch Exceſs of Sharpneſs and Severity, as was not much leſs than the Romiſh Inquiſition. Yet upon an Examination into the Acts of that Court, it appear'd, That during the twenty one Years of Archbiſhop Abbot's Government, there were more Sentences of Suſpenſions, and other Eccleſiaſtical Puniſhments, by Three, in every ſeven Years of his Time, than in the ſeven Years of the preſent Archbiſhop.

His Behaviour towards great Tranſgreſſors.

But what gave the greateſt and moſt fatal Diſlike to him was, That he wou'd not ſuffer the common Vices of Great Men to go unpuniſh'd; and being arm'd by the King's Pleaſure on one ſide, and the High-Commiſſion on the other, he had more ſignal Opportunities of making Examples, than any Man ſince the Reformation. For if the Faults and Vices were fit to be examin'd, let the guilty Perſons be who they wou'd, they were ſure to find no Connivance or Favour from him: He deſign'd the Diſcipline of the Church ſhou'd be felt, as well as ſpoken of, and be apply'd to the greateſt and moſt ſplendid Tranſgreſſors, as well as to the Puniſhment of ſmaller and meaner Offenders; and thereupon brought thoſe upon the Stage, who were not careful to cover their own Iniquities, thinking themſelves above the Reach of other Men, or their Power or Will to chaſtiſe. Perſons of Honour and great Quality of the Court and Country, were frequently cited into the High-Commiſſion Court, upon the Fame of their Incontinence, or other Scandal in their Lives, and were there proſecuted to their publick Shame and Puniſhment. This was a tender and dangerous Point, in a licentious Age, to offer to interrupt, much more to puniſh the Pleaſures of great Men; and this they call'd an inſolent Triumph upon their Degree and Quality, and level- ling them with the Common People, and accordingly reſented it with the utmoſt Reſolutions of Revenge. The Court at this time was full of Exceſs, Idleneſs and Luxury, and the Country full of Pride, Mutiny and Diſcontent, notwithſtanding the wonderful Affluence of Riches and Plenty; ſo that there was more Cauſe to complain of the headſtrong and hard-mouth'd Horſe, than of the ſtrait Rein or ſteady Hand of the Rider. However, by means of theſe, and other Proceedings lately or formerly mention'd, this pious Prelate, being in the higheſt Pitch of his Glory, exceedingly provok'd, or underwent the Envy, and Reproach, and the Malice of Men of all Qualities and Conditions, who agreed in nothing elſe but in their Hatred to him.

The Occaſion of the Book of Sports.

2. There happened two ſorts of Proceedings this Year, which afterwards turn'd much to the Diſadvantage of the Archbiſhop; namely, the reviving the Book of Sports, and the Proſecution of Mr. Prynn. The firſt was chiefly occaſion'd by ſome Complaints made concerning Ales and Revels upon the Wakes or Dedication-Sundays in Somerſetſhire; where the Lord Chief Juſtice Richardſon in his Circuit made an expreſs Order againſt them, and that Publication of it ſhou'd be made by the Miniſters in every Pariſh Church. This being done without the Conſent or Knowledge of the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, it was found to be ſuch an Incroachment upon the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction, that Biſhop Laud complain'd to the King of this Irregularity; and after that writ to the Biſhop of Bath and Wells, to give a full Account how the Feaſts of the Dedication of Churches, commonly call'd Wakes, were obſerv'd in thoſe Parts; and whether the Diſorders of them might not be prevented by the Juſtices of the Peace, without abrogating the Feaſts themſelves; which if decently retain'd might encourage Neighbourly Meetings, and a ſeaſonable Recreation of the People. The Biſhop return'd Anſwer, under the Hands of above ſeventy of the ableſt Clergy, 'That 'the ancient Cuſtom of thoſe Feaſts was laudable and inno'cent; That the late Suppreſſion was very unacceptable; 'and the Reſtitution of them wou'd be grateful to the 'Clergy, Gentry and Common People. Upon this Report, and other Enquiries, Judge Richardſon was reprov'd at the Council-Table, and ſo ſeverely by Biſhop Laud himſelf, that he came out complaining, That he had been almoſt choak'd with a Pair of Lawn Sleeves. However with great Uneaſineſs he revok'd his Order at the next Aſſizes; which Revocation, however well intended, was thought to countenance the miſpending and profaning the Lord's Day: And many devout Perſons were ſo highly offended at it, that from an awful Reſpect, they proceeded to a rigid Preciſeneſs, and abſolutely condemn'd all the Cuſtomary Sports and Diverſions upon Sundays, which after Divine Service had been long practis'd without Scruple.

This one Extream of the Puritan Party put the Government upon another, which prov'd more unhappy, and this was the renewing King James's Declaration concerning lawful Sports to be us'd upon Sundays, after Evening Prayers ended, from thence commonly call'd The Book of Sports, which in the Year 1618 had been order'd to be publiſh'd from the Biſhop of each Dioceſe, through all the Pariſh Churches. The King and Council finding the rigorous Notions of a Sabbath to encreaſe, and the Doctrines of ſome tending to downright Judaiſm; and to reſtore the Feaſts of Dedication of Churches, thought fit to revive and confirm the ſaid Declaration, 'with ſome ad'ditional Orders to Magiſtrates to permit the Uſe, and 'prevent the Abuſe of theſe Paſtimes; which in the firſt 'Place were to be no Impediment to the Duty of the Day; 'next, no Recuſants ſhou'd be capable of the Benefit of 'them, nor any others who were not diligently preſent at 'Divine Service, and did not keep themſelves to their own 'Pariſhes.' The Publication of this, however piouſly intended, gave great Offence to many of no ſmall Devotion; and the more, becauſe, tho' there was nothing expreſs in the Declaration, that the Miniſter of the Pariſh ſhou'd be oblig'd to the publiſhing it, yet ſome Miniſters for refuſing to read it, were ſuſpended ab Officio & Beneficio, ſome depriv'd, and more moleſted in the High-Commiſſion Court. This one Thing caus'd more ſpecious Grounds of Complaint againſt the King and the Archbiſhop, than any other Part of the Publick Adminiſtration, as having ſuch outward Appearances of Irreligion and Prophaneneſs. For tho' ſuch Liberties may be ſo limited in the Notions of learned Men, as to make them lawful; yet it is hardly practicable ſo to confine them to the Actions of the People, as to keep them from degenerating into Licentiouſneſs; So that the Declaration after a while dy'd of itſelf, and it was wiſh'd by many wiſe and ſober Men, that it had never been reviv'd.

It is order'd to be read in Churches.

An Account of Mr. Prynn.

3. The Proſecution of Mr. William Prynn prov'd another great Diſadvantage both to the Archbiſhop, and the Government. This noted Gentleman had his firſt Education in Oxford, and was now an utter Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn; where he had been a great Follower and Admirer of the famous Puritan Lecturer Dr. Preſton, formerly mention'd. He brought ſome Learning from the Univerſity, which he daily improv'd by Indefatigable Study; and being found to be of a warm and enterpriſing Spirit, and eager in the Purſuit of what he had once imbib'd, he was eſteem'd by Preſton as the propereſt Perſon to venture upon ſuch Exploits, in which calm and conſiderate Men durſt not appear. Whereupon he was encourag'd, and put into the Road of Writing, out of which no Threats or Puniſhments cou'd ever deter him; ſo that he became the moſt voluminous and violent Compiler, that perhaps the Nation ever produc'd. Beſides his defending of the Calvinian Principles, he began with laſhing the Looſeneſs and Debauchery of the Times, againſt drinking of Healths, wearing long Hair, ludicrous Entertainments, with other real and ſuppos'd Corruptions: 'Till after divers new Models and Additions, in the Year 1632 he publiſh'd a large Rhapſody againſt Stage-Plays, and innumerable other Diverſions, intitled Hiſtriomaſtix, &c. This various Work conſiſted of above a thouſand Pages, with infinite Quotations; in which he breath'd out Diſgrace to the Nation, Infamy to the Church, Reproaches to the Court, Diſhonour to the Queen, and ſome things believ'd to be tending to the Deſtruction of his Majeſty's Perſon.

His firſt Proſecution and Puniſhment.

This Book being fill'd with ſuch libellous Expreſſions and dangerous Inſinuations, Biſhop Laud firſt ſhew'd it to the King, and employing Dr. Heylyn to pick out the moſt virulent Paſſages, the Attorney-General Noy was order'd to proſecute Mr. Prynn in the Star-Chamber, which was done this preſent Year. In this Tryal Judge Richardſon extoll'd the King's Mercy in proceeding rather in a Criminal than a Capital Way; declaring, That if he had been turn'd over to his Tribunal, he muſt have been left to a Jury, of whom no Mercy cou'd be hop'd for ſo great an Offender. In ſhort, there appear'd ſo many foul and ſcandalous Reflections, that the Judges of the Court generally concurr'd in this Cenſure of him, 'To be fin'd five thou'ſand Pounds to the King; expell'd the Univerſity of 'Oxford, aud Lincoln's-Inn; degraded and diſabled from 'his Profeſſion in the Law; to ſtand in the Pillory in 'Weſtminſter and Cheapſide, and in each Place to loſe an 'Ear, to have his Book burnt before his Face by the Hand 'of the Common Hangman, and laſtly to remain Priſoner 'during Life.' This publick and ſolemn Puniſhment was by many thought to exceed the Proportion of the Crimes, eſpecially by thoſe who favour'd his Opinions; and the Terror of it ſerv'd to increaſe the popular Averſion againſt the Star-Chamber, and the principal Judges concern'd.

His Behaviour.

It much more increas'd the Fury of the Crimnal, who became a moſt violent Incendiary, and a moſt implacable Enemy to the Archbiſhop, and the preſent Powers, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil. In which he proceeded with ſuch a reſtleſs Vigour, and diſtemper'd Fervour, as ſhew'd him a notorious Inſtance how much a Man may be actuated by Zeal, Conſcience and Religion, and how little by the true Spirit of Chriſtianity. Yet after all, by means of his Publick Sufferings, his honeſt Pretenſions, his voluminous Writings, and his invincible Struglings, he obtain'd the Reputation of one of great Learning and Piety, and the Title of The Cato of the Age, which Name was ſaid to have been given him firſt by the King himſelf.

The Birth of King James the Second.

4. On the fourteenth Day of October this Year, the Queen was deliver'd of her third Son, but the Second now living, who was immediately proclaim'd Duke of York at the Court Gates; and upon his Account ſeveral Medals of Silver were caſt abroad. On Sunday the twenty fourth of the ſame Month, he was baptiz'd by the Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and by the Name of James, who came afterwards to be King of Great Britain and Ireland; a Prince unfortunate to Himſelf, but more than fortunate to his Kingdoms, in bleſſing them with two Daughters, whoſe Merits and Virtues can never be too highly celebrated.

A famous Maſque by the Inns of Court.

To congratulate this Birth, and to welcome his Majeſty from Scotland, and likewiſe to ſhew a publick Diſapprobation of Prynn's Hiſtriomaſtix, the whole Body of the Gentlemen of the four Inns of Court, by ſome of their principal Members, offer'd a moſt Splendid Maſque to be perform'd at White-Hall by their Societies jointly, as a ſingular Expreſſion of their Love and Duty to their Majeſties. Such Performances were highly taking at Court, therefore the Offer was graciouſly and readily accepted; The Management of the whole was left to the moſt conſiderable Men of each Inn, ſuch as Mr. Noy, Mr. Selden, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Whitelock, Sir Edward Herbert, Sir John Finch, &c. and the beſt of Poets, Muſicians, Painters, Workmen and Projectors were imploy'd, to bring it to the Height of Magnificence and Perfection. On Candlemaſs Night it began with a glorious Proceſſion from Ely-Houſe in Holborn to White-Hall, attended with infinite Numbers of Lights and Flambeaus, which diſcover'd ſuch ſurprizing Shows as the City had never ſeen. The Performance at the Banquetting-Houſe prov'd to the great Delight and Satisfaction of the King, Queen, and Court; and the Queen not only condeſcended to dance in Perſon, but alſo deſir'd to have the ſame acted again in the City. Whereupon Intimation being given to the Lord-Mayor, he invited the King and Queen about a Fortnight after, and made a noble Entertainment for them at Merchant-Taylor's Hall; where all was perform'd in the ſame Manner, to the no leſs Satisfaction of the City than the Court. Whitelock has given a full Account of this extraordinary Maſque, and tells us that the Expence of it amounted to above one and twenty Thouſand Pounds.

The Affairs of Ireland.

In Ireland, great Confuſions began to be compos'd this Year by the vigilant and active Lord Lieutenant Wentworth, who in the Beginning of it wrote a Letter to his Majeſty, in which he adviſ'd 'The Calling of a Parliament, and 'ſuggeſted the Ways and Means of their Supply to make 'up the Revenue, which within a Year wou'd fall ſhort 'twenty Thouſand Pounds, to diſcharge a Debt upon the 'Crown of eighty Thouſand Pounds, and to Support the 'Army; with Propoſitions for the Peace and Intereſt of his 'Majeſty's Affairs, and Conſiderations for the better Government of the Church and Clergy in that Kingdom.' In which he preſcrib'd, and afterwards purſu'd ſuch Meaſures as ſhew'd him to be an expert Soldier, a moſt able States-Man, and a zealous Churchman and Chriſtian. As to Foreign Affairs, the King's Thoughts of reſtoring the Palatinate ſeem'd at preſent to dye with the Prince Elector; but to countenance his Son and Heir, the young Prince, his Majeſty beſtow'd on him the Honour of a Garter.

The Death of Biſhop Godwin,

The Lord Falkland,

And Mr. Ferrars.

Beſides the Death of Archbiſhop Abbot this Year, we are to take notice of that of Dr. Francis Godwin, Biſhop of Hereford, a pious Man, an eminent Divine, a skilful Mathematician, an excellent Philoſopher, and an admirable Hiſtorian, yet a Stranger to the World: He was no leſs critical than the learned Selden, and is celebrated for his indefatigable Pains in collecting the Succeſſion of all the Engliſh and Welſh Biſhops, ſince the Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity. We ought alſo to mention the Death of Henry Cary, Lord Falkland, a Perſon highly eſteem'd for his great Abilities and Experience in State Affairs; and no leſs noted for the admirable Son he left behind him. Laſtly, we ſhall mention Mr. Henry Ferrars, an honourable Gentleman of Warwickſhire, much eſteem'd by the Great Mr. Camden; who proſecuting his Studies of Heraldry, Genealogies, and Antiquities, became highly valued for his eminent Knowledge in them, by which he not only gave a fair Luſtre to his ancient and noble Family, but alſo to the Country of his Nativity.

The Beginning of Ship Money.

VI. 1. The Kingdom ſtill enjoy'd a profound Peace, and was free from thoſe Wars that diſturb'd the Quiet of Europe; but by means of ſome Piratical Encroachments, and the King's new Wants in ſuppreſſing them, it gradually fell into further Troubles and Diſcontents at home. In order to Supplies, the Court had ſet on foot many Projects and Monopolies formerly mention'd, and had deſcended ſo low as to lay a ſort of Tax upon Cards and Dice; all which caus'd much more Hatred, and leſs Profit to the King, than was generally expected. But for a more certain and continu'd Supply, this Year was invented an extraordinary Project, which in ſome Reſpects prov'd of real Advantage to the King and Kingdom, and in others of great Miſchief to both; it being the moſt exceptionable Expedient, and thought the moſt irreconcileable to the Conſtitution, of any Practis'd at this Time. This was commonly call'd by the Name of Ship-Money; to judge of the Reaſonableneſs and Legality of which, we muſt always carefully diſtinguiſh between the Opinions and Eſtabliſhments of theſe Times, and thoſe of our own at preſent.

The Occaſion of it.

The Occaſion of this Tax was as follows: The narrow Seas were at this Time infeſted with Pirates of all the neighbouring Nations; and the Dutch began to challenge ſuch a Right of Fiſhery, as wou'd have deſtroy'd the King's Right to that Dominion, which had been always claim'd and exercis'd by his Royal Progenitors. To juſtify this new Pretenſion and Incroachment, they incourag'd the famous Grotius to aſſert their free Uſe of Shipping, in a Treatiſe ſtil'd Mare Liberum; which was fully anſwer'd and refuted by that learned Antiquary Mr. Selden, in his Mare Clauſum; of which the Materials had been collected at the Motion of King James, and were now reduc'd to order, and publiſh'd by the Command of King Charles. But this Controverſy was too material to be determin'd by Paper Arguments: Therefore to ſhew a juſt Concern for the Honour and Safety of the Nation, his Majeſty publiſh'd two ſeveral Proclamations; the firſt prohibiting the Mariners and Seamen to enter into Foreign Service without a Special Licence; the ſecond ordering a Diſtinction to be made between the Flags in the Royal Navy, and in the King's Service, and thoſe us'd by Merchants and private Traders.

The firſt Model by Mr. Noy.

But the Main Difficulty was how to raiſe Money for fitting out a Navy ſufficient to guard the Seas, as Neceſſity now requir'd, not only againſt the Encroachments of the Dutch, but againſt the encreaſing Inſolence of the Turkiſh and Algerine Pirates. Wherefore by Degrees a Project was fram'd out of many ancient Records by the deep-ſighted Attorney-General Mr. Noy, to impoſe upon every Sea-Port and Place of Merchandiſe the Obligation of finding ſuch a Number of Ships and Men, in Proportion to their Wealth and Trade. And the firſt Writ for the Tax was directed to the City of London, 'commanding the Citizens 'at their Charge to provide ſeven Ships of War, furniſhed 'with Men and Warlike Proviſions, to be at Portſmouth 'by the firſt Day of March, and to continue from thence 'twenty ſix Weeks in his Majeſty's Service, for the Defence of the Seas, &c.' The Writ being read in the Common-Council at Guild-Hall, it gave a general Diſguſt, and caus'd a formal Petition to the King, in which they repreſented, 'That by ancient Privileges, Grants and Acts 'of Parliaments, they were exempt, and were to be freed 'from that Charge.' But this Petition ſeem'd to have had no other Effect, but only to expreſs a Diſſent, when there muſt follow a Compliance; and the Example of Submiſſion, however extorted from the City of London, wou'd have its ſure and certain Influence upon all inferior Places.

Great Diſguſts.

Mr. Noy's Death and Character.

The Legal Right of this Aid was not yet diſputed in any Court of Judicature, but by Degrees it created a general Offence and Odium. The Nobility and Gentry became more and more jealous of any Methods of raiſing Money out of Parliament: The Merchants and Traders had the Grievance of thinking the whole Burden caſt upon Them: The Clergy cou'd not at firſt obtain an Exemption from their conſiderable Share; and the Country Farmers thought it little leſs than ſeizing their Corn and Cattle to be ſent on Ship-board. The Murmurs indeed were ſo univerſal, and ſo artificially improv'd by the Enemies of the Court, that they look'd upon the Death of the Projector Noy to be a Judgment ſent upon his Head; which hapned on the 9th of Auguſt, juſt at the Time when the Writs were compleated. This Perſon had been extoll'd for a great Patriot in the three laſt Parliaments, but by Means of the Lord Treaſurer Weſton, he was by the Lure of his Place brought over to the Court, where he ſtill retain'd the ſame affected Moroſity. He was a Man exceeding humourous, of a cynical Ruſticity, a moſt indefatigable Searcher of ancient Records, whereby he became an eminent Inſtrument both of Good and Ill to the King's Prerogative. He had a Roughneſs which made him unapt to flatter other Men, yet that and his Pride render'd him moſt liable to be flatter'd Himſelf. By which Means, he was by the Artifices of others brought to think that he cou'd not give a greater Proof, that his Skill in the Law was greater than all other Mens, than by making that Law, which all other Men believ'd not to be ſo. He wanted a due Knowledge of Men, and left a very ſtrange Will behind him, being by ſome accounted a Papiſt, if not an Atheiſt. But the Archbiſhop had a better and juſter Opinion of him, and in his Diary tells us, That he had loſt a dear Friend of him, and the Church the greateſt ſhe had of his Condition, ſince ſhe needed any ſuch.

Judge Finch's Character.

Upon the Death of this noted Man, Sir John Banks was made Attorney-General; and Sir Robert Heath being unexpectedly remov'd from the Honour of Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Finch was advanc'd to that Station. This ſudden Change occaſion'd various Diſcourſes; but within four Days after the Writs for Ship-Money, it was reported that he was to be inſtrumental in promoting that invidious Buſineſs. This Gentleman had been Speaker in the laſt Parliament, and having a good Stock of Wit and natural Parts, and no great Fortunes, or Skill in the Profeſſion he embrac'd, he was willing to uſe thoſe Weapons he beſt underſtood, and took up Ship-Money where Mr. Noy left it. And being a Judge, he carry'd it up to that Height, that it overwhelm'd him, and almoſt ſunk him. He very much influenc'd his Brethren the Judges in this Matter; and being afterwards Lord-Keeper, upon a Demurrer to a Bill founded upon no other Equity than an Order of Council, he declared, That while he ſat in that Poſt, no Man ſhou'd preſume to diſpute thoſe Orders, but the Wiſdom of the Board was, and ſhou'd be Ground enough for him to make a Decree in Chancery: Which was ſuch an Aggravation of the Exceſs of that Table, that it receiv'd more Prejudice from that unreaſonable Addition, than from the higheſt Contempt that cou'd be offer'd to it.

Sir Edward Coke's Death and Character.

The Death of Mr. Noy was ſhortly after ſucceeded by that of the Oracle of the Engliſh Law, Sir Edward Coke, in the 83d Year of his Age. He had been Attorney-General to Queen Elizabeth, and Lord Chief Juſtice of England under King James; which Advancement he loſt the ſame Way he got it, which was by his Tongue. His Receſs was far from being inglorious, and he was ſo excellent at improving a Diſgrace, that King James us'd to compare him to a Cat, that whatever hapned, wou'd always light upon her Feet. Finding a Cloud at Court, he met with fair Weather in the Country, where he ſo eſpous'd the Cauſe of the People, that in ſucceeding Parliaments the Prerogative felt him, as its moſt able and active Oppoſer. We are told that the Duke of Buckingham wou'd have reſtor'd him, if he wou'd have given a Gratuity; but he anſwer'd, A Judge ought not to take a Bribe, nor give a Bribe. He was an upright Judge, and a cloſe Arguer; and his uſual Saying was, Matter lyes in a little Room. Upon his Death many of his Papers were ſeiz'd by Order of Council, and afterwards return'd to his Heir; but his Will was by that Means quite loſt. Beſides the Deaths of theſe two great Lawyers, we are to mention thoſe of two celebrated Poets this Year, Thomas Randolphe and George Chapman: The former was a Cantabrigian, an adopted Son of famous Ben Johnſon, and accounted one of the moſt facetious and pregnant Wits of his Time; but too much indulging Himſelf with the Converſation of his Admirers, he was unfortunately worn out in the 29th Year of his Age. The Other alſo was an intimate Friend of Ben Johnſon's, and was likewiſe extoll'd and eſteem'd, as well for his ſeveral Dramatick Performances, as his laborious Verſion of the Works of Homer and the Minor Poets.

And George Chapman.

The Earl of Newcaſtle's Entertainment of the King and Queen.

2. This Summer the King and Queen thought fit to make a Progreſs towards the North; and having paſs'd the Trent, they were nobly entertain'd at Bolſover Caſtle in Derbyſhire by the Earl of Newcaſtle, where nothing was ſpar'd which might add Splendor to the Feaſt, ſo much honour'd with the Preſence of both their Majeſties. The Earl invited all the Nobility and Gentry of the Counties of Nottingham and Darby to wait upon their Majeſties, who repair'd thither with the utmoſt Chearfulneſs, and were treated with the Height of Civility and Magnificence. The Expence of the Entertainment at Bolſover this Year, and that at Welbeck the preceding Year, was modeſtly reckon'd at above ten Thouſand Pounds. All which was but an Earneſt of this Earl's Love and Duty to his Prince: For afterwards, when the unhappy Wars broke out, he adventur'd both Life and Fortune for the King; and being of the ſuffering Side, his Eſtate was ſeiz'd and ſold by the Parliament, who rais'd above a hundred and eleven Thouſand Pounds out of it: Beſides he had other great Loſſes out of his Eſtate Real and Perſonal, during thoſe calamitous Times.

Great Deſigns of Archbiſhop Laud.

In the mean time Archbiſhop Laud, proceeding with his uſual Vigour and Activity, enter'd upon two or three new and great Deſigns. The firſt was to bring the French and Dutch Churches to a perfect Conformity with the Church of England. This met with great Oppoſition, not only from thoſe Foreigners, who inſiſted upon particular Immunities and Exemptions, but alſo from the Puritan Party, and many others who were jealous of the Archbiſhop's Deſigns. Yet at laſt this Injunction was put in Force, 'That the Foreigners of the firſt Deſcent might continue in their former Ways; but all of the ſecond Deſcent, born here in England, ſhou'd reſort to their ſeveral Pariſh Churches.' This was ſo vigorouſly purſu'd in the Dioceſe of Norwich, by Biſhop Wren, that if we may believe Roger Coke, a Suffolk Man, it frighted Thouſands of Families out of Norfolk and Suffolk into New England, to the great Damage of the Woollen Manufactures, and the Ruin of the Trade of Ipſwich, and other Places. Another Deſign of the Archbiſhop's, in which he was very active, was to ſettle a regular Uniformity of Worſhip in all the Engliſh Factories beyond the Seas; ſo that it was hop'd that there wou'd be a Church of England in all Courts in Chriſtendom, in the chief Cities of the great Mahometan Princes, and in all the known Parts of the World; by which it might become as Diffus'd and Catholick as the Church of Rome. He had conſiderable Succeſs in this Deſign, but not ſo great in a third, which was to augment the Revenues of the Parochial Miniſters of London, which by Time and Corruptions had fallen into great Decay. This had not the deſir'd Succeſs; yet this, and others, were brought againſt him afterwards as heinous and capital Crimes.

The Affairs of Ireland.

In this Year, Ireland, under the vigorous Government of the Lord Deputy Wentworth, had a Parliament call'd to conſider of Ways and Means to maintain the Army, and to diſchage a Debt of eighty Thouſand Pounds, there contracted by the Crown. By the great Courage and Management of the Lord Deputy, theſe Ends were happily obtain'd, and three Subſidies were granted. Likewiſe a great Alteration was made as to Eccleſiaſtical Affairs; For in a concurrent Convocation, there was a Canon paſs'd, 'fixing the Agreement of the Church of England and Ireland in the Profeſſion of the ſame Chriſtian Faith, by receiving the Book of Articles of Religion, agreed by the Engliſh Convocation held at London in the Year 1562.' This new Eſtabliſhment was charg'd upon the Lord Deputy, and his Chaplain Dr. Bramhall, as an Arminian Project, when the Primate Uſher, and other Anti-Arminians perceiv'd, That the thus admitting the 39 Articles of the Church of England, had repeal'd the Articles of the Church of Ireland, eſtabliſh'd in 1615; wherein the Lambeth Articles, determining the Predeſtinarian Doctrine, and other Calvinian Principles, were aſſerted and receiv'd.

Foreign Affairs.

As to Foreign Parts, there was nothing ſo remarkable this Year as the ſignal Victory obtain'd by the Imperialiſts againſt the Swedes, who had got Poſſeſſion of about Half of Germany. The Latter, under the Command of Guſtavus Horn and Duke Bernard, were on the 6th of September attack'd by the Imperial Army near Nordlingen, commanded by the Duke of Lorrain and John de Wert, ſupported by the Cardinal Infanto, who had march'd from Milan thro' Switzerland with the old Spaniſh and Italian Troops. The Victory was compleat on the Imperial Side, and the Swedes loſt, beſides their Cannon and Baggage, above ten Thouſand Men; and of their two Generals Duke Bernard was wounded, and the brave Guſtavus Horn taken Priſoner. The Engliſh Court had no great Concern for this Action, having an Alliance with both Parties, tho' no very good Underſtanding with either of them. The great Miniſter of Sweden, Chancellor Oxenſtiern, had this Year ſent his eldeſt Son as Ambaſſador into England; but either wanting proper Credentials from the Queen of Sweden, Regent in her Son's Minority, or making hard Propoſals for aſſiſting the Elector Palatine againſt the Emperor, he was ſo much ſlighted and diſoblig'd, that he left England in Diſcontent, and made ſuch a Report of his Uſage to his Father, that he and his Family reſented the Affront, ſo as never to forgive the King of England.

Car. 11.

3. In the following Year, there began to appear the good and bad Effects of the Tax call'd Ship-Mony; the Good in the ſcouring the Seas, and the Bad in the Diſguſts of the People. By this Fund the King was enabled to ſet out a Fleet of forty Men of War, under the Earl of Lindſey Admiral, and twenty Sail more under the Earl of Eſſex Vice-Admiral, for ſecuring of the narrow Seas, and aſſerting the Engliſh Dominion of them. And indeed the mighty Encreaſe of the French Navy, and their threatning the Sea-Ports in Flanders, together with the Dutch Encroachments upon the Engliſh Coaſts, and the Piratical Invaſions of the Algerines and others, who infeſted the very Channel; were a great Proof of the Neceſſity of ſetting out a Fleet, which under the preſent Exigencies cou'd not be done without extraordinary Aid. To make this Aid more ample, and more continual, it was found expedient to enlarge the Extent of it; and whereas in the preceding Year the Writs were directed only to Maritime Towns, it was now reſolv'd to bring in all Counties of the Kingdom to ſome proportionable Share, as being Partakers of the general Benefit. And accordingly Inſtructions and Directions were prepar'd by the Lords of the Council, to be ſent with the Writs to the reſpective Sheriffs, to inform them, 'That his Majeſty, for his own Honour, the ancient Renown of the Nation, and the common Safety of his People, had iſſu'd the like Writs to all Counties, Cities and Towns in the Kingdom; that for due Execution, they ſhou'd firſt ſettle the general Aſſeſſment of the County, and then ſubdivide the particular Charge on each Hundred and Pariſh.' To promote the Execution of theſe Writs, the Lord-Keeper Coventry deliver'd a Charge in his Majeſty's Name to all the Judges of England, in the Star-Chamber, concluding with the Affair of the Navy, ordering them 'That in their Charges at the Aſſizes, they ſhould let the People know, how juſt it was, that his Majeſty ſhou'd require this Aid for their Defence, and with what Chearfulneſs they ought, and how much they were bound in Duty, to contribute towards it.

The Ship-Mony encreas'd.

Theſe Charges at the County Aſſizes began much to allarm the Country, and to make them feel the Burthen before it touch'd them; and what was before thought a private Proviſion to be made by particular Parts for their own Safety, was now found to be intended for a national Tax, and therefore the more odious, for want of the Authority of Parliament. And tho' the Weight it ſelf was not very heavy, for the yearly Income through the whole Kingdom amounted to no more than two hundred and thirty ſix thouſand Pounds; yet the making it an univerſal Aid, and the aſſeſſing and collecting it in the Parliamentary Methods, gave it much the greater Appearance of Grievance and Oppreſſion. Yet ſtill the King's Charges were ſo great in ſupporting his Fleets, and maintaining the Dominion of the Britiſh Seas, that he was oblig'd to make uſe of other Projects for improving his Revenues: As by erecting an Office for Licenſing Subjects to travel in Foreign Parts: By granting the Profits of the Office for receiving the Forfeitures incurr'd by profane ſwearing and curſing: By fixing a Letter-Office both for England and Scotland: By renewing a Commiſſion, to ſell, grant and confirm to the People their defective Eſtates and Titles; and By inflicting Penalties on exceſſive Carriages that were to the Deſtruction of the High-Ways; and by other Ways and Means, which were more and more look'd upon with a jealous Eye by the People. Yet the Dangers from abroad were really very imminent, and might well juſtify ſome extraordinary Proviſions. For the Dutch had made a League with the French againſt the Spaniards, by which a French Army was to invade Flanders by Land, and to attempt Dunkirk, while a Dutch Fleet were to lay by, and aſſiſt at Sea. And probably the Deſign had been effected, if the Terror of the Engliſh Navy had not timely obliged the Dutch to draw off their Ships, and return home.

New Regulations.

This Year alſo the King undertook to regulate two Inconveniencies, one accruing to the Country, and the other to the City. As to the firſt, his Majeſty had iſſu'd out a Proclamation to reſtrain the extraordinary Reſort of the Nobility and Gentry to the City of London, which prov'd much to the Damage of the Country, and was thought to encreaſe the City Infection. And now by his Attorney-General an Information was exhibited in the Star-Chamber againſt ſeven Lords, about ſixty Baronets and Knights, and a hundred Eſquires, with divers Ladies of Quality, for Non-Obſervance of this Proclamation. The other was the laying a Reſtraint upon the too great Increaſe, and other Inconveniencies ariſing from the Hackney Coaches in the Streets of London. And here it may be obſerv'd, That in the firſt Year of this Reign, no Hackney Coaches ſtood in the Streets, but in their Stables, to be us'd only as Perſons had Occaſion to ſend for them; and there were not at that time above twenty in Number to be hired in and about London. Alſo at that time the great Judges of the Law conſtantly rode on Horſe-back to Weſtminſter, in all Weathers, with great Solemnity.

The Arrival of the Prince Palatine.

In November, Charles the new Prince Palatine came over to ſollicite his Uncle to promote his Reſtoration; and in a Month after came his younger Brother Prince Rupert, who were receiv'd after a great and honourable Manner: And their Cauſe ſeem'd to have a more hopeful Aſpect by the late Concluſion of a Peace at Prague, whereby at leaſt the Proteſtants were reſtor'd to their Liberties and Profeſſion, as ſettled in the Year 1627. On the twenty eighth Day of December the Queen was deliver'd of a ſecond Daughter, nam'd Elizabeth; who prov'd a Lady of incomparable Abilities and rare Virtues, but of a cruel and untimely Fate, being in her Youth over-whelm'd with the Extremity of Grief for the Loſs of her Liberty, and much more for that of her Royal Father. To congratulate the preſent Acceſſion of Happineſs to the Court, the States of Holland ſent over a ſolemn Embaſſy, with a noble preſent of Amber-Greaſe, China Baſons, a Clock made by Rodolphus the Emperor, and ſome exquiſite Pieces of Painting by Titian, and other great Maſters.

The Queen deliver'd a ſecond Daughter.

The Death of Biſhop Corbet.

We ſhall conclude this Year with the Deaths of four noted Men: The firſt was Dr. Richard Corbet, Biſhop of Norwich, a Perſon who in his younger Years was eſteem'd one of the fineſt Wits in the Univerſity of Oxford; afterwards admired for his polite and quaint Preaching, and laſt of all for his pious Munificence and Hoſpitality. The ſecond was Mr. George Herbert, a fam'd Engliſh Poet, a younger Brother of the noble Family of the Herberts of Montgomery, choſen Orator to the Univerſity of Cambridge, and then piouſly undertook to be Rector of Bemerton near Salisbury; a Perſon of a florid Wit, obliging Humour, fluent Elocution, and great Proficiency in Arts and Sciences. The third was Dr. Alexander Gill, the famous Maſter of St. Paul's School, a learned Critick and Divine, and one who had ſuch an excellent way of training up Youth, that many eminent Perſons, in Church and State, eſteem'd it their greateſt Happineſs, that they had been educated under him. The laſt was noted only for his extraordinary great Age, being the Wonder of his Time, a Shropſhire Man, named Thomas Parr. He was now an hundred and fifty two Years old, and brought to London in good Health by the Earl of Arundel, as a great Rarity; and 'tis believ'd he might have continu'd ſome Years longer, had not the Fatigue of his Journey, and the Change of his Diet ſhorten'd his Days. He was born in the laſt Year of King Edward the Fourth, and in Effect had ſeen the Reigns of eight Kings and Queens of England.

4. Archbiſhop Land was now in the Height of his Glory and Power, but ſtill encreaſing as to the Enmity that daily appear'd againſt him. Being a Commiſſioner of the Treaſury, he met with much Oppoſition from the Lord Cottington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, by his profound Diſſimulation, often impos'd upon him, and took Advantage of the Vehemency of his Temper. And what gave him greater Trouble, his old Friend Windebank, who had been rais'd by him, forſook him, and joyn'd with the Chancellor and his Party. While he was Commiſſioner he found that the Treaſurer's Place was worth above ſeven thouſand Pounds a Year, without defrauding the King, or abuſing the Subject; and he obſerv'd, that divers Treaſurers of late had rais'd themſelves from private Fortunes to the Titles and Eſtates of Earls, which he believ'd cou'd not be done without Wrong to both. Therefore he reſolv'd to recommend a Perſon for this high Office, who had no Family to raiſe, and who wou'd better manage this great Truſt; and this was his Succeſſor Dr. Juxon Biſhop of London, whom he brought in without any Oppoſition, to the great Surprize of the Court, which had not ſeen any of that Profeſſion ſo exalted ſince the Reign of Henry the Seventh. The Staff was deliver'd to him on the ſixth of March, on which Day he was ſworn Privy-Counſellor; and on the firſt of the next Term he was conducted in great State from London-Houſe to Weſtminſter-Hall, the Archbiſhop riding by him, and moſt of the Lords and Biſhops about the Town, with many Gentlemen of the beſt Note and Quality, following in a regular and pompous Proceſſion.

Bp. Juxon made Lord Treaſurer.

It was much fear'd by ſome, and hop'd by others, that the new Lord-Treaſurer wou'd have ſunk under the Burden of the Place; and in this Promotion the Archbiſhop was juſtly conceiv'd neither to have conſulted his own preſent Peace, nor his future Safety. Had he ſtudy'd the former, he wou'd have open'd the Door for the Lord Cottington, who took himſelf to be neareſt ally'd to the Place; if the latter, he wou'd have recommended the Earls of Bedford, Hartford or Eſſex, the Lord Say, or ſome other of the Popular Nobility, who might have ſupported him in Time of Extremity. However he was infinitely pleas'd with what he had done, and unhappily believ'd that he had provided a ſtronger Support for the Church, as appears from his Diary; and never abated any thing of his Severity, and Sharpneſs of Language towards Men of all Conditions. But the Lord Clarendon tells us, This Promotion inflam'd more Men than were angry before, and not only encreas'd the Envy and Malice againſt the Archbiſhop, but unjuſtly diſpos'd many towards the Church it ſelf; which they look'd upon as the Gulph ready to ſwallow all the great Offices of State. He alſo gives ſo ſlight a Character of Biſhop Juxon himſelf, that le Clerk took him for One by no means fit for the Place; but to ſupply that Defect, we ſhall give his Character from Sir Philip Warwick, and others, who probably knew him better than his Lordſhip.

Many diſoblig'd.

Bp. Juxon's Character.

Dr. William Juxon had been a long and intimate Friend of the Archbiſhop's; they were both eminent for Integrity; and had Nature mingled their Tempers, and allay'd the latter by the Prudence and Foreſight of the former, or invigorated the former with the Zeal and Activity of the Other, Nature had form'd a finer Maſs, than ſhe uſually does in her moſt exact Workmanſhip about Mankind. This Prelate was a Man of an excellent Temper, of a meek Spirit, and of a ſolid and ſteady Judgment; and having addicted his firſt Studies to the Civil Law, in which he commenc'd Doctor, this fitted him more for Secular and State Affairs. Tho' he found the Revenue low and much anticipated, yet meeting good Times, and the King inclin'd to Frugality, he happily ſupported the Dignity of his Majeſty's Houſhold, the Splendor of the Court, and all Publick Expences with Juſtice in all Contracts, ſo as to have as few Complaints in his Time, as perhaps in any; and yet he clear'd off all Anticipations on the Revenue, and ſet his Maſter beforehand. His Proceedings were always with Calmneſs and Circumſpection, and the King highly valu'd his Advice in all Emergencies; declaring to a Friend of his, That he never got his Opinion freely in his Life, but when he had it, he was ever the better for it. His mild Behaviour and Prudence wrought ſo effectually upon all Men, that tho' he bore the two moſt invidious Characters, one of a Biſhop, the other of a Lord Treaſurer, yet neither drew Envy upon his Perſon, tho' the Humour of the Times tended to brand all great Men in Employment. So that the Lord Faulkland afterwards, in a ſevere Speech againſt Biſhops in Parliament, cou'd not but give him this Teſtimony, That in an unexpected Place and Power, he expreſs'd an equal Moderation and Humility, being neither ambitious before, nor proud after, either of the Crozier, or the White-Staff. It was by means of this admirable Temper and Conduct, that he weather'd the moſt dreadful Storm that ever the Nation felt, and at laſt rode triumphantly in the Harbour; and all without any Ship-wreck of his Honour or Principles. Sure there never was a more fortunate Pilot, nor never a more honeſt Man.

5. The Treaſury being thus hopefully eſtabliſh'd, his Majeſty's great Care was to have a more powerful Fleet at Sea, to enlarge his Character abroad, and preſerve the Peace at home, by making the Nation ſenſible of a juſt and wiſe

Diſpoſal

The Royal Soveraign built.

Notice taken of Mr. Selden and his Book.

Diſpoſal of the Ship-Mony. Accordingly he undertook to build a Ship, call'd the Royal Soveraign, a Veſſel the largeſt in Bulk, the richeſt in Price, the fineſt in Workmanſhip, and in ſhort the moſt wonderful floating Caſtle then known in the World. The Fame of it, when Building, drew vaſt Multitudes from all Parts to ſee it; which ſufficiently ſhew'd both the Taſte of the King, and the Skill of the Projectors and Builders. And further to give Countenance to theſe Naval Improvements, he took into Conſideration Mr. Selden's famous Book, entitled Mare Clauſum, which by his Order he had written with extraordinary Pains and Reputation; and requir'd one of the ſaid Books to be kept in the Council Cheſt, another in the Court of Exchequer, and a Third in the Court of Admiralty, as a full and faithful Evidence of the Right of the Crown of England to the Dominion of the Britiſh Seas. This great Man was ſtyl'd by his Adverſary Grotius, The Glory, and by other Foreigners, The great Dictator of Learning of the Engliſh Nation; who having been greatly provok'd by his Uſage in the High-Commiſſion for his Hiſtory of Tythes, and his Impriſonment for his Freedom in the laſt Parliament, he prov'd a great Oppoſer of the Prerogative. But now he was highly courted by the King and Archbiſhop, and at laſt induc'd to publiſh his learned Book; in which he did not only aſſert the Engliſh Dominion of the Britiſh Seas, but clearly prov'd by conſtant and continual Practice, That the Kings of England, without any Parliament, us'd to levy Mony from their Subjects for the providing of Ships and other Neceſſaries for Maintaining that very Dominion. This he prov'd without Interruption to the Reign of Henry II. and 'tis believ'd he cou'd have brought it much nearer to his own Times, and ſo open'd a Way for the Payment of Ship-Mony; but he was too much engag'd in the Country Party to encourage ſuch Opinions.

The Earl of Northumberland's Character and Succeſs.

Further to promote the Naval Power, the King by Proclamation renew'd an Order of King James, 'Reſtraining 'all Foreigners whatſoever from Fiſhing upon any of the 'Coaſts and Seas of Great Britain and Ireland, and the adjacent Iſles, without Licence firſt obtain'd: Declaring al'ſo his Reſolution to keep ſuch a competent Strength of 'Shipping upon his Seas, as may be ſufficient both to hin'der ſuch further Encroachments upon his Regalities, and 'protect all his good Friends and Allies. Accordingly he this Year put out a Fleet, much greater than any ſince the Death of Queen Elizabeth, under the Command and Conduct of Algernon Earl of Northumberland; who was of an ancient and high-born Family, that had lain under frequent Blemiſhes of Want of Fidelity to the Crown. But this Perſon being a very graceful young Gentleman, of great Sobriety and Regularity, and in all Kinds promiſing to be an eminent Ornament to the Court, by means of the Lord Wentworth the King unhappily caſt a friendly, and a fatherly Eye upon him, uſing him both with the Reſpect of a Friend, and the Tenderneſs of a Miſtreſs; and from being Maſter of the Horſe to the Queen, he made him Lord High-Admiral of England, as great a Truſt as cou'd be given to any Man. He prov'd faithful for a conſiderable Time, and ſucceſsfully ſet out with ſixty Sail from the Downs to the North, where the Dutch Veſſels were Fiſhing upon the Engliſh Coaſts. At firſt he requir'd them to deſiſt, but they refuſing, he fired among them, took ſome, ſunk others, and diſpers'd the greater Part of them. Upon which the Dutch immediately prevail'd with the Admiral to mediate with the King, that they might by his Permiſſion proceed this Summer to fiſh upon the Coaſts, and agreed for this Year to give the King thirty Thouſand Pounds, which was accordingly paid: And the States expreſs'd their Willingneſs to obtain a Grant from the King, for his Permiſſion of their Veſſels to fiſh for the future, and to pay a Yearly Tribute for it. But the Terms of Agreement afterwards prov'd like Nails well driven, but not well clincht; and they not being well held faſt, it made them more ſuſceptible of obſtinate Counſels from France, who was at this Time undermining the general Peace by Way of Scotland. For both France and Spain, as well as England, dreaded the Conſequence of the Ship-Money.

Great Oppoſitions againſt the Ship-Money.

Yet all this honourable Diſpoſal of the Ship-Money, and the apparent good Effects of it, cou'd not reconcile the People of England to a new Tax levy'd without an Act of Parliament: For great Murmurs, and a general Senſe of Oppreſſion, ran throughout the Kingdom. In London, one Mr. Chambers, a Merchant, had peremptorily refus'd to pay, for which he had been committed to Priſon by Sir Edward Bromfield, Lord Mayor, againſt whom he commenc'd a Suit for Treſpaſs and falſe Impriſonment: Which Caſe, when it came to be heard before Sir Robert Berkley, one of the Judges of the King's Bench, he wou'd not ſuffer the Point of the Legality of Ship-Money to be argu'd by Chambers's Council; but declar'd in open Court, That there was a Rule of Law, and a Rule of Government; and that many Things which might not be done by the Rule of Law, might be done by the Rule of Government. But this Diſtinction was thought very dangerous by many: And this Way of ſilencing a Cauſe, occaſion'd the People more to ſuſpect it. And the City of London now ſhew'd ſuch an Averſion to this Tax, that the Lords of the Privy-Council were oblig'd to write twice to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, in which they told them with Severity enough, 'That they cou'd not impute their Excuſe to any 'Thing but Want of Duty; therefore in his Majeſty's 'Name, they requir'd them to ſee the Directions of their 'Letter perform'd upon their Allegiance, and as they wou'd 'anſwer the contrary at their Perils.' When the City perceiv'd they cou'd not ſhake off the Burden, they deſir'd at leaſt a Mitigation of it, and preſented a Petition for an Abatement of the Number of Ships allotted to them. But this was alſo deny'd, and in ſuch a Manner as made the Denial more grievous. For by Order of Council Mr. Secretary Cook told Them, 'That Petitions and Pleadings a'gainſt ſuch Commandments were not to be receiv'd; and 'ſince they mention'd Precedents, they ſhou'd know that 'the Precedents in former Times were Obedience not Di'rection; that there were alſo Precedents of the Puniſh'ment of thoſe that diſobey'd his Majeſty's Commands.

The twelve Judges declare it legal.

This Anſwer, and theſe Methods ſerv'd only to encreaſe the general Averſion, and the Murmurs of the Nation. Therefore the King, who in his Nature lov'd not harſh Proceedings, took a more ſoft and plauſible Method, and order'd the Legality of this Tax to be formally decided by his twelve Judges, putting the grand Queſtion to them in Writing. After a Conſideration of every Judge by Himſelf, and a Conſultation of all of them together, they return'd their Anſwer in theſe Words; 'We are of Opinion, 'That when the Good and Safety of the Kingdom in gene'ral is concern'd, and the Kingdom in Danger, your Maje'ſty may by Writ, under the Great Seal of England, com'mand all your Subjects of this your Kingdom, at their 'Charge to provide and furniſh ſuch a Number of Ships 'and Men, Victuals and Munition; and for ſuch Time as 'your Majeſty ſhall think fit, for the Defence and Safeguard 'of this Kingdom from ſuch Danger and Peril; and that 'by Law your Majeſty may compel the Doing thereof in 'Caſe of Refuſal or Refractorineſs. And we alſo are of 'Opinion, that in ſuch Caſe your Majeſty is the ſole Judge, 'both of the Danger, and When, and How the ſame is to 'be prevented and avoided.' This Opinion was ſign'd and ſubſcrib'd with theſe Names, Bramſton, Finch, Davenport, Denham, Hatton, Jones, Crooke, Trevor, Vernon, Berkley, Crawley, and Weſton.

Cenſures upon it.

Theſe Judges had been generally noted for their Learning and Integrity, and moſt of them had often and briskly oppos'd the private Deſigns of the Court; and the Court had as often acquieſc'd in their Opinions, and ſhew'd a great Readineſs to be determin'd by them at this Time. Upon which account many have believ'd, with Sir Philip Warwick, That Nothing cou'd have led them into this judicial Opinion but their Books. But the Lord Clarendon thinks otherwiſe of the Matter, and ſeverely condemns both the Judges and their Opinion, as cauſing an open Violation of the Sacredneſs of the Law. And Whitelock tells us, That all this was obtain'd after much Solicitation by the chief Juſtice Finch, who us'd great Promiſes to ſome, and Threatnings to Others, whom he found doubting. The Suſpicion of Temptation and Awe encreas'd the more, becauſe ſome of them betray'd a Surpriſe, when they heard their Reſolution openly read by the Lord-Keeper in the Star-Chamber; as if they had deſign'd to deliver it for the private Satisfaction of the King and Council, and not for the Knowledge of the whole Nation. However it was, it gave a new Allarm to the Kingdom, and caus'd this new Tax to be thought a greater Grievance than ever it was before.

He entertains the Court at Oxford.

6. During theſe Struggles and Conteſts about Ship-Money, the Archbiſhop, now in the Height of his Proſperity and Grandeur, drew a new Load of Envy upon Himſelf, by his claiming the Right of Viſiting the two Univerſities, Jure Metropolitico. For both theſe learned Bodies deny'd his Claim, and pleaded, that as they were founded by Kings, they were only ſubject to Royal Viſitations. The Cauſe was brought to a Hearing before the King and Council at Hampton-Court in June; where Sir John Banks, Attorney-General, argu'd for the Archbiſhop's Right againſt the Royal Prerogative, and Mr. Gardiner, Recorder of London, pleaded their Subjection only to Royal Power, in behalf of the Univerſity of Cambridge, as Serjeant Thinne did in behalf of that of Oxford. The King Himſelf argu'd for the Archbiſhop, and at laſt gave Judgment for him, that is, as many believ'd, againſt his own Crown and Dignity. Having gain'd this material Point, and compleated a new Body of Statutes for Oxford, the Archbiſhop, to do that Univerſity and Himſelf ſome Honour in the Eye of the Kingdom, invited the King and Queen, the Prince Elector and his Brother, with the whole Court, to an Academical Entertainment, which was to begin on the twenty ninth

Day of Auguſt. Their Majeſties Reception was very great and ſolemn, accompany'd with ſeveral glorious Speeches, and three Comedies, which were repreſented with as much Variety of Scenes and Motions, as cou'd be invented by the fine Head of Mr. Inigo Jones. The Archbiſhop was particularly honour'd by the King and Court at his own College, St. John's; where, in the new Gallery of his own Building, he had provided a moſt magnificent Dinner, to the Wonder and Satisfaction of all that were preſent. Upon the ſame Day that the Court remov'd, he made another Solemn Feaſt for the Heads of the Colleges; and Order was given at his Departure that the three Comedies ſhou'd be acted again, for the Pleaſure of the Univerſity; all Things then going well and happily, as he hints in his Diary.

Foreign Affairs.

Beſides his Domeſtick Concerns, the King was ſhortly after engag'd again in Foreign Affairs, occaſion'd by the Death of the Emperor of Germany, and the Succeſſion of his Son Ferdinand the Third, towards the latter End of this Year. Upon the Notice of which Change, his Majeſty ſent over the Earl of Arundel, Earl Marſhal of England, his Ambaſſador, with a moſt ſplendid Equipage to the new Emperor, to repreſent the unhappy Condition of the Elector Palatine, now in the Engliſh Court, and to ſollicite the Reſtitution of his Patrimony. The Emperor return'd a civil Anſwer, ' That in Time his Reſtitution might be ' conſider'd as to the Lower Palatinate; but for the Upper ' Palatinate, it concern'd the Duke of Bavaria, with ' whom Conſultation muſt be had in that Affair.' But upon a freſh Conſultation, Bavaria anſwer'd like a Soldier, That what he had won by the Sword, he wou'd maintain by the ſame Power. Upon which, the Engliſh Ambaſſador ſo far reſented the Slights and Indignities put upon him, that he came away without taking Leave; and made ſuch a Report to the King, that he ſhew'd his particular Diſpleaſure to the Imperial Agent; all which further obſtructed the King's Endeavours of reſtoring his Nephew.

The Birth of the King's third Daughter.

The Death of Sir Julius Cæſar,

Sir Humphry Lynd,

Dr. Goad,

Mr. Brett,

And Mr. Welby,

This Year prov'd calamitous by the Plague, which broke out at London in the Beginning of it, and reign'd in ſome Meaſure the whole Summer and Autumn. It decreas'd in the latter End, when a new Pleaſure was added to the Court by the Birth of the Queen's third Daughter, baptiz'd by the Name of Anne, who dy'd before ſhe was four Years of Age. In the ſame Year there dy'd four noted Perſons, two Lay-men, and two Divines; the Lay-men were Sir Julius Cæſar, and Sir Humphry Lynd: The former had worthily executed many Offices, in three ſeveral Reigns, and dy'd Maſter of the Rolls; being a Perſon of great Gravity and Integrity, and of that prodigious Bounty to all of Worth, or in Want, that he might have been taken for Almoner General to the Nation. The latter was a moſt learned Knight, a pious and zealous Puritan, a warm Member of Parliament, and noted for being a profeſt Enemy to thoſe call'd Arminians and Pontificians. The two Divines were Dr. Thomas Goad, and Mr. Richard Brett; the former had been Chaplain to Archbiſhop Abbot, and made Rector of Hadley in Suffolk, and further preferr'd; being a general Scholar, an exact Critick and Hiſtorian, a Poet, Schoolman and Divine, who upon the Indiſpoſition of Dr. Hall, was thought worthy by King James to be ſent over to the Synod of Dort. The latter, Mr. Brett, was the learned Rector of Quainton near Aylesbury, who had been appointed by King James for one of the Tranſlators of the Bible; a Perſon highly eminent for his Skill in the Oriental Languages, his vigilant Care, and diligent Preaching, and his Charity and Munificence upon all juſt Occaſions. Beſides theſe four, we are to mention a Perſon, whoſe Life was more remarkable than all of them, Henry Welby Eſquire, a Lincolnſhire Gentleman of a Thouſand Pounds per Annum, who after he had enjoy'd the Benefit of the Univerſities, the Inns of Court, and Foreign Countries, and the Reputation of a publick and honourable Way of Living, in the 40th Year of his Age, he ſuddenly retir'd from all Mankind to his Houſe at London, and liv'd after an unheard-of Manner for 44 Years; where in true Acts of Charity he outſhin'd the moſt Bountiful of his Eſtate, and in real Solitude out-rival'd the greateſt Recluſes of the Romiſh Church: For which he was call'd the Phœnix of the Times.

VII. 1. At this Time England had a mighty Show of Glory and Felicity; the Court was great and magnificent, adorn'd with all outward Splendor; the Church was ſhining in the Grandeur, Piety and Learning of its Governours; the City and Country rich and wealthy, all Commerce thriving and encreaſing; and the Univerſities flouriſhing and abounding with all Arts and Sciences. But the Happineſs and Corruption of the Nation being too great to continue unalterable, the common Tranquillity began now to be interrupted; and tho' it had been diſturb'd by Wars abroad and Plagues and Complaints at home, yet this may be ſaid to be the firſt calamitous Year of this Reign; when a Flame broke out in Scotland, which in Time almoſt conſum'd the three Kingdoms. Both Civil and Religious Grievances were the Ground, or the Pretence of the Complaints and Diſcontents that contributed towards that unhappy Fire; but the latter had the Aſcendency among the middle and vulgar Sort. As there were many Tranſactions in England that before had a great Effect upon the Affairs of Scotland, ſo in this Year there were ſome that had a more particular Influence, and help'd to bring all the Troubles to a Criſis. Of all which we ſhall give an Account before we come directly to the Hiſtory of the Heats and Diſturbances of that Kingdom, which are to begin the next Chapter.

The Beginnings of the Troubles.

Many tranſport themſelves to the Weſt-Indies.

A Reſtraint put upon them.

As to the Eccleſiaſtical Power, two Topicks were often and vehemently inſiſted on, the Unreaſonableneſs of the Cauſe, and the Severity of the Proſecution; and the latter, which ſome call'd Exorbitancy, frequently occaſion'd the former to be ſuſpected, as Popiſh and Superſtitious. It was this that caus'd ſeveral of factious and ungovernable Tempers, who had met with ſharp Cenſures in thoſe Courts, to think of taking Refuge in Foreign Plantations, where their Trade and Humour in Religion might be free to themſelves. Till at length the Number of the Families, thus tranſported, began to raiſe the Jealouſy of the State, as fearing thoſe Parts of America, wherein they propos'd to ſettle, might prove ſuch a Receptacle of diſaffected People, as wou'd be of very bad Conſequence both to the Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Power at home. Wherefore a Proclamation was iſſu'd out to reſtrain the diſorderly tranſporting his Majeſty's Subjects to the Plantations in America, without a Royal Licenſe, Becauſe of the many idle and refractory Humours, whoſe only or principal End was to live without the Reach of Authority. After which an Order was made in Council, ' That ſpeedy and effectual Courſe ſhou'd ' be taken for ſtopping of eight Ships, then in the Thames, pre- ' par'd for New-England; and Order be given for the put- ' ting on Land all the Paſſengers and Proviſions, intended ' for that Voyage.' And becauſe ſome of the Clergy, under Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures, were ready to fly to the ſame Refuge and Protection, there was another Order of Council, ' To ſtop all Miniſters, unconformable to the Diſci- ' pline and Ceremonies of the Church; and that no Clergy- ' man ſhou'd be ſuffer'd to go to the Foreign Plantations, ' without Approbation of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ' and Biſhop of London. All this, tho' founded on Reaſon of State, encreas'd the Murmurs and Complaints of the People thus reſtrain'd, and rais'd the Cries of a double Perſecution, to be vex'd at home, and not ſufferr'd to ſeek Relief abroad. However, there was this certain Conſequence, that ſome of the principal Refugees, holding New-England by a Patent from the King, drew thither ſuch a Tribe and Colony of their own, as caſt off all Subjection to the Engliſh Church, to which their Poſterity were never yet reconcil'd.

The Judges ſupport the Spiritual Courts.

The Proceedings in the Spiritual Courts, not only againſt open Separatiſts and Puritans, but even againſt many true Members of the Church that did not come up to new Meaſures, were ſo ſtrict and ſevere, that this Year it gave Occaſion to ſtrike at the Juriſdiction of thoſe Courts, and to plead that they were held illegally, becauſe not kept by Vertue of the Broad Seal, and becauſe the Proceſſes were not in the King's Name. Theſe Objections being publickly alledg'd in the Star-Chamber, an Order was there made to have the Opinion of the twelve Juges in this Caſe; who in Writing unanimouſly return'd their Opinion, ' That ' the preſent Method of Proceeding in the Eccleſiaſtical ' Courts was according to Law, and that they had no Ob- ' ligation to act under the Broad-Seal, or to uſe the King's ' Name in their Proceſſes.' This being regiſter'd in all the Courts of Weſtminſter, the King iſſu'd out his Proclamation, to give a further Sanction to it, and a Satisfaction to his Subjects. This was look'd upon by the Archbiſhop and his Friends as a great Point gain'd, and their Proceedings were thought to have unqueſtionable Weight, as well as Aſſurance of Succeſs, ſo that the Severities were never leſs relax'd, but it ſerv'd more to encreaſe the general Diſſatisfaction, and to haſten the Ruin of themſelves and the Church. The Archbiſhop was moſt unhappy in his ſubordinate Inſtruments, whom he thought to be inſpir'd with the ſame Virtue and Fervour with himſelf, whereas many of them only borrow'd their Heat from him, inſtead of receiving of it from above. Some of them endeavour'd to introduce many things, which had too near a Reſemblance of Popery; nor were they blameleſs in their Lives, ſeveral being vicious to a Scandal, nor ſo humble and meek as they ought to have appear'd, but ſo very high, that One was complain'd of for ſaying, He hop'd to ſee the Day, when a Miniſter ſhou'd be as good a Man, as any Upſtart Jack Gentleman in England. By theſe Miſmanagements, the Puritans became great Gainers, being Perſons generally free from outward Scandal, excepting ſome Particulars in Commerce, ſhewing a moſt demure Formality and ſupple Mildneſs, which caus'd them deeply to inſinuate into the Eſteem of the Vulgar, who cou'd not then perceive that theſe Sheep and Doves had Teeth and Claws, which grew to be far more ſharp and terrible than thoſe of the Prelates.

The Proſecution of Baſtwick, Burton and Prynn.

2. Thus the Symptoms encreas'd, and drew on towards a fatal Criſis; and this Year there happened three or four Proſecutions and Hearings that had a great, tho' unforeſeen Influence upon the future Calamities. The firſt was the Proſecution of three famous Offenders, John Baſtwick Doctor of Phyſick, Henry Burton Batchelor of Divinity, and William Prynn Barriſter at Law; all Men of furious Spirits, who were try'd in the Star-Chamber for writing and publiſhing Seditious, Schiſmatical and Libellous Books againſt the Hierarchy of the Church, and the Peace of the Government. The two firſt of them had been ſo daring and exorbitant, that it occaſion'd a Meeting of the Judges at Serjeants-Inn, to determine whether ſeveral Paſſages in their Books did not amount to High-Treaſon. However it was agreed at laſt, that they ſhou'd be proſecuted in the High Court of Star-Chamber, together with Mr. Prynn, who ſince his Puniſhment, and in his Impriſonment, had ſhewn himſelf more fierce and virulent than before.

Their ſeveral Crimes.

Dr. Baſtwick was an Eſſex Man, who being educated a ſhort time in Cambridge, travell'd nine Years beyond the Seas, and was created Doctor of Phyſick at Padua. Returning home, he practis'd at Colcheſter, and publiſh'd a Book in elegant Latin, intitl'd Flagellum Pontificis, &c. For which he was accus'd in the High-Commiſſion Court, and committed to the Gate-Houſe, where he wrote a furious Book againſt the Injuſtice of the Proceedings in the High-Commiſſion, for which he was now proſecuted. Mr. Burton, a Yorkſhire Man, and a Divine, had been a Servant in the Cloſet to the preſent King when Prince of Wales. He took it very ill that he was not ſent as one of the Chaplains into Spain, when the Prince was there; but worſe, that Laud, then Biſhop of St. David's, ſhou'd execute the Office of Clerk of the Cloſet, while Biſhop Neil was ſick. Inrag'd at this Indignity, as he then conceiv'd it, he put a ſcandalous Paper into the Hands of the King, for which, and ſome other Inſolencies, he was commanded to depart the Court; and being never able to regain Admittance, he breath'd out nothing but Rage and Malice againſt the King and the Biſhops; and never deſiſted, even in his Sermons at his Pariſh in London, till he was ſtopp'd by the preſent Proceedings. Mr. Prynn, in his Impriſonment, among other Books publiſh'd a Libel call'd News from Ipſwich, chiefly deſign'd againſt Dr. Wren Biſhop of Norwich, a learned Man, but thought of a ſevere and ſower Temper, wherein he wittily deſcanted upon the Archbiſhop with his Arch-Piety, Arch-Charity, Arch-Agent for the Devil; and call'd the Biſhops Luciferian Lords, execrable Traitors, devouring Wolves, with other curious Appellations, that rather ſeem'd to come out of Bedlam than the Tower, where he was lodg'd.

After ſeveral Delays, the Cauſe of all three came on in Trinity-Term; at which Time they had drawn up ſome Anſwers, but ſo libellous and full of Scandal, that no Counſellor wou'd put his Hand to them, according to the Courſe of that Court. Inſtead of which they exhibited a Croſs-Bill againſt the Archbiſhop and his Confederates, charging them with the ſame Reproaches that had been the Subject of their former Libels; which being only ſign'd by their Hands, and ſo tender'd to the Lord-Keeper, was rejected, and themſelves taken pro confeſſis, as being ſelf-convicted, for want of anſwering in due Form of Law. Accordingly they receiv'd this Sentence, 'Prynn, as the 'moſt inveterate Offender, to be fin'd five thouſand Pounds, 'to loſe the Remainder of his Ears in the Pillory, to be 'branded on both Cheeks with the Letters S. L. for a 'Schiſmatical Libeller, and to be perpetually impriſon'd in 'Canarvan Caſtle: Baſtwick and Burton to ſuffer the ſame 'Fine, to be Pillory'd and loſe their Ears, and to be impriſon'd in the Caſtles of Lanceton and Lancaſter. A few Days after, they were all three brought with great Formality to the Palace-Yard, where three Pillories were erected, on which the Sentence was rigorouſly executed. Their Speeches and Behaviour were generally admir'd, with Applauſe by ſome, and Abhorrence by others: Burton ran a Parallel between the Sufferings of our Bleſſed Saviour and his own; and Baſtwick declar'd, That if he had as much Blood as would ſwell the Thames, he wou'd loſe it every Drop in this Cauſe; Prynn was more modeſt, and ſeem'd to lay the greateſt Blame upon the Cowardiſe of his Council. After this they were carefully convey'd to their ſeveral Priſons, where there was ſuch an extraordinary Reſort by ſuch as pity'd their Sufferings, that the State thought fit to remove them further; Prynn to the Caſtle of Mont Orgueil in the Iſle of Jerſey, Burton to Caſtle-Cornet in the Road of Guernſey, and Baſtwick to St. Mary's Caſtle in the Iſle of Silly, where they continu'd about three Years.

Their Puniſhment,

And Behaviour.

At the Delivery of the Sentence, Archbiſhop Laud made a long and remarkable Speech to clear himſelf and his Brethren from the Innovations, which of late had been ſo highly exclaim'd againſt by the Sufferers and Others. Yet ſtill this ſignal Puniſhment of three ſuch Men, had very direful Effects upon all the Biſhops and the Tranquility of the Publick. For tho' their Crimes were of that daring Nature, as cou'd not have eſcap'd Cenſure in the beſt and worſt of Governments; yet partly for the Severity of it, and partly the great Diſcontents of the People, their Caſe came to be extreamly pity'd, and themſelves look'd upon more as Martyrs than Criminals. It prov'd very ſhocking to the Generality, 'and 'it gave great Trouble to the Spirits of many very moderate and well-meaning Men, to ſee the three eminent Profeſſions in the World, Divinity, Law and Phyſick, to 'be ſo wretchedly diſhonour'd in the Perſons of theſe 'Malefactors, as was obſerv'd by the Archbiſhop himſelf 'in his Letter to the King.' As to the Sufferers, they glory'd in what they had done and endur'd, and became more turbulent than ever; and Prynn became ſo implacably furious, that he never reſted till he had taken off the Archbiſhop's Head, ruin'd Epiſcopacy, and involv'd the Nation in the moſt imaginable Confuſions. But at length having ſeen a thouſand unexpected Calamities, and growing weary of himſelf, when he had in a manner no Enemy to engage him, he began to look up, and heartily to repent his former Career, wiſhing, That when they had cut off his Ears, they had cut off his Head; and in the End became a happy Inſtrument of Peace both in Church and State.

It occaſions great Diſguſts.

The Proſecution and Puniſhment of theſe three ſignal Offenders, was ſhortly after ſucceeded by another, which had no ſmall Influence upon the Publick Tranquility; which was that of John Lilburne, a poor Tradeſman, of a good Family and pregnant Apprehenſion, who for the ſake of the Law was taken into the Service of Mr. Prynn; a Man of ſuch undaunted and ungovernable Spirit, as can ſcarcely be parallell'd in any Nation. This Perſon joyning with his Maſter in printing and publiſhing Libels againſt the Biſhops, &c. was ſentenc'd in the Star-Chamber to be whipp'd from the Fleet Priſon to Weſtminſter-Hall, before which to be pillory'd with his Aſſociate John Warton. The Whipping was executed with great Severity; and in the midſt of his Torments, inſtead of Submiſſion, he utter'd many railing Speeches againſt the Tyranny of the Prelates and his Perſecutors; and being ſet in the Pillory, he continu'd the ſame Virulency with his Tongue, and ſcatter'd out of his Pockets ſeveral ſeditious Pamphlets among the People. Upon theſe ſtrange Inſults, the Lords of the Star-Chamber, then ſitting, immediately order'd him to be gagg'd the reſt of the Time of his ſtanding; but when he cou'd not expreſs his Rage and Reſentment with his Tongue, he did it with his Feet, by continual ſtamping, to ſhew that he was altogether invincible. He was cloſe impriſon'd for about three Years, till the Change of the Times, and obtain'd the Name of Free-born John. Being again at Liberty, and coming into Play, he became a grand Leveller, a Modeller, a Ring-leader, and a violent Incendiary, and Oppoſer of all that was Uppermoſt; till after various Struggles and ſtrange Eſcapes, he at laſt dy'd a Quaker. In ſhort, he had that inveterate Spirit of Contradiction, that it came to be a common Saying, That if the World was empty'd of all but himſelf, John wou'd be againſt Lilburne, and Lilburne againſt John: An Antichriſtian Temper, which no Pretence of Honeſty, Juſtice, or a good Cauſe can vindicate.

An Account of John Lilburne, and his Puniſhment.

3. Before theſe laſt Proceedings were fully finiſh'd, there came on the famous Cauſe in the Star-Chamber, againſt a far greater Man, Dr. Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, which had different, tho' no leſs remarkable Effects. This eminent States-Man, who had been ſo great in the laſt Reign and the Beginning of this, did exceedingly decline in Favour for ſeveral Years, was oblig'd to quit the Court, and retire to his Palace at Buckden in Huntingtonſhire, where notwithſtanding he liv'd with great Splendor and Concourſe of Viſitants. The King and the Archbiſhop had entertain'd inſuperable Prejudices againſt him, and look'd upon him as a dangerous Affector of Popularity, and a Favourite of the Puritan Faction; and then his Subtle and Serpentine Ways in all Difficulties, gave too juſt an Occaſion to many to believe him not ſtrictly honeſt. The Difference in our beſt Writers has made it extreamly hard to judge exactly as to the laſt; but we have great Reaſon to believe that the Court was under ſeveral Miſtakes about this Prelate, and that the Diſtruſt and Emulation between the Archbiſhop and Him, with the Height of both their Spirits, caus'd ſuch a fatal Oppoſition, that they cou'd never come to a right Knowledge of each other's Characters. Then Williams being of the ſuffering Side, and believing himſelf highly injur'd, he ſometimes expreſs'd his Reſentments with a Freedom and Openneſs, as was not agreeable to his uſual Policy; which caus'd the Court to have a more vigilant Eye upon him and his Actions.

An Account of his Troubles.

The Beginning of his Troubles aroſe from Sir John Lamb and Dr. Sibthorp, who with Allen and Burden, two Proctors, being at Dinner with him at Buckden, there began a Diſcourſe concerning Nonconformiſts. Now the Biſhop knowing theſe to be all active Men in the Proſecution of them, adviſ'd them to abate their Severity, for he knew the King wou'd treat them more mildly for the future, being a conſiderable Party that much influenc'd Parliamentary Affairs; adding further, That the King had communicated this to him with his own Mouth. A few Years after, upon ſome Difference with the Biſhop, Sir John Lamb and Dr. Sibthorp inform'd againſt him in the Star-Chamber for Revealing the King's Secrets. But the Information being either not well laid, or ſufficiently ſupported, the Biſhop by Evaſions and Delays found Means to fence againſt it for ſome Years together, but with great Vexation and Expence. In the mean Time the Diſpleaſure of the Court increas'd againſt him, ſo that he was daily put to ſome new Trouble, and not ſuffer'd to have any Reſt. This caus'd him to apply himſelf to the Lord Cottington, and begg'd to know how he might procure his Peace, and ſuch ordinary Favours as other Biſhops had from his Majeſty. That Lord adviſ'd him to two Things, to reſign his Deanery of Weſtminſter, and to reſtrain his great and magnificent Way of Living: Both which he refus'd, the Former out of good Reaſon, and the latter out of a reſolute Temper.

At length Kilvert, a Proctor in the Arches, a Perſon very ſcandalous and cunning, who before had been employ'd in Hunting Bennet, a corrupt Judge in the Prerogative, to his final Sentence, was retain'd by ſome great Men to proſecute this Biſhop to the like Confuſion. This Man having found by diligent Inquiry, and ſubtle Practices, that the Biſhop's Purgation depended chiefly upon one Prigeon, the Regiſter of the Court of Lincoln, he made it his chief Buſineſs, by diſcrediting the Witneſs, to invalidate his Evidence, and ſo laid a Baſtard to his Charge, there appearing a ſufficient Ground for an Indictment againſt him. The Biſhop apprehending himſelf under a Neceſſity to ſupport the Reputation of Prigeon, engag'd himſelf more zealouſly than was thought conſiſtent with the Dignity of ſo great a Prelate, for ſo inconſiderable a Man. He was at a vaſt Expence to ward off the Blow, and the Fathering of the Baſtard was bandied between Prigeon and one Booth from Seſſions to Seſſions, and from one Year to another, till the Mother of the Child was found to have been tamper'd with by ſome of the Biſhop's Creatures to charge it wholly upon Booth, who, when it was too late, actually own'd himſelf to be the true Father. On the Diſcovery of which Practice, Kilvert let go his former Hold, and exhibited a new Bill againſt the Biſhop for Tampering with the King's Witneſſes, a Crime moſt proper for the Star-Chamber. The Biſhop finding Himſelf plung'd into new Difficulties, and under the Weight of a mercileſs Proſecution, endeavour'd to obtain a Compoſition with the King, being willing to pay four, and then eight Thouſand Pounds to purchaſe his own Peace, and his Majeſty's Favour; which, tho' for a while accepted of, afterwards was urg'd againſt him, as a Proof of his Conſciouſneſs and Guilt of the Crime charg'd upon him.

His Tryal in the Star-Chamber, and Puniſhment.

About the Middle of July the Cauſe came to a full Hearing, which held nine Days Debate, with an extraordinary Concourſe of People, who highly pity'd the Biſhop, 'as a Man mark'd out for a Sacrifice to the Court, and one 'who was like to bleed in his Purſe towards a deſign'd 'War againſt Scotland.' In Concluſion he was condemn'd 'to ten Thouſand Pounds Fine to the King, a Thouſand 'Marks to Sir John Mounſon, who was concern'd againſt 'Prigeon, Suſpenſion in the High-Commiſſion from all Office and Benefice, and Impriſonment during his Majeſty's 'Pleaſure.' All this was executed without the leaſt Abatement; and Walker his Secretary, Powel his Steward, and one Land, were ſeverally fin'd, and order'd to be impriſon'd. But they all eſcap'd both Fine and Impriſonment, which were in a ſhort Time commuted into ſuch other Offices as they were to do for Kilvert againſt their Maſter; as he ſoon found to his new Perplexity and Damage. For after the Biſhop had been impriſon'd in the Tower, and had his Goods to a vaſt Value ſhamefully waſted by Kilvert at Buckden, in the rifling of his Papers, Powel found a Letter writ to him about five Years before by Mr. Osbaldſtone the School-maſter of Weſtminſter, in which there were ſome Enigmatical Expreſſions, which were thought highly reflecting upon the Archbiſhop and the then Lord-Treaſurer Weſton. This being produc'd, Kilvert took the Advantage, and exhibited a new Bill againſt him for divulging Scandalous Libels againſt Privy-Counſellors. The Biſhop deny'd that ever he had receiv'd the Letter, but it being found in a Box in his Chamber, with another Paper that ſeem'd fully to explain it, he was condemn'd in another Fine of eight Thouſand Pounds. Osbaldſtone, tho' he explain'd his Letter in a very favourable Senſe, was fin'd five Thouſand Pounds, depriv'd of all Preferments, and condemn'd to the Pillory; but he eſcap'd all by a ſeaſonable Flight, which was accompany'd by a Jeſt, That he was gone beyond Canterbury.

A Second Blow.

Biſhop Hacket exclaims heartily againſt all theſe Proceedings, and according to his Account, with the ſeveral Circumſtances, this Prelate met with extraordinary Hardſhips, both from the Archbiſhop, and the Court in general; yet in all his Troubles and Defences, there ſtill appear'd more of the Serpent than the Dove, which by a charitable Conſtruction may rather be call'd Counter-Mining, than Under-Mining. However theſe Proceedings did raiſe a very deep Diſtaſte in the Hearts of many People, which was expreſs'd in great Murmurings againſt the Archbiſhop and others; and the Hardſhips were ſo apparent, that Fuller believes, that this Biſhop's Sufferings did much haſten, if not chiefly cauſe the Suppreſſion of that famous Court of the Star-Chamber. That Court had been for many Ages, the Glory, and now thought the Grievance of the Engliſh Nation; The uſual Subject was the Defence of Honour and Honeſty; and generally conſiſted of thirty or forty of the Greateſt, Wiſeſt, and moſt Learned of all Profeſſions in the Kingdom, and oftentimes with the King at the Head of them; ſo that no Court came ſo near the venerable Senate of Rome in State, Honour and Judicature. The Lord Bacon calls it one of the ſageſt and nobleſt Inſtitutions of the Kingdom, chiefly remarkable for its Cenſorian Power: But this gradually retrenching upon the Common Law, and degenerating to ſome Exorbitancies, private Paſſions, and Slaviſh Puniſhments, ariſing from the Indiſcretion of the Judges, and Neceſſities of the Government, it ſunk by its own Weight, and the King and Nation ſoon loſt a Benefit that cou'd never yet be retriev'd.

An Account of the Star-Chamber.

4. There was another Cauſe came on this Year, which tho' of very ſmall Concern to the Defendent, yet was thought of higheſt Moment to the Publick, which was that of Ship-Mony, that was now brought to a ſtrict Examination, and ſolemn Tryal at Law. This was occaſion'd by the famous Mr. Hampden, a Buckinghamſhire Gentleman, of extraordinary Parts and Reſolution; who refuſing to pay his Share of the Ship-Mony, amounting to leſs than thirty Shillings, had a Scire Facias brought againſt him in the Exchequer, in the midſt of May. Upon his Pleading, and the King's Council Demurring, the Legality of the Tax was graciouſly allow'd to be examined and argu'd at full Length, without any Interruption. This great Cauſe continu'd for ſeveral Weeks, after the moſt publick Manner, continually opening the Ears and Eyes of all People. It was firſt argu'd by two great Men, Mr. Oliver St. John, and Mr. Robert Holborn, for the Defendent; and on the King's Side by Sir John Banks, Attorney-General, and Sir Edward Littleton, Solicitor-General; and then very largely and elaborately diſcuſs'd and debated by the twelve Judges, in ſo many ſeveral fine Speeches. The Arguments both at the Bar and Bench were full of nice and admirable Learning, Variety of Precedents, Records and Pieces of Hiſtory; as may be ſeen imperfectly in Ruſhworth, but much more perfectly in Frankland, conſiſting of a hundred and ſixty Pages in a large Folio, with infinite References and Quotations. Precedents and Neceſſity, with the Publick Benefit, were great Topicks inſiſted on by the Judges; and becauſe the Petition of Right bore hard and near upon them, they acknowledg'd 'That the King cou'd not impoſe a Pe- 'cuniary Charge by way of Tollage, but only a Perſonal 'one by way of Service.' So all the Judges, except Hutton and Crook, gave Judgment againſt Mr. Hampden, to the great Diſappointment and Diſſatisfaction of the People. Whitlock tells us that Judge Crook was reſolv'd to deliver his Opinion for the King, and accordingly had prepar'd his Argument; but a few Days before the Time, he chang'd his Mind, by means of a ſerious Debate with his Friends, and his own Wife, who in particular told him, with a Courage not uſual to her Sex, That ſhe won'd be contented to ſuffer any Want or Miſery with Him, rather than occaſion him to do or ſay any Thing againſt his Judgment and Conſcience.

Mr. Hampden's Caſe of the Ship-Mony.

He is Caſt.

This Cauſe, and the Judgment given, was attended with ſuch Niceties and Intricacies in the Law, as were Matters of real Difficulty, and not of full Certainty in thoſe Times, tho' they are quite otherwiſe in ours at preſent; which ought always to be diſtinguiſh'd by thoſe that wou'd rightly judge of this Affair. However, it was directly againſt the main Bent of the Nation, and by the wiſeſt and beſt Men thought a dangerous Inſult and Breach upon the Conſtitution; for which the Judges cannot be too much condemn'd. The Cauſe being of an univerſal Concern, Nothing cou'd have done the King greater Diſſervice than this Determination; for the Tax was born with much more Chearfulneſs before, than ever it was afterwards. Men before might pleaſe themſelves with doing ſomething for the King, to which they were not oblig'd; but when this Teſtimony of their Affection was remov'd by declaring that to be Law, which might cut off all future Power of ſhewing it, they look'd upon it with the utmoſt Reſentment, and as an Impoſition of Divers Cenſures upon it.

of the Judges, to which they thought themſelves bound in Conſcience not to ſubmit. Wherefore the Lord Clarendon ſays, That the Damage cannot be expreſs'd, that the Crown and State ſuſtain'd by the deſerved Reproach and Infamy attending the Judges, by being us'd in this and the like Acts of Power; there being no Poſſibility to preſerve the Dignity, Reverence and Eſtimation of the Laws themſelves, but by their Innocency and Integrity. Yet after all, the Opinions and Arguments were various in thoſe Times; but we cannot better determine the Difficulties, than by referring the Reader to a printed Propoſal to the long Parliament in the Year 1640, by an eminent Hand, intitl'd The Caſe of Ship-Mony, which ſets it in a ſhort and clear Light; and tho' it fairly condemns it, yet at the ſame time it honeſtly preſcribes ſuch Remedies, as might have ſav'd the Nation, if they had been ſeaſonably apply'd.

The Death of Mr. Fludd,

Mr. Gellibrand,

And Ben Johnſon.

Thus ſtood the Affairs of England, at and ſoon after the Time of the Beginning of the Tumults and Troubles in Scotland in 1637; in which Year there dy'd three remarkable Men, all different in Genius, Robert Fludd, Henry Gellibrand, and Benjamin Johnſon. The Former, in Latin call'd de Fluctibus, was a celebrated Phyſician, a great Traveller, a Roſa-Crucian Philoſopher and Chymiſt, and a Man ſtrangely profound in obſcure Matters, and out of the Common Road; whoſe myſtical and paradoxical Writings have been greatly receiv'd and admir'd by Foreigners, as Rarities not to be match'd in any Country. Mr. Gellibrand, the Second, was fam'd for his ſudden and forward Proficiencies in Geometry and Aſtronomy, for which he was deſervedly made Aſtronomy Profeſſor of Greſham College, in the Room of Mr. Gunter formerly mention'd; but he was ſnatch'd away in the 40th year of his Age, to the great Loſs of the Mathematical Faculty. Ben Johnſon, the Laſt, was one of the moſt eminent Dramatick Poets that ever the Nation produc'd; who being educated under the famous Mr. Camden, became wonderful in Eſteem with the great Men in the Kingdom for his ſublime Wit and Parts, his uncommon Skill in Poetry, and his admirable Judgment, as well as penetrating Inſight, as to Human Nature. He outliv'd all that cou'd pretend to any Rivalſhip in his Art, as Shakeſpear, Beaumont and Fletcher, and in the ſixty third Year of his Age left the Stage of this World, deeply concern'd, and very penitent, upon the account of the undue Liberties he had too often taken with the Holy Scriptures in ſeveral of his Comedies.

The Beginnings of the Scots Diſturbances.

Their Management againſt Epiſcopacy.

I. 1. THE better to underſtand the Occaſion of the Tumults that now broke out in Scotland, and which at length prov'd ſo fatal to England, we muſt briefly conſider the State and Temper of the Nation, during this Reign, eſpecially ſince the Coronation of the King. The People in general were highly jealous of the Power and Prevalency of the Engliſh Nation; and from the Time of Queen Elizabeth till now, they may truly be ſaid to have walk'd by a dark Lanthorn, by which they ſaw all the Engliſh Affairs, and yet mov'd undiſcern'd by Them in any Thing they deſign'd. Their Behaviours were as ſubtle, as their Reſentments were ſtrong; and beſides the Diſcontents formerly mention'd in the Year 1633, the prevailing Part of the Kingdom was moſt violent againſt the Eſtabliſhment of Epiſcopacy, and particularly againſt the Conduct and Management of moſt of the preſent Biſhops, who had given too much Occaſion for Cenſure. In Order to deſtroy both, the Presbyterian Miniſters, after many unſucceſsful Struggles, uſually kept a private Faſt in their own Congregations, upon the firſt Sabbath of every Quarter. Upon which Days, in their Sermons they generally hinted 'at the Danger of 'Religion by Prelacy, and all its Dependencies, and in 'their Prayers ſupplicated for Relief, with a Bleſſing upon 'all good Means which Providence ſhou'd afford for that 'End;' by which Methods they daily gain'd upon the Minds of the Vulgar. The ſame Party had for a long Time entertain'd one Mr. Borthwick at London, a Perſon admirably ſkill'd for their Deſign, who ſucceſsfully tranſacted with the Non-Conformiſts there, to attempt a Reformation, as ſoon as the Work ſhou'd begin in Scotland; and upon his Return, gave them great Hopes and Encouragement. They had alſo a cloſe Correſpondence with the Scottiſh Miniſters in the North of Ireland, who by their Inſtigation grew ſo tumultuous againſt the Order of that Church, as caus'd their Biſhops to turn them out: Upon which they came over to Scotland, with high Exclamations againſt Perſecution, and were by their Friends accounted as ſo many Martyrs, and were cheriſh'd and receiv'd with all the invidious and odious Reflections upon the Epiſcopal Function.

The Want of Union among the Scotch Biſhops.

The Occaſion of it.

The Biſhops gave frequent Advantages to their Adverſaries, particularly by the Want of Harmony and Union among Themſelves; which chiefly proceeded from the different Meaſures taken by the Father and the Son in their Promotion, King James and King Charles. It had been the Cuſtom of the former, when a Biſhoprick fell void, to appoint the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews to convene the reſt of the Biſhops, who nominated three or four of the beſt qualify'd Men in the Nation; out of which Liſt the King fix'd upon One, whom he preferr'd to the Dignity. By which Means, the moſt worthy Men were advanc'd during his Reign, ſuch as Cooper to Galloway, Ballantine to Dumblain, Forbes to Aberdeen, Lindſey to Brichen, and Guthrey to Murray, beſides the famous Primate Himſelf, Spotſwood of St. Andrews. But King Charles unhappily follow'd another Method, and without any Conſultation with the Biſhops, preferr'd Men according to their Intereſt at Court. So that upon the Duke of Buckingham's Recommendation, Leſley was made Biſhop of The Iſles, and by Maxwell's of the Bed-chamber, Maxwell his Relation was made Biſhop of Roſs: By Archbiſhop Laud's means Syderſerfe was made Biſhop of Brichen, and Wedderburne of Dumblain; and when the former was tranſlated to Galloway, Whitford was made Biſhop of Brichen by the Intereſt of the Earl of Sterling, the Secretary of Scotland. Theſe New Biſhops were far ſhort of the Wiſdom and Experience of the Elder, and none was generally eſteem'd qualify'd for the Office, beſides Maxwell, who was undoubtedly a Man of great Parts, but of ſuch a graſping and unbounded Ambition, as prov'd a great Cauſe of the Ruin of all the reſt. Now theſe, having no Obligations to the old Biſhops for their Preferments, became independent of their Seniors, and kept up a ſeparate Correſpondence among Themſelves; and hap'ning to gain an Intimacy with Archbiſhop Laud, it occaſion'd him to procure to Himſelf a Power from the King to preſcribe Rules to the old Biſhops, which they never well approv'd or countenanc'd.

Several Prejudices againſt them.

Their particular Enemies.

Theſe Biſhops, not knowing the wiſeſt Uſe of their Power, or the true Temper of the People, gradually loſt the Eſteem of the Nation, and that upon ſeveral Accounts. The People had at that Time ſwallow'd the deepeſt Prejudice againſt any thing that ſavour'd of Popery, or promoted Arminianiſm, and had entertain'd the profoundeſt Veneration for the Morality of the Sabbath. Now the Biſhops in their Sermons and Diſcourſes had often mollify'd the Errors of the Firſt, promoted the Opinions of the Second, and diſcountenanc'd the rigid Practices in reſpect of the Laſt; all to the great Diſſatisfaction of the People. But what prov'd moſt fatal to theſe and the reſt, was their gaining ſo many Secular Places, and endeavouring to repoſſeſs themſelves of the alienated Tythes and Impropriations: All which highly diſguſted the Nobility and Great Men, who being more immediately concern'd, daily tax'd them 'with Worldly Deſigns, not only of trampling upon 'the Church, but of domineering over the State.' Beſides Rothes and Balmerino, formerly mention'd, ſome Noblemen, being diſappointed as to State Preferments, charg'd all upon the Biſhops; and others, who were already advanc'd, were highly jealous that they deſign'd their Fall. Of the former Sort was the Lord of Lorn, afterwards the famous Earl of Argyle, a Perſon highly conſiderable for Parts, Power and Intereſt, who upon the Vacancy of the Office of High Chancellor, earneſtly preſs'd to obtain it; but the King, having before conferr'd ſeveral Favours and Advantages upon him, refus'd his Requeſt, and gave the Place to the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews. This, and other like Diſappointments, provok'd him and others to ſhew their Reſentments againſt the whole Body of the Biſhops. Of the other Sort, was the Earl of Traquair, Lord High Treaſurer, a Perſon outwardly profeſſing great Friendſhip to the Biſhops, but a ſecret Confederate with their Enemies; for having conceiv'd a Jealouſy that the Prelates deſign'd his Fall, and finding that Maxwell Biſhop of Roſs was aſpiring at his Place, he privately carry'd on a politick Intrigue to ſupplant them and their Authority.

A Liturgy projected.

2. Affairs being in this unhappy Poſture, Providence afforded the faireſt Occaſion their Adverſaries cou'd deſire, for appearing in Action againſt them; which began when the King came to be crown'd in Scotland. At which Time Biſhop Laud, who had formerly been encourag'd by Biſhop Maxwell, held a Conference with the Scottiſh Biſhops, and others of the Clergy, in which he complain'd of the Nakedneſs of their Form of Worſhip in ſeveral Reſpects, ſpects, but chiefly for the Want of a Liturgy, and certain Canons, which he conceiv'd wou'd ſupply all Defects. The old Biſhops reply'd, 'That in King James's Time 'there had been a Motion made for a Liturgy, but that the 'Forming of it was deferr'd, in regard the Articles of 'Perth, then introduc'd, prov'd ſo unwelcome to the 'People, that they thought it not fit nor ſafe, at that 'Time, to venture upon farther Innovations; and they were 'ſtill under ſome Apprehenſions, that if it ſhou'd be now 'attempted, the Conſequence of it might prove very diſ'mal.' But Biſhop Maxwell, Syderſerfe, Mitchel and ſome others preſs'd hard, 'That it might be undertaken, 'declaring that there was no kind of Danger in the At'tempt,' Whereupon Biſhop Laud immediately mov'd the King to declare it to be his Will, that there ſhou'd be a Liturgy in the Church of Scotland. His Majeſty had been appris'd of the Matter before, and had been inclinable, with Biſhop Laud, to have the very ſame Liturgy with the Church of England. But upon the Opinion of the Scotch Biſhops, it was agreed to frame a new Liturgy, with ſome little Variations from the Engliſh, and alſo a Book of Canons to inforce that and other Eccleſiaſtical Matters. All which were to be tranſmitted into England, and examin'd and approv'd by the King and three Biſhops, Laud, Juxon and Wren.

And agreed upon.

As ſoon as this Deſign came to be reported abroad, the finiſhing of it was not more wiſh'd by the Epiſcopal Party, than by thoſe of the contrary Judgment, tho' upon very different Accounts: The former, to ſhew their Readineſs to obey the King, and out of a Belief that it wou'd turn to the Benefit of the Church: But the others more rationally concluded, That the Noiſe of it wou'd ſtartle the whole Nation, and excite them to engage in a War for oppoſing it, which they thought might eaſily cauſe the Extermination of Epiſcopacy, and all its Dependencies. However the Biſhops in the mean Time were buſily employ'd in the Work; and yet proceeded ſo ſlowly, that it was towards the latter End of the Year 1636, before they compleated their intended Reformation. And even then the proper Method was inverted, by preſenting a Body of Canons to precede the Liturgy; the Conſideration of which was referr'd by the King to the three Engliſh Biſhops beforenam'd; who after ſome Alterations made, by the Conſent of the Scotch Biſhops, return'd them to the King: And his Majeſty, without further Ceremony, iſſu'd out his Proclamation for the due Obſervance of them throughout all Scotland. This being done without the general Approbation of the Clergy, or Privity of the Council, they were eſteem'd as ſo many new Laws, impos'd upon the whole Nation by the King's ſole Authority, and contriv'd by a few private Men, Strangers to the Conſtitution of the Kingdom.

It is finiſh'd, with a Book of Canons.

3. But the Liturgy became ſtill more formidable to the People; and while they were conſidering how to put it in Practice, there aroſe a mighty Clamour againſt the Biſhops, 'That Religion was undermin'd by a Conſpiracy between 'the Engliſh Archbiſhop and Them, and that they, being 'ſuborn'd by his Intereſt, were bringing in the Maſs Book.' This being ſuddenly ſpread throughout the Land, wrought ſo powerfully upon the Vulgar, that all Men concluded there was no Way to avoid a Publick Rupture, but by ſuppreſſing the Book. And indeed the good Archbiſhop Spotſwood, with the wiſeſt of his Brethren, calmly conſider'd of it, and wrote to Archbiſhop Laud to prevail upon the King, to have the Book kept back, till the Nation was better prepar'd to receive it; which poſſibly might have taken Effect, if the Scotch Biſhops had been unanimous in the Matter. For thoſe who had been preferr'd in this Reign, being generally warm, and wanting the Experience of the Elder Sort, went not along with them, but joyn'd with the Lord Treaſurer Traquair, whoſe declar'd Opinion was, That the Work ſhou'd proceed, tho' with a Deſign far different from Theirs. The Lord Clarendon thinks very favourably of this unhappy States-man; but Biſhop Guthry, Heylyn and others, repreſent him as treacherous and ungrateful. The latter tells us, he was rais'd by the Power of Archbiſhop Laud, who with the greateſt Confidence rely'd upon his Honeſty, to the Ruin of his Affairs in Scotland. The former gives us a particular Account, That deſigning to deſtroy Epiſcopacy, he got ſome Letters under the Hands of the younger Biſhops, to promote the new Liturgy, and with them poſted to the Engliſh Court, and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, to whom he ſuggeſted, 'That there was no Danger to be apprehended, only the 'old Biſhops were timorous Men, and fear'd where there 'was no Cauſe of Fear; in Proof of which, if his Grace 'wou'd move the King to lay his Commands upon him, 'Upon his Life he wou'd carry through the Buſineſs, with'out any Diſturbance.' The Archbiſhop being ignorant of the Treaſurer's Deſigns, eſpecially when he brought Letters from his chief Correſpondents, was ſo affected with theſe Promiſes, that tho' he thought a Work of that Nature improper to be committed to a Lay-man, he yet procur'd to Himſelf a Warrant from the King to command the Biſhops, upon all Hazards, to proceed in the Work; withal threatning them, 'That if they delay'd any longer, 'his Majeſty wou'd remove them from their Places, and 'fill them with vigorous and couragious Men, who wou'd 'not be afraid to do him Service.

Deſigns againſt it.

The Earl of Traquair's Treachery.

The Biſhops having receiv'd this peremptory Command, at the Earl's Return, were not equally affected with it: The younger ſort were tranſported with Joy, and eſteem'd the Treaſurer as their ſureſt Friend, who had obtain'd the main thing they deſir'd. But the wiſe old Biſhops were of another Opinion, and reflected much upon the Conſequence; however they had no Way left them, but to proceed, or to ſuffer. And now being greatly encourag'd by the Treaſurer's ample Promiſes of Aſſiſtance, and ſharing in their Fortune, they went on with Aſſurance, as if there had been no Danger. And it is very remarkable, that hereafter they generally acted ſo much contrary to thoſe Rules of Prudence and Policy, by which they uſually manag'd their Affairs, that all Men began to diſcover a Fatality in it. For they did not endeavour, as they formerly had done in inferior Matters, to have their Book brought in by an Eccleſiaſtical Sanction; but having procur'd it to be authoriz'd by an Act of Council, they immediately proceeded to urge the Practice of it. By which they highly provok'd the greateſt Part of thoſe very Miniſters that were Epiſcopal in their Judgments, who thought it a very diſmal Thing, 'That a Liturgy ſhou'd be impos'd upon the 'Church, without the Knowledge and Conſent of the 'Church; and judg'd it ſuch a dangerous Preparative, 'that by this Means the Civil Power might afterwards in'troduce any thing, tho' never ſo injurious to Religion, 'and the Church never get one Voice in it.' And they were the more ſenſibly offended, in regard King James himſelf had never preſs'd any thing that way; but whatſoever he wou'd have done in ſuch Affairs, he always took a Church Way, as it was call'd, to bring it to effect. Nor did they firſt urge the Practice of this Liturgy in the remoteſt Dioceſes, and ſuch Places, where there was leaſt Averſion to the Change, but they determin'd to make the firſt Tryal, where they were moſt like to meet with the greateſt Oppoſition.

Falſe Steps made by the Scotch Biſhops.

Thus they fix'd upon Edinbugh for the Place, and Eaſter this preſent Year 1637 for the Time. But the Lord Treaſurer perſwaded the King to defer it till July, that Preparation might be made for the more chearful Reception of it. Others believe that this was to give the oppoſite Party more Time to unite and confederate againſt it. It is certain, they found ſufficient Opportunity to defeat the Deſign; and in April they ſent over two eminent Men, Mr. Alexander Henderſon out of Fife, and Mr. David Dick out of the Weſt-Country, to conſult with their Friends at Edinburgh, and carry on their Cauſe after the moſt ſecret and effectual Manner. The former of theſe, Henderſon, had in his Youth been very Epiſcopal, and being made Profeſſor of Philoſophy in St. Andrews, at his Entrance upon the Place, he choſe Archbiſhop Gladſtone for his Patron, with a very flattering Dedication, for which he ſhortly after obtain'd the Kirk of Lenchars. But afterwards, upon ſome particular Reaſons, he turn'd, and became the Head of the Presbyterian Party, upon whom all their Miniſters depended; he being a Perſon who for Gravity, Learning, Wiſdom and State Policy, far exceeded any of them. He and Mr. Dick coming privately to Edinburgh, communicated the Minds of thoſe that ſent them to the Lord Balmerino, Sir Thomas Hope, and others. And theſe afterwards meeting with ſeveral zealous Matrons of ſome Note, it was recommended to them, 'That they and their Female Ad'herents ſhou'd give the firſt Affront to the Book when 'read; aſſuring them that the Men ſhou'd afterwards take 'the Buſineſs out of their Hands.' This being reſolv'd upon, Mr. Henderſon privately return'd to Fife, and Mr. Dick retir'd to the Weſt; both waiting for the great Iſſue, when the Liturgy ſhou'd be firſt us'd, which was to be upon Sunday the twenty third Day of July.

Secret Deſigns againſt them and the Liturgy.

4. On the appointed Day, the new Service Book was begun to be read in the great Church of Edinburgh, call'd St. Giles, in the Preſence of many of the Council, both the Archbiſhops, and divers other Biſhops, the Lords of the Seſſion, the Magiſtrates of the City, and a great Auditory of all ſorts of People. No ſooner had the Dean of Edinburgh appear'd in his Surplice, and begun to read, but a Multitude of the meaner Sort, moſt of them Women, with Clapping of Hands, Execrations and Outcries, rais'd a hideous Noiſe and Confuſion in the Church. The Biſhop of the Place, who was to preach that Day, ſtept into the Pupilt, hoping to appeaſe the Tumult, by minding them of the Sacredneſs of the Place; but they were more inrag'd, and one Janot Gaddes, an old Woman, uſher'd in the future War by throwing a Stool at his Head, which might have endanger'd his Life. Upon this the Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, Lord Chancellor, was oblig'd to call down from the Gallery the Provoſt, Bailiffs and other Magiſtrates to their Aſſiſtance, who at length with great Difficulty thruſt the unruly Rabble out of the Church, and ſecured the Doors. After which the Dean proceeded in the Service, but ſtill was greatly diſturb'd by the loud Clamours of the Multitude without, who pelted the Doors and Windows with Sticks and Stones, and cry'd out A Pape, a Pape! Antichriſt! pul him down! ſtane him! with all the Marks of ungovernable Fury. Notwithſtanding, the Service was ended, but not the People's Rage, who watching the Biſhop's Retreat to his Lodgings juſt by, ſo aſſaulted him, that if he had not been reſcu'd by a ſtrong Hand, he had probably been murder'd. Nor was St. Giles's Church thus only diſturb'd and profan'd, but in other Churches alſo the People's Diſorders were anſwerable, tho' not in ſo ſignal a Manner. The Morning thus paſt, the Lord Chancellor and Council aſſembled to prevent the like Darings in the Afternoon, which they ſo effected, that the Liturgy was read without any publick Diſturbance. Yet ſtill the Biſhop of Edinburgh was, in his Return to his Lodgings, rudely treated by the People, the Earl of Roxborough's Coach, in which he paſs'd, ſerving for no Protection to him: Tho' the Earl himſelf was highly favour'd by the People, and not without ſome Cauſe ſuſpected to have been a Promoter of the Commotions of that Day.

Other falſe Meaſures.

Hitherto no Perſon of Note or Diſtinction appear'd to countenance the ſeditious Confuſion; nor did they ſeem to own the Tumult, but attributed it to the Rabble of the People: Only the zealous Kirk-mens, extoll'd it in their Pulpits, and magnify'd the Actors for the moſt Heroical Sparks that ever God inſpir'd and rais'd in this laſt Age of the World; and for the happy Mouths and Hands, which God had honour'd that Day with the Beginning of their Bleſſed Reformation. The Biſhops it ſeems thought it not of Moment to implore any Protection of the Council, but without applying there, or joining the Lay Lords with them, they ſent an Expreſs to the King, with a full Account of what had paſs'd, and a Petition That his Majeſty wou'd take what Courſe he thought beſt for the promoting his Service. After which they ran into a worſe Error, in leaving Edinburgh to itſelf, and retiring almoſt all of them to their own Dioceſes, to the great ſtrengthning of the adverſe Party. But in this they might naturally think themſelves unſecure, ſince neither the Lords of the Council, nor the City Magiſtrates took any Care for the puniſhing the Ringleaders of ſo dangerous a Tumult. And wiſe Men have thought that if two or three, the moſt notorious among them, had ſuffer'd Death, it might poſſibly have ſav'd all the ſucceeding Torrent of Blood that overflow'd three Kingdoms. All that the Magiſtrates did, was the calling in of a ſeditious Pamphlet, Intitled A Diſpute againſt the Engliſh Popiſh Ceremonies obtruded on the Kirk of Scotland. They likewiſe addreſs'd their Letters to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, profeſſing their Innocency, and their Diſlike of the late Tumult: And after that bound themſelves by an obligatory Act of the Common-Council, both for the Indemnity and the Maintenance of ſuch as ſhou'd read the Service-Book; the Miniſters generally refuſing to perform their Parts, without ſuch Encouragements.

Petitions againſt the Liturgy.

In the mean Time, Henderſon and Dick, the two Chiefs of the Kirk-Party, carry'd on their Cauſe with great Diligence and Secrecy, to whom were join'd four other Miniſters, Cant, Ramſey, Rollock and Murray; all which were encourag'd by ſeveral great Men, as the Earls of Rothes, Lothian, Caſſels, Egglington and Hume, and the Lords Lindſey, Lowdon, Lorn, Balmerino, &c. Henderſon and Dick deliver'd a Petition to the Lords of the Council againſt the Service-Book, which found an Acceptance from the Lord-Treaſurer greater than the Biſhops expected. This was follow'd with ſeveral other Petitions from the above-nam'd Lords and others, who obtain'd a Promiſe from the Council that they ſhou'd receive an Anſwer from the King by the ſeventeenth Day of October. The Oracle whom theſe Petitioners conſulted about the Legality of their Proceedings, was Sir Thomas Hope, his Majeſty's own Advocate; who, tho' he profeſſed to be no ways concern'd in the Buſineſs, as being the King's Servant, yet in the mean time he privately laid down the Grounds and Ways by which they might proceed: And to prevent being obſerv'd, he fix'd upon the Lord Balmerino and Mr. Henderſon to be the Men, who ſhou'd occaſionally come to him, and receive his Overtures.

Great Multitudes at Edinburgh.

5. Upon the appointed Day, the ſeventeenth of October, when the Harveſt was over, there appear'd a mighty Conflux of all Sorts of People at Edinburgh, to join in Petitioning; which was ſo general, that beſides the Encreaſe of many Noblemen, there were few or no Shires on the South of the Grampian Hills, that ſent not Gentlemen, Burghers, Miniſters and Commons. Yet ſtill if his Majeſty's Anſwer, which the Council receiv'd, had tended to the Diſcharging the Service-Book, as was hop'd and expected by all peaceable Men, it is believ'd the greater Part had return'd ſatisfy'd, and the reſt wou'd have met with an inſignificant Support. But inſtead of this, three Proclamations were read to them at the Market Croſs, 'The firſt 'appointing no Church Buſineſs to be at preſent treated of 'at the Council Table, and commanding all to repair to 'their Dwellings, under Pain of Rebellion: The ſecond, 'for removing the Council and Seſſion to Lithgow, and ſo 'to Sterling. And the third, for burning the foremention'd 'Pamphlet, againſt the Engliſh Ceremonies.

New Tumults and Diſcontents.

But theſe ſerv'd rather like the pouring on of Oyl to encreaſe the Flame, than of Water to extinguiſh it: For the next Morning, the Women in a great Rage aſſembled to the Number of three hundred, and made their firſt Attempt upon the Biſhop of Galloway, who going to the Council Houſe, was purſu'd along the Streets with bitter Railings and Curſes to the very Door; where being drawn in from the Fury of the Multitude, they immediately beſet the Houſe, demanding the Delivery of him, and threatning his Deſtruction. The Earl of Traquair, the Treaſurer, being inform'd of the Danger of the Biſhop, who had formerly been his Tutor, came to his Relief, and with great Difficulty forc'd an Entrance through the Preſs; but ſoon found himſelf in as ill a Condition as the Biſhop, the Noiſe and Multitude encreaſing, with terrible Outcries, God defend thoſe that defend God's Cauſe! God confound the Service-Book, and all the Maintainers of it! Hereupon the Provoſt and City-Council were call'd to raiſe the Siege; but they return'd Anſwer, That their Condition was the ſame: For they were ſurrounded with the like Multitude, who by threatning them with Fire and Deſtruction, at length forc'd them to ſign a Paper, importing, 'That they wou'd adhere to them in Oppoſition to the Service-Book, and that 'they would reſtore to their Places Henderſon, Ramſey and 'Rollock, who had been ſilenc'd for rejecting of it.' No better Anſwer being return'd, the Lord Treaſurer, with the Earl of Wigton, ventur'd in Perſon to the Town-Houſe, where they found the Heat of the Fury ſomewhat abated, becauſe the Magiſtrates had ſign'd the Paper; and return'd with ſome Hopes that they wou'd now calm the Diſorders about the Council-Houſe, ſo as to preſerve the Biſhop. But they no ſooner preſented themſelves in the great Street, but they were moſt rudely aſſaulted, the Throng being ſo outragious, as they pull'd down the Lord Treaſurer, took his Hat, Cloak and white Staff from him, and ſo hal'd him to the Council-Houſe. The Lords finding ſuch imminent Danger, fix'd upon the beſt Expedient for their Safety, and deſir'd the Aſſiſtance of ſome of the Nobility and Gentry as were diſaffected to the Service-Book. They ſoon obtain'd the Favour of theſe Lords and Gentlemen, who came and offer'd their Perſons and Power to protect them; by which Means they were quietly guarded to Haly-Rood Houſe, and the Biſhop to his Lodgings.

A Propoſition againſt Biſhops.

It is ſubſcrib'd.

Theſe were the Beginnings of their intended Work of Reformation, which, they ſaid, God even to a Miracle had graciouſly proſper'd in their Hands: And indeed this Advantage gain'd at Edinburgh, had a powerful Influence upon the reſt of the Boroughs of the Kingdom. And notwithſtanding the Proclamation commanding the Petitioners to leave Edinburgh, they ſtill remain'd in the Town, and met the next Day at their ſeveral Tables, conſulting how to proceed; where, to prevent ſuch Miniſters from obeying the Proclamation, who were not inform'd of the grand Secret, the Noblemen made an unwilling Diſcovery to them, 'How they had Aſſurance from the Treaſurer, that no 'Notice ſhou'd be taken of their remaining in Town, provided they did not appear openly in the Streets.' Whereupon they continu'd in their Meeting-Houſes all that Day, while the Lord Balmerino and Mr. Henderſon were privately managing their great Work with Sir Thomas Hope. In Concluſion, Henderſon brought a Propoſition to the Miniſters, 'That whereas they had formerly petition'd to be freed 'from the Service-Book, &c. they might now take in the 'Biſhops alſo, complain of them as Underminers of Religion, and crave Juſtice to be done upon them.' But to this many of the Miniſters were averſe, profeſſing, That they came there only to be freed from the Service-Book, and otherwiſe had no Quarrel with the Biſhops; which being reported to the Noblemen, they ſent the Earl of Rothes and the Lord Lowdon, who with long Speeches, mixt with Threats and Promiſes, ſo prevail'd upon the Miniſters, that the Challenge againſt the Biſhops, being ready prepar'd, was inſtantly ſubſcrib'd by them all, and deliver'd to the Clerk of the Council. Copies were alſo given to them, to be carry'd home to their ſeveral Presbyteries and Pariſhes, to be ſubſcrib'd by all Ranks, and return'd againſt the next Council Day, which was to be the 15th Day of November.

This being finiſh'd, the Miniſters were diſmiſs'd for that Time, and returning home behav'd themſelves ſo furiouſly in their Pulpits, that upon the fore-nam'd Day, Multitudes of all Sorts, and from all Quarters, repair'd to Edinburgh with their Petitions, in greater Numbers than before. And among other of the Nobility there appear'd the Earl of Montroſs, the Fame of whoſe Parts and Activity caus'd the Epiſcopal Party to fear an impending Storm. This and other tumultuous Meetings, which threatned the Peace of the whole Kingdom, produc'd a new Proclamation from the King, in which he let them know ‘ How unwilling he was that his Loyal Subjects ſhou'd be poſſeſs'd with groundleſs Doubts and Fears touching their Religion: That as he abhorr'd all Superſtitions of Popery, ſo he wou'd be moſt careful that nothing ſhou'd be allow'd within his Dominions, but that which ſhou'd moſt tend towards the Advancement of the true Religion, as it is now profeſs'd within his ancient Kingdom of Scotland; and that nothing was or ſhou'd be done therein, againſt the laudable Laws of that his native Kingdom. This Proclamation had not the intended Effect, but inſtead of a Submiſſion, a new Petition was fram'd, not by the rude Multitude, but by Noblemen, Barons, Miniſters, Burgeſſes and Commons, againſt the Liturgy and Canons. And the Lord Treaſurer was ſent to the King to repreſent to his Majeſty the diſorder'd Affairs of the Kingdom.

A Second Proclamation.

6. Upon which ſad Proſpect the King firſt ſent the Earl of Roxborough, and after that iſſu'd out another Proclamation, in which he let them know the Piety of his Intentions in appointing the Liturgy, ‘ and that he had no other End in it, than the Maintenance of the true Religion there already profeſs'd, and the beating down of all Superſtition, &c. That ſuch as had aſſembled for ſubſcribing the late Petition, had made themſelves liable to the higheſt Cenſures, both in Life and Fortune: Notwithſtanding, he was pleas'd to diſpenſe with the Error, as proceeding from a prepoſterous Zeal not contrary to Sovereignty, on Condition they retir'd themſelves, as good and dutiful Subjects. He therefore interdicted the like Concourſe that had been made in Edinburgh; commanding that none of them ſhou'd repair to Sterling, to which the Term was adjourn'd, without Warrant from the Lords of the Council; and that all ſuch Strangers ſhou'd within Six Hours Notice depart the Town, under Pain of Treaſon. Finally, that he wou'd not ſhut his Ears againſt any Petition, upon that or any other Subject, provided the Matter and Form of it be not prejudicial to his Regal Authority.

A Proteſtation againſt it.

The Publication of this Proclamation prov'd like a Cannon only charg'd with Powder, producing a great Noiſe and no Execution: For immediately after the Reading of it at Sterling, it was ſharply encounter'd with a Proteſtation, publiſh'd by the Earl of Hume, the Lord Lindſey, and many others, Barons, Miniſters and Burgeſſes, juſtifying Themſelves in their Proceedings, and inſiſting upon ſix Particulars, 1. ‘ That they might have immediate Recourſe to their ſacred Soveraign, to preſent their Grievances. 2. That the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, Parties complain'd on, ſhou'd not be allow'd as lawful Judges, to ſit in any Judicatory upon any of the Supplicants. 3. That no Act or Proclamation, paſs'd in the Preſence of the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, ſhou'd be any ways prejudicial to them. 4. That none of them ſhould incur any Danger in Life or Lands, for not obſerving Acts, Books, Canons, &c. introduc'd without General Aſſemblies, or Acts of Parliament. 5. That the Inconveniencies, ariſing from preſſing the Innovations, ſhou'd not be imputed to Them, who ſought only for Reformation. 6. That their Requeſts, proceeding from Conſcience, and a due Reſpect to his Majeſty's Honour, tended only for Redreſs of their preſſing Grievances,' Before Midnight the whole Town was fill'd with Armed Men from all Quarters of the Country, not without Threats againſt the Lord Chancellor, Archbiſhop Spotſwood; and the next Day, the Noblemen and others, to the Number of about two Thouſand, rod from Sterling to Edinburgh, there to conſult about further Proceedings.

The Scotch Tables.

In purſuance of their Deſigns, they erected a new Form of Government among Themſelves, ſufficiently deſpotical in reſpect to their Adherents, and unaccountable to the King for their Acts and Orders. This Government conſiſted of four diſtinct Tables in Edinburgh, for the four Orders of the State, namely the Noblemen, Barons, Burgeſſes, and Miniſters; each Order at its own Table conſulting of ſuch Things as were neceſſary for the carrying on of the great Work; which being reduc'd into Form, were offer'd, debated and concluded at the General Table, which conſiſted of a ſelect Number of Commiſſioners out of all the reſt. From all theſe they form'd and finiſh'd their celebrated COVENANT, under this ſubtle Title: ‘THE CONFESSION OF FAITH OF THE KIRK OF SCOTLAND, ſubſcrib'd at firſt by the King's Majeſty, and his Houſhold, in the Year 1580; thereafter by Perſons of all Ranks in the Year 1581, by Ordinance of the Lords of the ſecret Council, and Acts of the General Aſſembly; ſubſcrib'd again by all ſorts of Perſons in the Year 1590, by a new Ordinance of Council, at the Deſire of the General Aſſembly; WITH A GENERAL BAND for Maintenance of the true Religion, and the King's Perſon, and now ſubſcrib'd in the Year 1638, by us Noblemen, Barons, Gentlemen, Burgeſſes, Miniſters and Commons under Subſcribing; together WITH OUR RESOLUTIONS AND PROMISSES for the Cauſes after Specify'd, &c.' The Band was fitted and accommedated to the preſent Occaſion, and by that they enter'd into Covenant for the Maintenance of the Religion then profeſs'd, and his Majeſty's Perſon, but tending to the Deſtruction of Both, as appears both from the Band itſelf, and their Gloſs upon it. For by the One, they had bound Themſelves to defend each other againſt all Perſons whatſoever, not excepting the King Himſelf; and by the Other, they declar'd, That under the general Names of Popery, Hereſy and Superſtition, which were there expreſs'd, they had abjur'd not only the new Liturgy and Canons, but the Epiſcopal Government, and the Five Articles of Perth, tho' confirm'd by Parliament. And to this Covenant, in this Senſe, they requir'd an Oath of all the Subjects of Scotland; which was as large a Step as they cou'd make, for confirming their own Authority, and the Peoples Obedience, in any Project which ſhou'd hereafter iſſue from theſe Tables.

They enter into COVENANT.

The Nature of it.

Zealouſly promoted in all Parts.

This was the famous Scotch Covenant, and League that confederated all the Malecontents in both Kingdoms into a Civil War, that at length prov'd fatal to the Projectors and all their Adherents. It was publickly read and ſubſcrib'd upon the firſt of March, by a numerous Aſſembly, with great Joy and Shouting; which was the Introduction of innumerable Miſeries and Calamities. The Original is now preſerv'd in Trinity College in Cambridge, as a great Rarity. The King's Declaration calls it, That lewd Covenant, and ſeditious Band annex'd to it, and the Firſt Dung which from theſe Stables was thrown upon the Face of Authority and Government. Yet never was Human Compoſition ſo extoll'd by the People, who carry'd it on with incredible Flights and Applauſes, to a ſort of Adoration and Idolatry. It was ſoon impos'd upon all ſorts of Perſons, and Mr. Cant, in his Sermon at Glaſcow, told the People He was ſent to them with a Commiſſion from Chriſt, to bid them ſubſcribe, it being Chriſt's Contract: That he came as a Wooer for the Bridegroom, to call upon them to be hand-faſted, by ſubſcribing that Contract: That he wou'd not depart, till he had got the Names of all Refuſers, of whom he wou'd complain to his Maſter. Beſides theſe Ways, great Violence and Menaces were us'd in many Places, with Beatings, tearing of Cloaths, drawing of Blood, and expoſing Men to a thouſand Injuries and Indignities at Edinburgh, St. Andrews, Aberdeen, Glaſcow, Lanerick, and many other Places. The good old Archbiſhop Spotſwood, coming to Edinburgh, and hearing what was paſs'd, ſaid, Now all that we have been doing theſe thirty Years is thrown down at once; and fearing Violence, immediately fled to London, as did the reſt of the Biſhops, excepting four, of whom three ſav'd themſelves from Sufferings by their ſolemn Recantations. Theſe were Ramſey Biſhop of Dunkeld, Graham of Orkney, and Fairly of Argyle: But Guthry Biſhop of Murray wou'd neither fly nor recant, but patiently endur'd Excommunication, Impriſonment, and other Sufferings, ſtill juſtifying Epiſcopal Government to the Day of his Death. Likewiſe all thoſe Profeſſors in Colleges, and Miniſters, who did neither perſuade others, nor cou'd be perſuaded themſelves to take this Covenant, were put out of their Places; and all Things began to appear with a black and threatning Aſpect.

Car. 14.

II. 1. Thus the long Calm in England began to be interrupted by a threatning Storm from the North; which for a Time was thought to be of no Conſideration or Moment. At firſt it was ſcarcely obſerv'd in England; and the King himſelf had always been ſo careful of the Privileges of his Native Country, that it might not be ſuſpected of having any Dependence upon England, that he never ſuffer'd any thing relating to That to be debated in his Privy-Council, but manag'd all thoſe Affairs himſelf with two or three Scotch Men, who always attended at Court for that Purpoſe; who were ſtill under the Direction of the Marqueſs of Hamilton. And indeed there was ſo little Curioſity, either in the Court or Country, to know any thing of the Scotch Affairs, that when the whole Nation was deſirous to know what paſs'd in all other Parts of Europe, none enquir'd what was tranſacting in Scotland, nor had that Kingdom a Place in any of the News-Papers. But by

Degrees

The Diſcontents and Proceedings in England.

Degrees every One ſaw the dark Clouds ariſing, and the Storm approaching which prov'd more Dangerous, as it met with a divided Nation, already labbouring under too many Diſcontents. For in England the Ship-Mony, juſt now determin'd for the King, the Proſecutions in the Star-Chamber, and other Severities, were look'd upon as dangerous Grievances. Many Perſons grew clamorous, being ſtrictly proſecuted upon the Account of Church Ceremonies, and ſeveral of the Gentry were fin'd and impriſon'd; and in ſhort all manner of Perſons, diſoblig'd by the Court or Church, now began to take Pleaſure in the remote Proſpects of Revenge, and blew up thoſe Coals they ſaw kindling in the North. The famous Cardinal Richlieu, by his Agents, did very much contribute towards this Flame, the better to make his Advantages upon Spain and Flanders. The Popiſh Emiſſaries had a buſy Hand in this Work, upon a Religious Account; for finding the King and Archbiſhop Laud as much their Adverſaries, as the oppoſite Faction charg'd them to be their Friends, they had no Hopes but in ſome new Revolution. Bitter Invectives were likewiſe publiſh'd againſt Both by the Covenanters, which they were not contented to ſend into England only, but alſo ſent them to the Reformed Churches, by which they rais'd ſo great a Prejudice, that too many of them believ'd, ‘ That the King had a real Deſigu to change Religion, and introduce Popery.

The Archbiſhop reprints his Conference with Fiſher.

Therefore Archbiſhop Laud, to open the Eyes of thoſe who look'd on him as a Papiſt, and to juſtify the King from the like Slanders, did this Year enlarge and reprint his famous Conference with Fiſher the Jeſuit, and ſolemnly preſented it to his Majeſty: A Piece ſo ſolidly compos'd, that L'eſtrange, none of his greateſt Friend, commends it as the exacteſt Maſter-Piece of Polemick Divinity then extant; in which he had for ever diſabled the Papiſts from being ſo much their own as before. And Sir Edward Deering, his profeſs'd Adverſary, confeſs'd that in this Book, He had muzzled the Jeſuite, and ſhou'd ſtrike the Papiſts under the Fifth Rib, when he was dead and gone. That whereſoever his Grave ſhou'd be, Paul's wou'd be his perpetual Monument, and his own Book his Epitaph. Yet ſuch was his preſent Fate, that upon the Publication of it, when one of the King's Chaplains had preach'd two ſuch Sermons, as had occaſion'd one to ſay, That the Doctor had pull'd up Popery by the very Roots, an immediate Reply was made, That the Archbiſhop might preach, and the Doctor might preach what they pleas'd againſt Popery, but neither of them ſhou'd be thought the leſs Papiſts for that: A Sentence that needs no greater Aggravation than the Relation. The Archbiſhop had made ſeveral Converts from the Church of Rome, and particularly the great Mr. Chillingworth, a Man of ſo ſtrong a Head, that it became a Saying in Oxford, That He and the Lord Faulkland had ſuch extraordinary clear Reaſon, that if the Great Turk or the Devil were to be converted, they were able to do it. And this Year he had to deal with a Man of a different Kidney, the celebrated Mr. Hales of Eaton, a Perſon of infinite Reading and Ingenuity, and as communicative of his Knowledge, as the Celeſtial Bodies of their Light and Influences. This Man had imbib'd ſeveral Heterodoxical Notions in Religion, but by the Archbiſhop's great Induſtry, he was brought over to be a true Son of the Church of England, made his Chaplain, and preferr'd to the Church of Windſor. Yet none of theſe Things cou'd ſatisfy or mollify the People of England or Scotland, who by this Time had entertain'd inſuperable Prejudices againſt him and all his Proceedings.

His Converts.

The Queen Mother's Arrival.

The approaching Storm was thought to be haſtned and encreas'd by the Arrival of Mary de Medices, the Queen Mother of France, who by the Invitation of the Queen her Daughter came this Year into England for Pleaſure and Protection. This hapned upon the 19th Day of October, at the Time of ſuch extream wet and windy Weather, that the Watermen diſtinguiſh'd it by the Name of Queen Mother Weather. She was with great State convey'd through the Streets of London to St. James's; and many and great were the Apprehenſions upon this Buſineſs. For indeed the Engliſh Nation hated her, or ſuſpected her, for her own, for her Church's, for her Country's, and for her Daughter's Sake; and having ſhifted her Reſidence in other Courts, upon Calamities and Troubles which ſtill purſu'd her, the People thought it her Fate to carry along Misfortunes with her, and ſo dreaded her as an ill-boding Meteor, wherever ſhe appear'd. It is obſervable that ſhe arriv'd not long after the Birth of Lewis the Fourteenth, the mighty Monarch of France, a Prince who has been the Occaſion of more Actions, Battels, Sieges, &c. and a greater Deluge of Blood, than perhaps any one Man ſince the Creation: But whether to his Honour, or Infamy, we leave to impartial and diſintereſted Men, if there be any ſuch in Europe.

The Birth of Lewis XIV. of France.

The Affairs of Scotland.

2. But to return to Scotland, that began to threaten the Peace of England, where the whole Nation came to be divided into the two Denominations of Covenanters and Anti-Covenanters; and the former encreaſing and prevailing, all Things tended to Deſolation and Confuſion. But whether this Torrent was the unnatural Overflowings of the Waters of Populacy, or the Artifice of the Great Men, which deſtroy'd the Sluces and Flood-gates of thoſe Laws, which kept the Populacy and Presbytery in their due Bounds, it is hard to determine with Exactneſs. Upon the Noiſe of theſe Diſturbances in England, the King ſent a Meſſage to the Council at Scotland, requiring the Attendance of the Earls of Traquair and Roxborough, and the Lord Lorn; who all repaired to the Court, and after a full Conſultation, his Majeſty reſolv'd to ſend down the Marqueſs of Hamilton, his Commiſſioner, with full Power to ſettle all. The Lord Lorn return'd ſhortly after, but the other two remain'd at Court, till the Commiſſioner was ready to begin his Journey; and the Reaſon of the former's Haſte, was ſaid to be the Advice given to the King by his Father the Earl of Argyle, who being then at Court deſir'd the King not to let him return to Scotland, or elſe He wou'd wind him a Pin, as he expreſs'd it. His Majeſty thank'd the Earl for his Counſel, but declar'd, He ought to be a King of his Word; and having call'd him by his Warrant, he wou'd not detain him. Thus Lorn was diſmiſs'd, and was the firſt in Scotland who declar'd the King's Deſigu in ſending the Marqueſs of Hamilton. Upon Notice of which the few that remain'd Anti-Covenanters were much diſcourag'd, expecting no Benefit from him; and took Occaſion to revive the former Story of the Debate between the Lord Ree and Ramſey, concerning his Pretenſions to the Crown of Scotland, with many other Matters, much to this great Man's Diſadvantage.

The King's Care of his Word.

Further Endeavours to propagate the Covenant.

In the mean time, great Pains was taken to propagate Presbytery and the Covenant in the North of Scotland, where they met with greateſt Oppoſition. For this Purpoſe the Earl of Montroſs, with the three celebrated Miniſters, Henderſon, Dick and Cant, afterwards call'd The Apoſtles of the Covenant, repair'd to Aberdeen, where they had long Diſputes with the learned Doctors of that Univerſity, which were publiſh'd and printed. The Doctors withſtood all their Arguments, and gave notable Replies; for which they were afterwards ſo perſecuted, that they were forc'd to fly their Country, to ſave their Lives. Yet Montroſs, with the three Miniſters, prevail'd with many of the Citizens to ſubſcribe the Covenant, and by their Example had the like Succeſs with moſt of the Miniſters and People throughout the adjacent Shires. And ſo being accompany'd with a great Multitude of Proſelytes, they return'd to Edinburgh, to wait for the coming down of the Lord-Commiſſioner Hamilton.

Upon the third Day of June, the Marqueſs arriv'd at Berwick, where the Earl of Roxborough firſt inform'd him, ‘ That the People wou'd not be pacify'd without the Covenant allow'd to them, the Articles of Perth annull'd, the Service-Book and Canons aboliſh'd, and Epiſcopacy limited; all to be done in a General Aſſembly and Parliament ſuddenly to be call'd.’ The Marqueſs cou'd not think it honourable ſo ſoon to comply with any Terms; ſo with a very ſmall Attendance he went to Dalkeith, where the Lords of the Council were then aſſembled for Safety, as it was alledg'd, by Reaſon of the Combuſtions at Edinburgh, which daily encreas'd. For the chief of the Covenanters became ſtill more violent in their Courſes; increas'd the Meetings of their Tables, ſubdivided them into ſeveral Committees, augmented their Proviſions of Arms, and infus'd Fears and Jealouſies into the People, by exaſperating Sermons; caus'd Edinburgh Caſtle to be ſurrounded with ſtrong Guards, and hinder'd all Perſons to go to the Marqueſs, to treat or diſcourſe with him in the Buſineſs for which he was ſent, giving out, that there was a Plot to blow them up with Gun-Powder, if they went to Dalkeith; and at the ſame time receiv'd in two Ships loaden with Arms and Ammunition.

The Diſturbances increaſe.

The Marqueſs of Hamilton ſent by the King to Edinburgh.

Upon theſe Diſturbances, at the Requeſt of the Citizens of Edinburgh, the Marqueſs took his Journey from Dalkeith to that City, to the King's Palace at Haly-Rood Houſe. And being attended by the Council, and ſuch of the Nobility and Gentry as were affectionate to his Majeſty, about two Miles from Edinburgh he was met by the whole Body of the Nobility, Gentry and Covenanters then in the City, who came in a diſtinct Party to ſhew how numerous they were in Compariſon of the Company they met. Thus was he conducted to the Palace with Multitudes of both Sexes, whoſe Applauſes conſiſted of Execrations and Exclamations againſt Popery and Biſhops. Being ſettled, the Covenanters growing more clamorous, he immediately offer'd two Propoſitions to their Conſideration: ‘ Firſt, What they wou'd expect to hear in the King's Name for accommodating their Grievances? Secondly, What he

The Scots Stiffneſs.

‘ might expect from them in renouncing their Covenant, ‘ and returning to their Obedience?’ Both which were with Scorn rejected, and nothing cou'd ſatisfy them but a General Aſſembly, and a Parliament: Nor wou'd they acknowledge they had ever departed from their Obedience; and for the Covenant, They wou'd as ſoon renounce their Baptiſm as abate one Word or Syllable of it; accounting it more uſeful and available than all the Laws which had been enacted ſince the Time of Fergus their firſt King. And the Peoples Fury encreas'd to that Degree, that they clap'd new Guards upon the Caſtle, and the Pulpits reſounded with furious Sermons and Prayers; and they became ſo bold, that they ſent a Prohibition againſt reading the Engliſh Service-Book in the King's peculiar Chappel, where the Marqueſs himſelf and the Council reſided.

The Marqueſs's publick Proceedings.

His private Meaſures.

The Covenanters choſe the Earl of Rothes, the Earl of Morton, and the Lord Londore, together with the three Miniſters Henderſon, Dick and Cant, to treat with the Marqueſs; who ſtill proceeded like a faithful Subject, and upon the fourth of July caus'd his Majeſty's Proclamation to be publiſh'd at the Market-Croſs, declaring ‘His Reſolution ‘ to maintain the true Proteſtant Religion; and for clearing ‘ of Scruples, aſſur'd them, That he wou'd never preſs the ‘ Practice of the Canons and Service-Book, otherwiſe than ‘ in ſuch legal Way, as ſhou'd ſatisfy his loving Subjects, ‘ that he neither intended Innovation in Religion or Laws; ‘ warning all his good People to beware of Diſobedience.’ This was ſolemnly proteſted againſt by many thouſands, in an inſulting and hoſtile Manner; and they concluded, ‘ That ‘ if his Majeſty wou'd not allow their Proceedings, they ‘ themſelves wou'd call a General Aſſembly, as being agreeable to the Laws and Practice of that Church and ‘ Kingdom.’ On the Morrow, the forenam'd Lords and Miniſters return'd to his Grace, and found him more pliable in treating with them, even publickly before Roxborough, Southesk and others. To which Biſhop Guthry adds this remarkable Paſſage, That at their parting from the Lords of the Council, he took them into the Gallery, and in private thus expreſs'd himſelf to them; My Lords and Gentlemen, I ſpoke to you before thoſe Lords of the Council as the King's Commiſſioner; now there being none preſent but your ſelves, I ſpeak to you as a Kindly Scotchman: If you go on with Courage and Reſolution, you will carry what you pleaſe; but if you faint and give Ground in the leaſt, you are undone: A Word is enough to wiſe Men. This became the Subject of publick Diſcourſe in a ſhort Time, and the Earl of Montroſs ſeem'd not a little ſurpris'd at it, who declar'd to this Author, That he wou'd look more narrowly to Hamilton's Walking. Sir James Turner, in his Manuſcript Obſervations upon Guthry's Memoirs, which are now by me, ſeverely reflects on the Biſhop for this Story, and charges much of it upon the Malice, or rather ſubtle Deſigns of the Covenanters, particularly Mr. Cant: But ſtill what he ſo zealouſly urges for the Honour of the Marqueſs, ſeems to have been more founded upon the Arguments of Reaſon, than the Evidence of Witneſſes.

He returns to London.

The Marqueſs, to avoid the Indiction of an Aſſembly and Parliament, lay quiet at Haly-Rood-Houſe for a few Days, and then retir'd to his Houſe at Hamilton; where being again preſs'd by the Lords and Miniſters, and aſſur'd, That nothing but a Parliament and General Aſſembly cou'd ſettle Buſineſs; his Grace deſir'd Leiſure to make a Journey to the Court for procuring the ſame. And thus he left the Nation on the ninth of July, promiſing to return with his Majeſty's Anſwer before the twelfth of Auguſt: And a little to pacify them, before his Departure, he ſent a Proclamation to the Market Croſs of Edinburgh, for the Council and Seſſion to ſit there again, which was readily obey'd.

His ſecond Journey to Edinburgh.

3. The Marqueſs went directly to the Court at Greenwich, where he gave a large Account of the Condition of Scotland, and of the Strength and Rage of the Covenanters, and of the Fears and Inconſtancy of many of the ſecret Council. And therefore to obviate theſe Difficulties, he advis'd the King to renew the Confeſſion of Faith ratify'd in Parliament, 1567, and to enlarge his Inſtructions for the Indicting a free General Aſſembly, and for diſcharging the Uſe of the Service-Book, the Canons, and the Practice of the High-Commiſſion. With theſe Powers, and with Letters and Declarations of the King, the Marqueſs return'd back to Edinburgh on the eighth of Auguſt, where he found Affairs in a much worſe Poſture than he had left them: For the Covenanters had come to publick Reſolutions, ‘ That they ‘ wou'd have a General Aſſembly, that the Biſhops ſhou'd ‘ have no Vote in it, that Epiſcopacy ſhould be aboliſh'd, ‘ the Articles of Perth condemn'd, and all Perſons, under ‘ Pain of Excommunication, ſhou'd take the Covenant.’ The Marqueſs declar'd in Council, That he had obtain'd Allowance from his Majeſty to indict a Parliament and General Aſſembly, provided the Covenanters wou'd comply with ſome preparatory Articles. Upon which wiſe and peaceable Men endeavour'd much to diſpoſe them to a Compliance, but all in vain; for thoſe Articles being civilly offer'd to them, were utterly rejected. Upon this his Grace told them, That his Inſtructions did not warrant him to grant any Parliament or Aſſembly, till his Majeſty was further petition'd; and therefore deſir'd Time till the twentieth of September to bring a fuller Anſwer from his Majeſty; which upon the twenty fifth of Auguſt was agreed to, upon Condition there ſhou'd be no further Delays after that Day.

He again returns to Court.

His third Journey to Scotland.

His Compliances.

Thus the Marqueſs took a ſecond Journey to the Court, carrying with him Articles of Advice offer'd to the King by three Lords, on whoſe Fidelity his Majeſty much depended, Traquair, Roxborough and Southesk, who propos'd to diſcharge the Service-Book, Canons and High-Commiſſion; to forbear preſſing the Five Articles of Perth, and to revive the Confeſſion of Faith with a Covenant as ſign'd by King James in 1580; and ſo upon the Word of a King to pardon what was paſt. The Marqueſs at Court urg'd his Majeſty to the like Compliance, and obtain'd new Inſtructions, to empower him to perform all that was ſo advis'd. While he was there, a bold Treatiſe was printed at Edinburgh, and ſpread abroad, Shewing Reaſons for the Church's Power to hold Aſſemblies without the Magiſtrate's Allowance, in Caſe of his Averſeneſs; which plainly ſhew'd the Deſign of the Covenanters, if the King refus'd to comply with them. They proceeded ſo far, that when the Marqueſs arriv'd this third Time at Edinburgh, and produc'd the Old Confeſſion of Faith ſign'd by King James, which was the very Title of their own Covenant, they gave it out to the People, That what the Marqueſs brought tended to the Subverſion of their Liberties and Religion; That a new Covenant was ſet on foot to deſtroy theirs; and if they did not reſiſt now, all they had done was loſt. Nevertheleſs the Marqueſs and the Council did proclaim and ſubſcribe the foreſaid Confeſſion of Faith, or old Covenant. And, what was thought pleaſing to the moſt Furious and Violent, by Proclamation at the Croſs, they finally diſcharg'd the Service-Book, the Canons, and High-Commiſſion, declaring the Articles of Perth to have no Force, and appointed a General Aſſembly to ſit at Glaſcow the twenty firſt Day of November, and a Parliament at Edinburgh the fifteenth of May following.

The Troubles and Tumults ſtill encreaſe.

4. It was now hop'd that all Malecontents wou'd have been ſatisfy'd, and indeed all moderate Men were overjoy'd; and it was certainly believ'd That a faithful Miniſtry, and theſe Conceſſions at firſt, wou'd have put an End to all the Miſchiefs at once. But extorted Favours ſeldom give Satisfaction; and the Leaders of the Party, inſtead of acquieſcing, went boldly and tumultuouſly to the Croſs, and with Swords in Hand publiſh'd a ſtrange Proteſtation, wherein they attributed Infallibility to their Covenant; affirming It was approv'd from Heaven with rare and undeniable Inſtances. And the Sunday following, all the Pulpits reſounded with violent Invectives and Declamations againſt his Majeſty's Declaration, branding it with the Depth and Policy of Satan. This furious Carriage ſtartled great Numbers, and made them apprehenſive, That the Leaders in this Buſineſs had more in their View and Deſign, than ever they profeſs'd. But ſtill they carry'd Things with ſuch a potent Sway, that none had the Courage to ſpeak againſt Them; all went along with them, tho' with ſecret Reluctance: And it was no Wonder, conſidering, that by this Time they had almoſt engag'd the whole Nation to the Covenant, even the greateſt Part of the Highlanders. Thoſe who had Dependence upon the Houſe of Argyle, which were five Counties, prov'd violent Aſſerters of it, to gratify their Superior, the Lord Lorn, who about this Time, by the Death of his Father, became Earl of Argyle; and who, tho' he profeſs'd to ſtand by the King, and always joyn'd with the Council, was known to be hearty for the Covenanters, and to have an intimate Correſpondence with them: And the reſt, tho' in their Hearts they abhor'd the Covenant, yet to avoid Dangers and Sufferings, they went along with the Multitude.

The Cunning Management of the Covenanters.

The Aſſembly of Glaſcow being thus Indicted, they craftily projected that the Commiſſioners ſhou'd be elected out of the moſt rigid and enthuſiaſtical Spirits that were to be found: And they took care that no Miniſter ſhou'd be choſen who had formerly been the King's Chaplain, a Member of a Biſhop's Chapter, a Juſtice of the Peace, or upon the High-Commiſſion; the principal Covenanters perſuading the People, that the King deſign'd no Performance of what he promis'd in his laſt Proclamation, no not the Aſſembly it ſelf, but to gain Time till he was ready for their Ruin. They likewiſe ſent for all their Party to flock to Edinburgh, as if now the Danger was greater than ever; encreas'd their Guards about the Caſtle, and their Preachers publiſh'd in the Pulpits, That whoever ſubſcrib'd the King's Confeſſion and Covenant, were perjur'd Villains. Moreover they caus'd a moſt furious and ſcandalous Libel to be drawn up againſt the Archbiſhops and Biſhops, exhibited to the Presbytery of Edinburgh, and procur'd to be publickly read in the Pulpits. Whereupon all the Prelates were cited by the Presbytery of Edinburgh, to appear as Criminals before the next General Aſſembly at Glaſcow. And the more to infatuate the Minds of the Multitude, they ſet up a Female Impoſtor, one Michelſon's Daughter, ſaid to have been long diſtracted with Fits, and then pretended to be inſpired with Divination, who was much extoll'd for her ſtrange Ravings againſt the Biſhops; and Rollock, a Presbyterian Miniſter, gave out, That God ſpake through Her; her Expreſſions being, that it was reveal'd unto her from God, that their Covenant was approv'd from Heaven.

Preparations for the General Aſſembly at Glaſcow.

And ſhortly after this, they Indicted an Aſſembly, by their own Authority, to be upon the twenty firſt Day of November. But upon Aſſurance that the Lord Marqueſs, his Majeſty's Commiſſioner, was reſolv'd to hold the Aſſembly at the Time and Place appointed by the King's Proclamation, they alter'd their Purpoſe, and ſent out Papers for a General Meeting at Edinburgh upon the twelfth of November; and to ſtay there, till they were to go to Glaſcow, about five Days after. Then conſidering how fit it wou'd be, that beſides the Commiſſioners, the Gentry of the Country ſhou'd be drawn thither, to guard the Aſſembly, and make it terrible to Gain-ſayers; they found out a handſom Pretence to bring that about. There were then ſome Robbers up in the Highlands, of whom they made a Report to paſs, That they wou'd come down and beſet the Ways, and offer Violence to the Commiſſioners in their Journey to Glaſcow; to prevent which, it was convenient that all who were zealous for the Cauſe, ſhou'd convoy their Commiſſioners thither, and guard them there during their Sitting; all which was readily obſerv'd.

The Aſſembly begins.

5. Thus the General Aſſembly began at Glaſcow, on the twenty firſt Day of November, which prov'd a further Occaſion of the Calamities, which afterwards embroyl'd and enſlav'd the Scotch Nation. Never was known a greater Confluence in the Kingdom of all ſorts of People; and the Aſſembly conſiſted of about two Hundred and Sixty Commiſſioners, ſome of whom, as Mr. Burnet tells us, cou'd neither write nor read; and likewiſe of many Lay-Elders and Aſſeſſors. After the King's Commiſſion was read, the Marqueſs in a Speech exhorted Them to a peaceable and moderate Carriage, giving ſome Glances of the Diſorders that had paſs'd. To which Anſwer being made by a Nobleman, and Lay-Elder, That they had given his Grace Satisfaction for all their Proceedings, they went to the Choice of a Moderator, without the Approbation and Conſent of the King's Commiſſioner, and reſolv'd upon Mr. Henderſon, as their ſureſt Friend; againſt whom, when the Marqueſs proteſted, ſuch was their exorbitant Behaviour, that by the Hands of Dr. Hamilton, they preſented to Him a Declinator and Proteſtation againſt his Proceedings, in the Name of the Biſhops. But the Marqueſs had yet a deeper Reſentment of their Behaviour in another Caſe; for the King having nominated ſix Lords of the Privy-Council to be Aſſeſſors to Him, his Commiſſioner in that Aſſembly, they abſolutely refus'd to admit them, or allow their Suffrages, declaring, That if the King Himſelf were preſent, he ſhou'd have but one Voice, and that no Negative One neither. Several Proteſtations were made on the other Side againſt their new Lay-Elders, but to no Effect; and as their Elections were generally undue, ſo were their Actions in the Aſſembly; all being carry'd by Fury and Faction, as well as clancular Contrivances, as appear'd from their own private Papers of Inſtructions: Neither was there any Freedom of Debate, but what tended to the Advancement of their own particular Deſigns.

Inſolences towards the Marqueſs of Hamilton.

He diſſolves the Aſſembly

The Aſſembly had ſat but eight Days, when the Marqueſs finding their inſolent Demeanor, declar'd to the Lords of the Council his Reſolution to diſſolve it; and accordingly, upon the ſame Day, after a long Speech againſt the Illegality and Nullity of their Proceedings, he concluded with diſſolving the Aſſembly in his Majeſty's Name, and diſcharging their further Proceedings upon Pain of Treaſon. The Moderator and the Earl of Rothes made Anſwer, They were ſorry he left them, but their Conſcience bore them Witneſs, they had done nothing amiſs, and therefore wou'd not deſert the Work of the Lord. Accordingly they form'd a ſolemn Proteſtation, wherein they declar'd for a Freedom of uninterrupted Sitting, and for his Majeſty to contramand, was to prejudge the Prerogative of Jeſus Chriſt, and the Liberties of the Kirk. And at the ſame Inſtant the Lord Ereskyn, and three other mean Perſons, came and begg'd to be admitted into their bleſſed Covenant: Which Offer, tho' purpoſely contriv'd, was made ſo good uſe of by the Moderator, That he deſir'd it might be admir'd as God's Approbation, and Sealing of their Proceedings. Accordingly they reſolv'd to ſit on without Interruption: And what added much to their Strength was the coming in of the Lord Lorn, now Earl of Argyle, who went the ſame Day into the Aſſembly, notwithſtanding he had juſt before acted as one of his Majeſty's ſix Aſſeſſors. His Joyning with them caus'd great Rejoycing, yet many of the Party thought the Strain of his Speech much wanting of that Prudence that was expected from him: For he clearly confirm'd his Father's former Opinion of him, and told them, That from the Beginning he had been Theirs, and wou'd have undertaken that Cauſe as ſoon as any of them, if he had not conceiv'd that his former Profeſſions for the King, and his joyning with this Council, was more available to Them, than if he had declar'd himſelf at firſt. This Earl's Example, together with the yielding Deportment of the Commiſſioner himſelf, then in the midſt of the Country where his Power lay, ſo wrought upon the Lords of the Council, and other Anti-Covenanting Noble Men, that many of them, during this Illegal Seſſion, and others ſhortly after, joyn'd wholly with the Covenanters.

The Earl of Argyle declares for the Covenanters.

The Aſſembly by their own Power aboliſh Epiſcopacy, &c.

Upon the Diſſolution of the Aſſembly, the Lord Commiſſioner retir'd, but ſtill the Aſſembly continu'd by its own Authority, and ſat above twenty Days. During which Time, among other Acts, they declar'd ſix General Aſſemblies to be null and void; of which two were then in Force by ſeveral Acts of Parliament, and part of the other confirm'd by Parliament. They condemn'd the Service-Book, the Book of Canons, the Book of Ordination, the High-Commiſſion, and the Five Articles of Perth, together with that Covenant which had been allow'd in the Year 1580 by King James, and declar'd their own to be ſubſtantially One. They alſo condemn'd Epiſcopacy as Antichriſtian, tho' it ſtood confirm'd both by many Acts of Parliament and Aſſemblies; and the Biſhops themſelves were all depos'd, and moſt of them Excommunicated. All Arminian Tenets were condemn'd, and many Miniſters depos'd; and it was ordain'd that Mr. Henderſon ſhou'd be tranſlated from Lenchars to Edinburgh. They concluded that a Letter ſhou'd be drawn up and ſent to the King for obtaining his Royal Aſſent to all Things they had enacted: So upon the twentieth of December the Aſſembly aroſe in Triumph.

The Marqueſs leaves Scotland, and returns to Court.

Many Miniſters were oblig'd to fly into England, but Ramſey and Rollock for their Services found Favour; and Mr. Henderſon's Kirk of Lenchars was preſented to Mr. Borthwick, formerly mention'd, who had ſtay'd ſo long at London to incourage the Non-Conformiſts there; but in a ſhort Time he was ſent back to the ſame Place, by the Leaders of the Cauſe, to promote the former Deſign, where he continu'd till his Death. In the ſame Manner the Earl of Haddington, who, after his Father's Death, had gone up to kiſs the King's Hand, remain'd at London; and it was whiſper'd, That under Pretence of waiting on his Majeſty, he tranſacted the ſame Buſineſs with the Nobility, which Borthwick did with the Citizens, and Others of the inferior Rank; of which he kept Intelligence with his Brother-in-law the Earl of Rothes. In the mean Time the Marqueſs, finding the Tumults encreaſing in Edinburgh and other Places, obtain'd leave of his Majeſty to return into England; and after a fruitleſs, and perhaps injurious Negotiation, at the End of December, he a third Time return'd to the Court, leaving all in an Uproar and Confuſion.

The Scots reſolve upon a War.

They ſeize upon Edinburgh, &c.

6. Shortly after his Departure, Mr. Windrom of Liberton was ſent to the Court with the Aſſembly's Letter to the King, which was receiv'd and read before the Scotch Council there. They were all of Opinion, That it was a moſt humble and well penn'd Letter, or at leaſt ſo they declar'd; upon which his Majeſty took his anſwering of it into Conſideration, and ſhortly after ſent down a Letter to the Council at Edinburgh, importing, 'That for the better ſettling 'of their Affairs, he wou'd be at York upon the firſt Day 'of April, and wou'd call the Scotch Council to come 'there and give him Advice.' Notwithſtanding this, the Noblemen and Miniſters, who govern'd all at Edinbugh, profeſs'd they had Intelligence, That the King deſign'd nothing but War, and was now raiſing an Army to invade their Kingdom. Upon which Foundation, before Mr. Windrom's Return and Anſwer, they call'd a General Meeting of all Sorts to be at Edinburgh upon the twentieth Day of February, to reſolve upon a Defenſive War. And being met, a Paper was read ſetting forth the Lawfulneſs of ſuch a War, being compos'd by Balmerino, Hope and Henderſon; which was receiv'd with ſo much Satisfaction and Conviction, that they unanimouſly conſented to the raiſing of an Army, and voted General Leſly to be their chief Commander, a Soldier of eminent Experience in the Wars of Germany, who having been deny'd the Favour of a Barony by the King, readily accepted of the Office. The next Day they ſeiz'd upon Edinburgh, without Reſiſtance, and two Days after upon the King's Houſe at Dalkeith, where they took away the Regalia, and great Store of Arms and Ammunition; and not long after they became Maſters of the chief Parts of Scotland. The Commiſſioner Hamilton has been blam'd for the Loſs of Edinburgh Caſtle, and the Treaſurer Traquair for the Regalia and Arms at Dalkeith; but how juſtly, we cannot Determine.

Their Fondneſs for the Covenant.

In all theſe Matters the Miniſters were moſt induſtrious, who in their Pulpits cry'd out of the Ruin of Religion and Liberties, that all were to expect Popery and Bondage, If they did not quit themſelves like Men. Curſes were thunder'd out againſt thoſe Who went not out to help the Angel of the Lord againſt the Mighty; and they taught the People that there was a Neceſſity of bearing Arms againſt the King upon Pain of Perjury and Damnation. Moreover they procur'd divers Libels to be diſpers'd in England, for Juſtification of their Proceedings, and Defamation of Eccleſiaſtical Government; inciting his Majeſty's Subjects in that Kingdom, to make the like brave Attempts. One of them refus'd to pray for the Provoſt of Edinburgh, then lying upon his Death-bed, only becauſe he had not ſubſcrib'd the Covenant; and ſo much was that Paper Idoliz'd, that many Miniſters wou'd not admit thoſe to the Sacrament who had not ſubſcrib'd it, but in their Exhortation barr'd them in expreſs Terms with Adulterers, Slanderers, Blaſphemers, &c. One preach'd That the Non-Subſcribers of the Covenant were Atheiſts; and another exhorted the People never to give over, till they had the King in their Power, and then he ſhou'd ſee what good Subjects they were. Others preach'd, That the Service-Book was fram'd at Rome; and one preach'd, That the Wrath of God wou'd never leave that Kingdom, till all the Prelates were hang'd up before the Lord, like the ſeven Sons of Saul. Theſe and innumerable other ſtrange Expreſſions and Scandals, they publiſh'd in their Pulpits, which they call'd The Chairs of Truth: And to haſten the Peoples Inſurrection, they endeavour'd to perſuade them, that the King deſign'd an Invaſion of their Kingdom, and to make it a Province; as alſo to deſpoil them of their Laws and Liberties, and to give them new Laws, as if they were a conquer'd Nation.

Their Incouragements to undertake a War.

It may juſtly be thought a Matter of Amazement, that this low and unprovided Nation, ſhou'd dare to put ſuch Inſults upon their lawful King, who was then ſupported by the united Forces of England and Ireland, obey'd at home, and made formidable to all his Neighbours by a powerful Fleet on all Sides. Therefore it is rightly judg'd that they had ſome extraordinary Incouragements to enflame them to theſe bold Attempts; which are reaſonably thought to have been theſe following. Firſt they had the King for their natural Country-Man, born in that Air, retaining an Affection for them to the very laſt; and who by uſually giving them the Title of His Ancient and Native Kingdom, occaſion'd many to believe that he lov'd them above the Engliſh. They had in the next Place ſuch a ſtrong Party of Scots about him, that he cou'd neither move or ſpeak, ſcarce ſo much as think, but they were made acquainted with it. In the Bed-Chamber they had an equal Number of Gentlemen, and ſeven Grooms for one; in the Preſence-Chamber more than an equal Number among the Gentlemen Uſhers, Quarter-Maſters, &c. and in the Privy-Chamber, beſides the Carvers and Cup-Bearers, a vaſt Diſproportion of the Gentlemen belonging to it. By which the King was ſo obſerv'd, and withal betray'd, that as far as they cou'd diſcover his Meaning by Words, Signs or Circumſtances, it was immediately ſent into Scotland; ſome of his Bed-Chamber becoming ſo audacious, as to examine his Pockets when he was aſleep, to tranſcribe ſuch Letters as they found, and to ſend Copies by Way of Intelligence to their Countrymen. For Offices of Truſt and Credit, they were as well accommodated as with thoſe of Service: Hamilton, Maſter of the Horſe, who fill'd the Stables with that People; the Earl of Morton, Captain of the King's Guards; the Earl of Ancram, Keeper of the Privy-Purſe; the Duke of Lenox, Warden of the Cinque Ports, and Conſtable of Dover Caſtle; Balfore, Lieutenant of the Tower, and Wemmys Maſter Gunner of the King's Navy. In the Church, ſo many of that Nation were benefic'd and preferr'd in all Parts of England, that their Eccleſiaſtical Revenues amounted to more than all the Yearly Rents of the Kirk of Scotland; and moſt of theſe heartily eſpous'd and promoted their Cauſe among the People. Beſides they had no leſs Aſſurance of the Engliſh Puritans, than they had of their own, by means of their Emiſſaries in London; thoſe in the Court, being headed by the Earl of Holland, and thoſe in the Country by his Brother the Earl of Warwick; the firſt being call'd, The ſpiritual and inviſible Head, the other, The viſible and temporal Head of the Puritan Faction.

The Marqueſs of Hamilton's dark Proceedings.

But their greateſt Advantage ſeems to have been from the Marqueſs of Hamilton, their Lord and Patron, who had ſuch Authority in the Court of England, and ſuch Influence on the Council of Scotland, that in Effect he was King of their Nation. As to his general Behaviour in theſe great Affairs, the various Accounts we find have rais'd many Difficulties. Many Writers have more than blam'd his Conduct, and have charg'd him with Treachery and Ingratitude to the King, who had granted him his Favours in the moſt invidious Inſtances, even in the moſt blameable Projects and Monopolies. Great Pains have been taken by an eminent Pen to vindicate his Reputation, from original and unqueſtionable Papers; all which, tho' redounding to his Honour, ſeem more to ſhew the Confidence of the Prince, than the Fidelity of the Subject. So that notwithſtanding Sir James Turner's Vindication, we know not how wholly to disbelieve Biſhop Guthry, who being better inform'd in ſome Particulars, has diſcover'd and condemn'd his private Tranſactions; of which we ſhall have Occaſion to ſay more hereafter. His Ways were generally indirect and ſerpentine, and ſuch as gave the ſtrongeſt Suſpicions both to Friends and Enemies. For the Solution of which the Lord Clarendon intimates to us in a remarkable Story, how, by great Subtilty and Induſtry, he ſo inſinuated Himſelf with the King as to gain his Conſent to make Promiſes, and to ingratiate Himſelf with his Enemies, the better to ſerve his Majeſty: And that the King aſſur'd Him, That it ſhou'd not be in any Man's Power to infuſe the leaſt Jealouſy of him into his Breaſt. The Subſtance of this Story is confirm'd by Sir Philip Warwick, who well knew the Man, and diſapprov'd of his winding Paths, as being contrary to the honeſt Temper of his younger Brother. This, if true, was a ſtrange Piece of Policy, which gave him Opportunity of doing much Good or Hurt to the Publick at this Time.

The Death of Serjeant Hoskyns,

Thus paſs'd the tumultuous Year 1638; for the Concluſion of which, we ſhall mention the Deaths of ſome conſiderable Men, that hapned the ſame Year. Firſt, John Hoskyns, Serjeant at Law and a Welſh Judge, a great Grecian and an admired Poet, who ſo poliſh'd Ben Johnſon, that he ever after call'd him Father Hoskyns. His Wit and Parts caus'd him to be much admir'd by Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Camden, Selden, Daniel, Martin, Dr. Donne, Sir Henry Wotton, and Sir Benjamin Rudyerd. Next we are to mention Richard James, Nephew to Thomas James, formerly mention'd, Batchelor of Divinity of Corpus Chriſti College in Oxford, a Perſon humourous, but incredibly induſtrious, and skilful in Critical Learning, Antiquities and Languages; for whoſe Helps both Mr. Selden and Sir Robert Cotton were particularly oblig'd, which were carry'd on with that Labour, that he is believ'd to have dy'd with hard ſtudying. Next Mr. Joſeph Mede, Batchelor of Divinity and Fellow of Chriſt College in Cambridge, a ſingular Ornament of that Univerſity, a Perſon of excellent Variety of Learning, and of exemplary Piety and Charity. He had an admirable Faculty in interpreting the Holy Scriptures; and tho' ſome of his Opinions were a little peculiar, yet he has been juſtly accounted the moſt modeſt and moſt judicious of all the Apocalyptick Writers. The Foreign Vertuoſi took great Notice of him; and uſually rank'd him with the Lord Bacon and Mr. Lydyat of Oxford; and underſtanding that He and Mr. Lydyat were very meanly preferr'd, they ſaid, The Engliſh did not deſerve to have ſuch excellent Scholars, ſince they rewarded them no better. Next we ſhall mention Sir Richard Hutton, one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas, a worthy Lawyer, very conſcientious and charitable, and a great Reſpecter of the Clergy; who became more ſignally conſpicuous for giving his Judgment againſt the Legality of the Ship-Mony; with which the good King was ſo little diſoblig'd, that he ſtill continu'd to call him THE HONEST JUDGE. Shortly after him dy'd Sir Dudley Diggs, one of the great Oppoſers of the Duke of Buckingham, formerly mention'd, and ſince made Maſter of the Rolls; a Perſon of eminent Knowledge and Experience in the World, and of no leſs Virtues and amiable Qualities. He was a ſhining Example of Honour and Integrity, and it was hard to ſay, whether he was a better Father, Husband, Brother, or Friend; and his Death hapning at the very Concluſion of this Year, the wiſeſt Men have reckon'd it among the publick Calamities of theſe Times.

Mr. Mede,

Judge Hutton,

And Sir Dudley Diggs.

The Power of England.

III. I. England was now ſufficiently alarm'd by the black Appearance of the Northern Clouds, and rous'd from the Enjoyment of as full a Peace and Proſperity, as had bleſs'd any People for ſo many Years together. Yet the Nation had never leſs Reaſon to fear a Storm, if well united: The Strength of it was encreas'd both by Sea and Land, and the Revenue ſo improv'd by the preſent Lord-Treaſurer's Management, as was ſufficient for the undertaking any noble Enterprize. So there is no Queſtion, but if all of the Scotch Nation, who were Confederates in the Deſign, had appear'd in the Army, and publickly avow'd the Covenant, which in their Hearts they privately ador'd, neither the King nor Kingdom cou'd have ſuſtain'd any great Damage by them, nor the Memory of their Preſumption been preſerv'd in any thing but a more memorable Overthrow. But the too yielding King, unwilling to condemn a Nation for the Tranſgreſſion of a Part of it, and hoping to retrieve it from a general Defection by the Fidelity of a ſuperior Party, ſtill repos'd the ſame Confidence in thoſe who attended his Perſon, tho' in reality they were no better than Spies, and, as was before hinted, kept up the Spirits of their Country-men by their ſecret Intelligence.

The King's Preparations againſt Scotland.

Indeed his Majeſty had ſome Thoughts of uſing Force the laſt Year, as appears from his Letters to the Marqueſs of Hamilton, whom he adviſ'd to uſe Delays, and gain what Time he cou'd. And theſe Intentions increas'd, with the Behaviour of the Scots, till they came to a full Reſolution of raiſing an Army, to reduce thoſe turbulent Spirits, and deſtroy the Idol they had ſet up. For the carrying on of which, beſides the Money in the Exchequer, conſiderable Contributions were made by the Nobility, Judges and Officers, in which the Biſhops and Clergy were generally more liberal towards this War; ſo that the Covenanters call'd it Bellum Epiſcopale, the Biſhop's War, and publiſh'd ſeveral Libels, by which they branded the Archbiſhop of Canterbury as the firſt who adviſ'd the King for the raiſing of Arms againſt them; tho' his real Advice was for Peace, and thought the Controverſie might better be compos'd by Ink than Blood. However his Majeſty began with publiſhing a large Declaration, giving a full Account of the Scots Proceedings, and after a Proclamation, 'In 'which he inſiſted upon his many gracious Conceſſions 'and Condeſcenſions on one ſide, and their inſolent and 'rebellious Practices on the other; and takes God to wit'neſs, that he was conſtrain'd by their Treaſons to take 'Arms for the Safety of that and this Kingdom.' To this the Covenanters return'd an Anſwer, under the Title of An Ordinance of their Aſſembly, in which after a ſtrange Preamble, declaring their Reſolutions to proceed, they add, 'That for doing any Harm to England, curſed be their 'Breaſts, if they harbour'd any ſuch Thought; they there'fore implore the good Opinion of their Brethren there: 'They cite the Law Natural and Civil, which is enough 'for Defence, that the Offer of Offence or the juſt Fear 'of Offence go before, as they profeſs their Caſe, even the 'Defence of God and his Religion.

His Proclamation.

The Scots Anſwer.

The Engliſh Army.

In a ſhort time the King rais'd an Army, ſaid to be the beſt for Quality of the Perſons, Compleatneſs of Arms, Number of ſerviceable Horſe, and neceſſary Proviſions of all Sorts, that ever attended an Engliſh King in a War with Scotland. Moſt of the Nobility in Perſon waited on the King; and the Flower of the Engliſh Gentry chearfully put themſelves upon Action, upon a Confidence of getting Honour for themſelves, as well as their King or Country; of whom many were at no ſmall Expences. And not a few of the old Engliſh Commanders, who had been train'd up in the Wars of Holland and Germany, left their Employments there to ſerve their Sovereign at home, with no leſs Gallantry than Affection. The Horſe amounted to near ſix thouſand, as good as the Kingdom cou'd produce; the Foot were of a ſufficient Number, tho' not proportionable to the Horſe, ſtout and couragious, and generally well affected to the Cauſe. Beſides which the King had a powerful Fleet, with a Body of three thouſand Men on Board, who were to deſtroy the Scotch Trade, and make all proper Attempts upon their Lands. The Earl of Arundel was made General, whoſe Character has been already given, a Hater of the Scots, and the Puritans, but neither of a warlike Diſpoſition, or Experience; yet of that high Rank, that no Man cou'd decline ſerving under him. The Earl of Eſſex, the moſt popular Man in the Kingdom, and the Favourite of the Sword-men, was made Lieutenant-General; who between Hatred and Contempt of the Scotch Nation, proceeded with great Alacrity. And the Earl of Holland, by the Queen's Mediation, was declar'd General of the Horſe, contrary to the Inclination of the Earl of Eſſex, who had rather have choſen that Poſt himſelf. But the greateſt Truſt, the Fleet, was committed to the Marqueſs of Hamilton, who particularly promis'd ſo to viſit his Country-men on their Coaſts, as that they ſhou'd find little Eaſe or Security in their Habitations, as Sir Philip Warwick aſſures us. Here was a Force ſufficient to have trampled all Scotland under their Feet, at this Juncture, and to have made an abſolute Conqueſt of the Nation. But there appear'd no Reſolution in the King for ſuch an Attempt, or for any Bloodſhed, only that the Terror of his Arms he hop'd wou'd reduce the Scots to Obedience. And afterwards, when ſome took Occaſion to mention the Earl of Holland's Infidelity to the King, his Majeſty reply'd, That if that Army had been in earneſt, he wou'd have choſen other Commanders.

The ſeveral Commanders.

A ſtrange Omen.

At the King's leaving the Court for this Expedition, there hapned a very ſtrange Accident, which was then, as well as ſince, interpreted as a fatal Omen: There was a Statue or Buſto of the King's Majeſty, grav'd by the famous Hand of Cavaliero Bernini at Rome, a Perſon who had never ſeen the King, but had done it from ſome excellent Draughts of Vandike's Pencil, and ſo much to the Life, that it exceeded all Imitation. This ſtanding in a Room of the King's Store-Yard at Greenwich, upon his Majeſty's Journey, was order'd to be remov'd, and carry'd into the Queen's Buildings, then near finiſh'd: In the Way thither, a Swallow, or ſome other Bird, flying over it, dung'd in three places upon the very Face of the Statue, which was ſurpriſingly converted into three Drops of Blood, that by no cleanſing cou'd be got out. But more ominous were the Words of the ſame Bernini, an excellent Phyſiognomiſt as well as Statuary, who viewing the Draughts from Vandike, without being inform'd whoſe Face it was, told the Meſſenger that brought them, He was ſure the Perſon, there repreſented, was born to great Honour, and certainly to as great Misfortune. But what may ſtill be thought more ominous, or more unfortunate, was his not following the Advice of his old experienc'd Counſellor Archbiſhop Spotſwood, who coming to take leave of his Majeſty at this time, we are told that he left theſe three Advertiſements at his going. 'Firſt, That he wou'd ſuffer none of the Scotiſh 'Nation to remain in the Army; aſſuring him, They wou'd 'never fight againſt their Country-men, but rather hazard 'the whole Army by their Tergiverſation. Secondly, That 'he would make a Catalogue of all his Counſellors, Hou'ſhold Officers, and Domeſtick Servants; and then with 'his Pen expunge all the Scots, beginning firſt with himſelf, 'the Archbiſhop who had given the Counſel; conceiving, 'That no Man wou'd accuſe his Majeſty of Partiality, when 'they found the Archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, who ſo many 'Years had ſerv'd his Father and himſelf, expung'd among 'the reſt. Thirdly, He muſt not hope to win upon them 'by Condeſcenſions, Sweetneſſes, or Acts of Grace; but 'ſhou'd reſolve to reduce them to their Duty, by ſuch 'Ways of Power as God had put into his Hands.' The Reaſon of which Counſel was, becauſe he had found by ſixty Years ſad Experience, That they were generally a People ſo ſtubborn, That they were gain'd by Puniſhments, and loſt by Favours.

Archbiſhop Spotſwood's Advice to the King.

2. With theſe differing Proſpects, the unfortunate King began his March upon the Anniverſary of his Inauguration, the twenty ſeventh of March, and within a few Days arriv'd at York, with a glorious Attendance of Nobility and Gentry. Here was the general Rendezvous of his Army, which look'd more like the Pomp and Parade of an Eaſtern Prince, than the Expedition of an Engliſh Monarch. If there had been none in the March but Warriors, in all Probability an honourable Peace wou'd ſoon have been brought about; but the Progreſs was more illuſtrious than the March, and the Soldiers were the leaſt Part of the Army, and the leaſt conſulted. But the King more deſign'd the Pomp of his Preparations, than the Strength of them, and did ſtill hope that the One wou'd ſave the Labour of the Other; preſuming that the Splendor of ſuch a viſible Appearance of the Nobility, wou'd repreſent ſuch an Union, as wou'd at once terrify and reduce the Scots. This did no ways anſwer his Expectations, but, as the Lord Clarendon obſerves, it was his fatal Misfortune, which proceeded from the Excellency of his Nature, and his Tenderneſs of Blood, that he ſo long deferr'd his Reſolution of uſing his Arms; and after he had taken that Reſolution, it was not proſecuted with more Vigour.

The King meets his Army at York.

Some Inconveniencies and bad Proſpects at York.

The Inconveniencies of theſe Delays, and of ſuch a Conflux of People, ſoon began to appear at York, where his Majeſty found it neceſſary to ſtay ſome Days. The Court was too numerous to be left to its own Liberty, and the Multitude of the Scots in it rais'd great Offence and Jealouſie to all ſorts of Perſons, who had too juſtly believ'd that the King was every Day betray'd; their uſual Diſcourſe being a Magnifying the good Intentions of their Country-men, and their Duty to their King, or an undervaluing the Power and Intereſt of thoſe who diſcover'd themſelves againſt the Church. They inſinuated to the Engliſh Lords the Dangers they wou'd bring upon themſelves by the Pride and Tyranny of the Biſhops, if the Scots were ſubdu'd; and ſo mitigated the Diſpleaſure of ſome, and took off the Edge of others, that they did not leave York the ſame Men they came thither. The Earls of Roxborough and Traquair are ſaid to have been deeply concern'd in theſe double Dealings. The former was accus'd for his Correſpondence with the Covenanters, and his ſaying to ſome Engliſh Noblemen, That the Ruin of the Scotch Army wou'd enable the King to command more in England, than they wou'd be willing to obey. The latter was accus'd by the Scotch Biſhops, and others, for his treacherous Deportment in Scotland. But his Majeſty was very unwilling to harken to any Complaints of that Nature; therefore only gave them a ſlight Confinement, and diſmiſs'd them.

However he ſoon diſcover'd that the Engliſh Lords were much alter'd, and their Zeal againſt the Scots much cool'd and abated: Therefore for the better ſecuring and uniting his Party, it was thought fit by the whole Body of the Council, that a ſhort Proteſtation ſhou'd be drawn, in which all Men ſhou'd upon Oath 'profeſs their Loyalty and O'bedience to his Majeſty, and diſclaim and renounce the ‘ having any Intelligence, or holding any Correſpondence ‘ with the Enemy.’ Many thought that none of the Engliſh nor the Scotch wou'd refuſe this Proteſtation, and conſequently there wou'd be no Diſcovery from that Teſt; but there they were deceiv'd: For tho' the Scots took it to a Man, without wounding their Conſcience, or reforming their Behaviour; yet among the Engliſh Nobility, the Lord Say and the Lord Brook, two Popular Men, undevoted both to the Church and Government, abſolutely refus'd it in the King's own Preſence, declaring That it was againſt the Law to impoſe any Oaths or Proteſtations, which were not enjoyn'd by the Law; therefore, that they might not betray the common Liberty, they wou'd not ſubmit to it. This occaſion'd Matter of new Diſpute at a very unſeaſonable Time. They were firſt committed to the Sheriffs of York, and afterwards interrogated upon certain Articles touching their Approbation, or Diſlike of the War; to which their Anſwers were ſo doubtful and unſatisfactory, that his Majeſty thought it ſafer for him to diſmiſs them to their own Houſes. And the better to ſatisfy the People in general, before he left York, the King was graciouſly pleas'd to recall and diſcharge thoſe Patents and Monopolies, that were moſt diſtaſteful to the Nation.

Two Lords refuſe it.

The Earl of Eſſex*'s good Behaviour.*

3. As to the carrying on of the War, the Lieutenant General, the Earl of Eſſex, was detach'd with a Body of Horſe and Foot to ſecure the Town of Berwick, which the King was inform'd wou'd be ſpeedily garriſon'd by the Scots. Which as he chearfully undertook, ſo he courageouſly perform'd it, notwithſtanding all the Terrors and Damps he daily met in his March. For being encounter'd by ſeveral Scotch Noblemen, then going to York, they us'd all Methods to diſſuade him from the Attempt, aſſuring him, ‘ That either the Scots wou'd be in the Town before ‘ him, or that their whole Army wou'd be ſo near, that his ‘ further Progreſs wou'd expoſe him to inevitable Ruin.’ Theſe Advertiſements caus'd him to quicken his Marches, inſomuch that he reach'd Berwick, and enter'd it without the leaſt Oppoſition, ſooner than he firſt deſign'd; and by all the Enquiries he made, he cou'd not diſcover that any of their Forces had been drawn that Way, nor indeed had they then any conſiderable Body of Men together, nearer than Edinburgh. Being poſſeſs'd of this Poſt, the Earl immediately inform'd the King of the Intelligence he had receiv'd from ſuch conſiderable Men then with him at York, who juſtly deſerv'd to be ſuſpected for publiſhing ſuch groſs Falſhoods. But they ſtill perſiſted in the ſame Reports, and ſeem'd confident that the Earl was defeated, and his Party cut off; and yet they underwent no other Reproach, than that their Fears had multiply'd the Sight and Proſpect, and that they had been frighted by other Men's Relations: Which Remiſſneſs, or ſomething worſe, was an ill Omen of the Diſcipline likely to be obſerv'd.

As the Scots were approaching, they ſent humble and inſinuating Letters to his Majeſty, proteſting ‘ the Loyalty of their Hearts and Affections, and that they deſir'd ‘ nothing but to be admitted into the Preſence of their ‘ gracious Sovereign, to lay their Grievances at his Royal ‘ Feet, and leave the Determination of them to his own ‘ Wiſdom and Pleaſure.’ By which they gain'd their Ends both as to Time and Popularity, and even Pity from their Enemies. But during theſe ſubmiſſive Appearances, their Preparations ſo increas'd, that the King thought it neceſſary to march towards the Borders of Scotland, by Newcaſtle to Berwick, where the General had the Army drawn up in Battalia; and the King march'd at the Head of them, till he came near the Tweed, two Miles Weſt from Berwick, in an open Field call'd The Berks, where he encamp'd, and lodg'd in his Tent with the Army.

The King advances to the Borders of Scotland.

Upon the thirtieth of May, the King had Intelligence that General Leſley, with about ſix thouſand Men, was quarter'd at Dunce, a Town about ſeven Miles diſtant from the Engliſh Camp. Upon which the Earl of Holland was order'd to march towards them with three thouſand Horſe, and two thouſand Foot; and coming thither, he found the Scots drawn up on the Side of a Hill, where the Front cou'd be only in View, with great Herds of Cattle at a Diſtance upon the Hills on either Side; A Stratagem of Leſley, to cauſe the Appearance of a formidable Body, when he had not above three thouſand Men, ill arm'd, and ordinary Fellows, brought thus together for a Show. The Earl of Holland, having by ill Fortune his Foot and Artillery three or four Miles behind, was ſo terrify'd with the Apparition of the Scotch Army, that he ſent Orders to his Foot, not to advance, and made his Retreat towards them; and thus, when he had the Opportunity of finiſhing the War, he moſt ingloriouſly return'd to the King's Camp; with another Misfortune of having quarrell'd with the Earl of Newcaſtle, which afterwards produc'd a Challenge. Which mock Attempt was ſeconded by another of no better Conduct or Succeſs: For two Days after, Information being brought that the Scots were about ſix Miles Diſtance at Kelſo, with only fifteen hundred Men, it was reſolv'd in a Council of War to ſend a Detachment towards them. Upon which the Earl of Holland with a Body of two thouſand Horſe, and as many Foot, march'd again over the River Tweed towards Kelſoe, and with his Horſe came within Sight of the Enemy, while the Foot was ſtill three Miles behind. The Scots immediately drew up their Forces to ſo much Advantage and Surpriſe, that the Engliſh General again retreated to his Foot, and ſo peaceably return'd once more to the Camp. Theſe two Salleys of Bravery, ſo ſtrange and unaccountable, gave great Diſcouragement to the King's Army, by keeping them from the Glory and the Reward of Action; and made the Scots more bold and daring, when they found it was likely to be no otherwiſe than the Jeſt of a War.

The Earl of Holland's inglorious Attempt.

A Second as ill.

Car. 15.

The Expedition at Sea, under the Marqueſs of Hamilton, where much was promis'd, met with no better Succeſs. His firſt Arrival with twenty large Men of War, rais'd no ſmall Terror, being in the Road of Leith, and near the Capital City; ſo that the Lord Aboyn took the Field with the Gordons, and other Anti-Covenanters in the North, and ſent an Invitation to the Marqueſs, that he wou'd be pleas'd to employ his Land Soldiers to join with them, which his Lordſhip refus'd. The Fortifications of Leith were carry'd on with a Multitude of Hands of all Sorts, and none were more buſie in bearing the Rubbiſh than Ladies of Honour. But they found no Occaſion for Reſiſtance: For the Marqueſs having anchor'd his Fleet in the Frith, and landing ſome of his ſpent Men in a little Iſland, to give them ſome Breath and Refreſhment, receiv'd a Viſit from his Mother, a moſt rigid Covenanter; which caus'd the Scots on Shore to ſay with no ſmall Laughter, They knew the Son of ſo gude a Mother cou'd never hurt them. And ſo it prov'd; for he ſpent his Time in a fruitleſs Correſpondence with the Earl of Rothes, the Lord Lindſey, the Lord Lowdon, and other great Covenanters, and with ſome of them in a very ſuſpicious Manner. Theſe ſo inſiſted upon their Rights and Privileges, and ſo much extoll'd their Power, that the Marqueſs ſoon poſſeſs'd the King of the Dangers of further Hoſtilities: So that indeed all Things unhappily conſpir'd to loſe the Opportunity of Honour and Succeſs in this Royal Expedition. The Memoirs of his Life give a fair Account of the Marqueſs's Proceedings, and the attending Difficulties at this Time; but Biſhop Guthry, who probably knew more of the Caſe, plainly condemns his Conduct, and further tells us, it particularly wrought upon the Earl of Montroſs, who now entertain'd further Jealouſies of his Ways than before. In which Caſe, Sir James Turner ſeems to have made no ſufficient Vindication.

The Marqueſs of Hamilton has no Succeſs.

4. Thus ſtood the King's Affairs in Relation to the Scots; the Generals and Admiral were indifferent, or rather complaiſant in their Proceedings; the Common Soldiers and Sea-men were ſick and weary of the Mock-Show; the Courtiers and Council thought it wiſer not to carry Things to Extremity, while there were any Hopes of Submiſſion. All which gave ſo great Incouragement to the Scots, that they diſpers'd their Letters abroad amongſt the Noblemen at Court, eſpecially three, which they directed to the three Generals, Arundel, Eſſex and Holland. That to the Earl of Eſſex was more ſubmiſſive than the others: They repreſented to him, ‘ That they had not the leaſt ‘ Thought of engaging in a War againſt England, their ‘ chiefeſt Hope being to defend their own Rights and Liber- ‘ ties; and how deſirous they were the Earl ſhou'd under- ‘ ſtand their main Grievance, was the Intereſt of the Marqueſs ‘ of Hamilton; who they knew was in no Degree accep- ‘ table to the Earl, and therefore, They begg'd they might ‘ by his Means be admitted to his Majeſty's Preſence.’ The Earl, who was a punctual Man in Points of Honour, ſent this Letter to King his Maſter without returning any Anſwer, or entertaining the Meſſengers with any Conference, or the leaſt Ceremony. But the Earls of Arundel and Holland gave another Sort of Reception to the Letters they receiv'd: The firſt us'd them with greater Reſpect than was agreeable to the Office of a General; and the latter was, from that Time at leaſt, found inclinable enough to their Intereſt. By theſe Means they had a ſhort and hopeful Proſpect of having their Petition graciouſly receiv'd by his Majeſty.

The Scots take Courage, and write to the Engliſh Generals.

They had from the Beginning obſerv'd a ſubtle and peculiar Stile in their Addreſſes, in which under the Liberty of accuſing the Behaviour of Others, whom they did not name, they virulently reproach'd the immediate Directions of the King Himſelf; and at the ſame time made the moſt ſolemn Profeſſions of Duty to his Majeſty's Perſon. On the other Side the King was ſo tender of their Caſe, that he was more ready to receive their Petition, than they to offer it. As he declin'd all Bloodſhed, ſo he refus'd to inflict any Puniſhment, to the infinite Miſchief of Himſelf and Others afterward. So that when a well experienc'd Commander offer'd him, That with two Thouſand Horſe, he wou'd ſo waſte and ſpoil the Country, That the Scots ſhou'd creep upon their Bellies to implore his Mercy, he wou'd by no Means hearken to the Propoſition. As the Lord Clarendon obſerves, it was the King's Misfortune at this Time not to have one Perſon about him of his Council who had the leaſt Regard to his Honour, or any Friendſhip for thoſe who ſat at the Helm, excepting the young Duke of Lenox, a Perſon of ſmall Experience, tho' of true Honour, and very good Parts. The reſt who were in any Offices of Attendance, were the Earl of Holland, formerly Characteriz'd, One who neither lov'd the Marqueſs of Hamilton, nor the Lord Wentworth, nor the Archbiſhop, nor hardly any Thing then done in Church or State. Secretary Cook was near eighty Years of Age, who knew nothing of the Affairs of Scotland, and thought nothing there worth the preſent Expedition. Sir Henry Vane was Comptroller of the Houſhold, a buſy plodding Man, who car'd for no Man further than he found it convenient for his own Intereſt. The Earl of Arundel had much of that Temper, and thought he had been General long enough. The Earl of Pembroke lov'd Hunting and Hawking too well, not to favour all Overtures towards an Accommodation. So that the Scots found Perſons enough to mediate according to their own Deſire. Only the brave Earl of Eſſex ſtill preſerv'd his Exactneſs and Grandeur; nor wou'd he hold any Correſpondence with the Scotch Commiſſioners till the Pacification was concluded.

The King's Eaſineſs and Miſfortune.

On the other hand the Covenanters continu'd firm to their Principle, and juſtify'd all they had done, 'Deſiring thoſe might be ſeverely puniſh'd, who had miſrepreſented them to the King, and that ſome noble Lords might be nam'd to treat upon all Particulars.' Upon this Submiſſion only, Commiſſioners were appointed to treat of a Pacification, the Earls of Pembroke, Holland, Saliſbury and Berkſhire, with Sir Henry Vane and Secretary Cook on the King's Side; and on the Other Party, the Earls of Rothes and Dumferlin, the Lord Lowdon, Douglas Sheriff of Tividale, and two Inferior Perſons, Mr. Henderſon and Mr. Johnſon. But the Earl of Arundel was principal Commiſſioner for the King, in whoſe Tent the Treaty was manag'd; where the King unexpectedly appear'd in Perſon, which put ſuch a Reſtraint upon the Mouths of his Commiſſioners, that ſcarce any of them wou'd ſpeak, but the Earls of Pembroke and Saliſbury, who began highly to court the Scots. This is look'd upon by Sir Edward Walker as one of the Infelicities of this Expedition; who thinks that the King's Abſence might have procur'd a Peace more laſting, or a War more ſucceſsful.

Commiſſioners appointed for a Treaty.

A Pacification agreed.

After five or ſix Days Debates, the Commiſſioners on both Sides came to this Concluſion on the Seventeenth Day of June, Firſt, 'That his Majeſty ſhou'd confirm whatever his high Commiſſioner had granted in his Name, and that from thenceforth all Matters Eccleſiaſtical ſhou'd be determin'd by the Aſſemblies of the Kirk, and all Matters Civil by the Parliament: And to that End a General Aſſembly ſhou'd be Indicted on the ſixth of Auguſt, where his Majeſty deſign'd to be in Perſon, and a Parliament on the twentieth of the ſame Month; in which Parliament an Act of Oblivion ſhou'd paſs, for the common Peace and Satisfaction of all Parties.' Next the Scots were to agree to ſeven Articles, the Subſtance of which were, 'That upon Publication of this Declaration, they ſhou'd within forty eight Hours diſband all their Forces, diſcharge all their Tables and Meetings, and reſtore to the King all his Caſtles, Forts and Ammunition of all Sorts. The like Reſtitution was to be made to all his good Subjects, of the Liberties, Lands, Houſes, Goods and Means whatſoever, taken and detain'd from them ſince the firſt Day of November: That thereupon his Majeſty ſhou'd immediately recall his Fleet, withdraw his Land Forces, and cauſe Reſtitution to be made to all Perſons of their Ships and Goods detain'd and arreſted ſince the firſt of February.' On the following Day theſe were ſign'd on both Sides, a few Hours before the Arrival of the Marqueſs of Hamilton, ſo that he cou'd not well ſhare either in the Honour, or the Odium.

The Articles.

Very diſhonourable on the King's Side.

Such was the Concluſion of this unaccountable Pacification, after a three Months War without Bloodſhed: In which the chief Grounds of the Conteſt, the Proceedings of the Aſſembly at Glaſcow, were left at large and undecided. Had it been inviolably obſerv'd, it might have been happy, but not honourable on the King's Side; but He ſoon found that his Army was diſbanded without a Peace made, and that the Scots were equally inclin'd, and more in Power, to affront him than before. Sure Nothing but the moſt tender Regard to Mens Lives cou'd induce a Prince at the Head of ſuch an Army, to allow ſuch uncertain Submiſſions, and ſo ſuddenly to diſband all his Forces. The Earl of Holland, who ſeem'd moſt backward in this Expedition, cou'd not but diſapprove of this, who ſoon after told the Archbiſhop, That his Majeſty ſo ſuddenly diſſolv'd his Army, that every Body wonder'd at it: That for his Part he was ſo ſorry, eſpecially for the Horſe, which were as good as any in Chriſtendom, that he offer'd to keep one Thouſand of them for a Year at his own and his Friends Charges, till the King might ſee all Things well ſettled again in Scotland.

IV. 1. England now began to have the happy Appearance of a Calm, and for a while the Clouds ſeem to have been diſpers'd; tho' a blacker Storm was ſtill gathering both at home and abroad. The unfortunate Effects of the Expedition ſoon diſcover'd Themſelves in England; and the Calamities that befel the King upon this ſtrange Treaty, are not to be expreſs'd; who was ſo in haſte, that he diſbanded the Army with the moſt diſobliging Circumſtances. The Gentry, who with great Charge had engag'd themſelves, in hopes of gaining Honour to their King, Country or Themſelves, were ſuddenly diſmiſs'd, without the Honour they aim'd at, or any Acknowledgement of their Love and Loyalty: A Thing ſo ungrateful to them, that few of them appear'd in the next Year's Army, and many of them turn'd againſt him in the following Troubles. The Earl of Eſſex, who had committed no falſe Step, either in Counſel or Action, was diſcharg'd in the Crowd, without ordinary Ceremony; and ſhortly after was unreaſonably refus'd the Command of Needwood Foreſt, which lying at his Door, wou'd have infinitely gratify'd him: All which inflam'd his high Nature, and expos'd him to the Power of ſome Impreſſions afterwards, which otherwiſe wou'd not have found ſo eaſy an Admiſſion. The Factions and Fewds at Court were rather greater that before: And the Earl of Newcaſtle, Governour to the Prince, who had at his own Charge brought in a brave Troop of Horſe againſt the Scots, had been ſo affronted in the Order of his March by the Earl of Holland, that he now ſent him a Challenge; and the King upon Notice was forc'd to interpoſe his own Authority, but to the Satiſfaction of neither Party. The Marqueſs of Hamilton alſo was more and more afraid of his Country-Men, and enter'd upon dark Deſigns that render'd him ſuſpected on all Sides.

Several unhappy Steps.

The King very uneaſy and much troubled.

Theſe Things made a deep Impreſſion upon the King, who grew very melancholy, and ſoon found he had loſt Reputation both at home and abroad; and thoſe Counſellors that had been moſt blameable, ſhifted every Man the Fault from himſelf, and found ſome Friend or other to excuſe him. But it being requiſite ſo infamous a Matter ſhou'd not be bury'd in abſolute Oblivion, it fell to old Secretary Cook's Turn to be made the Sacrifice, a Perſon then very little regarded. He being diſmiſs'd, upon the Pretence of ſome Errors or Omiſſions, Sir Henry Vane the Comptroller, by Hamilton's fatal Contrivance, and the powerful Influence of the Queen, was made Secretary of State. And this again gave Occaſion to an unſeaſonable Diſpleaſure in the Queen afterwards againſt the Deputy Wentworth, who out of Kindneſs to the old Man, then near eighty Years of Age, and Hatred to Vane, but chiefly out of Deſire of ſome greater Expiation for ſuch a Miſcarriage, oppos'd it ſo vigorouſly, as drove the Queen to the Exerciſe of her full Power to effect it; which afterwards produc'd many dangerous Miſchiefs. So that by means of this unhappy Pacification, the Flame that firſt broke out in Scotland, kindled many Fires in England, both in the Court and Country.

New Inſolencies among the Scots.

2. As to the Scots, from whom all Peace and Calmneſs might have been expected, notwithſtanding their ſpecious Pretences for Religion and Liberty, and their Promiſes, That they wou'd ever in all Things carry themſelves like humble and loyal Subjects, they ſoon diſcover'd the Weakneſs, and Inſignificancy of this New Treaty. For no ſooner had the King diſbanded his Army, but the Scots openly proteſted againſt the Pacification, and in very ſeditious and diſhonourable Terms reflected both upon It and his Majeſty; and likewiſe publiſh'd a turbulent Paper, entitul'd, Some Conditions of his Majeſty's Treaty with his Subjects of Scotland, before the Engliſh Nobility, &c. ſo falſe and ſcandalous, that it was afterwards by the King and Council order'd to be burnt by the Common Hangman; which occaſion'd a fooliſh miſtaken Report, that the Agreement it ſelf was burnt. Nor did they, according to the firſt Article, diſband their Forces; for tho' they diſmiſs'd ſome, yet ſeveral Bodies were ſtill kept in Being, and all their Officers in Pay: The Caſtle of Edinburgh was deliver'd up, but the Fortifications of Leith were ſtill continu'd, and Garriſon'd by Themſelves, contrary to the ſecond and ſixth Articles. Nor, according to the fifth Article, did they diſſolve their former Tables of illegal Councils and Meetings, that ſo much derogated from the King's Honour and Authority. Moreover they enforc'd the Subjects to ſubſcribe to all the Concluſions in their late Aſſembly at Glaſcow, tho' contrary to the King's Proclamation; and were ſo far from reſtoring the King's Friends to their Liberties and Profeſſions, according to the fourth Article, that they branded them with the Name of Incendiaries and Traytors to God and their Country, and charg'd them with greater Taxes for the Payment of their Army. In ſum, they ſhew'd ſo general a Hatred and Diſſatisfaction, that they kept not one Article of the Pacification, and declin'd no Ways or Means, tho' never ſo falſe or diſhonourable, that might bring the King into Diſgrace or Odium among the People. And many of his Council and great Miniſters, who formerly did not defend their riotous Proceedings, now began freely to eſpouſe their Intereſt, and became Heads of their Party; particularly the Earl of Argyle, who ow'd his Protection from the Fury of his incens'd Father, to his Majeſty's ſole Power and Kindneſs.

Their unfair Dealings with the King.

The Beginnings of theſe further Troubles being made known to the King, before his leaving the North, he requir'd Twelve of their Chiefs to repair to his Court at Berwick, with whom he might conſult about the Way of his coming there to hold the General Aſſembly and Parliament in Perſon. Theſe were the Earls of Argyle, Rothes, Montroſs, Lothian, Caſſels and Dumferling, the Lords Lindſey and Lowdon, Sir William Douglaſs and Mr. Henderſon, Mr. Johnſon and Mr. Edgar. Of theſe only ſeven appear'd, Rothes, Montroſs, Lothian, Douglaſs, Johnſon and Edgar; who kiſſing the King's Hand, were commanded to ſend back Poſt for the reſt. Which being done, they prepar'd and took Horſe, but had contriv'd the Buſineſs, that before they cou'd leave Edinburgh, Multitudes were met to ſtop them, upon Pretence that if they went, they wou'd be all detain'd Priſoners. Whereupon the Lord Lowdon wrote an Excuſe to the King, who being diſoblig'd, he diſmiſs'd thoſe who were with him, upon a particular Promiſe that they wou'd return and bring the reſt along with them. But being got to the City, the Matter was debated, and reſolv'd that it was not ſafe for them to go; and thereupon Lindſey and Lowdon were ſent to the King to excuſe their Appearance. This ſo provok'd his Majeſty, to be thus ſhamefully diſtruſted, that inſtead of coming to Edinburgh to hold the enſuing Aſſembly and Parliament in Perſon, upon the 29th of July, he left Berwick, and took his Journey for London. This caus'd new Exclamations from the Covenanters, who readily imputed it to ſome Advertiſement from the Queen and the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the latter of whom they call'd The great Firebrand: Tho', as he ſays in his own Hiſtory, many of them had warm'd themſelves at him, yet he had never fir'd any of them. They took him for their greateſt Enemy; yet he there ſolemnly declares, That the Scottiſh Nation in General, the City of Edinburgh in Special, very many particular Men of good Worth, and ſome Men of Honour, beſides Clergy-men of all Sorts; had been more beholden to Him, than to any Ten Engliſh Subjects, of what Rank and Condition ſoever.

A General Aſſembly at Edinburgh

3· The Time approaching for the Meeting of the General Aſſembly, in the Room of the Marqueſs of Hamilton the King appointed the Earl of Traquair for his Commiſſioner, the Lord Treaſurer often mention'd, whom Sir Philip Warwick accounts the moſt verſatile Man in Scotland; and others worſe. The Aſſembly being ſat, according to the appointed Time, and Mr. Dick being Moderator, and aſſiſted by Henderſon, they proceeded to confirm all that had been agreed in the Aſſembly at Glaſcow, namely the utter Extirpation of Epiſcopacy, the aboliſhing the five Articles of Perth, the High-Commiſſion, the Liturgy and Book of Canons; and likewiſe ratify'd the Covenant, ordaining it to be ſworn to and ſubſcrib'd by all the Members in the Kingdom. All this was compleated in a few Days, and receiv'd the Conſent of his Majeſty's Commiſſioner. In Concluſion, they fix'd the Divinity Profeſſors for the four Univerſities, Mr. Adamſon, for Edinburgh; Mr. Rutherford, ſupported by Mr. Blair, for St. Andrews; Mr. Dick for Glaſcow, and Mr. Cant for Aberdeen. Theſe were all Men of great Zeal, and the placing of them in the Univerſities, in proceſs of Time prov'd the moſt effectual Support of the Cauſe: For when the young Men, who had their Education under them, came to be Miniſters in the Church, they prov'd incomparably furious, and ſo far outvy'd the elder Men of their own Perſuaſion, that if any of them hapned to incline towards Moderation, they were reckon'd Laodicean Politicians, &c. And, as Guthry ſays, the Madneſs of the Time was ſuch, that thoſe who were moſt cruel, were moſt cry'd up.

A Parliament at the ſame Place.

Upon the breaking up of the Aſſembly, the Parliament met on the 31ſt of Auguſt; where, becauſe the Aſſembly's aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy had deſtroy'd one of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom, they were at a Loſs how to proceed according to Rule, in which the conſtant Method was this: The King having firſt nominated eight Biſhops, thoſe Biſhops elected eight Noblemen, thoſe Noblemen eight Barons, and thoſe Barons as many Burgeſſes; and all theſe, with eight Officers of the Crown, made up a ſelect Committee of Forty, whoſe Buſineſs was to prepare Things for the Parliament: This had been the Uſage and Cuſtom for near three hundred Years, and theſe were call'd The Lords of the Articles: But now this antient Cuſtom was laid aſide, by the Abſence of the Biſhops, who were not permitted to act or ſit; yet upon the Motion of the Commiſſioner it was granted, that not to prejudice his Majeſty's Right, he ſhou'd now have the Election of eight Noblemen inſtead of the eight Biſhops uſually nominated, and for the future every State ſhou'd chuſe their own Commiſſioners. Thus at once they deſtroy'd the firſt Eſtate of the Kingdom, ſo eſſential to the Conſtitution; and then having ratify'd the Acts of the Aſſembly, they proceeded to the Act of Oblivion; but inſtead of that urg'd that an Act for Juſtification of all their Actions might be recorded in Parliament. Which being done, they proceeded to high Demands from the King; 'That the Coin, a Prerogative peculiar to the Crown, ſhou'd not be manag'd but by Advice of Parliament; That no Foreigner ſhou'd have Command of their Caſtles; no Honour granted to any Stranger, but ſuch as had a competent Eſtate in Scotland, and that Commiſſioners of Juſticiary or Lieutenancy ſhou'd have Power but for a limited Time.' The King having notice of theſe and other Exorbitancies, deſign'd to eclipſe his Royal Authority, he ſent ſpeedy Orders to his Commiſſioner Traquair to prorogue their Sitting till June in the next Year. Upon the Earl's acquainting the Houſe with his Majeſty's Command, they immediately proteſted againſt it, declaring it invalid and of no Force, and without Precedent, that the Commiſſioner ſhou'd by a private Warrant prorogue the Sitting of a Parliament: Yet for the preſent they reſolv'd to make Remonſtrance to his Majeſty, and that ſome of each Eſtate ſhou'd ſtill remain at Edinburgh to attend his Anſwer.

Their high Demands.

They ſend Deputies to London.

Accordingly they ſent the Earl of Dumferlin, and the Lord Lowdon, as their Deputies to the King; but they coming without Warrant from his Majeſty's Commiſſioners, were the firſt time ſent back without Audience. After which they return'd with two more, Sir William Douglaſs and Sir Robert Berkley; and their Buſineſs was to plead Integrity, and to demonſtrate their Fidelity, but were not impower'd to propoſe any Particulars towards a Mediation to the King's Satisfaction. At their Arrival at London, Whitelock tells us they had great Reſort to them, and many ſecret Councils held with them by the diſcontented Engliſh, chiefly by thoſe who were no Friends to Biſhops, or had ſuffer'd in the late Cenſures in the Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, and other Judicatories. Thoſe alſo who were inclin'd to a Republick, had great Correſpondence with them; and they courted all, fomented every Diſcontent, and made large and religious Promiſes of Future happy Times. He further informs us, that the Earls of Eſſex, Bedford, and Holland, the Lord Say, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen, of great Intereſt and Quality, were deep in with them. They were likewiſe further incourag'd by a ſtrange Artifice of ſome of the Engliſh, as we are told from the Memoirs of Duke Hamilton, That an Engliſh Nobleman, not nam'd, went to the Scotch Lords Dumferlin and Lowdon, and with great Vehemence preſs'd them to a new War, and among other Motives brought them Engagements in Writing from moſt of the greateſt Peers in England, to joyn with them, and aſſiſt them when they ſhou'd come into England with an Army. This did highly animate them, and had an extraordinary Effect afterwards; yet all this the next Year was diſcover'd to be a direct Forgery. The Memoirs do not mention the Contrivers Names; but Dr. Wellwood, who relates the Story with ſome Variations, ſays it was the Lord Savile, afterwards made Earl of Suſſex; which likewiſe agrees with the Memoirs of the Earl of Mancheſter. But to return to the Scotch Deputies, who being commanded to attend a Committee at an appointed Time, reſented the Thing, and did not think themſelves oblig'd to treat with any but the King only. Upon which his Majeſty vouchſaf'd his Preſence in the ſaid Committee, where the Lord Lowdon, a bold Speaker, began with declaring 'The Independency of the Crown of Scotland, and juſtify'd the Tranſactions of the Aſſembly and Parliament; That they were according to the Articles of Pacification, and Laws and Cuſtoms of the Nation; therefore they deſir'd a Ratification of their Proceedings, and that the Parliament might go on to determine of all Bills for Settlement of Religion, Peace, &c.' Having finiſh'd his Speech, their Commiſſion was examin'd by the Council, and found not at all obligatory to thoſe that ſent them; yet an imperfect Paper was produc'd, authorizing Dumferlin and Lowdon, which was at length accepted. Yet they were ſoon check'd, for after they had inſiſted upon their foreſaid Requeſts, their Treaſons were ſumm'd up to them, and a Letter produc'd by the King, wherein they petition'd for Aid of the French, and endeavour'd to invade theſe Kingdoms with a Foreign Enemy. This Letter, tho' written by a ſecret Juncto, and managed with all poſſible Secrecy, fell into the King's Hands. It was directed to the French King, with this Title, Au Roy, a Stile only uſ'd from Subjects to their natural King, and ſubſcrib'd Rothes, Montroſs, Leſley, Marr, Montgomery, Lowdon, Forreſter: In which they addreſs'd to his Majeſty, 'As the Refuge 'and Sanctuary of afflicted Princes and States, moſt humbly beſeeching him to give Faith and Credit to Mr. Colvil, whom they had ſent to repreſent the Candour and 'Ingenuity of their Proceedings, and to aſſure Themſelves 'of an Aſſiſtance ſuitable to his wonted Clemency.' This was found to be Lowdon's own Hand, who being examin'd, refus'd to give any other Anſwer than, That it was writ before the Agreement, and thereupon reſerv'd and never ſent; That if he had committed any Offence, he ought to be queſtion'd for it in Scotland, and not in England; therefore, upon his ſafe Conduct, he expected his Liberty to return. But this Treaſon and bold Excuſe of it rais'd ſuch an Abhorrence in the King's Council, that He and Colvil were both ſecur'd, and the firſt committed to the Tower; and had they been brought to a ſpeedy Tryal, it might have ſtruck Terror in the Scots, and render'd their Proceedings more odious to all the World.

Lowdon and Colvil ſecur'd.

But they daily gather'd Strength both at Home and Abroad. At Home, where the People were ſo fluſh'd with the Hopes of what was to be done for them, that their Lives and Fortunes were now at their Leaders Service; and the Tide was ſo impetuous, that moſt of the King's Privy Council, and great Miniſters fell into the Faction: And when part of the Walls of Edinburgh Caſtle fell down on the 19th of November, the King's Birth-Day, not without ſome Preſage of his future Misfortunes, they wou'd neither ſuffer Timber nor any Materials to be carry'd to repair it. Abroad they enter'd into Correſpondence with Holland, and obtain'd Credit for Arms and Ammunition, and were alſo raiſing Men in Germany and Sweden; but in France they met with ſpecial Encouragement, from whence the great Cardinal Richlieu ſent over Chamberlain, a Scot, his Chaplain and Almoner, to aſſiſt the Confederates in advancing the Buſineſs, and to attempt all Ways for blowing up the Firſt Heat; with Orders not to leave them, till he might return with favourable News: And upon that he appointed one of his Secretaries to reſide in Scotland, to march along with them into England, to be preſent at all Councils of War, and direct their Affairs. On the other Side, Hamilton's Chaplains had free Acceſſes to Con, the ſame Country Man, at ſuch Time as Chamberlain was negociating for the Cardinal, to increaſe the Flames, which already had begun to rage. The Cardinal alſo ſent them Arms and Ammunition, and promis'd them Aſſiſtance proportionable to any Enterprize they ſhou'd freely undertake; the Subſtance of which is acknowledg'd by the French Writers Themſelves. The Jeſuit d' Orleans, one of the beſt of them, freely owns the Fact, and ſays, That beſides the unreaſonable Oppoſition the Cardinal met with from the Engliſh at Rhee and Rochelle, he was lately diſappointed in a new Deſign by the King of England. He and the Prince of Orange had form'd a Project to attack the Maritime Places of the Spaniſh Flanders, particularly to beſiege Dunkirk and Graveling at the ſame Time; to effect which, they agreed that the Cardinal ſhou'd prevail with King Charles to obſerve an exact Neutrality. Accordingly he ſent over the Count D'Eſtrades into England, to apply himſelf to the Queen, and to induce her to perſuade the King her Husband to continue Neuter in this Juncture; inſinuating, That France, in Time of Neceſſity, wou'd ſupport him under thoſe Troubles that then diſtracted his Dominions. Both the King and the Queen receiv'd the Propoſal with equal Contempt, and the King in a high manner ſaid, It was inconſiſtent either with his Honour, or Intereſt, to grant the Neutrality demanded; that he ſtood not in need of any Man's Help, to reduce his Subjects to their Obedience. The Queen alſo told the Count, That as to the Cardinal, ſhe was acquainted with his Deſigns, that he was no Friend to Her, and ſhe expected Nothing from Him. Upon the Return of theſe Anſwers, he wrote to the Count, That he was glad he had diſcover'd the Senſe of the Court of England, which might have given him much Trouble, had they known how to have conceal'd it: Accordingly he gave him Directions how to aſſiſt and encourage the Scots, and declar'd, It ſhou'd ſoon appear he was not a Perſon to be deſpis'd, for before a Year was paſs'd, the King and Queen of England ſhou'd repent their Rejecting his Offers. Thus all Things conſpired to bring on a ſecond War, more dangerous and formidable than the firſt.

4. Theſe threatning Inſults from the North caus'd the King to reſolve upon new Meaſures; and, as if the Oracle at Delphos was to be conſulted, the great Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was ſent for over, and with no ſmall Solemnity made Knight of the Garter, and Earl of Strafford in Yorkſhire. Great was the Expectation of all the Engliſh, what might be the Effect of his Arrival, and great was the Opinion which Men generally had conceiv'd of his Parts and Abilities; looking on him Him as the only Hinge, upon which the State was now likely to turn. But the Conjectures of the Gentlemen of that Time were very various, as to the Uſe this great Stateſman wou'd make of his Power and Favour; and ſome ſaid freely, That he was ſent for only to compleat that bad Work, which others of leſs Brains than He, had begun. Yet he was not ſole Dictator, but only one of the Triumviri, which, beſides himſelf, conſiſted of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Marqueſs of Hamilton. It is plain that the Latter was by his Maſter eſteem'd rather unfortunate, than treacherous, and lay undiſcern'd to thoſe two great Engliſh Men, who otherwiſe wou'd never have incorporated with him; ſo that theſe two ſeem'd neither to have well conſulted the State of Scotland, nor that of England. For the Archbiſhop being reingag'd, moſt Men again look'd upon it as an Eccleſiaſtick Expedition; and Hamilton reimploy'd, they expected, that in the ſame Man would be found the ſame Heart; and the Earl of Strafford being freſh come in, many envy'd his Greatneſs, and dreaded his Proſperity. Sir Henry Vane, being lately made Secretary of State, was unhappily an Aſſiſtant to this Juncto, a Man of no clear Head, but a buſtling ſubtle forward Courtier in Affairs of his Capacity; who, tho' a Creature of the Queen's, and a Confident of Hamilton and Northumberland, was both deteſted and deſpis'd by the Earl of Strafford: And Vane had a mortal Hatred to Strafford for taking the Title of Raby, then his Seat and Habitation, purchas'd from the Crown, and conſequently his Ambition; tho' by Deſcent, or Blood, the other had the fairer Pretenſion.

A new Juncto.

Unhappily temper'd

With this untemper'd Mortar was the poor King forc'd to build in a moſt tempeſtuous Seaſon; which afterwards ſhew'd how dangerous it is for a Prince, not truly reverenc'd and fear'd, to have a Body of Council made up of diſagreeing Members. However they began in the moſt plauſible and popular Manner, and upon the fifth of December reſolv'd upon the calling of a Parliament, which was receiv'd with great Marks of Joy both in the City and Country; tho' many thought it an ominous and unſeaſonable Expedient at this Juncture. This was appointed to meet on the thirteenth of April; but they likewiſe concluded of a Parliament in Ireland, which ſhou'd ſo long precede that in England, as that the Earl of Strafford might be both at That and the Other. But in regard it might be a conſiderable Time before Subſidies cou'd be rais'd, and the Scots being more forward than the King, it was thought neceſſary to have ſome preſent Supply of Money: Therefore the Earl of Strafford, by way of immediate Advance, ſubſcrib'd to lend the King twenty thouſand Pounds, the Archbiſhop ten thouſand Pounds, and the Lord Keeper as much: And moſt of the Nobility, either out of Zeal on the one ſide, or Shame on the other, ſubſcrib'd according to their Abilities, ſome few only refuſing. The Duke of Lenox exceeded all, who, tho' his Fortune was not extraordinary, ſubſcrib'd forty thouſand Pounds; and reflecting upon the Refuſal or Backwardneſs of Hamilton, he ſmilingly ſaid, I will ſerve the King in his Perſon, tho' I carry but his Cloak, as well and as chearfully as any in the greateſt Truſt. The Judges of the Law, with their Officers and Dependants, and many private Gentlemen, readily brought in their Proportions: But none were more free of the Loans than the Popiſh Recuſants; in which the Queen was very active, and appointed Sir Kenelm Digby and Mr. Walter Montague to negociate with the Roman Catholicks for that End, which they yielded to with great Readineſs and Alacrity, to the further Jealouſie and Diſguſt of the People.

Their Proceedings.

Great Subſcriptions againſt the Scots.

5. Before the Concluſion of theſe Tranſactions, there arriv'd in the Court of England the Elector Palatine, who after his Defeat in Weſtphalia, was adviſ'd by the Prince of Orange again to apply himſelf to his Uncle the King of England to put him in a Condition towards his Reſtoration. The King ſatisfy'd him that the Difficulty of his own Affairs in Scotland wou'd not at preſent allow him to furniſh him with any Supplies; therefore all he cou'd do was to recommend him to the French Ambaſſador, who undertook to make an Intereſt for him with his Maſter, and with Cardinal Richlieu. But the Cardinal becoming ſuſpected to the Court of England, as a Fomenter of the Scotch Troubles, it was thought more adviſeable for the Prince to go Incognito through France to the Swediſh Army, who upon his Appearance were to receive him as their General, than to truſt to the Sincerity of Richlieu, or the Delays of a Treaty. Accordingly he took his Journey, and paſs'd diſguis'd through France till he came to Lyons, where being unfortunately diſcover'd, was made Priſoner by the Order of the French King, who interpreted this Proceeding, while he was in Treaty with him, to be ſome ill Deſign againſt his Crown and Dominions.

niſh Fleet upon the Engliſh Coaſts, conſiſting of above ſeventy Sail of conſiderable Ships, commanded by Don Antonio d'Oquendo. Theſe were met by an inferior Fleet of the Hollanders, who furiouſly ſet upon them, and forc'd them into the Downs near Dover, where the Spaniards expected to be ſafe under the King of England's Protection. There they continu'd for ſome time, when the Weather growing ſtormy, Van-Trump the Dutch Admiral told ſome Engliſh Gentlemen, That if they lay there a little longer, the King of England wou'd have their Guns, the Country their Wreck, and the Devil their Men. Both Parties being Allies to England, it was judg'd by the Law of Nations, that the Shore and Harbours of a neutral Prince ſhou'd be a Refuge to protect the Weaker; but at laſt Van-Trump upon a ſlight Pretence, without the Ceremony of asking leave, fell in upon the Spaniards with that Vigour and Bravery, that he burnt, ſunk and drove aſhore far the greateſt Part of their formidable Navy, in the very Sight of our Engliſh Fleet. This, tho' not juſtify'd upon the Rules of Honour, was yet highly pleaſing to the common People, who hated the Appearance of a Spaniſh Armado, and had too much Reaſon to ſuſpect their Deſign: For tho' they pretended only to carry Recruits and Money to Dunkirk, yet ſuch a Deſign not requiring ſo many Ships or Men, the Expedition ſeem'd to have been meant for ſome greater Purpoſe. By ſome Evidences ſince recover'd, it appear'd that the Project was very much like that memorable One in Eighty Eight; and on the beginning of the following Parliament a Book was produc'd in the Houſe of Commons, containing, 'The Papiſts fiſhing in troubled Waters, 'whilſt the King was at War with the Scots, with Prayers 'in it for the Holy Martyrs that ſuffer'd in the Fleet ſent 'againſt the Hereticks in England, Anno 1639. However this prov'd ſuch a fatal Blow to the Maratim Power of Spain, that they never ſince recover'd it, or have been able to appear conſiderable upon the Seas.

The Spaniards defeated.

The Deaths of Sir Henry Wotton,

Before we paſs on to the following Year, we ought a little to embalm the Memory of ſome eminent Men who dy'd in this: As firſt Sir Henry Wotton, Knight, and Provoſt of Eaton Colledge, formerly a great Traveller, and Secretary to the unfortunate Earl of Eſſex in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, and after that employ'd by King James in eleven ſeveral Embaſſies to Foreign Potentates. He was a Man of ſingular Politeneſs, Wit, Learning and Piety; but for all his great Services to the Crown, no otherwiſe rewarded than with Knighthood, and the Provoſtſhip of Eaton. Next was Mr. Robert Burton, commonly known by the Name of Democritus Junior, which he gave himſelf before his famous Book call'd The Anatomy of Melancholy; a Divine, and Fellow of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, celebrated for a moſt general Scholar, an exact Mathematician, and a thorough-pac'd Philologiſt; as alſo for being a Devourer of Authors, an honeſt and facetious, yet melancholy and humorous Perſon. After him follow'd Philip Maſſenger, the moſt noted Dramatick Poet after Ben. Johnſon, a Perſon of great Modeſty and extraordinary Parts, extreamly belov'd by the Wits of the Age; and there were few but what took it as an Honour to join with him in a Play, in which Art he was highly eſteem'd both for the Purity of his Stile, and the Oeconomy of his Plots. Beſides theſe of inferior Stations, there alſo dy'd two great Miniſters of State, firſt John Spotſwood, Archbiſhop of St. Andrews, Primate and Chancellor of Scotland; a Perſon juſtly advanc'd to that high Character, which he ſupported with ſuch excellent Wiſdom and Integrity, as ſhew'd he deſerv'd his Honour and Dignity. He was bury'd at Weſtminſter Abby, near his beloved Maſter King James; coming to the Grave in Peace and a good old Age, without being Witneſs to thoſe Calamities which afterwards hapned to his Country, whoſe Affairs he knew as well as any Man whatſoever. Laſtly dy'd Sir Thomas Coventry, who had been Lord Keeper fifteen Years, a worthy Miniſter, whoſe Character we have formerly given, who upon his Death-bed ſent this laſt Requeſt to the King, That his Majeſty wou'd take all Diſtaſtes from the Parliament ſummon'd againſt next April, with Patience, and ſuffer it to ſit without an unkind Diſſolution. With this good Advice he dy'd, to the King's great Detriment rather than his own; and was ſucceeded by Sir John Finch, Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, already mention'd; a Man exceedingly obnoxious in the Caſe of Ship-Mony, and not of ſufficient Authority and Reputation to countenance and advance the King's Service.

Mr. Burton,

Mr. Maſſenger,

Archbp. Spotſwood

And the Lord Keeper Coventry.

Succeeded by Judge Finch.

Preparations and Steps towards

VI. We are now arriv'd at the remarkable Year, which prov'd ſo fatal to the general Repoſe of England, 1640; the Beginning of which was buſily employ'd in the Election of a new Parliament, an Aſſembly that the Nation had not ſeen for about twelve Years. Great were the Expectations of the People, who had almoſt laid aſide the thoughts of future Parliaments; and great were the Endeavours of the Nobility and Gentry of the Scotch Faction to obtain their Deſigns. Many Pulpits were employ'd to this Purpoſe, and no Pains ſpar'd in packing of Voices, and making of Parties; and were often ſo violent, that thoſe Meetings for Elections appear'd more like riotous Tumults, than orderly Conventions. Yet after all, the Election had that Succeſs, that the Commons in general prov'd exceedingly diſpos'd to pleaſe the King, and to do him Service. To make way for their Proceedings, the Lord Lieutenant Strafford firſt ſummon'd a Parliament in Ireland, whom he manag'd with ſuch a Fortunate Dexterity, that he preſently obtain'd for his Majeſty four intire Subſidies, with farther Promiſes, as alſo publick Thanks given to the King for placing over them ſo Juſt, Wiſe, Vigilant and Profitable a Governour. In the mean Time, the Court, that it might not appear apprehenſive of any Thing from the ſucceeding Parliament, ſtill proceeded in the ſame unpopular Ways; Ship-Mony was levy'd with the ſame Severity, and the ſame Rigour us'd in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, without complying with the Humour of any Man: A Steadineſs that vaniſh'd in no long Time,

The FOURTH PARLIAMENT.

On Monday the thirteenth of April the Parliament met at Weſtminſter with the uſual Ceremony and Formality; and about Noon his Majeſty accompany'd with all his Nobles, and other principal Officers in great State, rode from White-Hall to Weſtminſter-Abby, where he heard a Sermon from Dr. Wren Biſhop of Ely. Being remov'd to the Houſe of Lords, and ſeated on the Throne, with the Prince on his left Hand, he made this ſhort Speech to both Houſes. My Lords and Gentlemen, There was never a King that had a more great and weighty Cauſe to call his People together than my Self. I will not trouble you with the Particulars; I have inform'd my Lord Keeper, and command him to Speak, and deſire your Attention. After which the Lord Keeper Finch deliver'd a long Speech, in which he inform'd that great Aſſembly, 'That his Majeſty's Kingly Reſolutions 'were ſeated in the Ark of his Sacred Breaſt, and it were 'too high a Preſumption, for any Uzzah uncall'd to touch 'it; therefore they were to remember that tho' the King 'ſometimes lay'd by the Beams and Rays of Majeſty, yet 'he never laid by Majeſty it ſelf. But the main Scope was 'to lay before them the Happineſs of the Engliſh Nation, 'with the undutiful Proceedings in Scotland; that the King 'was reſolv'd to reduce his diſaffected Subjects, and by no 'Means to admit of their Mediation, as being in his own 'Nature inclinable to all Grace and Goodneſs: But before they enter'd into any other Debates, he expected 'their immediate Aid and Supply; and afterwards wou'd 'give them full Time for Conſidering any juſt Grievances 'to be heard and redreſs'd.' Upon finiſhing of which, the King reaſſum'd his Speech, and gave them an Account of the Letter he had intercepted, which had been directed to the French King, which he caus'd to be read by the Lord Keeper, together with the Tranſlation; informing Them that he had ſecur'd one of the Parties concern'd in the Tower. Upon this he diſmiſs'd the Commons to chuſe their Speaker; to which Serjeant Glanvile was deſign'd and elected; a Perſon fully acquainted with Parliamentary Proceedings, of a ready Conception, and a voluble Expreſſion, dextrous in the way of diſpoſing the Houſe, and acceptable both to Them and his Majeſty.

The King's Speech.

The Houſe of Commons having ſettled the Committees for Religion, Grievances, Priviledges and Courts of Juſtice, Mr. Secretary Windebank acquainted the Houſe with the Examination of the Lord Lowdon, who with Difficulty acknowledg'd 'that to be his Hand-Writing, which was 'ſubſcrib'd to the Letter directed to the French King, and 'did conceive the other Names ſubſcrib'd were the Hand-'Writings of thoſe Perſons.' After which the Houſe proceeded to agree upon a Day of Solemn Faſting and Humiliation, and a Meſſage was ſent to the Lords to deſire their Concurrence. Divers Petitions were then alſo read, preſented by ſeveral Knights of the Shire, complaining of Ship-Mony, Projects, Monopolies, Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, &c. which occaſion'd two Days Debates, and many long Speeches. Mr. Harbottle Grimſton ſpoke upon the Subject of Grievances, and argu'd, 'That the Dangers at 'home were greater than thoſe from abroad; and that the 'Diſeaſes and Diſtempers in the Body Politick were grown 'to that Height, that for a Cure, Examples ought to be 'made, ſo that the Cauſers and Authors of the Nation's 'Miſeries, might be as Treacle to expel the Poyſon of 'Miſchief out of Others.' Then Sir Benjamin Rudyard ſpoke againſt the Diſcontinuance of Parliaments, 'and that 'during the Vacation of thoſe Meetings, many Diſorders 'had been committed, which muſt now be ſet right, to 'vindicate God in his Religion, the King in his Honour, 'and the Common-Wealth in its gaſping Extremities. Yet 'he acknowledg'd the Greatneſs of the King's Wants, and 'when his Power and Neceſſity meets, he will not be long 'diſappointed; therefore they ought to reſpect Temper and 'Moderation, leſt the Race of Parliaments ſhou'd be rooted 'out.' The next Day Mr. Pym, a Man of publick Reputation putation and long Experience in Parliaments, made an elaborate Speech againſt Grievances, reducing them to three Heads; 1. ‘Thoſe which during the long Interval were againſt the Liberties and Priviledges of Parliament. 2. Innovations in Matters of Religion, and 3. Grievances againſt the Propriety of our Goods. Concluding with this Propoſal, That for a Remedy he advis'd to preſent them to the Houſe of Peers, that they might join with them to go to his Majeſty, and pray that thoſe Grievances may be voted: If any thing in the Vote be queſtion'd, that it may be debated and drawn into a Remonſtrance, with an humble Petition of both Houſes for Redreſs. And he hop'd the Wiſdom of this Houſe wou'd prepare ſuch a Remedy, as wou'd make his Majeſty a great King, and the People Happy.

Several Speeches in the Houſe of Commons.

The Ship-Money debated.

As to the Buſineſs of the Ship-Mony, which was thought the greateſt of the Civil Grievances, Mr. Grimſton inſiſted upon the irregular and prepoſterous Engaging the Judges to deliver their Opinion to the King, and ſaid, That he was perſwaded, that they did it againſt the Dictamen of their own Conſciences. Mr. Peard, a bold Lawyer of ſmall Note, more warmly inveigh'd againſt it, and call'd it An Abomination. Upon which Mr. Herbert, the King's Solicitor, with great Addreſs and Civility, put them in mind, ‘with what Candour his Majeſty proceeded in that, and all other Matters of Juſtice: That, tho' he was perſwaded of the Juſtice, as well as Neceſſity of it, yet he iſſu'd not his Writ for levying Ship-Mony, till he was aſſur'd of its Legality by all the Judges in England. That no Cauſe was ever more freely and publickly debated, when the Payment was oppos'd by Mr. Hampden, a worthy Gentleman then preſent: And after all This, and a Judgment pronounc'd with ſo much Deliberation and Solemnity, by which his Majeſty was as legally poſſeſs'd of that Right, as of any elſe he had, for any particular Man to call it An Abomination, was very unwarrantable; therefore he mov'd that the Gentleman, who had us'd that Expreſſion might explain Himſelf, and then withdraw.’ Upon this many were for calling him to the Bar; and the Solicitor's Speech was thought to have ſo much Weight in it, that Mr. Peard very hardly eſcap'd a ſevere Reprimand: Which ſhews the Houſe to have been in a good Temper, and had a real Inclination to oblige the King. Yet ſtill they retain'd the Remembrance of the tumultuous Concluſion of the laſt Parliament, and ſtrictly inquir'd into the Proceedings againſt Sir John Elliot, Mr. Hollis, and the impriſon'd Members; and were very warm about the late Speaker, Sir John Finch's leaving the Chair, contrary to the Order of the Houſe, tho' by the King's Special Command, and voted it a particular Breach of Priviledge.

The Keeper's Speech to both Houſes for a Supply.

2. The Commons having ſat about ſix or ſeven Days, without any Advances towards a Supply, the King was diſpleas'd that his main Buſineſs ſhould be neglected or deferr'd; wherefore upon the twenty firſt of April, he commanded the Lords and Commons to attend him in the Banqueting-Houſe, where he order'd the Lord Keeper, in his own Preſence, to acquaint them, ‘That the Cauſe of Calling this Parliament was for the Aſſiſtance and Supply of his Majeſty; that if the Supply was not Speedy, it wou'd be of no Uſe; for the Army was now marching, and ſtood his Majeſty at leaſt in One Hundred Thouſand Pounds a Month; and if proper Means were not immediately us'd, his Majeſty's Deſign wou'd be loſt, and the Charge all caſt away. As to Ship-Mony, his Majeſty had been ſo far from making any private Benefit of it, that for the ſame End he had Expended great Sums of Mony out of his own Coffers. He inform'd them, That in one Parliament in Ireland they gave his Majeſty ſix Subſidies, and in the laſt four, every Subſidy worth fifty or ſixty Thouſand Pounds. Laſtly upon granting a Supply, his Majeſty wou'd give them Scope and Liberty to preſent their juſt Grievances to him, and wou'd hear them with a gracious Ear, and give ſuch an Anſwer, as ſhou'd give Joy and Satisfaction to Them and all the Kingdom.

Mr. Wal*ler's Speech in the lower Houſe.*

On the Report made the next Day in the Houſe of Commons of the Keeper's Speech, Edmund Waller Eſquire made a ſevere Harangue, ‘in which he charg'd the Biſhops and Miniſters of State with a Deſign of ſetting up a new Species of abſolute Monarchy. Yet he acknowledg'd That the Perſon of no King was ever better belov'd of his People, than his preſent Majeſty: That his Wants were not ſo great, but they might find Means to ſupply Him, nor their Deſires ſo unreaſonable, but that his Majeſty might well ſatisfie them. That Phyſicians, tho' they were call'd very late, ſhou'd not reſent it, or talk what might have been, but apply themſelves briskly to the Cure. He concluded with this Motion, That there might be an Order immediately made, that the firſt Thing the Houſe ſhou'd conſider of, ſhou'd be the reſtoring of the Nation in General to the fundamental and vital Liberties, and then to conſider of the deſir'd Supply.

The King's Speech to the Lords.

While the Commons were thus reſolving on the Redreſs of Grievances, his Majeſty came unexpectedly to the Houſe of Lords, and earneſtly repreſented to them ‘That his Neceſſities were ſuch that cou'd admit of no Delay; That whatſoever he had promis'd by the Lord Keeper, he wou'd perform, if the Houſe of Commons wou'd truſt him. That tho' they truſted him in part at firſt, yet before the Parliament ended, he muſt totally truſt Them; and in Concluſion, for the Execution of all Things they muſt wholly truſt Him; Therefore ſince the Matter was no more than who ſhou'd be firſt truſted, and that the Truſt of Him was but a Truſt in part, he deſir'd the Lords to take into their Conſideration His and their own Honour, and the Safety of the Kingdom, and by their Advice diſpoſe the Commons to give Precedence to the Supply.’ This had ſuch a ſenſible Effect upon the Lords, that they immediately reſolv'd to oblige the King, and accordingly mov'd it in a Conference with the Commons: But in this they met with a very different Effect, for inſtead of a Compliance, it rais'd an unſeaſonable Diſpute about the Priviledges of their Houſe, and they unanimouſly declar'd, ‘That the Lords propounding a Supply, was a Violation of their Priviledges; therefore they cou'd proceed upon no other Buſineſs, till they had firſt receiv'd Satisfaction from the Houſe of Peers; which they demanded the next Day in a Conference.’ The Lords were ſenſible of their Error, and acknowledg'd the Priviledge of their Houſe, particularly ‘That Mony-Bills ought to have their Beginning there, and after they were paſs'd by the Lords, they ought to be return'd back to the Commons, and by their Speaker preſented to the King: But they deſir'd it might not obſtruct the Publick Affairs of the Kingdom, but that they wou'd proceed in their own Way and Method.’ This ſtill gave no Satisfaction; the Thing was univerſally reſented, and a Committee appointed to examine Precedents, and to prepare a Proteſtation to be ſent up to the Houſe of Lords, and enter'd in their own Journal; and in the mean Time no Publick Proceedings to be in the Houſe, except from ſome Report from a Committee.

The Commons diſoblig'd at the Lords.

The King's laſt Propoſal to the Commons.

3. The Houſe had ſat near three Weeks, without giving any Supplies, when the King finding that the Interceſſion of the Lords did but irritate the Commons, he took another Method, which, as it was believ'd, wou'd not fail of Succeſs. This was to ſend two Meſſages to them by his new Secretary Sir Henry Vane, the firſt ſhewing Them ‘The Neceſſity of a ſudden Supply’; and the ſecond ſoon after promiſing ‘Them upon the preſent granting of Twelve Subſidies, to be paid in three Years Time, (viz. five the Firſt Year, four the Second, and three the Third) his Majeſty wou'd not only at preſent forbear the levying of any Ship-Mony, but wou'd give Way to the utter aboliſhing of it by any Courſe that they ſhou'd like: And for Grievances, he wou'd give them as much Time as may be now, and another Seſſion the next Michaelmaſs; to which he expected a preſent and poſitive Anſwer.’ This Sum deſir'd amounted to leſs than eight hundred Thouſand Pounds, and was about three Years Purchaſe for the Ship-Mony; which, conſiſting of a greater Number of Subſidies than ever had been given at one Time, was by many thought an exorbitant Demand; but by thoſe who conſider'd the great Decreaſe in Subſidies of late Years, the three Years in levying them, and the total giving up of Ship-Mony, the Propoſal was thought very healing and reaſonable.

A long Debate upon it.

Upon this grand Matter the Houſe enter'd upon a full Debate the Day following; which continu'd from Nine in the Morning, till Four in the Afternoon, with great Warmth and Earneſtneſs. They who deſir'd to obſtruct the giving any Supply, objected the greatneſs of the Sum; and others obſerv'd, ‘That the purchaſing a Releaſe of a very unjuſt Impoſition, wou'd in effect confeſs it to be juſt; and therefore wiſh'd that the Judgment upon Examination might be declar'd void; that what they then preſented the King, might appear to be a Gift, and not a Recompence.’ But this was rather modeſtly inſinuated, than ſtifly inſiſted upon; and the greater Number reflected more on the Proportion demanded, which ſome ignorantly thought wou'd exceed the preſent Stock of Mony in the Nation. There were very few indeed, except thoſe of the Court, who had but little of their own to give, but thought the Sum too great, and wiſh'd a leſs might be accepted, and were willing the Debate might be adjourn'd till the next Morning. All this was in a Committee of the whole Houſe, and Mr. Lenthall in the Chair; but throughout the whole Day, ſcarce an offenſive or angry Word was ſpoken, except what a Country Gentleman ſaid, That the Supply was to be employ'd in ſupporting Bellum Epiſcopale, which the Biſhops were fitteſt to do Themſelves.

Which is re-aſſumed the next Day.

The Propoſal defeated by Sir Henry Vane.

The next Morning, the Houſe again in a Committee, and the ſame Man in the Chair, they proceeded in the Debate, and many ſpoke with more Reflexion upon Ship-Mony, and ſaid it deſerv'd no Conſideration, but in a ſhort time wou'd appear null and void. And this ſo agreed with the Senſe of a great Part of the Houſe, that Mr. Hambden, the moſt popular Man there, thought the Matter ripe for the Queſtion, and deſir'd that it might be put, ' whether the ' Houſe wou'd conſent to the Propoſition made by the ' King, as it was contain'd in the Meſſage;' which he knew wou'd be oppos'd by all who thought the Sum too great, or wou'd not have it as a Recompence for Ship-Mony. Hereupon Serjeant Glanvile, now out of the Chair, ſtood up, and in a moſt pathetical Speech, endeavour'd to perſwade the Houſe, To comply with his Majeſty's Deſire, for the Good of the Nation, and to reconcile him to Parliaments for ever. He made it appear how inconſiderable a Sum twelve Subſidies were, by informing them how much upon Computation his own Proportion wou'd be; and when he had nam'd the Sum, he being known to have a great Eſtate, it ſeem'd not worth any further Deliberation. The natural Warmth of his Rhetorick, and his artificial mingling of ſome Expreſſions againſt the Ship-Mony, made a wonderful Impreſſion upon the Houſe; and ſcarce any Speech ever ſo united the Inclinations of a popular Council to the Speaker, as this: And if the Queſtion had been immediately put, it was believ'd few wou'd have oppos'd it. But after a ſhort Silence, the other Side, recovering new Strength, call'd again with ſome Earneſtneſs, That Mr. Hambden*'s Queſtion might be put*, which being like to meet with a Concurrence, Mr. Hyde ſtood up, and objected againſt it as a captious Queſtion of ill Conſequence, and propos'd, ' That to the End every Man might freely ' give his Yea or No, the Queſtion might be put only upon ' giving the King a Supply; which if carry'd, another might ' be put upon the Manner and Proportion; if not, it wou'd ' have the ſame Effect with the other propos'd by Mr. ' Hambden. This was receiv'd with great Approbation by ſome, and no leſs Paſſion by others, and diverted by various Propoſitions, till Serjeant Glanvile propos'd that his Countryman, Mr. Hyde, might again propoſe his Queſtion; which being done, and ſome Objections anſwer'd by him, there follow'd a confus'd Clamour and Call, Mr. Hambden*'s Queſtion! Mr.* Hyde*'s Queſtion!* The Call appearing much ſtronger for the laſt, it was generally believ'd that the Queſtion had been put, and carry'd in the Affirmative, tho' poſitively and unaccountably oppos'd by the Solicitor Herbert, had not Sir Henry Vane, the Secretary, ſtood up and declar'd, That the putting and carrying that Queſtion wou'd be of no Uſe; for he had Authority to tell them, That if they paſs'd a Vote for Supply, and not in the Proportion and Manner propos'd in his Majeſty's Meſſage, it wou'd not be accepted by him; therefore he deſir'd that the Queſtion might be laid aſide: Which being again urg'd by the Solicitor, upon the ſame Authority, and the other Privy-Counſellors being ſilent, tho' highly diſpleas'd with the Secretary's Declaration, the Buſineſs was no more preſs'd; but it being near five in the Afternoon, and the Houſe weary, they agreed to adjourn till the next Morning. Juſt before which, Mr. Waller himſelf ſpoke earneſtly to Sir Thomas Jermyn, Comptroller of the Houſhold, to ſave his Maſter from the Effects of ſo bold a Falſity deliver'd by Sir Henry Vane; for, ſaid he, I am but a Country Gentleman, and cannot pretend to know the King's Mind. But Sir Thomas had not the Courage to contradict the Secretary; and his Son afterwards acknowledg'd to Mr. Waller, That his Father's Cowardiſe had ruin'd the King.

He and the Solicitor Herbert cauſe the King to diſſolve the Parliament.

The Miſchief that Sir Henry Vane did, is apparent by the Effects, but the Malice is unfathomable: For the beſt Writers agree, that if he cou'd not induce the Houſe of Commons to give twelve Subſidies, he ſhou'd deſcend to eight, and ſix, according to the Orders of the King, who with great Anger afterwards declar'd, That he had given him no ſuch Authority as he aſſum'd; That any Supply wou'd have been welcome to him, the Reputation of his Subjects aſſiſting him in that Conjuncture, being all that he deſir'd. Sir Edward Walker ſays he heard it was the Earl of Strafford's Advice To relinquiſh all, rather than make a Breach: But having an implacable Hatred againſt that Earl, whoſe Ruin was then upon the Anvil, he ſeem'd willing to bring all things into Confuſion; and did not only diſoblige the Commons, but the very ſame Night went to the King and told him plainly, That it was in vain to expect longer, or to make any other Overture to them; for no Money wou'd be had againſt the Scots. This being ſeconded by the Solicitor, for Reaſons ſtill unknown to the World, they two, and they only, wrought ſo far on the King, that the next Morning he call'd a Council at ſix a Clock, where he unhappily determin'd to diſſolve the Parliament. And going the ſame Morning to the Houſe of Peers, he ſent for the Speaker and the other Houſe before they cou'd begin to ſit, and in a ſhort Speech vindicated himſelf ' as to Religion ' and ſome other Matters, heartily thank'd the Lords, and ' blam'd the Commons for not obſerving what had been ' told them, That Delay was the worſt kind of Denyal; ' and then declaring his Reſolutions to maintain the true ' Religion, and the Liberties of his Subjects, he diſſolv'd ' them. Thus abruptly ended the fourth Parliament in this Reign, upon the fifth of May, after it had ſat three Weeks and one Day; which laid a Foundation for making the next perpetual, and producing all the Miſeries and Calamities of the Nation.

The King repents it.

This Diſſolution caſt an univerſal Damp upon the Spirits of the whole Nation, except thoſe who had moſt oppos'd the King's Deſires, who cou'd not conceal the great Joy of their Hearts; well knowing that the King muſt ſhortly call another Parliament, when they were ſure ſo many unbyaſs'd Members wou'd not be return'd again. Particularly Mr. Saint John, a Man of a cloudy Aſpect, and ſeldom known to ſmile, finding Mr. Hyde deeply concern'd That in the Time of ſuch Confuſion, ſo wiſe a Parliament ſhou'd be ſo imprudently diſſolv'd, he told him with a pleaſant Look, That all was well; that Things muſt grow worſe; before it cou'd be better; and that this Parliament cou'd never have done what was neceſſary to be done; as indeed it wou'd not, what he and his Friends thought neceſſary. The King himſelf, upon better Thoughts, was extreamly ſorry for what he had done, expreſs'd his Reſentments againſt Sir Henry Vane, and conſulted whether he might by Proclamation recall them; but finding it impracticable, he proceeded to a Courſe he had formerly us'd, and publiſh'd a Declaration to all his loving Subjects of the Cauſes which mov'd him to diſſolve this laſt Parliament. This did not give full Satisfaction, eſpecially ſince he was thought to have ſhewn too much Anger againſt the leading Members, if ever he deſign'd to meet them again. The Lord Brook's Study, Cabinets and Pockets were ſearch'd for Papers; Henry Bellaſis Eſquire, Sir John Hotham Knight and Baronet, and John Crew Eſquire, were impriſon'd; and ſome occaſional Rebukes were given to many others, to the increaſing of future Diſſenſions.

The Proceedings of the Convocation.

4. As the Parliament was generally thought to have continu'd too ſhort a Time, ſo the Convocation was believ'd by many to have ſat too long. During the Seſſion of Parliament, beſides a Project for ſome new Canons, the Clergy had agreed in Convocation to give the King ſix Subſidies, payable in ſix Years, each Subſidy amounting to twenty Thouſand Pounds; but the Act of it was not made up. His Majeſty, being under preſſing Neceſſities, was not willing to loſe theſe Subſidies, therefore he thought upon the continuing the Convocation, when the Archbiſhop was going about to diſſolve it, forgetting that he was to have the King's Writ for Diſmiſſing, as well as Convening of it. Accordingly he told the Archbiſhop, He was willing to have the Subſidies, which they had granted him; and that they go on with the finiſhing thoſe Canons, for which he had given them Power under the Broad-Seal of England. And when the other reply'd, It wou'd probably be excepted againſt by ſeveral, and deſir'd his Majeſty to adviſe well upon it; the King anſwer'd, He had ſpoken with the Lord Keeper Finch, who had aſſur'd him it was Legal. However, the Archbiſhop, and ſome of the Clergy, well knowing the Spirit of Bitterneſs contracted againſt them, ſince the Scotch Commotions, deſir'd to have the Opinion of the Learned in the Law concerning that Matter. This was graciouſly approv'd by the King, and in the Preſence of the Council, the Queſtion was put to the Lord Keeper and ſeveral of the Judges, who ſubſcrib'd this Writing: ' The Convocation being call'd by the King's Writ, under the Great ' Seal, doth continue, until it be diſſolv'd by Writ, or ' Commiſſion under the Great Seal, notwithſtanding the ' Parliament be diſſolv'd; Finch, Mancheſter, Bramſton, Littleton, Whitfield, Banks, Heath.

It ſits after the Diſſolution of the Parliament.

Upon this Judgment, and a new Commiſſion granted, they proceeded according to the Power requir'd by the Statute of the 25th of Henry the Eighth, and according to a Precedent under Archbiſhop Whitgift, in the 29th of Queen Elizabeth; and ſo finiſh'd their Act of Subſidies, which they call'd by the Name of Free Benevolence. Beſides this they went on and finiſh'd their ſeveral Canons, to the Number of Seventeen, with as little Oppoſition as cou'd be imagin'd. In one of which they oblig'd the Clergy and their Dependents to take a Sort of Anti-Covenanting Oath in theſe Words, ' I A. B. do ſwear, that I do approve the Doctrine and Diſcipline of Government eſtabliſh'd in the ' Church of England, as containing all Things neceſſary to ' Salvation: And that I will not endeavour by my Self, ' or any Other, directly or indirectly, to bring in any Popiſh Doctrine, contrary to that ſo eſtabliſh'd: Nor will ' I give my Conſent to alter the Government of this Church ' by Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Deans, and Archdeacons, &c. as ‘ it ſtands now eſtabliſh'd, and as by Right it ought to ‘ ſtand ; nor yet ever to ſubject it to the Uſurpations and ‘ Superſtitions of the See of Rome.’------ The firſt Canon aſſerted the Regal Power, two others were for ſuppreſſing the Growth of Popery and Socinianiſm, another to regulate the Converſation of the Clergy; and all were then thought to the Honour and Advantage of the Church and State. However before they were paſs'd, they were laid before the King, the Lords of the Council, the Judges and other Lawyers, where they were deliberately read and approv'd, and laſtly ſubſcrib'd by the Members of both Houſes. And Serjeant Crook, one of the Judges who was againſt Ship-Mony, upon reading of them lift up his Hands, and gave Thanks to Almighty God, That he had liv'd to ſee ſuch good Effects of a Convocation.

It is diſſolv'd.

Theſe being finiſh'd, the Convocation, or rather Synod, was diſſolv'd on the 29th of May.

It was hop'd by many that theſe Proceedings wou'd have added Strength, as well as Ornament to the Church of England; but they rather prov'd like new Blaſts of Wind againſt a Fabrick, which by the Underminings of ſome, and the open Attempts of others, was ready to fall before.

Cenſures,

The Canons and the Oath were afterwards moſt violently exclaim'd againſt, and all the deſign'd Supports in this Reign, by their own Weight, help'd to haſten the Church's Ruin; and tho' theſe laſt underwent all the Scrutiny of the Laity, yet the whole Storm fell all upon the Biſhops and Clergy, but more eſpecially upon the Archbiſhop Himſelf. During their Sitting, the Libels from Lilburn and others ſo incens'd the People againſt them, that they were in continual Danger of being pull'd out by the Rabble; ſo that the King was forc'd to place a Guard upon Weſtminſter-Abby where they ſat.

And Tumults.

About five Hundred of them beſet Lambeth Houſe at Midnight, and doubtleſs had made the Archbiſhop a Sacrifice to their Rage, cou'd they have got him into their Power. But having Notice of their Intentions, he provided ſome Arms and Ammunition, with which they were repuls'd, without doing or receiving any great Damage. The next Day ſeveral of theſe ſeditious People were apprehended and committed to the White-Lyon Priſon in Southwark; but three Days after ſome of their Confederates got together, broke open the Priſon and releas'd them: Nevertheleſs one of the Ringleaders of the Mutiny was afterwards taken, arraign'd, condemn'd, and hang'd, drawn and quarter'd; which put ſome End to the preſent Inſurrection.

VI. I. England began now to approach towards an unnatural Ferment, being daily excited and influenc'd by the new Clouds and Meteors ariſing from the North. Theſe Tumults and Diſorders were the firſt Symptoms of the Nation's Calamities, and Scotland was their great Encouragement; Therefore the King, rous'd with Indignation, took a Reſolution to reduce that Nation to a better Obedience.

The King's Preparations againſt the Scots.

Their raiſing a new Army, and threatning an Invaſion, was a ſufficient Caution to provide againſt them; but the King found himſelf under great Difficulties to proſecute a War that ſhou'd prove effectual. Therefore he made Choice of a ſelect Committee, or Triumvirate, as was formerly obſerv'd, for this Emergency, upon whom the Burthen and Envy of all great Affairs was to reſt, viz. the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the Earl of Strafford, and the Lord Cottington. A few others were alſo join'd with them, as the Earl of Northumberland for Ornament, the Biſhop of London for his Treaſurer's Place, the two Secretaries, Sir Henry Vane and Sir Francis Windebank, for Service and Intelligence: Only the Marqueſs of Hamilton indeed by his Skill and Intereſt, bore juſt as great a Part as he thought convenient; by whoſe Procurement the Lord Lowdon was diſcharg'd out of his Confinement, and after a few Days kind Reception, diſmiſs'd into Scotland. Theſe Perſons made up the Committee of State, which in Court was enviouſly call'd the Cabinet Council; and by others reproachfully call'd The Juncto; and they were to meet as often as they thought fit, upon any extraordinary Occaſion.

An Account of thoſe who compos'd the new Juncto.

Of the Firſt of theſe we have formerly given a full Account; of the Second, the Earl of Strafford, we have likewiſe given a juſt Character; only it is to be obſerv'd, that both were univerſally hated by the Scotch Nation, and the Latter, as well as the Former, had contracted the Enmity of ſeveral of the Nobility of England. The Lord Cottington, tho' he was a wiſe Man, knew better how to make his Maſter great abroad, than gracious at home, and had been concern'd in many hard Shifts to raiſe Mony, and was likewiſe ſuſpected as a Favourer of the Papiſts. There were two Things that render'd him as odious as any, to the preſent Reformers; One, he cou'd not be perſuaded to countenance any of their Deſigns; the Other was, he had two good Places, the Chancellorſhip of the Exchequer, and the Maſterſhip of the Wards, without which their Reformation wou'd be imperfect: Then his being a ſubtle Enemy to the Archbiſhop, render'd him more unfit for this preſent Exigency. The Marqueſs of Hamilton was thought to have had more Enemies and fewer Friends, in Court and Country, than any of the other. For by means of his Intereſt in the King's Affection, he had more outfac'd the Law in bold Projects and Preſſures upon the People, than any other Man durſt have undertaken: So that he had as much Reaſon to fear, and perhaps more Policy to prevent, than any of the reſt of the Committee. The Earl of Northumberland, formerly ſpoken of, was a great Man and a Favourite, who if he had thought the King as much above him, as he thought himſelf above other conſiderable Men, he might have prov'd a good Subject. Biſhop Juxton of London, who has been fully characteriz'd, had by his Wiſdom and Integrity preſerv'd himſelf from all Blame, but what aroſe purely from the Envy of his Treaſurer's Place. Secretary Windebank, rais'd by the Archbiſhop, ungrateful to him, and hateful to the Puritans, was particularly obnoxious to the People, not only for his favouring, but his open protecting great Numbers of Romiſh Prieſts and Jeſuits. Secretary Vane, notwithſtanding his late Carriage in the Parliament, was ſtill further truſted, who took ſuch Notes of their Debates, as afterwards by the help of his Son, were the principal Cauſes of the cutting off the Earl of Strafford.

With theſe jarring and unequal Members was the unfortunate King forc'd to form his Council, and proceed in this Emergency. They generally adviſ'd him to an Offenſive War, ſhewing his Majeſty many eſſential Reaſons,

Their Deſigns and Meaſures.

‘ That a Defenſive War wou'd only heighten the Covenanters in their Demands, and encourage their Faction ‘ in England: That by an Offenſive War he might eaſily ‘ ruin them, upon whoſe Aid and Policy the factious Spirits ‘ at home chiefly depended; which effected, they wou'd be ‘ eaſily brought to a Compliance: That any Delay of ‘ Time wou'd both ſtrengthen the Scots there, and their ‘ Party here.’ But how Mony ſhou'd be rais'd to undertake this War, was the next, and indeed the main Point to be debated. To call a Parliament for effecting it, beſides the tediouſneſs of the Time, it might likewiſe prove vain and uſeleſs, as Experience had already taught them; for, as the Lord Cottington then alledg'd, The Lower Houſe ſeem'd too little to value King or Church: Therefore other Ways were to be conſider'd for raiſing of Mony; and Advice was given, that the Collection of Ship-Mony ſhou'd be rigorouſly put forwards, and that a Loan of a hundred Thouſand Pounds ſhou'd be deſir'd from the City of London. But the Citizens pleaded Poverty, tho' they never were in richer Circumſtances; but indeed they were at this Time highly diſguſted, having lately by a ſolemn Sentence in the Star-Chamber been depriv'd of their Plantation at London-Derry in Ireland, after they had been at very great Expences, their Patent adjudg'd to be forfeited, and the Undertakers ſeverely fin'd, to the Sum of fifty Thouſand Pounds: And tho' they offer'd by Way of Compoſition, to build a ſtately Palace for the King in St. James's Park, to pull down White-Hall, and make a noble Way by the Thames ſide to Weſtminſter-Hall, yet it wou'd not be accepted. This happen'd in a very unſeaſonable Time for the King's Affairs, who now was forc'd to ſtretch every String of the Prerogative to procure Supplies. Yet ſtill he had ſo much the Hearts of his Subjects, that by a particular Loan of Lords, Gentlemen and others, he had three hundred Thouſand Pounds paid into his Exchequer, in leſs than three Weeks Time: A Sum that ſufficiently manifeſts the Plenty of the Times, and greater than moſt Princes in Europe cou'd have commanded in ſo ſhort a Space.

300000 l. advanc'd.

An Army rais'd.

By Means of this Advance an Army of above twenty Thouſand Men was ſoon rais'd, in the Command of which, the Earl of Eſſex and ſome others were unhappily neglected and laid aſide, which occaſion'd that haughty Earl thus to expreſs his Reſentment to Sir Edward Walker, It ſeems the King lays by all thoſe that faithfully ſerv'd him laſt Year, whom if he had pleas'd to employ again, both wou'd and cou'd have ſerv'd him as well as thoſe he now truſts.

The chief Commanders.

But the King truſted the chief Command to the Earl of Northumberland, whom before he had made High Admiral of England, with as great Characters of Power and Favour as cou'd be imprinted on a Subject. The Earl of Strafford was made Lieutenant General, and the Command of the Horſe was given to the Lord Conway, whoſe Father had been rais'd by King James from a private Condition to be his Secretary, and a Peer of the Realm; he himſelf being a Man of Epicurean Principles, a great Devourer of Books and good Entertainments, and who lay under ſome Reflection ſince the Action in the Iſle of Rhee; yet his Parts and Qualifications made him eſteem'd by many, particularly the Archbiſhop, who look'd upon him as a zealous Defender of the Church, when in truth he had little or no Senſe of Religion. Of theſe three Commanders, it was obſerv'd, ‘ That the Firſt had ſufficient Health, but had ‘ no Will to the Expedition; the Second had a good Will to

‘ it, but wanted Health; and that the Third had neither the One or the Other.’ The reſt of the Commanders, ſuch as Wilmot, Goring, Aſhburnham, Oneal, &c. were generally merry Companions, and none of them real Friends to Strafford, but more Dependents upon the Earl of Holland. Yet as infirm as the Earl of Strafford found himſelf, he chearfully undertook the Charge of the Army in the Abſence of the General, who by a Letter to the Archbiſhop ſignify'd, That he durſt venture upon the Peril of his Head to drive the Scots out of England; but he did not hold it counſellable as the Caſe then ſtood. If any other of the Lords had adviſ'd the King to try his Fortune in a Battel, he doubted not of ſending them home, in more Haſte than they came; but the Scots had render'd him unfit to make the Motion, leaſt it might be thought that he ſtudy'd more his own Concernments, than the King's.

The Politick Proceedings of the Scots.

But theſe politick Invaders, finding by whoſe Counſels the King govern'd his Affairs, reſolv'd to draw them into Diſcredit, both with Prince and People. And therefore it was declar'd in a Remonſtrance they publiſh'd before this ſecond Attempt, ‘ That their Propoſitions and Deſires, ſo neceſſary and vital to their Kingdom, cou'd find no Acceſs to the Ears of their gracious King, by reaſon of the powerful Diverſion of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Deputy of Ireland, who, ſtrengthned with the high and mighty Faction of Papiſts near his Majeſty, preſided in all Matters Temporal and Spiritual; making the Neceſſity of their Service to his Majeſty to appear in being fit Inſtruments to oppreſs both the juſt Liberties of his Free Subjects, and the true Reform'd Religion in all his Kingdoms.’ They ſeconded this Remonſtrance with another Pamphlet call'd, The Intention of the Army, in which they there ſignify'd to the good People of England, ‘ That they had no Deſign either to waſte their Goods, or ſpoil their Country; but only to become Petitioners to his ſacred Majeſty to call a Parliament, and to bring the ſaid Archbiſhop, and Lord Lieutenant, to their condign Puniſhment: Modeſtly declaring, That as they deſir'd the unworthy Authors of their Trouble, who had come out from Themſelves, to be try'd at home, according to their own Laws; ſo they wou'd preſs no further Proceſs againſt the Archbiſhop and Lieutenant, and the reſt of the pernicious Counſellors in England, the Authors of all the Miſeries of both Kingdoms, than what their own Parliament ſhou'd diſcern to be their juſt Deſerving.’ And that the Engliſh might ſee whom they chiefly aim'd at, a Book was publiſh'd by the Name of Laudenſium Autocatacriſis, or the Canterburians Self-Conviction; in which the Author by a ſtrange Inverſion wou'd prove out of the Works of the Archbiſhop Himſelf, That there was a peculiar Deſign on foot for introducing Superſtition, Popery and Arminianiſm, to the Subverſion of the Goſpel, and ſuppreſſing the Religion of England eſtabliſh'd by Law.

The Birth of the Duke of Glouceſter.

This Invaſion of the Scots welcom'd into the World the King's fourth Son, and the third now living, who was born on the eighth Day of July, at Oatlands in Surrey, and on the 22d of the ſame Month was baptiz'd by the Name of Henry, and intitled Duke of Glouceſter. This gave Joy, but not Unity to the Court of England, which at this Time was full of Faction and Animoſity, where each Member more deſign'd the Ruin of his Adverſary, and the ſatisfying his Reſentments, than advancing his Maſter's Service, or complying with his publick Duty; while every Man unwiſely thought the Oppoſer of his Enemies, a Friend to himſelf, or rather by the narrowneſs of his Underſtanding, and extent of his Paſſions, contracted all his other Affections to that ſingle one of Revenge.

The King's Proclamation againſt the Scots.

2. With theſe unhappy Circumſtances, the King, having ſent his Army before, on the 20th of Auguſt left London, and haſtned to his Rendezvous at York. Shortly after he publiſh'd a Proclamation, in which he declar'd, ‘ That he had, by all Ways of Mildneſs and Clemency, endeavour'd to appeaſe the Rebellious Courſes of his Subjects in Scotland, who under Pretences of Religion had ſought to ſhake off his Regal Government, and did now take Arms, and invade the Kingdom of England: and therefore he declar'd, That all thoſe, who had already enter'd, or ſhou'd preſume in a Warlike Manner to enter any Part of England, ſhou'd be adjudg'd, and were thereby denounc'd Rebels and Traytors againſt his Majeſty. However, if they wou'd yet acknowledge their former Crimes, crave Pardon, and yield Obedience for the Time to come, he tender'd them his Gracious Pardon, they retiring home, and demeaning themſelves like loyal Subjects for the future,’-------A Prayer was likewiſe compos'd and publiſh'd to be ſaid in all Churches for the King, in his Expedition againſt the Rebels of Scotland. But nothing cou'd alter the Opinion and Humour of ſeveral of the Officers and private Soldiers of his Army, who in their March did not ſpare to give their Judgments againſt this War, particularly, That they wou'd not fight to maintain the Power and Pride of the Biſhops. All which Temper was ſufficiently known to the Scots, who had ſo contriv'd an Intelligence with ſome of the Engliſh Nobility and Gentry, that nothing ſucceeded in the Counſels or Actions of the King againſt them; by which means they took Courage to make ſuch Invaſions, which otherwiſe they durſt not have attempted: And this Treachery was afterwards boaſted of in Cromwell's Reign by Mr. Archibald Johnſon himſelf, who valu'd himſelf in being the chief Contriver in it, as that which gave the Occaſion of Ruin to the Family of the STUARTS.

The Scotch Army enter England.

From theſe Encouragements, and further from a Forgery of the Lord Savile's, the Scots reſolv'd to do more than in their laſt Expedition; and therefore having gather'd a new Army under their old General Leſley, Montroſs, and others, on Friday the twenty firſt of Auguſt they enter'd the Kingdom of England without Oppoſition: And to give the greater Encouragement to the Soldiers, the Earl of Montroſs leading the Van, alighted off his Horſe, and went through the River Tweed on Foot; ſo zealous did he ſtill ſeem for the Cauſe. The Army advancing through Northumberland, came to Newburn upon Tine, about five Miles from Newcaſtle, where the Lord Conway was advantageouſly poſted with three Thouſand Foot, and fifteen Hundred Horſe, able to have made a ſufficient Reſiſtance. The Armies being in view, Leſley ſent a Meſſenger to the Lord Conway, deſiring leave to paſs with a Petition to his Majeſty; to which Anſwer was return'd, That he might have liberty to paſs with a few, but not with his Army. Upon which Leſley commanded three Hundred Horſe to ford the River; which they did, but were ſoon forc'd to retire by the Muſketeers firing from behind a Breaſt-Work. Which Leſley perceiving, play'd ſo furiouſly upon it with his Cannon, that the Soldiers ſoon abandon'd their Poſt, threw down their Arms and fled: Whereupon the Scotch Cavalry re-advanc'd, and tho' they met with ſome Oppoſition, yet the Engliſh retir'd with ſuch Precipitation, that but few of them cou'd be either kill'd or taken Priſoners. Our Writers do not well agree about the Loſs and Particulars, yet none deny but the Action was unfortunate and diſhonourable to the Engliſh, and the Lord Clarendon expreſſes his Indignation, and calls it an infamous and irreparable Rout. It is ſaid that the Scotch Army that gave this Rout conſiſted of above twenty Thouſand Men; however this firſt Attempt was the laſt good Succeſs they ever met with in the whole War.

The Lord Conway routed at Newburn.

The immediate Conſequence was very great, and there was a prodigious Conſternation of all Ranks of People, who fled in vaſt Numbers with their Goods and Families into Yorkſhire; and the Terror increaſing, Biſhop Morton of Durham retir'd to his Caſtle at Stockton, and ſo towards the South, and Dr. Belconqual the Dean made haſte to ſecure himſelf, the Scots threatning him as an Incendiary for penning the King's large Declaration. The Day after their Victory, the Scots were ſaluted by Commiſſioners from Newcaſtle, who came to treat for the Surrender of the Town, a Place of far the greateſt Conſequence in the North of England, which was ſuddenly abandon'd by Sir Jacob Aſhley, having firſt ſunk the Cannon in the River. On Sunday the thirtieth of Auguſt, the Scotch Army enter'd Newcaſtle, where they found the King's Magazine, both of Arms and Victuals, as alſo an Opportunity of enlarging Mr. Colvill, who had been ſent by them to France with Letters to the French King, and Cardinal Richlieu. The ſame Day Mr. Henderſon preach'd in the great Church of the Town, and after Sermon the General and Nobility were feaſted by the Mayor. The Earl of Lothian was made Governour of the Place, having two Thouſand Men allow'd him; which Truſt they thought him well deſerv'd, for his Zeal to the Cauſe was ſuch, that tho' both his Father and He ow'd all their Wealth and Greatneſs to the King's Bounty, yet he was one of the firſt that ingag'd againſt him and his Undertakings. At the ſame Time a more diſmal Fate purſu'd the Lord Haddington, who having avowedly fallen from the King's Side, and liſted under Leſley, was left at home with his Regiment to attend the Motions of the Garriſon of Berwick. For that End he kept his Quarters at Dunglaſs, where ſtanding at Noon-Day in the Court Yard with about Sixty Gentlemen, the Caſtle having a Magazine of Powder, was ſuddenly blown up, and in a Moment bury'd him and all his Company, ſo that they were never more ſeen. Which Tragical Event being reported at Court, the Royaliſts were not ſo moderate in their Cenſures as the King himſelf, who only ſaid, That tho' he had been very ungrateful to him, yet he was ſorry he had not ſome Time to repent.

The Scots enter Newcaſtle.

The Lord Haddington's Fate.

It was under theſe diſcouraging Circumſtances, that the Earl of Strafford met the Engliſh Army at Durham, who brought with him a Body much broken with his late Sickneſs, and a mind labouring under the Dregs of it; which being inflam'd and exaſperated at the late Diſhonour, render'd him leſs inclin'd to ingratiate Himſelf with the Officers upon his firſt Entrance into his Charge. An Opportunity thoſe, who by this Time were retain'd for that Purpoſe, laid hold of to incenſe the Army againſt him; and ſo far ſucceeded, that in a ſhort Time it was more prejudiced againſt him than the Enemy. The Lord Conway was highly blam'd by him, but to no Effect; the Soldiers were inſolent and unruly, having committed ſeveral outragious Actions even in the Churches: So that he found it neceſſary to retire to the Skirts of Yorkſhire, leaving all Northumberland and the Biſhoprick of Durham to the Pleaſure of the Conquerors; who, beſides a Proviſion of Coals and Forage, Seſs'd thoſe Parts at a Contribution of eight Hundred and fifty Pounds a Day; that is, three Hundred to be paid out of Northumberland, three Hundred and fifty out of the Biſhoprick, and two Hundred out of the Town of Newcaſtle. Under which miſerable Servitude, the Poor People continu'd a Year before they cou'd be fully reliev'd.

Northumberland and the Biſhoprick left to the Scots.

The Scots Petition.

3. The Scots having ſeated Themſelves in Newcaſtle, where they were indulg'd with good Proviſions, and better Entertainment than they enjoy'd in their own Country, thought fit to ſtay there till they ſent a Petition to the King, which they entitled The humble Petition of the Lords in the laſt Parliament, and other his Majeſty's Loyal Subjects in Scotland: 'In which they in general complain'd of their 'Grievances, for Relief of which they were now conſtrain'd to come, without Prejudice to the Peace of 'England, or any of the Subjects therein, till they preſs'd 'with Strength of Arms to oppoſe their Paſſage at Newburn: That now they preſented Themſelves to his Majeſty's Goodneſs for Satisfaction of their full Demands, 'and Reparations of their Wrongs and Loſſes, with the 'Advice of the Parliament of England to be convened.' The King by the Earl of Lanerick, his Secretary for Scotland, on the fifth of September return'd an Anſwer, 'That 'he expected their Demands in particular, and commanded 'them to advance no further.' Three Days after they return'd their Reply to the Earl, declaring, 'That as nothing 'in the World was more eligible to them than his Majeſty's Favour, ſo they deſired nothing but what ſuited 'with his Majeſty's Honour, and Peace of his Dominions: That they wou'd have expreſs'd the Particulars of 'their Deſire in their Petition, had they not before done it 'in their Printed Declarations; however they now recited 'the Sum of them. Firſt, That the late Acts of Parliament might be publiſh'd with the States of Parliament: 'That Edinburgh Caſtle, and other Forts in Scotland, might 'be repair'd, and us'd for their Defence: That their Country-men in England and Ireland might not be forc'd to 'Oaths and Subſcriptions, contrary to their National Oath and Covenant: That the common Incendiaries in the 'King's Dominions might be brought to Cenſure: That 'their Ships and Goods, with all Loſſes, Damages and 'Charges, be repair'd: That the Declaration made againſt 'them as Traytors be recall'd: That all Garriſons be remov'd from the Borders, and all Impediments that may 'ſtop a free Trade: And that the Parliament of England may 'meet as ſoon as poſſible, as the only Means to ſettle 'Peace, and enable them to obey the King's Prohibition 'of advancing further. For as Nothing, but invincible Neceſſity had brought them out of their Country, ſo nothing leſs ſhou'd draw them beyond the Limits appointed 'by his Majeſty.

Their Demands.

Their earneſt Preſſures for haſtning of the Engliſh Parliament was ſuppos'd to ariſe from their clear Belief, That the Engliſh Populacy, being now ſo generally inclin'd to their Faction, the Houſe of Commons wou'd favour both Them and their Projects; and they had the leſs Reaſon to doubt it, ſince the City of London had already ſeem'd to joyn with them, by preſenting a Petition to the King, exactly anſwerable to their Deſires. In which they highly complain'd of the Grievances, 'The unuſual Impoſitions 'upon Merchandiſe, The levying of the Ship-Mony, with 'the Loſs of Veſſels by Pirates; The Multitude of Monopolies, Patents and Warrants, and the Decay of Trade; 'The Innovations in Religion, the new Oath and Canons, 'which were like to deprive them of their Miniſtry; The 'great Concourſe of Papiſts about the City and Suburbs, 'and the ſudden Diſſolution of Parliaments, before Grievances were redreſs'd: That the great Fears they and their 'Families had for the Danger of his Sacred Perſon in the 'War, had greatly obſtructed Trade; therefore they concluded with a Deſire for the ſudden calling a Parliament.' At the ſame Time another Petition was ſent from twelve Lords, very much of the ſame Strain, in which they alſo expreſs'd a great fear of Danger to his ſacred Perſon, and concluding with the ſame Deſire for a Parliament, ſubſcrib'd themſelves, Bedford, Eſſex, Hertford, Warwick, Briſtol, Mulgrave, Say and Seal, Howard, Bullingbrook, Mandevile, Brook, and Paget. This being reported to the Scots, their Zealots were pleas'd to ſay, That Haddington and Borthwick had not labour'd in vain, and that the Work wou'd ſhortly begin in England alſo. They alſo grew very high, and beſides the eight hundred and fifty Pounds per Diem, they ſeiz'd the Rents of the Biſhop, Dean and Chapter, and Papiſts, as Enemies to their Deſigns, and Leſley ſuffer'd his Soldiers to rifle and break open Shops and Houſes; and likewiſe ſeiz'd on four great Engliſh Ships, loaden with Corn, as lawful Prize. Theſe and many other Exorbitancies were committed by them, beſides their Threats and Menaces to do more, in caſe the Engliſh came not to a ſudden Accommodation.

The Petition of the City of London, And of twelve Lords.

In theſe Diſtractions, between an Enemy inſolent with Succeſs, an Army corrupted or diſheartened, a Country mutinous and inclin'd to the Scots, and a Court infected all three Ways, the King cou'd not but find himſelf in miſerable Straits. His Treaſure was likewiſe exhauſted; for the unfortunate raiſing and disbanding his firſt Army had coſt Three Hundred Thouſand Pounds, which the good Husbandry of the Treaſurer had reſerv'd for an Emergency; and the Borrowing as much for the uſe of the latter Army had drawn ſuch Burthens and Anticipations upon the Revenue, that there was not enough left to defray the neceſſary Expence of the King's Houſhold. A Parliament cou'd not meet Time enough to relieve theſe Extremities; therefore a new Invention was thought of, or rather the Revival of a very ancient Cuſtom, that had not been practis'd in ſome Hundreds of Years, and this was the Calling of a Grand Council of all the Peers of England to meet and attend his Majeſty; that by their Advice the great Affairs might be more proſperouſly manag'd. This Reſolution being taken, Writs were immediately iſſu'd under the Great Seal to all the Peers of the Realm to attend his Majeſty at York within twenty Days; and Preparations were accordingly made in all Places.

A new Project.

A grand Council of the Peers at York.

VII. 1. In this unhappy State and Condition were Things and Perſons, when the great Council of Peers met at the City of York, upon the twenty fourth Day of September. Where his Majeſty being ſeated under a Canopy, in the Hall of the Dean's Houſe, in a Speech to this noble Aſſembly declar'd, 'That it had been the Cuſtom of his 'Predeceſſors, upon ſudden Invaſions or Dangers, as 'cou'd not admit the uſual Delays of a Parliament, to aſſemble the Great Council of the Peers, by whoſe Advice and Aſſiſtance they might give timely Remedies. 'That this being his preſent Condition, an Army of Rebels lodg'd in his Kingdom, he thought fit to ſummon 'their Lordſhips, to conſult how they might joyntly proceed for the Chaſtiſing of their Inſolencies, and ſecuring 'his good Subjects: But firſt, ſince he deſir'd nothing 'more than to be rightly underſtood of his People, of his 'own accord he had already given Order to the Lord-Keeper for the immediate Calling of a Parliament, to aſſemble on the third of November next enſuing. In the 'mean Time he deſir'd their Advice in two Points; Firſt, 'what Anſwer to give to the Petition of the Rebels, and 'in what Manner to treat with Them: Secondly, How 'the Army ſhou'd be kept on foot, till the Parliament cou'd 'meet; for he thought no Man cou'd adviſe him to 'disband, ſo long as the Scots continu'd in England.' But becauſe the Call of a Parliament was the moſt popular Propoſal, that the Queen might have the Honour of it, whom he exceedingly deſir'd to endear to the People, he inform'd them, That by a Letter the Queen had adviſ'd him to it.

A new Parliament deſign'd.

After which the Scots Petition, and other Papers were ſucceſſively read; then by his Majeſty's Command, the Lords were inform'd of the Grounds and Reaſons which mov'd the Privy-Council to adviſe the raiſing an Army againſt the Scots; and the Demands, acknowledg'd by the Lord Lowdon, were read, and explain'd by the Earl of Traquair; who prov'd to their Lordſhips 'That ſome of 'thoſe Demands ſubverted the fundamental Laws of Scotland, others the Prerogative and Dignity of the King, 'deriv'd to him from his illuſtrious Anceſtors; and that 'many of them were to the Detriment of his Majeſty as 'to Profit and Revenue, and prejudicial to divers of his 'good Subjects in that Kingdom.' But the ſame Day another Petition was preſented to the King from the Scots, ſo full of Submiſſion, as wou'd probably beget a Treaty; and the Council having conſider'd and debated theſe Matters, it was agreed, that as to the firſt Point propos'd by his Majeſty, certain Lords ſhou'd be ſent as Commiſſioners to treat with the Scots.

Commiſſioners appointed to treat with the Scots.

But then the King was caution'd, not to intruſt any ſuch ungracious Perſons in it as might create Jealouſies in the Scots, and ſo render the Negotiation fruitleſs. For which Reaſon the Earls of Hertford, Bedford, Pembroke, Saliſbury, Eſſex, Holland, Briſtol and Berkſhire, the Lords Mandevile, Wharton, Dunſmore, Paget, Brook, Savile, Paulet, and Howard of Eſcrick, were appointed by the King: All ſixteen popular Men, and ſcarce one of them a Friend, or ſo much as civilly inclin'd towards the Earl of Strafford. Thoſe from the Scotch Army were much inferior in Quality, having only two Noblemen, Dumferling and Lowdon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglaſs, Mr. Smith, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderſon and Mr. Johnſon. Some thought it ſtrange to ſee Henderſon and Johnſon, two Clergymen, made Commiſſioners for this and the laſt Treaty, when they had acted ſo furiouſly againſt their Biſhops for intermedling in Civil Affairs. But now the Scots bore down all before them, and were ſo ſtrict, that they refus'd to come to York, as a Place not ſecure, in regard their chief Enemy, the Earl of Strafford, commanded there in chief; ſo Rippon, a Town about ſixteen Miles from York, was the Place appointed for the Treaty.

The Treaty of Rippon begins.

2. Upon the firſt Day of October the Treaty began at Rippon, where the Earl of Traquair was excepted againſt, as not being authoris'd as a Commiſſioner; but after ſome Reaſons given by the Engliſh Lords, he was allow'd to be preſent, but not to vote. The Scotch Commiſſioners made the moſt cloſe and particular Applications to the Earls of Bedford, Eſſex, Holland, and the Lord Mandevile; tho' in Publick they ſeem'd equally to careſs them all, where, beſides declaring their Duty and Veneration for their Sovereign, they ran out into voluminous Expreſſions 'Of 'their Affection to the Kingdom and People of England, 'proteſting they had the ſame Regard to their Laws, Liberties and Privileges, as to their own. That as the Invaſions upon their native Country had forc'd them upon 'this Manner of Addreſs, ſo they hop'd it might prove to 'the Benefit of England and all its Subjects, in affording 'them this Opportunity of vindicating their own Liberties 'and Laws, which were infring'd by thoſe very Men, who, 'when they had finiſh'd their Work in Scotland and Ireland, intended to eſtabliſh the ſame Slavery in their own 'Kingdom; all which wou'd be prevented by removing 'three or four Perſons from the King, who of himſelf was 'graciouſly inclin'd to his People; but thoſe ill Men had 'too great an Influence upon his Counſels.' After theſe plauſible Inſinuations, they proceeded to this Propoſal, 'That to prevent the Effuſion of Chriſtian Blood, all Hoſtility ſhou'd ceaſe on either ſide; which cou'd not effectually be done, unleſs preſent Care were taken for the 'Payment of their Army, ſtill reſtrain'd to cloſe and narrow Quarters.' There was not one of the Engliſh Commiſſioners but approv'd of theſe Motions, and promis'd to himſelf ſome Advantage from the Alterations which were like to happen. To thoſe Lords, with whom they deſir'd a ſtricter Confidence, the Scots ſpoke more freely 'Of the Exceſs of the Queen's Power, which was ſo prevalent with 'the King, that he cou'd never be happy, till he had ſuch 'about him, as were of Honour and Experience, and zealous for the Proteſtant Religion, now in great Danger 'from the exorbitant Power of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and others influenc'd by him. Then they aſſur'd 'them of their Affections to their Kingdom, that tho' they 'ſhou'd receive immediate Satisfaction as to their own 'Concerns, they wou'd not deſiſt, till Proviſion was likewiſe made for the true Intereſt of England, and a Reformation in Church and State.' This Model was approv'd by moſt of the King's Commiſſioners; who patiently liſten'd to all they ſaid in publick, of which they deſign'd to give an Account to the King, and willingly heard whatever they ſaid in private, drawing ſuch an Uſe from it, as they thought moſt conducing to their own Ends.

The chief Propoſal of the Scots.

Thus the Scots gain'd Ground with little or no Oppoſition: But during theſe Tranſactions, a great Complaint was made to the Engliſh Commiſſioners by two Durham Gentlemen againſt Meldrum, Secretary to the Scotch General Leſley, who at the Time the new Aſſeſſment was laid upon the Biſhoprick, publickly ſpoke theſe Words in the Shire-Houſe; I wonder you are ſo ignorant, that you cannot ſee what is good for your ſelves: For they in the South are ſenſible of the enſuing Good, and that we came not unſent for, and that oftner than once, or twice, by your Great Ones. There being a Doubt made at theſe Words, Great Ones; he reply'd to them, your own Lords, with a further Explanation. All this was offer'd upon Oath by the two Gentlemen to the Commiſſioners; but the Lords only requir'd them to write down the Words, and ſubſcribe their Names, which were John Killinghall and Nicolas Chayter. The Paper being ſhewn to the Scotch Commiſſioners, they ſent it to General Leſley at Newcaſtle; who ſent back another Paper to Rippon, in which his Secretary deny'd the Words. Whereupon ſome of the Engliſh Commiſſioners requir'd they ſhou'd go to the Scotch Camp at Newcaſtle, and give in their Teſtimony before Leſley himſelf. The Gentlemen reply'd, They had rather, and cou'd more ſafely teſtify it in any Court of England; yet they wou'd do it there, provided they might have a ſafe Conduct from the Scotch Commiſſioners; there being as yet no Ceſſation of Arms. Hereupon a Meſſenger was ſent to them for a ſafe Conduct for the Gentlemen; but he brought this Anſwer from the Earl of Dumferling, That the two Gentlemen were unwiſe, if they went to give ſuch Teſtimony at the Camp: And then ſpeaking with the Lord Lowdon, he again told the Meſſenger, That ſuch a ſafe Conduct cou'd not be granted, and that he wou'd ſatisfy the Earl of Bedford. Upon which laſt Anſwer the two Gentlemen were diſmiſs'd, and the Buſineſs ſeem'd to be at an End.

A Complaint of ſome Words ſpoken by a Scot,

But to no Effect.

However by means of private Intercourſes, another Diſcovery was made of more than ordinary Importance; which was a forg'd Ingagement of the Lord Savile's, formerly hinted at, which having the Names of many Engliſh Lords and great Men, ſeems to have had greater Effects than all the real Invitations. The Scots now not meeting with expected Performances, according to this Ingagement, the Lord Lowdon and Mr. Johnſon privately apply'd themſelves to the Lord Mandevile, and with ſevere Expoſtulations charg'd the Earls of Bedford, Eſſex and Warwick, the Lords Say, Brook, Savile and himſelf with Breach of Promiſe and Ingagement, profeſſing, That they had never invaded England, but upon Confidence of their keeping Faith with them, according to thoſe Articles they had ſign'd and ſent to them. They likewiſe urg'd it as an Act of great Ingratitude towards them, who had hazarded all that was dear to them, upon the Perſwaſions and Ingagements of thoſe Lords. This Diſcourſe both ſurpris'd and amaz'd the Lord Mandevile; who procur'd a Meeting with the Lord Savile next Day, where to that Lord's great Diſhonour and Mortification, it was diſcover'd and own'd to be all a Forgery, and that he had counterfeited the Hands of thoſe great Men, whom he thought moſt zealous for the Scotch Cauſe. After ſome Extenuations and Profeſſions of Good to the Cauſe, it was thought convenient to proceed no further in the Diſcovery, than the clearing the Lords that ſtood charg'd, and cutting out their Names from the forg'd Ingagement; and all this without reſtoring the Ingagement it ſelf. The Earl of Mancheſter's Memoirs are very particular in this Matter, and further aſſure us, That the Scots labour'd under ſuch Difficulties, by the Failure of thoſe Supplies they expected from their ſuppos'd Confederates, that they once deſign'd to retreat with their Army to the Borders, and caſt themſelves upon his Majeſty's Grace and Favour, by a Petition and Remonſtrance, ſetting forth this Invitation and Ingagement that had brought them into England. But tho' they were not ſo formally invited as they believ'd, yet they met with a hearty Welcome; and conſidering the mighty Conſequences of this bold Attempt, it may be ſaid, That Providence often ſeems to play with Human Affairs, and influence the Fate of Kingdoms by the moſt improbable Meaſures and Counſels, if he had not deſign'd them to be ſubſervient to his great Ends.

A remarkable Diſcovery.

The Lord Savile's Forgery.

The Engliſh Commiſſioners return to York.

3. The Treaty had continu'd but a few Days at Rippon, when the Engliſh Commiſſioners return'd to the King at York, and gave him an Account of what had paſs'd, and how zealous the Scots were to his Majeſty's Service; which was the more magnify'd, becauſe they had politickly, if not generouſly, reſtor'd the Officers taken Priſoners at Newburn, particularly Wilmot and O-Neal, who much extoll'd the Diſcipline and Strength of their Forces. Three of the Commiſſioners, and no more, were of the King's Council, the Earls of Pembroke, Salisbury and Holland, who were all influenc'd by the Scots, and approv'd of whatever they pretended to deſire. Beſides theſe the King had but five to adviſe with, the Lord-Keeper Finch, a Perſon ſo obnoxious to the People, tho' affectionate to his Majeſty, that he ſtrove to ingratiate himſelf with thoſe he found able to protect him; the Duke of Richmond, young, and more us'd to diſcourſe with the King in the Bed-Chamber, than at the Council-Board; the Marqueſs of Hamilton, who had leave to be wary, and to move in the Clouds; Sir Henry Vane, and the Earl of Strafford, which laſt was the only Man, whoſe Advice was of any Credit with the King. And he thought there was but one Way, and that not proper to be heard in Council, which was to drive the Scots out of the Kingdom by the Engliſh Army: Wherefore he ſent Major Smith with a Party of Horſe, who defeated two or three of their Troops in the Biſhoprick, and made it appear that the Kingdom might be freed from the reſt, if it were vigorouſly purſu'd. Upon this General Leſley complain'd, That he had forborn any ſuch Attempt out of Reſpect to the Treaty; and the Engliſh Commiſſioners fancy'd themſelves affronted in it. And when it was known that the commanding Officer was a Papiſt, it increas'd the Clamour; and the King was prevail'd with to reſtrain his General from giving any more ſuch Orders.

They go back to Rippon.

The King was ſo far diſpleas'd with the Temper of the Commiſſioners, that he thought the Parliament wou'd be more jealous of his Honour than they appear'd to be; and therefore he ſent them back to renew the Treaty, and conclude

The Articles of the Treaty.

The Treaty remov'd to London.

clude a Ceſſation of Arms upon the beſt Terms they cou'd. After many high Demands, and much Time ſpent, upon the 26th Day of October they agreed upon twelve Articles, The Subſtance of which was ‘ A preſent Ceſſation of Arms, with a peaceable Retaining what both Parties were in Poſſeſſion of; A Continuation of the eight Hundred and Fifty Pounds per Diem, in which Payment Cumberland and Weſtmoreland were alſo to be included: That the River Tees was to be the Boundary of both Armies, and private Inſolencies to be no Breach of the Treaty. And after all it was agreed that the Treaty ſhou'd be adjourn'd and transferr'd to London, where further Demands were to be heard;’ the only Thing deſir'd by the Scots, without which they cou'd never have effected their great Deſigns. At the ſame time the Earl of Pembroke was ſent to borrow two hundred Thouſand Pounds of London for the Payment of both Armies, while the Ceſſation and Treaty ſhou'd continue; to which the City eaſily agreed, being to be repaid out of the firſt Mony that ſhou'd be rais'd in Parliament. Thus the unfortunate Treaty broke up, but not ended; about which Time the Earl of Montroſs, who had been fatally engag'd with the Covenanters, began to deteſt their Proceedings, and having written a dutiful Letter to the King, with general Expreſſions of Loyalty and Affection, the King had ſuch Attendants about him, that the Subſtance of it was ſent back to General Leſley; who challenging Montroſs with holding Intelligence with the Enemy, he undauntedly own'd it, asking Who it was, that durſt reckon the King an Enemy? And with this Bravery quaſh'd this Charge, ſo that they dared not to proceed againſt him in a judicial Manner.

Cenſures upon it.

Thus England lay under the Weight of two diſtinct Armies in her Bowels, which, beſides private Oppreſſions without Number, was a certain Charge of fifty Thouſand Pounds a Month. Several Errors and falſe Steps are juſtly complain'd of by good Writers in the Management of this War and Treaty. But the laſt prov'd the moſt fatal, which was the removing the Treaty from Rippon to London, and upon any Terms conſenting that the Scotch Commiſſioners ſhou'd reſide there before a Peace concluded. This is call'd a confounding Error, which not only gave them Opportunity to publiſh all their Counſels and Directions in their Sermons to the Multitude, and to give their continual Advice to ſuch of the Engliſh who yet knew not how to compaſs their Ends, but alſo to interpoſe in the Name of their Nation, and make ſuch Demands on the Behalf of Scotland, as under no leſs Stile wou'd have receiv'd any Countenance. This carrying with it the Inclinations of an incens'd People, brought an univerſal Terror upon thoſe of neareſt Relation to the King's Service, as well as many at a greater Diſtance, whoſe greateſt Warineſs and Wiſdom was employ'd to preſerve Themſelves from the Power of the approaching Parliament.

The Treatment of the Scotch Commiſſioners at London.

The Earl of Rothes, and two or three more were added to the Scotch, and it is almoſt incredible to ſhew how much their Commiſſioners were admir'd and even idoliz'd in the City of London; they were feaſted and preſented by all ſorts of People, and their Lodgings viſited as the Repoſitories of Divine Truths, tho' the Petition and Tumults that follow'd were generally form'd in thoſe Places; and indeed, both by Parliament and City, they were look'd upon as Angels of Light; and they frequented the Congregations of the Diſſenting Miniſters, who from all Quarters of the Kingdom flock'd into the City; as if they were to convert an unſanctify'd Heathen Nation. Epiſcopacy was run down as Tyrannical, the Rites of the Church as Superſtitious, and Bowing at the Name of Jeſus had a Book written againſt it with no leſs Title, than Jeſus-Worſhip confuted: So that it was obſerv'd by a pleaſant Gentleman, If a Mahometan had heard it cry'd about, as it was, he might have reaſonably thought, that the Nation at that Time was going about to deny their Saviour.

A Mob in London.

4. Theſe were all ſo many Symptoms and Fore-runners of the Downfall of the Church of England; a glorious Fabrick, which with frequent Repairings had ſtood the full Age of Mankind, fourſcore Years, with all the Appearance of Strength and Firmneſs. But now its Ruin began to be apparent, being haſtned on by the Unskilfulneſs of the late Artificers, and the Treachery of ſome of the Workmen, as well as all the violent Attacks from without. Archbiſhop Laud was the moſt vigorous, but moſt unſucceſsful Supporter of it, and when Priſoner in the Tower ſaid to a Friend, That he endeavour'd the Repair of an old Houſe; but it had been ſo much neglected, and run to Ruin, as to fall about his Ears in the Attempt. The People indeed began to entertain inſuperable Prejudices againſt Him and his Order, and all the ſeveral Means us'd to ſtrengthen and ſupport it. For beſides their diſperſing of great Numbers of ſcandalous Papers and Libels; not many Days before the Parliament met, a Mob of no leſs than two Thouſand Browniſts, and the like Sectaries, enter'd St. Paul's Cathedral, where the High-Commiſſion Court then ſat, and after a ſtrange Manner tore down all the Benches, and with great Tumult cry'd out, No Biſhop! No High-Commiſſion!

The Impudence and Boldneſs of the Papiſts.

But ſtill the moſt general Outcry among the Vulgar was the Danger from the Papiſts and Arminians; and the Archbiſhop was exclaim'd againſt as a Favourer of One, as well as the Other. The Former had for many Years enjoy'd a great Calm, and were treated as good Subjects at Court, and as good Neighbours in the Country. But, as the Lord Clarendon obſerves, they were not prudent Managers of this Proſperity; and tho' their Numbers might not ſo much encreaſe, yet their Pomp and Boldneſs did to a Degree that ſeem'd to threaten the eſtabliſh'd Religion. They appear'd more publickly, and diſputed more openly, than had been formerly known: They reſorted to Maſs at Somerſet-Houſe, and return'd in great Multitudes, with as little Reſervedneſs, as others came from the neighbouring Churches: They attempted to make Converts of uninform'd Ladies, with ſuch Circumſtances, as provok'd the Rage, and deſtroy'd the Charity of great Families, which long'd for their Suppreſſion; and they were likewiſe deeply concern'd, in being the publick Promoters and Receivers, in the moſt odious and grievous Projects. Their Prieſts, tho' liable to the higheſt Penalties, were departed from their former Fear and Modeſty, and were as willing to be known, as to be eſteem'd; and for the moſt invidious Protection of the whole Party, a publick Agent from Rome uſually reſided at London; publickly careſs'd and viſited, and avowedly attended by the Romaniſts of all Conditions, over whom he aſſum'd a particular Juriſdiction. In their Contributions, formerly mention'd, they had expreſs'd more Vanity than Prudence would have admitted; which by the Queen were preſented as a Free-Will Offering from the King's Catholick Subjects, for the carrying on the War againſt the Scots; which drew upon them the Rage of that Nation, with little Reverence to the Perſon of her Majeſty, as if ſhe deſir'd to ſuppreſs the Proteſtant Religion in both Kingdoms, by the Arms of the Papiſts. In ſhort, ſays the noble Hiſtorian, they carry'd themſelves ſo, as if they had been ſuborn'd by the Scots to root out their own Religion.

The Archbiſhop blam'd for all.

Still the Archbiſhop bore a great Share of the Blame, and was ſaid to be more than Popiſhly affected; notwithſtanding his famous Book againſt the Jeſuite Fiſher, and the conſiderable Converts he had made; notwithſtanding his zealous promoting the Collections for the Palatine Churches, and his hearty Proviſions for the diſtreſſed Rochellers and their Religion. It is certain that he ſhew'd ſome Favours to the Romaniſts, and ſometimes conniv'd at their Practices; but that was, as he declar'd, to obtain the like Indulgences for the Proteſtants that liv'd under Popiſh Princes. But what was thought the moſt criminal part of his Charge, was a Deſign of working a Reconciliation between the Church of England and Rome: This is boldly aſſerted by ſome, and partly own'd and vindicated by others, as a Project agreeable to the moſt extenſive Charity. But upon a full Examination, it appears, That all the pompous Ceremonies, and the Approaches towards Popery, ſo zealouſly promoted, may be comprehended under the Name of a Rivalſhip, more than any Imitation of the Church of Rome.

The chief Papiſts take him for their Enemy.

For tho' the Puritans exclaim'd againſt him for a Papiſt, and many of the Papiſts look'd upon him as their own, yet the wiſeſt and moſt knowing of their Party were of a direct contrary Opinion. So that when a Novice with great Joy had told a Father of the Engliſh College at Rome, That now the Engliſh were returning to their Mother Church, for they began to ſet up Altars, to officiate in Copes, to adorn their Churches, to have the Pictures of Saints, &c. To this the old Father reply'd with ſome Indignation, That he talk'd like an ignorant Novice; That theſe rather tended to the Ruin, than the Advancement of the Catholick Cauſe; for the Church of England now drawing nearer to the antient Uſages, the Catholicks there wou'd ſooner be brought off from them, than any more come over to Rome. This Dr. Heylin had from a Perſon of known Nobility; which Opinion is ſufficiently confirm'd by two Certificates publiſh'd by Mr. Wharton; which ſhews that the Archbiſhop's Death was reported at Rome with great Satisfaction, where an Abbot declar'd, They had Cauſe to rejoice, that in England the greateſt Enemy of the Church of Rome was cut off, and the greateſt Champion of the Church of England ſilenc'd. Page 616.

A Plot againſt the King and the Archbiſhop.

The Papiſts, who hop'd to gain great Advantages by the Power and Prevalency of the Queen, found the Archbiſhop ſo averſe to their Practices, and the King ſo immoveable in the Maintenance of the Church of England, that they thought it neceſſary to ſet them both aſide, before they cou'd effect any Thing anſwerable to their Expectation. A Confederacy was form'd amongſt them this Year, conſiſting of ſome of the moſt ſubtle Heads in the Jeſuitical Party; by whom it was concluded to foment the Broils begun in Scotland, land, and to blow up thoſe Flames, that the King being drawn into a War, might afford them Opportunity to effect their Deſign of ſending Him and the Archbiſhop to the other World. Which being, out of Compunction of Conſcience, made known by one of their Party to Andreas ab Habernsfield, who had been Chaplain, as was ſaid, to the Queen of Bohemia, they both together gave Intimation of it to Sir William Boſwell, the King's Reſident at the Hague; having firſt bound him by Oath not to reveal it to any Man living but the Archbiſhop Himſelf, and by Him to the King. This was ſignify'd by Boſwell's Letter in September, together with a general Draught of the Deſign, tranſmitted to the Archbiſhop, under the Hand of Habernsfield Himſelf, the firſt Diſcoverer of the Plot. On the Receipt of which Diſpatches, the Archbiſhop, incouraging Boſwell to proceed to a further Diſcovery, ſent the Intelligence with all imaginable Speed to the King at York; begging nothing more than his Secrecy, 'That he wou'd not truſt his Pockets 'with thoſe dangerous Papers, and that he wou'd further 'declare his Pleaſure for the Proſecution of the Buſineſs.

Which is not much credited.

A Foreigner's Obſervation.

Thus far both the King and He had very good Reaſon to be ſenſible of the Dangers that threatned them: But when the Large Diſcovery was brought to him in Boſwell's Letter in October, he found ſome Names in it, which diſcredited the whole Relation, as well in his Majeſty's Judgment, as his own. For beſides the naming of ſome profeſs'd Papiſts, as the Dutcheſs of Buckingham, the Counteſſes of Arundel and Newport, Mountague, Digby and Winter, whoſe Fidelity the King was not willing to ſuſpect, he nam'd the Earl of Arundel, Secretary Windebank, and Porter a Groom of the Bed-chamber, whom he plac'd among the King's Enemies, and ſuch as betray'd his Secrets to the Pope's Nuncio; all whom his Majeſty look'd upon as Men of approv'd Loyalty and Affections to him. By Reaſon of which, no ſufficient Credit being given to the Advice they had from Boſwell, the Danger ſo much apprehended at firſt, became more ſlighted and neglected, than conſiſted with his Majeſty's Safety, and the Condition of the Times, ſo pregnant with Miſchief. For tho' the Party who firſt open'd the Diſcovery might be miſtaken in the Names of ſome of the Accomplices, by reaſon of their near Relation to the Church of Rome; yet the Calamities which ſoon after fell upon both, with their fatal Ends, ſufficiently declare, that there was ſome greater Reality in the Plot, than the King was willing to believe. But as it had been his Father's Maxim, That Suſpicion was the Sickneſs and Diſeaſe of a Tyrant, which expos'd him to the dark Practices of ſubtle Projectors; ſo this King's natural Conſtitution was, not to be jealous of any Man of whom he had once thought well, as Clarendon aſſures us: And his Maxim was, It was better to be deceiv'd, than to diſtruſt; which is believ'd to have open'd a Paſſage to all thoſe Miſfortunes, which fell upon him in the whole Courſe of his Reign, eſpecially for ten Years laſt paſt. Then, through a modeſt Diffidence of Himſelf, he unhappily yielded to be led by Others, who were wanting either in Skill, Fidelity, or Courage; which caus'd ſo many falſe Steps in this nice Juncture: So that le Clerk, a Foreigner not partial in his Favour, thus concludes, 'If there have been Kings, as 'doubtleſs there have been many, who have deceiv'd their 'Subjects; there never was One, whom his Subjects did 'did ſo frequently and cruelly deceive, as Charles the 'Firſt.

The unhappy State of the Nation.

Thus the Clouds were gathering in all Parts, while the Parliament was approaching; whoſe Meeting was expected by the Nation with ſuch Longings and Impatience, that every Moment that retarded it, was thought a Grievance or Miſfortune: For moſt Men began to think that Nothing cou'd make the Nation happy but a Parliament, and that no Parliament cou'd make it miſerable. The King Himſelf was reduc'd to great Straits and Perplexities, yet was full of hopes that his Condition was better than it ſeem'd to be: But the main Care and Buſineſs of the Courtiers was, to preſerve themſelves from the Cenſure of the enſuing Parliament, and to render Themſelves gracious to Thoſe who were like to be powerful in the Houſe. Tho' all Things tended towards a Confuſion and Combuſtion, yet the Lord Clarendon is of Opinion, That the Fire, which ſhortly after burnt the whole Kingdom, might at this Time have been cover'd under a Buſhel. But if the Fire was ſo ſmall, the combuſtible Matter was prodigiouſly great, and ſo unhappily diſpos'd, that a Blaſt from any Corner was ſufficient to throw it into a Flame.

The Death of Dr. Jackſon,

Archbiſhop Neile,

Judge Jones,

Dr. Chaderton,

And Dr. Alabaſter.

But before we enter upon this fatal Parliament, we ſhall conclude this Period with the Deaths of three eminent Men this Year. The firſt was Dr. Thomas Jackſon, the Ornament of the Univerſity of Oxford, Preſident of Corpus Chriſti Colledge, and Dean of Peterborough; a Man of great Piety and Worth, Induſtry and Abilities, a great Maſter of the Fathers, and profoundly read in Theology, as appears from his many learned Treatiſes. The next was Dr. Richard Neile, Archbiſhop of York, who by his Merits had paſs'd through all the Degrees and Orders of the Church of England, having been School-Maſter, Curate, Vicar, Parſon, Chaplain, Maſter of the Savoy, Dean of Weſtminſter, Clerk of the Cloſet to two Kings, Biſhop of Rocheſter, Litchfield, Lincoln, Durham and Wincheſter, and laſtly Archbiſhop of York; in which he dy'd but three Days before the Parliament met, full of years, as he was full of Honours; a faithful Subject to his Prince, an indulgent Father to his Clergy, a bountiful Patron to his Chaplains, and a true Friend to all that rely'd upon him. A little above a Month after he was follow'd by Serjeant William Jones, one of the Judges of the King's Bench, a Perſon of eminent Skill and Knowledge in the Municipal Laws of the Nation; but his Memory ſuffers upon the Account of his open Judgment for the Ship-Mony, the unhappy Conſequences of which he did not live to ſee. Beſides theſe three, we may juſtly mention two Others, Dr. Laurence Chaderton, the firſt Maſter of Emanuel Colledge in Cambridge; a Perſon who was choſen by the Puritans to be one of their four Repreſentatives in Hampton-Court Conference, and was afterwards employ'd to be one of the Tranſlators of the Bible. He was a grave, pious and excellent Preacher, who freely reſign'd his Maſterſhip of the Colledge, liv'd to ſee ſeveral of his Succeſſors, and dy'd extreamly old, in the Hundred and Fifth Year of his Age. The Other, with whom we ſhall conclude, was Dr. William Alabaſter, a very conſiderable Divine, educated in Trinity Colledge in Cambridge; yet ſo remarkable in other Reſpects, that Wood acknowledges that he was the rareſt Poet and Grecian, that any one Age or Nation has produc'd.

I. 1. HAVING through various Steps and Turnings paſs'd over the longeſt, and moſt happy Part of this Reign, we are entring upon the dark and ſtormy Part; which to the Nation prov'd diſmal and calamitous, as much beyond Expectation as Example. And all this occaſion'd by what was then thought a certain Cure for all Diſtempers, a Parliament. The ſhort Continuance, as well as the Diſcontinuance of thoſe Aſſemblies, was accounted one of the greateſt Grievances of the Kingdom; therefore all poſſible Care was taken to prolong this, and to make it ſupply all former Defects; and no leſs Endeavours were us'd in the Choice of Members that were judg'd proper for ſuch relieving Purpoſes.

Preparations towards a Change in the Government.

Thoſe few who bore the greateſt Sway in the Elections, and afterwards in the Parliament it ſelf, ſuch as the Lord Say, the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Stroude, Mr. Knightley, and ſome others, had for a conſiderable Time been watching for all Advantages in reſpect to the publick Errors and Grievances, and with infinite Skill and Induſtry were labouring for a Change in the Government; ſuch an Alteration as might intirely weaken, if not root out that prevailing Power that produc'd them. As they were Perſons neglected and unimploy'd by the Court, and ſome of them Sufferers from it, they were implacably bent againſt the Authority then practis'd both by the Civil and the Eccleſiaſtical Judges; and accordingly they manag'd and purſu'd their Deſigns with indefatigable Vigour, as well as admirable Dexterity. Mr. Hampden went Yearly to conſult with his Friends in Scotland, Mr. Pym rode through divers Counties in England, and others us'd the like Endeavours to effect the main Deſign; and by their Pains and Subtlety they daily gather'd ſuch Strength, that long before the Parliament met, one of the Head of them boaſted, That their Party was then ſtrong enough to pull the King's Crown from his Head, but the Goſpel wou'd not ſuffer them.

Several Meetings among the Projectors of it.

In Order to bring about their deep Projects, theſe Politicians had ſeveral private Committees, both in the City of London and the Country: But the moſt conſiderable were the Meetings in Oxfordſhire and Northamptonſhire, the one at Broughton, the Lord Say's Seat, and the other at Fawſley, the Houſe of Mr. Knightley. It was much obſerv'd that in the Lord Say's Houſe, there was a particular Room, and a Paſſage to it, which his Servants were not permitted to come near; and when the Company was compleat, great Noiſes and Talkings were uſually heard amongſt them, to the Admiration of thoſe who liv'd in the Houſe, who cou'd not ſee or diſcover the Perſons Themſelves. At other Times they met at Fawſley, where, as at other Places in the Kingdom, they had their Council-Chambers and chief Speakers; and what Embryos were conceiv'd in the Country, were often ſhap'd at London, in Grays-Inn-Lane. But their grand Scheme, to which they reſolv'd to adhere, ſeem'd at length to have receiv'd its finiſhing Stroke at Mr. Knightley's own Houſe, where their main Reſolutions were determin'd and concluded. By which Scheme it appears, that they deſign'd many ſtrange Things, which cou'd not be effected without great Struggles and Convulſions, but not thoſe prodigious Alterations that afterwards hapned in Church and State; many of which were indeed the Effects of a Thouſand unforeſeen Cauſes and Accidents. As to the Management and Purſuit of their Cauſe, in Craft and Politicks they ſhew'd themſelves more than Men; but if we judge by the Conſequences and their Diſappointments, they prov'd themſelves weaker than Women: They had all the Succeſs of a Conqueſt, yet all the Misfortunes of a Defeat.

1640. Car. 16.

The Nature of their Scheme.

The firſt Scheme that theſe Men principally aim'd at, as I have been well inform'd, was much the ſame with That which ſeveral Years after appear'd under the Title of Plato Redivivus. The Foundation of which was this choice Maxim receiv'd amongſt them, That all Empire is founded in Property; ſo that the larger the Lands are, the greater is the Power. ‘ But whereas the Kings of England, by the ‘ Alienation of the Crown-Lands, &c. had loſt moſt of ‘ their natural Power, and now chiefly retain'd what was ‘ artificial; they thought it neceſſary to retrench a great ‘ Part of what the King at preſent enjoy'd, and to make ‘ other proper Regulations. Four great Things were ‘ thought too much to be poſſeſs'd by the Kings of England, 1. Their abſolute Power of making Peace and War, ‘ 2. Their ſole Diſpoſal and Ordering the Militia, 3. Their ‘ Power of nominating all great Officers of Truſt and ‘ Profit, and 4. Their Right of diſpoſing of the Common ‘ Revenues of the Crown. To regulate all which, theſe ‘ four Magnalia of Government, as they were call'd, were ‘ to be exercis'd by the Conſent of four ſeveral Councils to ‘ be appointed for that End; and theſe, as well as the Creations of Noblemen, to be nam'd and fix'd in Parliaments, ‘ which were to meet every Year without any Writs or ‘ Summons from the Crown.’ This is the Sum of that Scheme which they are ſaid to have form'd, which was moulded and wrought up with peculiar Fineneſs and Curioſity, ſo that it appear'd infinitely plauſible in the Theory, tho' it prov'd ſtrangely defective in the Practice. However fallible they might prove as to ſome Particulars, being highly incens'd at ſeveral Exorbitancies in the Government, they in General reſolv'd to ſtrike at the chief Prerogatives of the Monarchy, as well as all the Powers of the Hierarchy.

In

Preparations towards Elections.

The Temper of the new Parliament.

In Order to effect which, all neceſſary Correſpondencies were ſettled, all Preparations were made, either of Force or Stratagem: Scarce a Sectary in London, but had before the Meeting of the Parliament furniſh'd himſelf with Arms, to ſerve each Boy in his Houſe; and many Porters Loads of Muskets had been ſeen carried in the Evenings into the Houſes of Men notoriouſly diſaffected, who convey'd both Arms and Libels, printed at the publick Charge, to their Country Aſſociates. Nor durſt the Lord Mayor make Inquiſition, for fear of being accounted an Enemy to the Peace of the Kingdom, then diſcompos'd with Fears and Jealouſies from Papiſts and other Enemies. Then at the Elections they ſhew'd their utmoſt Skill and Diligence, and rode from County to County with that Succeſs, that the Earl of Warwick wrote from York to his Friends in Eſſex, That the Game was well begun. But the Danger of the true Religion was moſt of all cry'd up, and had a prodigious Influence upon the Inferior Sort: Of this Mr. Hampden was juſtly ſenſible, when in Anſwer to a private Friend, who ask'd him, Why they pretended Religion, when Liberty, Property, and temporal Matters were the chief Ends, he reply'd, Shou'd we not uſe the Pretence of Religion, the People wou'd not be perſuaded to aſſiſt us. For this Reaſon they exclaim'd againſt the Nomination of any who belong'd to his Majeſty's Service, and gave Votes for Men of the new Religion, and notorious Oppoſers of the King or the Clergy; whoſe Names they had before privately liſted, by which divers Citizens and Lawyers were choſen Members for thoſe Corporations, that never ſo much as heard of them. Theſe and many other uncommon Practices were us'd to defeat the King's Friends; yet after all their Artifices and Endeavours, the Puritans for Number cou'd not make above a third Part of the Houſe of Commons; and the Numbers were yet much ſmaller of Thoſe who caus'd the great Flames and Convulſions in the Nation; there being few who had the Power of Leading, tho' Multitudes were diſpos'd to follow. Yet this ought to be declar'd, That there were ſtill many great and worthy Men, as eminent as any Age ever produc'd; but moſt of them came with Reſentments, which tho' grounded on juſt Reaſons, prov'd too ſtrong for their Wiſdom and Foreſight, and help'd to overwhelm them and their Friends in the common Ruin. They had unqueſtionably ſeveral real Grievances to redreſs, but few of them were able to apply the right Cures, or to ſtop when the End was actually and effectually obtain'd: In ſhort, they cou'd not enough gueſs at the Conſequences of violent Methods, nor yet ſee, ‘ That while they were defeating their Enemies, they were ‘ haſtning on their own Ruins.

The Characters of the Reformers in the Upper Houſe.

The Earl of Bedford,

2. Such were the Preparations towards the Meeting of this famous Parliament, which was to ſave the Nation. But before we enter upon the Acts and Proceedings of it, it will be very proper to take ſome Notice of the preſent Temper of both Houſes, and to give ſome Account of the few Perſons who were the firſt and chief Movers towards thoſe prodigious Alterations that ſo ſoon hapned. In the Upper Houſe, which conſiſted of about 110 Lords, beſides the Biſhops, there were ſeveral who were highly diſguſted at ſome Severities they felt, and no leſs diſappointed at the Want of Places; and there were more who deſir'd to bring about a Reformation in Church and State; ſo that many were ready to move forwards towards any plauſible Alteration. The chief Leaders of theſe, who with thoſe in the Lower Houſe were call'd Reformers, were the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Say, the Lord Kimbolton, and the Earl of Eſſex. The firſt, the Earl of Bedford, was the moſt moderate, and beſt natur'd of all the reſt, the greateſt Perſon of Intereſt of all the popular Party, and the moſt likely to govern the reſt. He was a wiſe Man, and of too large a Fortune to wiſh a Subverſion of the Government; and it ſoon appear'd, that he, as well as ſome others, only deſign'd to advance Himſelf and his Friends at Court, and not to leſſen the Court it ſelf. So that his Death, which hapned within a few Months after the Meeting of the Parliament, was more thought a Detriment to the King's Cauſe, than any Hindrance of the Deſigns of his Party.

The Lord Say,

The Lord Viſcount Say, before mention'd, was a Man who had the deepeſt Hand in the Original Contrivance of all the Calamities which befel the Nation, tho' he had not the leaſt Thought of diſſolving the Monarchy, and leſs of levelling the Ranks and Diſtinctions of Men. For no Man valu'd himſelf more upon his Family, or had greater Ambition to advance it, and to raiſe his Fortune, which was but mean in reſpect to his Title. He was of a proud, moroſe and cholerick Temper, and of a moſt aſpiring Ambition; but ſuch as wou'd not be ſatiated with Offices and Preferments, without ſome Condeſcenſions and Alterations in Eccleſiaſtical Matters. He had great Parts, and much convers'd with Books, and from his Infancy he had ſuck'd in an implacable Malice againſt the Government of the Church; ſo that for many Years he had been the Oracle of thoſe call'd Puritans in the moſt rigid Senſe, and ſteer'd all their Councils and Deſigns. As he was a profeſs'd Enemy to the Church, ſo he was to moſt of the eminent Church-Men, with ſome of whom he had particular Conteſts. His Commitment at York laſt Year, with the Lord Brook, had given him much Credit; and in Reality he had very great Authority with all the diſſatisfy'd Party in the Kingdom, and a good Reputation with many others, who look'd upon him as a wiſe Man, and ſerviceable in the Preſervation of the Laws in a licentious Age. So that he became the very Pilot to all thoſe Veſſels which were freighted with Sedition and Diſcontent.

The Lord Kimbolton.

The Lord Kimbolton, commonly call'd the Lord Mandevile, and afterwards the Earl of Mancheſter, eldeſt Son to the Lord Privy-Seal, was a Man of greater Civility and good Breeding, having been early brought up in the Court, under the Shelter of the great Duke of Buckingham, and call'd to the Houſe of Peers during the Life of his Father, which was an extraordinary Favour. But afterwards, having marry'd the Daughter of the Earl of Warwick, the richeſt, tho' not moſt rigid Patron of the Puritans, he totally eſtrang'd himſelf from the Court, and clos'd in with the Lord Say, and others before mention'd, who were moſt zealous for a general Reformation. In a Letter afterwards written to this Lord, we find that the Earl his Father, who ſeem'd not to value a particular Religion, had acted a double Part in providing for his two eldeſt Sons, adopting this into the Puritan Party, and entering the other in the Popiſh Religion, ſo that one might never fail of an Intereſt in Times of Extremity. However this Lord having liſted himſelf in the Fraternity of the new Reformers, his generous Diſpoſition, and his Endeavours to improve a Popularity, caus'd him to live above the narrow Allowance made to him by his wary Father, and to contract a Debt which lay very heavy upon him. So that his Father, who was firm to the Crown, and was wont to ſay, That the lopping its Prerogative wou'd endanger the whole Nation, did now often bewail that his Son ſhou'd be ſo deeply engag'd in a popular Party; yet at this Time he found the Benefit of being skreen'd by his ſole Intereſt, from that Infirmity that run through his whole Life, of refuſing Nothing that was given him. Indeed this Lord having ſo great a Share of the moſt obliging Behaviour and good Nature, no Man became a greater Confident of the diſcontented Party than He, and none to whom the whole Maſs of their Deſigns, as well thoſe in Embryo, as thoſe in full Form, was more entirely communicated.

And the Earl of Eſſex.

Theſe three Lords therefore are here mention'd as the principal Agents in the Houſe of Peers; for they were chiefly rely'd on, and without Reſerve truſted by thoſe who were to manage All in the Houſe of Commons, and to raiſe that Spirit which upon all Occaſions was to inflame the Lords, or might by any Means increaſe their Party. By their Artifices, and Application to the Vanity and popular Humour of the Earl of Eſſex, they prevail'd, and got full Poſſeſſion of Him. He was the unhappy Son of an unfortunate Father, and in King James's Reign he had met with great Hardſhips at Court upon the Account of the Favourite Earl of Somerſet; which made ſo ſtrong an Impreſſion upon him, that going to ſerve in Holland, he was heard to ſay, It was Time to learn the Uſe of Arms, if ever he meant to requite that Indignity. Yet ſtill he might have been ſecur'd to the Court, had he been treated according to his Deſerts in reſpect to the Scotch Expedition; for tho' he had a high Opinion of his Merits, he had no Ambition of Title, Office or Preferment, but only to be kindly look'd upon and ſpoken to, and quietly to enjoy his own Fortune; and no Man naturally abhorr'd Rebellion more than He, nor cou'd he have been led into it without a thouſand Diſguiſes and Impoſitions. But having been long neglected, and more than once diſoblig'd by the Court, he was deluded by the Artifices and Inſinuations of others, and at laſt ſhew'd the World how a weak Judgment, ſome Vanity, and much Pride, will hurry a Man into as dangerous Attempts, as the moſt unlimited and inſatiable Ambition. Such was the preſent Temper of the Leaders in the Houſe of Peers, where Warwick, Brook, Wharton, Paget, Howard, and ſome others, implicitely follow'd and obſerv'd the Dictates of the foremention'd Lords, and ſtarted and ſeconded whatever they were directed.

The Characters of the Reformers in the Lower Houſe.

Mr. Pym,

or adorn'd by Art. He had been well known in former Parliaments, and impriſon'd upon the Account of his Freedom of Speech in King James's Reign; ſo that his great Experience in thoſe Aſſemblies, and his Religious Concern for the Anti-Arminian Principles, gave him a mighty Reputation and Authority, both among the younger, and the Puritan Members, tho' he profeſs'd to follow the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church of England. His grave and graceful Way of expreſſing Himſelf, with great Volubility of natural and proper Words, and his peculiar Talent of aggravating the Errors and Failures in the Government, render'd Him for ſome Months the moſt popular Man, and the moſt able to carry a Cauſe, than any that ever appear'd in the Houſe. But meeting with a Proſpect of Preferment, with his great Friend the Earl of Bedford, and inclining a little towards the Court, his Intereſt viſibly abated in the Houſe: So that loſing his Hopes by the Death of the ſaid Earl, and finding that he was then better able to go forwards than backwards, he ſuffer'd himſelf to be carry'd by thoſe who wou'd not follow him, and ſo with indefatigable Pains continu'd to the Day of his Death in the Head of thoſe who made the moſt deſperate Propoſitions.

Mr. Hampden, Mr. John Hampden was a Gentleman of a good Extract and a fair Fortune in Buckinghamſhire, a Perſon of admirable Parts and Abilities, who from a Life of great Pleaſure and Liberty, had ſuddenly withdrawn to extraordinary Sobriety and Strictneſs, and yet retain'd his uſual Chearfulneſs and Affability; which, together with the Opinion of his Wiſdom and Juſtice, and his Courage in ſolely oppoſing the Ship-Mony, exceedingly rais'd his Reputation, not only in his own County, but generally throughout the Kingdom. So that when this Parliament met, the Eyes of all Men were fix'd upon him, as their great Patriot, and the Pilot that muſt ſteer their Veſſel through all the threatning Rocks and Tempeſts; and at that Time it was believ'd his Power and Intereſt was greater to do Good or Hurt, than any Man's in the Nation, or than any Man of his Rank has had at any Time; for his Reputation of Honeſty was univerſal, and his Affections ſeem'd ſo publickly guided, that no corrupt or private Ends cou'd byaſs them. He was a Man of infinite Addreſs and Penetration, had a Sovereign Command of his own Paſſions, and conſequently a great Power over other Mens; ſo that in all Debates, he appear'd the moſt modeſt and calm, yet the moſt inſinuating and ſubtle Speaker, of any in the whole Houſe. And Sir P. Warwick obſerves, That he had a peculiar Dexterity, when a Queſtion was to be put, that did not agree with his own Senſe, in drawing it over to it, by adding ſome equivocal or crafty Word that wou'd enervate the Meaning of it, as it was firſt put. His rare Affabilities and ſeeming Humility gain'd upon great Numbers at firſt; but as none ever had a greater Power over Himſelf, ſo none was leſs the Man he ſeem'd to be; which by Degrees appear'd to all Men, when he found it leſs needful to keep on the Maſque.

Mr. St. John Mr. Oliver St. John was a Branch of the noble Houſe of Bullingbrook, a Lawyer of Lincolns-Inn, noted for his Parts and Induſtry; who having been ten Years before committed and brought into the Star-Chamber, with others of great Name and Reputation, tho' he and the reſt were graciouſly diſcharg'd, he never forgave the Court that firſt Aſſault. This caus'd his Name to be more known; but he was not much taken notice of, till he argu'd the Caſe of the Ship-Mony in behalf of Mr. Hampden; which gave him great Reputation, and call'd him into all Courts, and all Cauſes, where the King's Prerogative was moſt conteſted. He was a Man naturally ſubtle and reſerv'd, of a dark and clouded Countenance, very proud, and converſant with few, but thoſe of his own Humour and Inclinations, from whom he had contracted an implacable Diſpleaſure againſt the Church. Tho' the Court endeavour'd ſhortly to have brought him off, yet being deeply ingag'd with the Earl of Bedford, and the reſt, he became more deeply involv'd in all the Miſeries of the Nation; in which Holles in his Memoirs tells us, that his Opinion always concluded in the ſeverer Side, that he never ſtopp'd, where there was any Way to it, till he came to Blood, or to the Deſtruction of Eſtate and Fortune. He proceeded ſo far in his myſterious Ways, as afterwards to be call'd Cromwell's Dark-Lanthorn.

It was generally believ'd, that theſe three Perſons, with the other three Lords before-mention'd, were of the moſt intimate Truſt with each other, and made up that popular Engine which mov'd all the reſt; yet it was viſible that Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes and young Sir Harry Vane were receiv'd by them with full Confidence, and without Reſerve. Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, The Former was the ſecond Son of the Lord Say before mention'd, a Man of good Parts and Learning, who for ſome Years had been educated at New-College in Oxford, where his Father had been Fellow, by means of his Affinity with the Founder. Leaving the Univerſity, he ſpent his Time Abroad, in Geneva, and amongſt the Cantons of Switzerland, where he improv'd that Diſinclination to the Church which had been inſtill'd in him by Old Subtilty his Father. From his Travels he return'd through Scotland, at the Beginning of the Inſurrections in that Kingdom; and was but little known, except among that People which convers'd wholly among Themſelves, till he was now found in Parliament, when it was ſoon diſcover'd that he was the Darling of his Father, and like to make good all that was promis'd in his Family; which he perform'd in his inceſſant promoting the moſt ſevere and violent Meaſures.

Sir Henry Vane Junior, The other, Sir Henry Vane Junior, the eldeſt Son of the preſent Secretary of State, often call'd Sir Humourous Vanity, was a Man of great natural Parts, and of a very profound Diſſimulation, as well as of a quick Conception, and weighty Expreſſion; and if he was not ſuperior to Mr. Hampden, he was inferior to no other in the moſt ſubtle and exquiſite Artifices. His peculiar Aſpect and unuſual Phyſiognomy made Men think there was ſomething Extraordinary in Him; and the whole Courſe of his Life verify'd that Imagination. Leaving his Studies at Oxford, where his Life was not very ſtrict, he ſpent ſome Time in France, but more in Geneva, where he firſt ſuck'd in that bitter Prejudice to the Church, which after his Return into England he contracted to ſo high a Degree. In this Unſteadineſs, which much did, or ſeem'd to offend his Father, who ſtill appear'd highly conformable, he tranſported himſelf into New-England; where among thoſe profeſs'd Enemies to the Engliſh Church, his Parts and Quality ſo far prevail'd, that at the next Election they choſe him their Governor; in which Poſt, by Means of his New and Enthuſiaſtical Scruples, he had the ill Fortune to be diſpleas'd with Them, and they with Him. But having ſown new Seeds of Diſſenſions, he return'd again into England, and ſeeming much reform'd from his former Extravagancies, by his Father's Approbation and Intereſt he obtain'd a young Lady of Fortune in Marriage, and alſo a Place of great Truſt and Profit in the Navy, and appear'd to be well ſatisfy'd with the Government. Upon the Diſobligation the Father receiv'd from the Earl of Strafford, they abandon'd themſelves to all imaginable Thoughts of Revenge; and from that Time the Son ingag'd himſelf into the Friendſhip of Mr. Pym, and all other diſcontented Perſons, and contributed all that Intelligence which was deſign'd for the Earl's Deſtruction, which acquir'd him the entire Confidence of all thoſe who promoted the ſame: So that in ſhort, Nothing was conceal'd from his Knowledge, tho' 'tis believ'd that he communicated his own Thoughts to very few.

And Mr. Denzill Holles. Beſides theſe two laſt, Mr. Denzill Holles, the younger Son, and younger Brother of the Earls of Clare, was as much eſteem'd by the whole Party as any Man, being of more accompliſh'd Parts than any of the reſt, and of ſingular Reputation for what he acted in Oppoſition to the Court and the Duke of Buckingham, in the Parliament in the fourth Year of this Reign, and his long Impriſonment and ſevere Proſecution afterwards upon that Account; the Memory of all which he retain'd with great Reſentment. He was a Man full of Fire and Vivacity, a vigorous Mover in difficult Paths, and a zealous Promoter of the Scots; whom in his Memoirs he has vindicated, or at leaſt commended more than any of their own Hiſtorians. But he wou'd not concern himſelf againſt the Earl of Strafford, who had marry'd his Siſter, and had all his Children by her, which made him a Stranger to all thoſe Conſultations; yet he did not leſſen his Friendſhip with the Proſecutors Sir Gilbert Gerrard, the Lord Digby, Strode, Haſlerigg, and thoſe moſt incens'd againſt the Earl, or fearful of Themſelves, ſuch as Hotham, Cholmley and Stapleton, with ſome popular Lawyers, who had no Suſpicion of any Wickedneſs in Deſign, and ſo gradually became involv'd in the Worſt, obſerving and following the Directions of the Other, according to the Parts aſſign'd them upon emergent Occaſions.

Theſe were the firſt and principal Leaders, who in the Beginning had a greater Influence than thoſe who afterwards bore the greateſt Sway, ſuch as the Lord Grey of Grooby, Lenthall, Pierepoint, Whitelock and Cromwell himſelf. And this was the Temper and Conſtitution of this famous Parliament at the firſt Meeting, where they immediately obſerv'd all thoſe who were not, nor were like to be of their Opinions, with all imaginable Jealouſy; and whenever their Elections came to be diſputed, they were ſure to be turn'd out, and then all Artifices were us'd to bring in more ſanctify'd Members; ſo that every Week their Party encreas'd, either from new Elections, or Proſelytes they gain'd upon the Old; and all this under the ſpecious, yet juſt Name of Reformation, and Redreſſing of open and manifeſt Grievances.

The Meeting of the LONG PARLIAMENT.

II. 1. With all theſe ill-bodeing Circumſtances the famous Parliament met on the third Day of November at Weſtminſter, with a fuller and more formidable Appearance than was formerly known. The very Day was thought Ominous; ſo that before the appointed Time ſome perſwaded the Archbiſhop to move the King to have the Sitting reſpited for a Day or two longer, becauſe the Parliament in Henry the Eighth, which ended with the Diminution of the Clergy's Power and the Diſſolution of Religious Houſes, began the ſame Day; but the Archbiſhop took little Notice of the Advertiſement. But the Place was really more ominous and hazardous than the Day, and the appointing of That was thought a fatal Error; for no Place at this Time was ſo dangerous as the Neighbourhood of London; but York was adjudg'd moſt proper, which by means of the Scotch Affairs was now in effect the Center of the King's Buſineſs. In the Meeting alſo his Majeſty declin'd the accuſtom'd Way of Riding in a magnificent State from Whitehall to the Church of Weſtminſter, and his Solemn Entrance at the great Weſtern Gate; but choſe to paſs privately in his Barge to the Parliament Stairs, and ſo to the Church, as if it had been to a Return of a prorogu'd or adjourn'd Parliament. The thrifty Omiſſion of the publick Pomp at this Conjuncture, caus'd ſome to preſage that it wou'd prove as inauſpicious to him, as the like Neglect had done at his Coronation; and that this Parliament, which began without Solemnity, wou'd end with Sorrow.

The King's Speech.

As every Thing had a Melancholy Aſpect, ſo the King's Speech was with leſs Spirit and Majeſty than was uſual. Being Seated on his Throne in the Houſe of Lords, He told both Houſes, 'That the Knowledge he had of the 'Deſigns of his Scotch Subjects, was the Cauſe of his Calling 'the laſt Parliament; wherein, if he had been believ'd, he did 'ſincerely think, that Things had not hapned as they now ſaw 'them. But it was no Wonder that Men were ſo ſlow in Be'lieving that ſo great a Sedition cou'd be rais'd on ſo little 'Ground. But now, ſince the Honour and Safety of the 'Kingdom lay ſo near at Stake, he was reſolv'd to put 'Himſelf freely and clearly on the Love and Affection of his 'Engliſh Subjects: Therefore he ſhou'd not at all mention 'his own Intereſt, or that Support he might juſtly expect 'from them, till the common Safety was ſecur'd: Though 'he muſt tell them, That he was not aſham'd to ſay, thoſe 'Charges he had been at were meerly for the Security and 'Good of his Kingdom, tho' Succeſs had not anſwer'd 'his Deſires. Wherefore he ſhou'd only deſire them to 'conſider the beſt Way for the Safety and Security of the 'Kingdom; wherein were two Things chiefly conſidera'ble; Firſt the chaſing out of Rebels; Secondly the Sa'tisfying their juſt Grievances, in which he promis'd ſo to 'concur with them, as to ſatisfy the World of his In'tentions to make this a flouriſhing and glorious King'dom. Two Things more he wou'd acquaint them with'all; Firſt, that the Loan of the City of London, and the 'Mony advanc'd by thoſe Lords who waited upon him at 'York, wou'd pay his Army but two Months from their 'Advance; and therefore he referr'd it to their Conſidera'tion, what a great Diſhonour and Miſchief it wou'd be to 'this Kingdom, if his Army for Want of Mony ſhou'd be 'forc'd to disband, before the Rebels were put out of it: 'And Secondly, the Redreſſing the great Calamities the 'Northern Counties endur'd, in which all England was 'like to ſuffer with them. Laſt of all, deſiring them to 'lay aſide all Suſpicion of one another, and declaring it 'ſhou'd not be his Fault if this were not a good and happy 'Parliament, he referr'd them to the Lord-Keeper.' That Lord in a long Harangue, after his inſiſtingupon the Perſonal Worth and Virtues of his Majeſty, and naming this uſual Saying of his, He ſerves me beſt, who ſerves me with Honeſty and Integrity, he gave a full and ſatisfactory Account of the Scotch Invaſion, with all the threatning Dangers that attended ſo formidable an Appearance.

Beſides other ill Beginnings, there befell at this Time an irretrievable Misfortune, as to the King's Affairs, in the Choice of a Speaker. His Majeſty deſign'd Sir Thomas Gardiner, Recorder of London, to have been the Perſon, as being every Way worthy of the Place; but being a known Friend to the King, the Enemies of the Court had prevented his Election, not only in the City, but in all other Places where he ſtood. So that upon a ſudden Mr. William Lenthall, a Bencher of Lincoln's-Inn, was fix'd upon by the King, a Lawyer of competent Practice, not then noted for any Diſaffection to the Government, either in Church or State. He was rather prevail'd with, than perſuaded to accept the Charge, and yet the King cou'd not have made a worſe Choice among all the Profeſſion; for he was a Man of a very narrow and timorous Nature, and of no Experience or Converſation in the Affairs of the Kingdom, beyond what he had been ingag'd in by the very Drudgery of his Profeſſion, in which all his Deſign was to make himſelf rich. In ſhort, he was in all Reſpects unequal to the Work, not knowing how to preſerve his own Dignity, or to reſtrain the Exorbitancies of others; ſo that his Weakneſs as much contributed to the growing Calamities, as the Malice of the chief Projectors. Two Days after he was ſolemnly approv'd by his Majeſty, who at that Time underſtanding, that great Offence had been taken by the Scots and their Friends, becauſe in his Speech he had twice call'd them by the Name of Rebels, he choſe to explain Himſelf in another Speech, and in theſe Words: I told you that the Rebels muſt be put out of this Kingdom; it's true, I muſt needs call them ſo, ſo long as they have an Army that invades us; and tho' I am under Treaty with them, and I under my great Seal do call them my Subjects, and ſo they are too. This is thought to have given the Commons too great a Senſe of their own Power, and his Compliance; ſo that they reſolv'd not ſo eaſily to part with their Scotch Friends, as the King hop'd and expected.

The King explains his Speech.

Grievances and Petitions.

2. The Houſe of Commons had ſat about four Days, ſettling of ſmaller Matters, when they began to open the dark Scene of Complaints and Grievances. A wonderful elated Countenance was obſerv'd in many of the Members, who ſhew'd themſelves full of Hopes and Reſentments; and the ſame Men who ſix Months before were thought to be very calm and moderate, talk'd now in another Dialect both of Things and Perſons: They alledg'd, That now they muſt not only ſweep the Houſe clean below, but pull down all the Cobwebs above, to prevent new Duſt, and a foul Houſe hereafter; that now they cou'd make their Country happy, by eradicating the Cauſes of all Grievances, if all wou'd do their Duties. Many tragical Petitions were deliver'd to the Houſe, in behalf of the moſt notorious Sufferers formerly mention'd, as Prynne, Burton and Baſtwick, Lilburn, Leighton, &c. Then the particular Grievances of the ſeveral Counties were repreſented; as thoſe of Hertfordſhire by Mr. Arthur Capel, of Yorkſhire by Mr. Bellaſis and the Lord Fairfax, of Lincolnſhire by Sir John Wray, of Weſtmoreland by Sir Philip Muſgrave, of Wilts by Sir Francis Seymour, of Worceſterſhire by Sir John Packington, of Rutland by Sir Guy Palmes, of Norfolk by Sir Edmund Montford, of Eſſex by Sir Thomas Barrington, of Kent by Sir John Culpeper, and of other Counties and Towns by their reſpective Knights and Burgeſſes.

Speeches, by Mr. Pym,

Sir B. Rudyard,

Mr. Bagſhaw,

And Sir J. Holland.

The grave and leading Mr. Pym open'd the Scene in an Harangue of two Hours long upon all the Grievances of the Nation, under three Heads; Firſt, againſt the Privileges of Parliaments, Secondly to the Prejudice of Religion, and Laſtly againſt the Liberty of the Subject: All which he ſubdivided into numerous Branches, diverſify'd and aggravated with no ſmall Skill and Management, and particularly inveigh'd againſt that great and unparallel'd Grievance the Ship-Mony, and alſo inſiſted upon the Legality of Annual Parliaments. Then Sir Benjamin Rudyard deliver'd a Speech chiefly againſt the Innovations in Religion; yet he ſpoke honourably of his Majeſty's free putting Himſelf into the Hands of his Parliament, and of his being wiſer than his Adviſers; had let fall this healing Expreſſion, The King is reduc'd to great Straits, in which it were Undutifulneſs beyond Humanity to take Advantage of Him; let us rather make it an Advantage for him, to do him beſt Service when he has moſt need. Mr. Bagſhaw ſpoke more ſeverely, and concluded with this Propoſal, Let the woful Violation of the Statute of Monopolies, and the Petition of Right, be made Felony, or Premunire at leaſt; but in the interim, let them be made Examples of Puniſhment, who have been the Authors of thoſe Miſeries, according to the Counſel of Solomon, 'Take away the Wicked from before the King, 'and his Throne ſhall be eſtabliſh'd in Righteouſneſs.' Sir John Holland ſpoke next with more Modeſty and Temper: He touch'd upon the Grievances, and recommended a Redreſs of them, but then he ſaid, Touching ſupplying his Majeſty's Wants, I humbly deſire we may proceed therein within its due Time, and that with as much Loyal Duty and Liberality as ever any People expreſs'd towards their Prince.----- Let us remove the Scotiſh Army with a ſoft and gentle Hand of Mediation and Reconciliation, if it may be wrought with his Majeſty's Honour, and the Kingdom's Safety: If not, then to repel them with ſtout and reſolute Spirits, with valiant and united Hearts and Hands, ſuch as beſt ſuit with our Duty to God, our King, and our Country.

Committees.

So numerous were the Complaints and Petitions concerning Grievances, that the whole Houſe was divided, and ſubdivided into above forty Committees to hear and examine them: But the main were reducible to theſe four Heads, 1. Committees concerning Religion, Innovations in the Church, and Grievances in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. 2. Committees concerning publick Affairs in general, and particularly Ireland and Scotland. 3. Other Committees relating to Ship-Mony, Judges and Courts of Juſtice. 4. Committees concerning Popery, the Popiſh Hierarchy, the Pope's Nuncio, Plots, Deſigns, &c. ſo that all Things began to appear more and more with a formidable Aſpect.

Speeches, by the Lord Digby.

3. After an Appointment of a ſolemn Faſt, and a ſtrict Enquiry after Papiſts, the next Day began with a freſh Stream of Complaints and Harangues made by the Lord Digby, Sir John Culpeper, and Mr. Harbottle Grimſtone. The Firſt made a celebrated Speech againſt the intolerable Burden of Ship-Mony, the Abuſes in Preſſing Soldiers, the Multitude of Monopolies, and other common Grievances; where mentioning the new Canons and Oath, he call'd the latter a Covenant againſt the King for Biſhops and the Hierarchy, as the Scoth Covenant was againſt the King and Biſhops. Then he ſatyrically quibled upon Biſhops and the late Convocation, whom he term'd a new Synod, made up of an old Convocation, and call'd their granting a Benevolence to the King, a Malevolence in them to the Parliament, and a Malevolence in the Refuſers from the Biſhops, with a Penalty of no leſs than the Loſs of Heaven and Earth; Heaven by Excommunication, and Earth by Deprivation. He highly extoll'd the King's Virtues, but no leſs condemn'd evil Counſellors; ſo that whereas Money rais'd from Subjects was formerly as Vapours by the Sun exhal'd from the Earth, to be diſtill'd again in fructifying Showers; of late they were only Clouds to darken the Sun, and had fallen upon the Land in Hail-Stones and Mil-Dews. Therefore to remove ſuch dangerous Men, he mention'd an Aphoriſm in Phyſick, That to purge Bodies effectually, their Humours muſt firſt be made fluid and moveable; and ſo concluded with urging for a Remonſtrance to be made to his Majeſty of the deplorable State of the Kingdom. Sir John Culpeper ſeconded him upon moſt of the ſame Topicks, but moſt ſeverely inveig'd againſt the Train of Monopolizers, thoſe Swarms of Vermin, which had overſpread the Land, and like the Frogs of Ægypt, had gotten Poſſeſſion of their Dwellings, ſo that ſcarce a Room was free from them; thoſe Leeches that had ſuck'd the Common-Wealth ſo hard, that it was almoſt become Hectical. Mr. Grimſton expatiating upon ſome of the ſame Heads, mention'd a Paſſage he had from a Judge of the King's Bench, who upon a particular Occaſion told his Brethren They begin to ſay in the Town, that the Judges have overthrown the Laws, and the Biſhops the Goſpel. This he mention'd with ſome mollifying Words after it; but very ſeverely exclaim'd againſt the Monopolizers, whom he call'd Achitophels, Hamans, Woolſeys, Empſons and Dudleys, Treſilians and Belknapps; and concluded with moving for a Committee for a Remonſtrance, for which twenty four were ſoon appointed.

And Mr. Grimſton.

A Meſſage from the King.

Speech by Sir E. Deering.

At this Time alſo the Houſe of Commons was diſpleas'd That the King had made the Lord Cottington Conſtable of the Tower of London, over the Lieutenant himſelf, and plac'd a Garriſon of four Hundred Men, to preſerve the City from Tumults; and they further complain'd againſt the Confluence of Popiſh Recuſants about the City. Whereupon his Majeſty ſent a Meſſage to the Houſe, acquainting them, ‘ That he had commiſſionated a Conſtable over the ‘ Tower, for the better ſecuring the Peace of the City, but ‘ that now he wou'd recall his Commiſſion, and leave the ‘ Tower to the Government of the Lieutenant only; and ‘ as for the Papiſts, they ſhou'd be remov'd by Proclama‘ mation to the Places of their Habitation.’ But becauſe Religion was thought greatly in Danger, eſpecially from Popery and Arminianiſm, Sir Edward Deering made a zealous Speech in the Houſe, and notwithſtanding the King's immediate Wants in this Emergency, he thus cry'd out, Let the Sword reach from the North to the South, a general Perdition of all our remaining Right and Safety threaten us in open View, it ſhall never make me decline the firſt Setling of Religion. After which he ſpoke very ſeverely againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, concluding, That before the Year run round, he hop'd his Grace wou'd either have more Grace, or no Grace at all: For our manifold Griefs do fill a mighty and vaſt Circumference; yet ſo, that from every Part our Lines of Sorrow do lead to Him, and point at him the Center, from whence our Miſeries in this Church, and many of them in the Common-Wealth do flow.

Monopolizers ejected.

About the ſame Time the Houſe of Commons proceeded to a very popular Act, and ejected out of their Houſe moſt of thoſe Members as receiv'd any Benefit from Monopolies, or unlawful Projections. However this was look'd upon as contrary to ancient Cuſtom, and it was complain'd, That they who ſo much declaim'd againſt Innovations, were the firſt Innovators: For we are aſſur'd that there was never any Precedent to be found, that the Commons had Power to exclude any Members from their Places in Parliament, neither upon the Account of falſe Elections, or any other Pretence whatſoever; and if not for undue Elections, they had much leſs Power to ſuſpend thoſe who acted by the King's Patent, and for his Service. Yet in this ſort of purging the Houſe, they ſubtilly paſs'd over ſome of the greateſt Criminals, whoſe Offences wou'd naturally render them obnoxious to their Power, or obſequious to their Deſigns. Nor did there want Complaints in the Houſe of Lords, who highly reſented the Breach of their Privilege, by the ſearching of the Packets, Cabinets and Studies of the Earl of Warwick and the Lord Brook for Papers, at the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament: For which Sir William Beecher the Agent, one of the Clarks of the Council, being brought before them, tho' he alledg'd the Command of the two Secretaries of State for Juſtification of Himſelf, yet he was committed Priſoner to the Fleet. Thus began the black Cloud to ſpread it ſelf on all Sides, which at firſt appear'd but like a Man's Hand, yet afterwards overſhadow'd and confounded three Kingdoms.

The Earl of Strafford's Troubles.

The King perſuades him to come to Parliament.

III. 1. The Parliament had not ſat above eight Days, when the Publick was allarm'd with a new Matter, and the Fortunes of the Earl of Strafford began to have their fatal Operation. We underſtand from Whitelock that that great Man was firſt urg'd by the King at York to appear in Parliament, as one of whoſe Service he ſhou'd have particular Occaſion, much relying upon his Fidelity and Abilities. But the Earl humbly deſir'd his Majeſty to excuſe his Going at that Time, alledging, ‘ That he ſhou'd not be ‘ able to do his Majeſty any Service there, but rather be a ‘ Means to hinder his Affairs; as foreſeeing that the Envy ‘ and Animoſity of the Parliament and the Scots wou'd be ‘ turn'd againſt him. Whereas if he kept out of their Sight, ‘ he ſhou'd be leſs in their Thoughts; and if they ſhou'd ‘ proſecute him, when at a Diſtance, he might better avoid ‘ the Conſequence, and retire from Danger, go over to ‘ Ireland, or any other Place, where he might be moſt ſer‘ viceable to his Majeſty. But if he ſhou'd throw himſelf ‘ into their Power, by appearing in Parliament, he knew ‘ that the Scots and all their Party were ſo provok'd at his ‘ coming againſt them, that they wou'd immediately en‘ deavour his Ruin.’ The King, notwithſtanding theſe Reaſons, continu'd very earneſt for the Earl's coming up to Parliament; for which he laid his Commands upon him and told him, That as he was King of England, he was able to protect him from any Danger; and that the Parliament ſhou'd not touch one Hair of his Head. The Earl thank'd the King, but reply'd, That if there ſhou'd happen any Difference between his Majeſty and his Parliament concerning him, it wou'd prove a mighty Diſturbance to his Majeſty's Affairs; and that he had rather ſuffer himſelf, than his Maſter's Affairs ſhou'd in any meaſure ſuffer upon his Account. But the King remain'd unalterable in this Reſolution, and declar'd That he wou'd not want his Advice, in the great Tranſactions that were like to be in this Parliament; and in obedience to his Commands, the Earl prepar'd for his Journey.

He reſolves upon it.

But before his Removal, ſome of his Friends in Parliament poſted Letters to him in the North, advertiſing him of Secret Deſigns againſt him, and the Apprehenſion they had that a Storm was gathering, which wou'd ſhortly be diſcharg'd upon him; leaving it to his own Judgment whether to come up to the Parliament or not. However they adviſ'd him, if he did reſolve to come, that he ſhou'd come prepar'd to impeach ſome of the Principal of his Enemies of a Confederacy with the Scots in their invading of England, and ſo as the Duke of Buckingham had formerly treated the Earl of Briſtol, to cruſh their Accuſations in the Bud, by obliging them firſt to clear themſelves. Thoſe who were his intimate Friends, adviſ'd him abſolutely to decline his Appearance in Parliament, and made uſe of the ſame Arguments that he had before urg'd to the King. But being once reſolv'd, nothing cou'd intimidate this couragious Earl, who had much more of the Oak than the Willow in his Temper; ſo that confiding in his own Innocence and Abilities, and conceiving he had got ſufficient Evidence againſt the Lord Say and other Friends to the Scots, and digeſting his Intelligence almoſt into the Form of an Impeachment, he took Poſt with the ſame, deſigning to preſent it to the Houſe of Pears at his firſt Arrival. But his Enemies prov'd too ſubtle and diligent for him; and knowing how great Influence the firſt Blow muſt have, before he cou'd accompliſh his Intentions, they prevented him by an Impeachment as quick as it was unexpected.

Several Speeches againſt him.

For upon Wedneſday the eleventh of November, a ſudden Motion was made in the Houſe of Commons, by his declar'd Foe Mr. Pym, alledging That he had a Matter of Importance to acquaint the Houſe, and deſir'd that the Doors might be lock'd up, and the Keys laid upon the Table. This being done, and a ſecret Advertiſement given to ſome of the Lords to keep their Houſe from riſing, Mr. Pym in a long labour'd Speech, conſiſting of ſeveral Topicks, inveigh'd againſt the Earl with all his uſual Arts and Aggravations, who from a zealous Patriot, had long ſince turn'd an Apoſtate, and became the greateſt Enemy to the Liberties of his Country, and the greateſt Promoter of Tyranny, that any Age had produc'd. ------ He inſtanc'd in many high and imperious Actions both in England and Ireland, and mingled ſome lighter Paſſages of his Vanity and Amours, that they who were ſufficiently incens'd againſt him for the former, might have leſs eſteem for his Virtue and Diſcretion; and concluded with a ſolemn Motion to all the worthy Members, to prevent the Continuance of that great Man's Power and Credit with the King. Mr. Pym was ſeconded by Sir John Clotworthy, an Iriſh Gentleman purpoſely brought into this Parliament, who made a long and confus'd Relation of his Tyrannical Carriage in Ireland, and particularly that at his leaving that Kingdom, he had declar'd, That if he return'd, he wou'd not leave a Scotch-Man to inhabit in Ireland. Sir John Hotham and ſome Yorkſhire Gentlemen continu'd the Invective, and inſiſted upon an Expreſſion made by the Earl, That they ſhou'd find the little Finger of the King's Prerogative heavier than the Loins of the Law; which Expreſſion, at this Time miſtaken, extreamly increas'd the Paſſion and Prejudice againſt him. So that in Concluſion, after many Invectives and Hours ſpent, it was mov'd according to a ſecret Reſolution before made, That the Earl might be forthwith impeach'd of High-Treaſon; which was no ſooner mention'd, than it found almoſt an univerſal Approbation and Conſent from the whole Houſe.

He is impeach'd in the Houſe of Lords.

And committed to Cuſtody.

Mr. Pym was appointed for the fatal Meſſenger to perform this Office, who enter'd the Houſe of Lords but a few Minutes after the Earl's firſt Appearance there, and in the Name of all the Commons of England impeach'd the ſaid Earl, with the Addition of all his Titles, of High Treaſon, and other heinous Crimes and Miſdemeanours; deſiring in their Name that he might be immediately ſequeſter'd from all Councils, and be put into ſafe Cuſtody. Upon which, the Earl, with more Clamour than became the Gravity of that High Court, was call'd upon to withdraw, hardly obtaining Leave to be firſt heard in his Place, tho' he had a Right to challenge it. He then 'pathetically lamented his great Misfortune, to lye under ſo heavy a Charge; profeſs'd his Innocence and Integrity, deſiring he might have his Liberty, till ſome Guilt ſhou'd be prov'd againſt him: He wiſh'd them to conſider what fatal Miſchiefs they were bringing upon Themſelves, if upon a general Charge without the mention of any one Crime, they committed a Peer of the Realm to Priſon, and of what Conſequence ſuch a Precedent might be to their Privilege and Birth-Right;' and then withdrew. The Peers upon a very ſhort Debate reſolv'd, 'That he ſhou'd be committed to the Cuſtody of the Uſher of the Black Rod, till the Commons ſhou'd produce a particular Charge againſt him.' Whereupon he was immediately committed to the Cuſtody of Mr. Maxwel the Uſher; and that the Commons might diſable him of the Teſtimony and Aſſiſtance of Sir George Ratcliff his great Friend and Confident, it was preſently reſolv'd to make him a Party, and accuſe him of High-Treaſon and Confederacy with the Earl. And when a remarkable Debate aroſe upon his being a Member of the Parliament in Ireland, Whether he cou'd without Breach of Privilege be ſent for? It was reſolv'd as a Thing out of all Doubt, 'That in Caſe of High-Treaſon, Privilege of Parliament neither here nor there cou'd protect any Man:' A Reſolution which they wholly ſet aſide, when ſome of their own Members came to be accus'd of the ſame Crime.

A Failure in him.

He lyes under great Hardſhips.

Here again it was conceiv'd that the Earl did not ſhew that exalted Courage and Reſolution, which formerly had conducted him through ſo many Difficulties, in giving over his Deſign: For tho' he had loſt the Opportunity of ſtriking the firſt Blow, yet he had Time enough to ſtrike the ſecond, which might have been a ſingular Advantage to his Preſervation. For had he offer'd his Impeachment, and proſecuted it in the ſame Steps and Method, as that which was brought againſt him, it was thought the Buſineſs on both Sides might have been huſh'd up without much Damage to either. But his own Fate now began to hurry him from one Extremity to another; and not many Days after, upon Articles exhibited by Mr. Pym, he was committed cloſe Priſoner to the Tower. The Commons us'd the ſureſt Methods to cut off all Advantages from him, and order'd, 'That no Member of their Houſe ſhou'd viſit Him, during his Reſtraint, without Licence firſt obtain'd from the Houſe;' and the like Order was alſo obſerv'd in the Houſe of Lords. And that they might the more effectually ruin him, they voted a peculiar and cloſe Committee; which was oppos'd by ſeveral, and reſented by an old Factioner, Sir Peter Hayman, who alledg'd It was making the reſt of the Members ſee by other Mens Eyes. This was obſerv'd by Mr. Warwick, who remembring how turbulent he had been in the third Parliament, with a Satyrical Laugh told him Every Parliament muſt out-pitch the other by a Bar. In ſum, the Earl was hunted and purſu'd with all the Marks of an inſatiable Deſire after Blood; yet Sir Roger Manley intimates as if that Thirſt might have been allay'd at firſt, who tells us that there were ſome Motions made in order to his Preſervation, in caſe the King wou'd conſent to advance ſome of the Grandees of the Party to the great Offices of the Crown: But that being delay'd, or imprudently manag'd, they became more implacable than before. So that this great Man now felt the Effects of his rough and haughty Temper, and found the Irregularities and Hardſhips he had formerly promoted againſt the Duke of Buckingham, redoubled upon himſelf.

2. By this large Step the Houſe of Commons ſoon became formidable to the whole Nation; and they ſeem'd to have laid the main Streſs of their Deſigns upon this Hinge, the Removal of the Earl: For ſome of them were heard to ſay, If they cou'd perſuade the King to part with Strafford, he cou'd then deny them Nothing. And to make the Blow full and fatal, ſuch Care was taken, that the Earl cou'd not be admitted to Bail, tho' ſeveral of High Quality and unqueſtionable Security had offer'd their Service; ſo that all he cou'd obtain was to have Council and a Solicitor.

The Commons borrow Mony.

Having gain'd ſo great a Point, the Commons found Time to conſider the Burden and Charge which lay upon the Northern Countries in maintaining two great Armies in their Bowels; therefore by Way of Relief, they order'd the Borrowing a hundred Thouſand Pounds upon Intereſt from the City of London; for which ſeveral Members of the Houſe of Commons ſtood engag'd, till ſuch Time as it cou'd be repaid out of the Subſidies to be rais'd. Of which Mony, fifty Thouſand Pounds was ſent as a Preſent to the General of the Scotch Army; which Gratuity, B. Guthry tells us, was to be altogether without Prejudice to the eight Hundred and fifty Pounds per Diem, formerly appointed them.

Debates about the Judges.

Shortly after there aroſe a great Debate in the Houſe concerning the Writs of Habeas Corpus, upon which Mr. Selden, and the reſt of his Fellow Priſoners, had demanded to be bail'd, but were refus'd by the Judges of the King's Bench, who requir'd of them Sureties for their good Behaviour. This, tho' happing twelve Years before, was ſo far aggravated by ſome, that they mov'd 'That the Priſoners might have Reparation out of the Eſtates of thoſe Judges, who then ſat in the King's Bench, and remanded them to Priſon;' which Judges they nam'd to be Hyde, Jones, and Whitelock; but for Judge Crook, one of the ſame Court, they excus'd him, as differing in Opinion from the reſt. Upon which Mr. Bulſtrode Whitelock, Son to the Judge, ſtood up and ſpoke in Behalf of his Father, 'That it was not unknown to ſeveral worthy Members of the Houſe, that Judge Whitelock had been an able and faithful Aſſertor of the Rights and Liberties of the Subjects of this Kingdom, for which he had been many ways a Sufferer: Particularly by a cloſe Impriſonment, for what he ſaid and did, as a Member of this Houſe in a former Parliament. And he appeals to thoſe noble Gentlemen, who remember thoſe Paſſages, and ſome who were then Sufferers with him. And for his Opinion and Carriage in the Caſe of the Habeas Corpus, it had been the ſame with Judge Crook's, for which he appeals to many there preſent.' This Motion was ſeconded by Mr. Hampden and ſeveral others, who affirm'd much of the Fact, and expreſs'd themſelves with great Reſpect and Honour to the Memory of the deceaſed Judge, who was thereupon reckon'd by the Houſe in the ſame Degree with Judge Crook, as to the Cenſure and Proceedings.

A bold Attempt.

A Speech of Sir Edward Deering.

This Matter was not long over before the Houſe was allarm'd by a bold Attempt of one James a Papiſt upon Mr. Heyward, an active Juſtice of Peace in Weſtminſter, who had carefully drawn up a Catalogue of the Recuſants there, to be preſented to the Committee of Religion. This ſo far provok'd the Zeal of Mr. James, that meeting him in Weſtminſter-Hall, he publickly ſtabb'd him. Mr. Heyward eſcap'd with Life; but the Fact, tho' done by one little better than a Mad-Man, caus'd a great Diſturbance, and help'd to ſwell all the old Fears and Jealouſies of the Dangers from Popery and Papiſts. Religion began now to be more and more the Outcry of the Parliament and People; and in a grand Committee for that Purpoſe the zealous Sir Edward Deering made his ſecond Speech, crying aloud, That God's true Religion was violently invaded by two ſeeming Enemies, but indeed, like Herod and Pilate, faſt Friends for the Deſtruction of the Truth; the Papiſts for one Party, and the Prelating Faction for the other. Likewiſe declaring, That he had rather ſerve one as far off as Tiber, than to have him come ſo near as the Thames; a Pope at Rome wou'd do him leſs Hurt, than a Patriarch might do at Lambeth. And he concluded with a Motion, 'To ſelect a Committee of a Few, and to empower them for the Diſcovery of the Numbers of oppreſſed Miniſters, under the Tyranny of the Biſhops for theſe ten Years laſt paſt.

3. Upon the Removal of the Earl of Strafford, the Parliament's next Aim was at the Archbiſhop of Canterbury; and their Deſign was to ſequeſter him from the King's Councils, then to confine him to his Dioceſe, and laſtly to deprive him of his Archiepiſcopal Authority. This appears to be the utmoſt of their Intentions at this Time; in order to which it was thought proper that his Majeſty ſhou'd be firſt mov'd to releaſe his high Oppoſer the Biſhop of Lincoln from his long Impriſonment in the Tower, and to reſtore him to his Place in the Houſe of Peers. This was done upon the 16th of November, five Days after the firſt Confinement of the Earl of Strafford; and the following being a Day of Humiliation, he was conducted into the Abby Church at Weſtminſter, and there he officiated as Dean, before ſix Biſhops who attended him thither. He had not been many Hours in the Houſe of Peers, before he was amaz'd to ſee ſuch warm Proceedings, and ſuch violent Intereſts on foot; where the diſcontented Party thought Themſelves ſure of this Prelate, and that a Man of his high Spirit wou'd not forget his former Sufferings. He ſhew'd ſome Reſentments indeed againſt the Archbiſhop and the Lord-Keeper, who had oppos'd his Inlargement, and he was at firſt more honour'd than any of his Order: But in a few Days they found themſelves extreamly miſtaken, inſomuch that one of them cry'd out, We have conjur'd up a Spirit, I wou'd we cou'd lay him again; and ſome directly declar'd, That he was good for Nothing. His Majeſty was ſoon acquainted with his Loyalty, ‘ and ‘ that he took the Freedom to fall ſharply upon thoſe Lords ‘ to whom he ow'd his Releaſement, for not ſpeaking dutifully of his Majeſty, or reverently of his Actions.’ Upon which the King, notwithſtanding former Prejudices, ſent for him, and had a Conference with him till after Midnight: And to make him ſome Satisfaction for his paſt Troubles, he commanded all Orders Filed up againſt him to be cancell'd and eraz'd, that no Memorial of them might remain to Poſterity.

Miſlik'd by the Party.

Orders were likewiſe made by the Houſe of Commons for releaſing ſuch as were impriſon'd by the Star Chamber, Council-Table, or High-Commiſſion; and more particularly for the remanding of the three famous Criminals mention'd in 1637, Prynne, Baſtwick, and Burton, from the ſeveral Iſlands to which they were confin'd. There can hardly be a greater Inſtance of the mutinous Spirits of the City of London, now the Sink of all the ill Humours of the Kingdom, than the triumphant Entry of theſe Incendiaries. Prynne and Burton landed at the ſame time at Southampton, where they were careſs'd with extraordinary Marks of Eſteem and Affection, and their Charges were not only born with great Magnificence, but liberal Preſents were ſent them; which Method and Ceremony was continu'd to them all their Journey. And as they came near London, Multitudes of People met them ſome Miles from the Place; and at two in the Afternoon they were attended into the City by above ten thouſand Perſons, with Bays, Roſemary and Flowers, and the loudeſt Expreſſions of Joy for their Deliverance and Return; mingling in their Acclamations bitter Expreſſions againſt the Biſhops, who had ſo unmercifully perſecuted ſuch godly Men! This was upon the twenty eighth of November; and a few Days after, upon the Return of Dr. Baſtwick, in the ſame triumphant Manner, they were admitted to the Houſe of Commons to preſent their Petitions againſt their Perſecutors; which they did with all imaginable Aggravation, and Defiance of that Court of Juſtice that had cenſur'd them.

The Return of Prynne, Burton and Baſtwick.

This had a ſtrange Influence both upon the City and the Parliament, and more and more exaſperated the Minds of both: And now having gather'd Strength, upon the ſeventh Day of December, the Commons enter'd upon the grand Debate concerning Ship-Mony; at which time the famous Lord Falkland made a vehement Speech againſt that Impoſition, declaring That they had done nothing, if they did no more, highly inveighing againſt the Judges, who ſhou'd have been as Dogs to defend the Sheep, but had prov'd as Wolves to worry them. Then he declar'd, that the Cauſe of all our Miſeries and Jealouſies, was, That a moſt excellent Prince had been moſt infinitely abus'd by his Judges, telling him that by Policy he might do what he pleas'd: And laſtly he mark'd out the Lord-Keeper Finch as the principal Adviſer and Abetter in this Matter. Upon the whole the Commons reſolv'd Nemine Contradicente, without Examination of the Reaſons of the Judges, ‘ That the Charge impos'd upon the Subjects for the providing and furniſhing ‘ of Ships, and the Aſſeſſments for raiſing of Mony for ‘ that Purpoſe, commonly call'd Ship-Mony, the extrajudi‘cial Opinion of Judges, and the Ship-Writs themſelves, ‘ in the whole and every Part of them, are againſt the Laws ‘ of the Realm, the Right of Property, and the Liberty of ‘ the Subject, contrary to former Reſolutions in Parliament, ‘ and the Petition of Right:’ All which was afterwards confirm'd in the Houſe of Lords.

Lord Falkland's Speech

Ship-Mony condemn'd by the Commons.

On the 8th Day of the ſame Month, the Court was under ſome Affliction by the Loſs of the Princeſs Anne, the King's third Daughter, who dy'd at Richmond before ſhe was full four Years old. She was a Child of pregnant Parts, much above her Age; and the Manner of her dying, ſhews what religious Education her Father had given her: For being minded by thoſe about her to call upon God, when the Pangs of Death were upon her, ſhe anſwer'd, I am not able to ſay my long Prayer, meaning the Lord's Prayer; but I will ſay my ſhort one; which was, Lighten my Eyes, O Lord, leſt I ſleep the Sleep of Death! Which being ſaid, ſhe quietly gave up the Ghoſt.

Death of the Princeſs Anne.

4. None had greater Influence upon the publick Affairs than the Scotch Commiſſioners and their Dependents; who were vaſtly eſteem'd, and almoſt Idoliz'd by great Numbers of the Citizens, as was formerly obſerv'd. The Earl of Rothes and the Lord Lowdon were the Chiefs of theſe Reformers, who were carefully lodg'd in the Heart of the City near London-Stone, in a large Houſe ſo near St. Antholin's Church, that there was a Way out of it into a Gallery of the Church; where one of their own Chaplains always preach'd, who were reſorted to by Multitudes, out of Zeal, Faction or Curioſity, to that Degree, that on every Sunday the Church was crowded within and loaded without, from Morning till Night; tho' their Sermons, as the Lord Clarendon ſays, were the moſt flat and inſipid that cou'd be deliver'd upon any Deliberation. They were highly careſs'd by the Parliament, and a new Committee of both Houſes, ſuch as were very acceptable to them, was nominated to renew the Treaty. Then they publiſh'd their Declaration againſt the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in which they ſhew'd, ‘ That ‘ as they reſerv'd Thoſe of their own Nation, who had ‘ been Incendiaries between the two Kingdoms, to the Inquiſition of their own Parliament; ſo they wou'd reſt ſatisfy'd with what Juſtice the Wiſdom of this Parliament ‘ ſhou'd think fit to decree againſt thoſe two Criminals.’ That Expreſſion concerning Thoſe of their own Nation, plainly ſhew'd, That they deſign'd no Hurt to the Marqueſs of Hamilton, againſt whom at firſt all their Reſentments were levell'd. But by means of his Friendſhip to the Lord Lowdon, his Dexterity with the Scots Commiſſioners at York, and his Promiſes of future Offices and Services, he had obtain'd both from the Engliſh and the Scotch all Aſſurance of Indemnity; which they ſo punctually obſerv'd, that they were not more induſtrious to procure Evidence and Information againſt the other two great Men, than they were careful to divert and ſtifle all that cou'd be produc'd againſt the Marqueſs. But Secretary Windebank durſt not ſtand theirs nor the Engliſh Scrutiny, who being accus'd of reprieving ſome Prieſts and Jeſuites, upon a Summons from the Commons on December the 10th fled beyond the Seas: Which muſt needs make an Impreſſion upon the King, that he muſt be aſſaulted on the one Hand, and deſerted on the other; becauſe not able to protect his Miniſters, nor they able to vindicate Themſelves.

The Power and Influence of the Scotch Commiſſioners.

Secretary Windebank's Flight.

The Intereſt and Influence of the Scotch Commiſſioners daily increas'd the Boldneſs and Hatred of the inferior Sort againſt the eſtabliſh'd Church, inſomuch that immediately after the Secretary's Flight, Alderman Pennington, with a Multitude of the Refuſe of the People, preſented a ſtrange Petition to the Commons, alledg'd to be ſubſcrib'd by fifteen Thouſand Men, in which they did not only complain of Popery and Arminianiſm, but in plain Terms requir'd the total Extirpation of Archbiſhops, Lord Biſhops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. This led the Way for other Petitions of the like Nature, which were generally procur'd by a ſtrange Diſingenuity, which came extreamly in Practice. Firſt they uſually prepar'd a Petition very modeſt and dutiful for the Form, and not very unreaſonable in the Subſtance. which they carefully communicated at ſome publick Meeting, to get it receiv'd with Approbation. The Subſcription of a few Hands fill'd the Paper it ſelf, which contain'd the Petition, and therefore more Sheets were annex'd for the Reception of the Number, which was to countenance the Undertaking. When many Hands were procur'd, the Petition it ſelf was cut off, and a New One, anſwerable to the Deſign on Foot, annex'd to the long Liſt of Names, which were ſubſcrib'd to the former Petition.

Unfair Methods in Petitioning.

Of this Sort was Pennington's Petition, which ſtruck ſo boldly at all Eccleſiaſtical Government, that it was very ſhocking to a Parliament not yet prepar'd for ſuch large Steps. Many ſober Men in the Houſe were ſurpris'd at it, tho' they were not unwilling to have the Abuſes in Church-Government reform'd; ſo that after a long Debate, the Petition was referr'd, and only order'd not to be rejected. But thoſe that favour'd the Buſineſs, tho' they were unſucceſsful in it, ſhortly after fell upon another Topick more plauſible, which was an Inſpection into the Legality of the late Convocation, and the Canons there confirm'd. Several ſevere Speeches were made upon this Occaſion: Sir Edward Deering call'd the Convocation A Conventual-Synodical-Aſſembly of Commiſſioners, a threefold Chimæra, a Monſter to our Law, and a Cerberus to our Religion: That the Clergy had ramm'd into their Canons a prodigious, ungodly Oath; and inſiſted upon the Illegality of all their Determinations, without the Conſent of the Laity. Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes reflected violently upon the Faults and Miſchiefs ariſing from moſt of the Canons Themſelves, beſides the unprecedented Oath, and concluded with a Motion to have them all damn'd, as dangerous and deſtructive to the Laws of the Land and the Rights of Parliaments. Sir Benjamin Rudyard ſpoke warmly againſt the proud Beckets and Woolſey Prelates; but if he found but one good Cranmer, Latimer, or Ridley, he ſhou'd eſteem them as rich Jewels fit to be ſet in the King's own Cabinet: But for the Canons, they were ſo heavy and droſſy, that he wou'd have them melted down and diſſolv'd, diſmounted and deſtroy'd. Mr. Holborn ſpoke two Hours in Defence of them; but after two Days Debate, the Commons reſolv'd, without dividing, 'That the Clergy had no Power to make Canons, Conſtitutions or Laws to bind either Laity or Clergy, without a Parliament; and that the Canons are againſt the Fundamental Laws of the Realm, the King's Prerogative, Property of the Subject, the Right of Parliaments, and do tend to Faction and Sedition.' The Benevolence granted to the King was in the ſame manner condemn'd; and to keep the Clergy in Awe, they likewiſe fram'd a Bill for fining all ſuch as ſat in Convocation, ſo that none of them durſt appear to defend their ancient Rights.

They are all condemn'd.

All this was done on the 15th of this Month, by which Time Prynne and his Adherents had fill'd the Town with Libels and Ballads full of all manner of Scurrility againſt the Biſhops, eſpecially againſt Canterbury Himſelf. This was the Prelude to the Downfal of the Archbiſhop, who having been heavily charg'd by the Scotch Commiſſioners, on the 18th was by Mr. Denzil Holles impeach'd in the Name of all the Commons of England, of no leſs than High Treaſon; and immediately committed to the Cuſtody of Mr. Maxwell, the Uſher of the Black Rod. The Accuſations againſt him were numerous, and the Hatred of all Sorts almoſt univerſal; yet nothing particular was brought up in Form to the Houſe of Lords till ten Weeks after; all which Time he lay at a very great Expence. But the Reſentments of the great Men ſoon appear'd in that remarkable Caſe of Sir Robert Howard and the Lady Viſcounteſs Purbeck. The latter having liv'd in an open State of Adultery with Sir Robert, was in the Year 1627 ſentenc'd in the High-Commiſſion to do Penance: But avoiding that Sentence by a Retreat, after ſome Years continuance in the ſame Courſe, and having ſeveral Children by him, they became ſo bold as to live together in the Face of the Court at Weſtminſter. This gave great Offence to the King himſelf, who particularly encourag'd the Archbiſhop to proceed againſt them in the High-Commiſſion, by whoſe Order they were both confin'd, till ſhe ſhou'd perform the Penance formerly put upon her. Sir Robert found Means to convey her away in Man's Apparel, but he himſelf was for that Reaſon continu'd a Priſoner for two or three Months. This was ſo reſented by Sir Robert and others, that as ſoon as the Archbiſhop was now committed, upon his Petition, the Lords immediately condemn'd him to pay five Hundred Pounds by way of Satisfaction to Sir Robert; and their Commands were ſo ſtrict, that he was oblig'd to lay down the Mony without Delay, which he did with great Difficulty, and the Help of Friends.

5. The Commons having ſecur'd the great Stateſ-man the Earl of Strafford, and the great Church-man Archbiſhop Laud, and driven away the chief Secretary, began to prepare an Impeachment againſt the great Officer of the Law, the Lord-Keeper Finch. Upon Notice of which, on the 21ſt of this Month, he deſir'd Leave to ſpeak for Himſelf in the Houſe of Commons; which he did in a very eloquent and moving Speech, deliver'd with an excellent Grace and Geſture. But notwithſtanding the Pity he had rais'd, he was voted a Traytor, '1. For refuſing to read the Remonſtrance againſt the Lord-Treaſurer Weſton, when the Parliament deſir'd it. 2. For perſuading and threatning the Judges to deliver their Opinion in Favour of Ship-Mony. 3. For ſeveral illegal Actions in Foreſt Matters; and 4. For ill Offices done in making the King diſſolve the laſt Parliament, &c.' The Lord Clarendon makes it viſible, That this great Man was ſtill ſo much in Favour of the Houſe of Commons, that they wou'd have gladly preſerv'd him in his Place, and that they us'd Artifices to give him all Advantages; but finding the Accuſation cou'd not be ſtifled, they gave him an Opportunity to fly into Holland, before it was carry'd up to the Houſe of Lords. Upon his Flight, which hapned next Morning, Sir Edward Littleton, Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, was made Lord-Keeper in his Place; a Man of great Reputation in the Law, an excellent Judge, and above all Suſpicion of Corruption, of whom we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak more hereafter.

The Lord Keeper Finch voted a Traytor.

He flys.

This being done, the Commons proceeded to threaten ſeveral of the Judges, and caus'd the Lords to oblige them to put in great Bail for their Appearance upon all Occaſions, ſo that they might lye continually under the Laſh of the Parliament. Thus the Commons became formidable to the whole Nation, and in a few Weeks had remov'd two of the greateſt Counſellors of the Kingdom from their Maſter's Ear, under the Name of High-Treaſon, frighted away the Lord-Keeper and one of the Secretaries of State, and prepar'd many of the principal Gentlemen throughout the Kingdom, to expect ſuch a Meaſure of Puniſhment as their future Carriage ſhou'd draw upon them for their former Failures. And indeed great Numbers, from the Higheſt to the Loweſt, upon the Account of Ship-Mony, or ſome other Grievance, found themſelves involv'd under ſome of their Votes, and liable to be proſecuted upon the firſt Provocation: Whereby they were kept in ſuch terrible Awe in both Houſes, that they durſt not appear to diſlike, much leſs to oppoſe whatſoever was propos'd. For this Reaſon many of the King's Friends, who perceiv'd themſelves any ways obnoxious, made it their main Buſineſs to ſooth and oblige the new Reformers, who being ſupported by the Scotch, began to bear down all before them. So that his Majeſty was often not only debarr'd, but expos'd to the treacherous Advice of ſome who were moſt oblig'd to him. Yet ſtill the Commons ſhew'd great outward Reſpect to his Perſon, and under Pretence of inſpecting his Revenue, which was graciouſly allow'd them, by a particular Meſſage they promis'd him, Not only to ſettle and augment it, but to make his Majeſty one of the richeſt Princes in Chriſtendom.

Thus after a Seſſion of near two Months, doing vaſt Buſineſs and granting no Mony, they concluded the old Year with an Adjournment of Themſelves, and a ſhort Receſs of ten Days.

A ſhort Receſs.

IV. 1. The King was now exceedingly perplex'd and diſturb'd by the Proceedings of the Parliament, and the Loſs of his moſt faithful Friends; and being infinitely deſirous of ſaving the Earl of Strafford, he began to incline to an infirm, tho' ſometimes neceſſary Piece of Policy, namely, courting and obliging his moſt violent Oppoſers. Theſe Men when they found there was no further Danger from Canterbury, Strafford and others, now reſolv'd to repair as well as demoliſh; and accordingly Care was taken to infuſe into the King by the Marqueſs of Hamilton, who had ſecur'd his own Stake, 'That his Majeſty having declar'd to his People, That he ſincerely intended a Reformation of all Exceſſes in Church and State, the moſt gracious Inſtance he cou'd give of ſuch Intention, was to call ſuch to his Council, whom the People thought inclin'd to ſuch a Reformation.' Hereupon the Earls of Hertford, Bedford, Eſſex and Briſtol, the Lords Say, Savile and Kimbolton, were ſworn Privy-Counſellors all in one Day; and the Earl of Warwick, in a very ſhort time after. All this the King did chearfully, juſtly inclining to ſome of them, and not miſtruſting any Inconvenience from the other, who he thought wou'd be reform'd, or at leaſt reſtrain'd by this Act of Grace. But ſome of them, notwithſtanding, prov'd of the greateſt Diſſervice to him; for inſtead of preſerving and vindicating their new Juriſdiction, they reſolv'd principally to ſupport the Greatneſs of the Parliament, to which they had reaſon to believe they ow'd their own Greatneſs. And therefore when the King requir'd the Advice of his Privy-Council, in Matters of the higheſt and niceſt Importance, theſe new Counſellors declar'd 'That they might not give his Majeſty any Advice, that was not agreeable to the Senſe of the Parliament, his Great Council, by whoſe Wiſdom he was entirely to guide himſelf.' As this Notion was unaccountably urg'd by ſome, ſo it was ſtupidly ſubmitted to by others; ſo that the King in a Moment found himſelf bereav'd of all publick Advice, when he moſt needed it: And tho' the ſole Buſineſs at this time was to conſider what Propoſals of the Parliament were to be receiv'd, and what to be rejected; he was now told, That he was only to be adviſed by the two Houſes, or rather, that he muſt do whatever they deſir'd of him.

Several new Privy Counſellors.

Beſides the making of theſe new Privy-Counſellors, a further Project was laid for the Advancement of the chief of their Party: The Earl of Bedford was to be Lord Treaſurer; in Order to which Biſhop Juxon of London had already begg'd Leave of the King to reſign his Staff, and ſo reſolv'd to withdraw from the impending Storm with no leſs Honour than Security. Mr. Pym was to be made Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Lord Say Maſter of the Wards; and the Lord Cottington, upon Promiſe of Indemnity for the future, was to ſurrender both theſe Places. Mr. Denzil Holles was to ſucceed Windebank as Secretary of State, and Proviſion was made for the Satisfaction of Eſſex, Kimbolton, Hampden and others, whoſe overflowing Zeal at that time might probably have been diverted. Thus far the King comply'd with the Project for Preferments, and it was unhappy that it was not fully executed, that he might have had ſome able Men to adviſe and aſſiſt him; which it was believ'd theſe Men would have done, after they had been ſo thoroughly engag'd: Whereas his Majeſty had none left near him in any great Truſt, excepting a very few about his Perſon, who did not betray, or ſink under the Weight and Reproach of it. Bedford and Pym had both engag'd to obtain a liberal Proviſion and Settlement for the King's Revenues, the Want of which had occaſion'd all the ill and unpopular Projects; and others had made ſuitable Promiſes: But by means of ſome Accidents, the King unhappily ſuſpended the Execution of this Deſign; which ſerv'd but to increaſe the Party's Hatred againſt the Earl of Strafford. And to this Purpoſe was hinted afterwards in one of the King's Declarations, in which he ſignified 'What Overtures had been made by them, what Importunity for Offices and Preferments, what great Services ſhou'd have been done for him, and what other Undertaking, even to have ſav'd the Life of the Earl of Strafford.' By which Diſcovery, as he blemiſh'd the Reputation of ſome Leaders in the Eyes of many of the People, ſo he gave no ſmall Cauſe of Wonder to many others, when they were told from his own Pen, at how cheap a Rate he might have ſav'd the Life of ſuch an able and faithful Miniſter.

Mr. St. John made Sollicitor-General.

All that was done at this time was the Advancement of Mr. Oliver St. John, one of the moſt inveterate of the Party, who by the Earl of Bedford's Means was made Sollicitor-General, in room of Herbert, who was remov'd into Banks's Place of Attorney-General, as he was into that of Littleton in the Common-Pleas. The King readily comply'd in his Preferment, hoping that this noted Lawyer and Patriot wou'd in the preſent Exigence have been very uſeful to ſupport his Service in the Houſe of Commons, where his Authority was then very great; at leaſt, that he wou'd be aſham'd to appear in any thing prejudicial to the Crown. But his long and rooted Malignity againſt the Government was ſuch, that he loſt no Credit with his Party, who had no Apprehenſion of his changing Sides: And he made good their Confidence; no ways abating his black and clowdy Diſpoſition, or diſſembling it; but notwithſtanding his Obligations as Sollicitor, with equal Obſtinacy he oppos'd every thing that might advance the King's Service.

The Keeper Finch impeach'd.

2. In the mean Time, the Houſe of Commons, after their ſhort Receſs, proceeded in the ſame Steps, and gave Incouragement to all diſcontented Petitions againſt the Biſhops and the Hierarchy. And upon the fourteenth of January they exhibited Articles of Impeachment againſt the abſent Lord-Keeper Finch: Upon which Occaſion the Lord Falkland made a vehement Speech againſt that Miniſter, declaring That his were Crimes of Supererogation, ſo that High-Treaſon was but part of the Charge: He gave our Goods to the King, our Lands to the Deer, our Liberties to the Sheriffs; ſo that there was no way by which we had not been oppreſs'd and deſtroy'd, if the Power of this Perſon had been equal with his Will, or the Will of his Majeſty had been equal to his Power. Mr. Hyde was a particular Aſſiſtant to his Lordſhip in this Matter, and together with him, Mr. Whitelock, and Mr. St. John, obtain'd the Thanks of the Houſe, both for this Impeachment, and their transferring the Buſineſs of the Ship-Money, and other Matters concerning the Liberty and Property of the Subject.

The Lord Digby's Speech for Triennial Parliaments

The Impeachment againſt the Lord Strafford was ſtill carry'd on with private and regular Steps; but before the finiſhing Stroke they had a great Point to gain, namely a Remedy to prevent the long Intermiſſion of Parliaments. In which Matter, on the nineteenth of this Month, the Lord Digby ſhew'd himſelf very zealous, in a ſevere Speech, where he thus exclaim'd: Let his Majeſty hear our Complaints never ſo compaſſionately, purge away our Grievances never ſo efficaciouſly, puniſh ill Miniſters never ſo exemplarily, or choſe good ones never ſo exactly; if there be not a way ſettled to keep them good, the Miſchiefs and they will all grow again like Sampſon's Locks, and pull down the Houſe about our Heads. Then he mention'd Mr. Noy and Sir Thomas Wentworth, who had both been ſo ſignally ſerviceable in The Petition of Right, yet to the eternal Aggravation of their infamous Treachery, had turn'd Apoſtates to the Common-wealth: The Firſt, he hop'd God had forgiven in the other World; but the Latter muſt not hope to be pardon'd in this, till he be diſpatch'd to the other. In Concluſion, he declar'd, That in chaſing ill Miniſters, they did but diſſipate the Clouds that might gather again; but in voting this Bill, they ſhou'd contribute to the perpetuating our Sun, our Sovereign, in his vertical meridian Luſtre. Accordingly the Bill for Triennial Parliaments was finally paſs'd in the Commons, and carry'd up to the Lords by the ſaid Lord Digby. Having gain'd this Step, they renew'd their Civilities to the Scotch Commiſſioners, and within three Days deſcended to this diſhonourable Vote, 'That a Friendly Aſſiſtance and Relief ſhall be given towards Supply of the Loſſes and Neceſſities of the Scots; and that in due Time the Houſe will conſider the Meaſure and Manner of it.

A Vote for the Scotch.

The King's healing Speech to both Houſes.

3. All theſe Proceedings were ungrateful to the King, who ſtill carry'd it with great Patience and Temper, tho' he met with none of his expected Supplies or Aſſiſtance. Therefore to heal all Breaches, upon the twentyfifth of this Month he ſent for both Houſes to the Banqueting-Houſe, where after he had inſiſted upon the Inconveniencies of Delays, and the Preſſures of the two Armies, he inform'd them 'of the Diſtractions that were then occaſion'd through the Connivance of the Parliament, there being ſome Men, who more maliciouſly than ignorantly, wou'd put no Difference between Reformation and Alteration of Government: From whence it came that Divine Service was irreverently interrupted, and Petitions in an indirect Way procur'd and preſented: That he wou'd chearfully concur with them for reforming all Innovations both in Church and Common-wealth, and for reducing all things to the ſame Condition they ſtood in the beſt and happieſt Times of Queen Elizabeth: And whatſoever Part of his Revenue was found illegal, or heavy to his Subjects, he was willing to lay it down, truſting in their Affections. That he cou'd not but take Notice of many ſtrange Petitions given in the Name of divers Counties, againſt the eſtabliſh'd Government of the Church, and of the great Threatnings againſt the Biſhops, That they wou'd make them to be but Cyphers, or at leaſt their Voices to be taken away: That if upon ſerious Debate, they cou'd ſhew him that the Biſhops had ſome Temporal Authority not ſo neceſſary for the Government of the Church, and upholding Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, he wou'd not be unwilling to have them lay it down; and finally, if they had encroach'd too much upon the Temporality, he was content that all Abuſes of that kind ſhou'd be redreſs'd; and that he wou'd go with them ſo far, and no further. As to their Bill concerning frequent Parliaments, he miſlik'd their giving his Power to Sheriffs and Conſtables, but he was content to have a Bill for that Purpoſe, ſo it did not trench upon his Honour and the ancient Prerogative of the Crown, and for that End he had order'd his learned Council to attend upon them; for he own'd that frequent Parliaments were the beſt Means to keep a right Underſtanding between him and his People. To conclude, he had ſhewn them the State of his Affairs, his clear Intentions, and the Rocks they were to avoid, as alſo the Deſire he had to give them Satisfaction; which they ſhould alſo find by thoſe Miniſters he had or ſhou'd have about him, all which he queſtion'd not but wou'd bring Peace and Happineſs to his Subjects, and Contentment to them All.

Complaints againſt Papiſts.

It is believ'd that if this Speech had been deliver'd in the preceding Parliament, it had hardly fail'd of the Bleſſings of Unity and Peace; for the Conceſſions of it were ſufficient to have reconcil'd all Things. But the ſpecious Proſpect of the Scotch Army in the North, and the Influence of the Scotch Commiſſioners in the Town, made the leading Members too fond and exalted with their Advantage over the King's Neceſſities: So that inſtead of Thanks for the Speech, and a juſt Conſideration of it, four Days after a Remonſtrance of the two Houſes was deliver'd to his Majeſty, againſt the Impunity of Papiſts, and the Pardon of Goodman a Jeſuit, declaring, 'That there was more need now than ever to put the Laws in ſtrict Execution, by reaſon of the great Increaſe of Popery, and great Conflueuce of Popiſh Prieſts, &c. and therefore they deſir'd that Goodman might be left to the Mercy of the Law.' Shortly after his Majeſty anſwer'd the two Houſes at Whitehall in a gracious Speech, 'That he took in good Part their Care of the true Religion eſtabliſh'd in this Kingdom, from which he wou'd never depart: That it was againſt his Mind that Popery or Superſtition ſhou'd any ways increaſe; and that he wou'd reſtrain the ſame, by cauſing the Laws to be put in Execution; for which he wou'd ſpeedily publiſh a Proclamation. And that the Reaſon why he repriev'd Goodman the Prieſt, was, that neither Queen Elizabeth, nor his Father, did ever avow, that any Prieſt in their Times was executed merely for Religion: However, he wou'd remit the Cauſe to the two Houſes, and deſir'd them to conſider the Inconveniencies that might fall on his Subjects and other Proteſtants abroad by ſo great Severity.' Upon which Goodman himſelf in a Petition to the King deſir'd, That if the Storm was raiſed for his Sake, for the Good of others that he might be made a Sacrifice, and thrown into the Sea.

The King's Anſwer.

The Scots Demands.

But neither cou'd this yielding to the Stream put any Stop to it; for the leading Part of the Houſe depended all upon the Scots; and whatſoever their Commiſſioners were pleaſed to demand, was in a Manner granted to them. As Firſt, 'That all Acts made in their Parliament, ſhou'd be publiſh'd in the King's Name with Conſent of the Eſtates. 2. That the Caſtle of Edinburgh, and other Forts of the Kingdom ſhou'd, with the Advice of the 'Eſtates in Parliament, be furniſh'd and uſ'd for Defence of the Kingdom. 3. That all Scotch-Men in England and Ireland ſhou'd be reſtor'd to their Liberties, and freed from Cenſure, for ſubſcribing the Covenant, and not be oblig'd to any Oath contrary to the Religion there eſtabliſhed. 4. That his Majeſty wou'd not employ any Perſons in any Office or Place, that ſhou'd be judg'd incapable by Sentence of Parliament; nor make uſe of their Service, or grant them Acceſs to his Perſon, without Conſent of Parliament. 5. That all Ships taken and ſtopt, ſhou'd be reſtor'd on both Sides, and four thouſand Pounds immediately advanc'd, towards ſetting forth eighty Scotch Ships ſtop'd in the Engliſh Ports. 6. That from the Juſtice and Kindneſs of England, Reparation be made for the great Loſſes the Kingdom of Scotland had ſuſtain'd, and the vaſt Charges they had born in the late Troubles. 7. That all Pamphlets both in England and Ireland, writ againſt them, be ſuppreſs'd. 8. That Monuments and Tokens of Hoſtility upon the Borders of the two Kingdoms, be taken away; and not only the Garriſons of Berwick and Carliſle be remov'd, but the Works ſlighted, and the Places diſmantled.

They are debated.

Theſe Demands were in a great Meaſure granted; only the ſixth concerning Reparation was now debated. For the Scots being deſir'd to bring in their Account in Writing, they made it amount to five hundred fourteen thouſand one hundred and twenty eight Pounds nine Shillings; beſides four hundred and forty one thouſand Pounds, for their Loſſes and Neglect of their Fortunes; and beſides their eight hundred and fifty Pounds per Diem on the Northern Counties, and all their Waſtes and Plunderings. Theſe exorbitant Sums, which they ſtil'd Modeſt Demands, at firſt ſtartled the Houſe of Commons, and after ſome Debate, Sir Jarvis Hollis, a conſiderable Member, ſtood up, and in a Speech us'd theſe Words: Our younger Brother of Scotland, like Jacob, ſeems to ſupplant us, and take away our Birth-Right. No Man had a more charitable Conſtruction of their Intentions than I had, while they made their Addreſſes in humble Diſtance becoming Subjects to their Sovereign;-------but now, Sir, when I ſee them ſwell in their Demands, beyond all Proportion; when I hear them enlarge upon their firſt Propoſitions, and require things unfit for the King to grant, and diſhonourable for this Nation to ſuffer, I cannot but fix a Mark of Danger upon them: I fear we have nouriſh'd in our Boſom thoſe that will ſting us to Death. Upon this free Speech Sir Jarvis, not giving Satisfaction in his Explanation, was expell'd the Houſe; and they proceeded to this Reſolution, 'This Houſe doth conceive the Sum of three hundred thouſand Pounds a fit Proportion for the friendly Aſſiſtance and Relief thought fit to be made towards the Loſſes and Neceſſities of our Brethren of Scotland:' And in fine, they accepted the Thanks of the Scotch Commiſſioners, for the ſaid Aſſiſtance, and the Stile of Brethren given them in the Vote of the Houſe. This chargeable Correſpondence between the Scotch in Arms, and the Engliſh in Parliament, was the fatal Combination that deſtroy'd the King. The Commons look'd upon the Scots as their Protectors, and the Scots eſteem'd the Commons as their Pay-maſters; and no longer valu'd the King's calling them Rebels, while the Parliament call'd them Friends and Brethren.

Three hundred thouſand Pounds voted them.

4. Having gain'd theſe Advantages, the Commons proceeded more vigorouſly with Relation to Epiſcopacy and the Church, concerning which there paſs'd ſeveral ſmart Sayings and Replies among the Members; and when the Miniſters Remonſtrance about Eccleſiaſtical Government was read, Mr. Grimſtone propos'd this ſubtle Argument againſt the Biſhop's Authority: That Biſhops are Jure Divino, is a Queſtion; that Archbiſhops are not Jure Divino, is out of Queſtion; Now that Biſhops which are queſtion'd whether Jure Divino, or Archbiſhops which out of Queſtion are not Jure Divino, ſhou'd ſuſpend Miniſters that are Jure Divino, I leave to your Conſideration. Upon which the learned Mr. Selden with great Quickneſs thus retorted his Argument: That the Convocation is Jure Divino, is a Queſtion; that Parliaments are not Jure Divino, is out of Queſtion; that Religion is Jure Divino, there is no Queſtion: Now that the Convocation which is queſtionable whether Jure Divino, and Parliaments which out of Queſtion are not Jure Divino, ſhou'd meddle with Religion which queſtionleſs is Jure Divino, I leave to your Conſideration, Mr. Speaker. To which Mr. Grimſton reply'd, But Archbiſhops are not Biſhops, Mr. Speaker: And to that Mr. Selden briskly rejoin'd, That, Mr. Speaker, is no otherwiſe true, than that Judges are no Lawyers, and Aldermen no Citizens.

Sharp Repartees.

Debates about Epiſcopacy.

After theſe and the like Rubs, they proceeded to the Conſideration of the Londoners Petition, againſt the whole Body of the Hierarchy, which had been dormant for about two Months; which occaſion'd many Debates and remarkable Speeches by the Lord Digby, Mr. Fiennes, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, the Lord Falkland, Mr. Bagſhaw, Mr. Plydell, Mr. Grimſtone, &c. The Lord Digby was very ſevere upon the Petition, which he compared to a Comet kindled out of the poyſonous Exhalation of a corrupted Hierarchy; but the fifteen thouſand that join'd in it he thought was a terrible Tail, pointing towards the North, which caus'd no leſs Diſtempers by its Influence, than it portended by its Appearance. The whole he ſaid was a Mixture of Things Contemptible, Irrational and Preſumptuous. After many Particulars he agreed that the Reformation of Church Government was moſt neceſſary; but to ſtrike at the Root, he cou'd never give his Vote till three things were clear'd. Firſt, that no Rule or Boundaries cou'd be ſet ſufficient to reſtrain Biſhops from ſuch Exorbitancies. Secondly, ſuch a Frame of Government muſt be laid before them, as no Time, no Corruption cou'd make liable to Inconveniencies proportionable to thoſe they aboliſh'd. Thirdly, whether that new Model wou'd be practicable in State, and conſiſtent with Monarchy. The reſt generally inveigh'd againſt the exorbitant Power, and the unneceſſary Severities of the Biſhops, and mov'd for Regulations and Boundaries; but Mr. Fiennes and Mr. Bagſhaw join'd with the Petition, and were for an utter Extirpation. But they cou'd not immediately come to a Determination in ſo great a Change. Yet in a ſhort time after, they and their Party obtain'd this reſtraining Vote in the Houſe of Commons, 'That no Biſhop ſhou'd have any Vote in Parliament, nor any Judicial Power in the Star-Chamber, nor bear any Sway in Temporal Affairs; and that no Clergy-Man whatſoever ſhou'd be in Commiſſion for Juſtices of the Peace.

The Clergy reſtrain'd.

5. During theſe increaſing Diſtractions, the Leiger Ambaſſador of Holland having made ſeveral Overtures of a Match between the young Prince of Orange, and the Princeſs Mary, the King's eldeſt Daughter, his Majeſty very willingly inclin'd to the Alliance, in Regard of that Prince's great Affection to the Proteſtant Religion. Yet he reſolv'd to acquaint the Parliament with his Intentions, before he proceeded to any Determination; which being done in a Speech from the Throne, it was receiv'd with very great Applauſe by the Parliament, and with infinite Satisfaction by the People in general, who were extreamly pleas'd, that the King ſhou'd condeſcend to make a Match with an inferior Prince for the Sake of the Proteſtant Religion. This Marriage, which was concluded a few Weeks after, prov'd afterwards of a wonderful Conſequence to the Engliſh Nation; and the very Name of it at preſent much abated the Fears and Jealouſies, which the Parliament had infus'd into the People, of the King's Deſigns to introduce Popery. But theſe they thought fit to revive with all Speed, and accordingly the very next Day four Members of the Commons were ſent up with a Meſſage to the Lords, to acquaint them of a formidable Plot of the Papiſts, an inviſible Army of fifteen thouſand of them in Lancaſhire, eight thouſand more in Ireland, and uncertain Numbers in other Places, all well arm'd and in Pay, rais'd by the Earl of Strafford, the Earl of Worceſter, and others; but both the Men and the Arms all vaniſh'd with the Meſſage, and totally diſappear'd.

A Marriage deſign'd between the Prince of Orange and Princeſs Mary.

Two Days after the Commons proceeded to an Impeachment, formidable to the Judges and many more; which was that of Sir Robert Berkley, one of the Judges of the King's-Bench, who having given his Opinion for the Ship-Mony, was by Sir John Culpeper and others accus'd of High-Treaſon in the Houſe of Lords, in the Name of all the Commons of England. Upon which Maxwell, Uſher of the Black-Rod, was ſent to fetch him in the moſt publick Manner off the Bench, which he perform'd in the Face of the Court, when Weſtminſter-Hall was full of People. This open Diſgrace, and ſudden Change from a Judge to a Priſoner, ſtruck a great Terror into the reſt of his Brethren then ſitting in Weſtminſter-Hall, and all others of his Profeſſion. Whitelock informs us that this Judge was a very learned Man in our Laws, and a good Orator and Judge, moderate in his Proceedings, excepting his Deſires of the Court-Favour. He afterwards redeem'd himſelf by ſupplying the Parliament's Occaſions with ten thouſand Pounds, and ended his Days in a private Retirement: And having made conſiderable Gains by his Chamber-Practice, he left a plentiful Fortune to his Family.

Judge Berkley impeach'd.

Shortly after this Impeachment, the Commons finiſh'd their firſt Mony Bill of four Subſidies, for the Relief of the King's Army and the Northern Parts; but after an unprecedented Manner, they order'd it ſo as the Mony never ſhou'd come into the Hands of his Majeſty. Yet to make ſure of their Deſigns, they at the ſame time prepar'd and concluded their famous Bill for Triennial Parliaments, which was to paſs with it. Theſe Bills being ready, upon the fifteenth of February, the King readily paſs'd both; and upon the Account of the Triennial Bill he made a gracious Speech, in which he told them 'That never Bill paſs'd in the Houſe of more Favour to the Subjects than this; which was the greater Obligation, becauſe done at a Time when he had receiv'd ſo little Encouragement.

The King paſſes the Triennial Act, with a Speech.

‘For hitherto they had gone on in what concern'd themſelves, and not in thoſe things that concern'd the Strength of the Kingdom, the Support of the State, or himſelf. They had taken the Government all in Pieces, and almoſt off the Hinges; yet a ſkilful Watch-Maker to clean the Work will take it aſunder, and ſo make it go the better, provided he leave not a ſingle Pin behind. This he mention'd not by way of Reproach, but to ſhew them the State of Things.’ Therefore he concluded with ſaying ‘That as he had done all this on his Part, they knew what to do on theirs; and he hop'd they wou'd ſee clearly, that he had really perform'd what he had expreſs'd to them at the Beginning of the Parliament, of the great Truſt he had in their Affections: For this was the higheſt Expreſſion of Truſt, that before they had done any thing for him, he had put ſuch Confidence in them.

Great Joy and Promiſes from the Commons.

Great Rejoycings were made at the Paſſing this Bill, with Bells, Bonefires and Illuminations; and the two Houſes were ſo ſenſibly oblig'd, that they waited on his Majeſty, and return'd their Thanks by the Mouth of the Lord-Keeper, ‘For having now ſufficiently provided for the Security of the Common-wealth; and that there remain'd nothing to be done, but ſuch a Return of Duty and Gratitude, as might teſtify their Devotions to his Majeſty, and that their only End was to make him a GLORIOUS KING.’ This Act was ſo great an Incroachment upon the King's own Prerogative, that the next Day the Earl of Dorſet, meeting his Majeſty, ſaluted him by the Name of Fellow-Subject, as having by that Grant transferr'd all the Regalia to the Parliament: And it was obſervable as a prophetick Miſtake of a Lady, who writing to a Country Friend that the King had paſs'd this Bill, inſtead of Triennial, wrote he had paſs'd a Bill for a Tyrannical Parliament. The King however was ſatisfy'd in his Conſcience, and in his own Pourtraiture thus expreſſes himſelf; ‘That the World might be fully confirm'd in my Purpoſes at firſt, to contribute what I could in Juſtice, Reaſon, Honour and Conſcience, to the happy Succeſs of this Parliament, I willingly paſs'd the Bill for Triennial Parliaments: Which, as gentle and ſeaſonable Phyſick, might, if well apply'd, prevent any Diſtempers from getting any Head or prevailing; eſpecially if the Remedy prov'd not a Diſeaſe beyond all Remedy. He alſo intimates that he deſign'd the Continuance of the Parliament, with convenient Receſſes, for three Years: But it has been rationally conjectur'd, That had the King at this time diſſolv'd the Parliament, now he had remov'd all Fears of long Intermiſſions, got the Mony apply'd to the ſettling of the North, and conferr'd the great Offices upon the leading Men, as was formerly deſign'd, in one or two Years he might have prepar'd a Way for an amicable Meeting. This may be call'd on of King Charles's fatal Moments; and as the haſty Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament was one great Error, ſo the longer Continuance of this was thought a greater than the other.

Articles againſt the Archbiſhop.

His Complaint.

VI. It was now hop'd by ſome wiſe Men, that the Parliament wou'd have been more moderate and complying, upon this new Security from the Crown; but theſe Conceſſions, inſtead of aſſwaging, ſerv'd both to increaſe the Thirſt, and to open Paſſages to ſuch as were greater. The Commons were unmoveably intent upon the Proſecution of the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Earl of Strafford, about whom they ſpent more than a Month, without performing any material Buſineſs not ſubſervient to that End. They ſoon finiſhed their preſent Deſigns againſt the Former, and upon the twenty-ſixth of February they exhibited fourteen general but heavy Articles againſt him in the Houſe of Lords. Upon which he declar'd to their Lordſhips, If the Charge cou'd be made good againſt him, he muſt be unworthy to live; however it was yet but in Generals, and Generals made agreat Noiſe, but no Proof. For Human Frailties, he cou'd not acquit himſelf; but for Corruption in the leaſt Degree, he fear'd no Accuſer that wou'd ſpeak Truth. But what touch'd him neareſt was, That he ſhou'd be thought falſe in the Profeſſion of his Religion; as if he ſhou'd profeſs with the Church of England, and have his Heart at Rome. Then he petition'd for an Inlargement, and ſo made his Vindication to every Article with great Eloquence and Strength of Argument. But he was deſign'd for a Sacrifice to an Army and the People; and therefore on the firſt Day of March he was ſent cloſe Priſoner to the Tower, meeting with many barbarous Inſults and Revilings as he paſs'd through the City. Under this Confinement he thus repreſents his Caſe, This is a hard Straight into which I am caſt: The Pope's Agent plots my Death, becauſe I will not be wrought upon to help in the Roman Superſtition; and the Parliament Articles to overthrow me, out of a Jealouſy that I go about to bring it in. The great Mens Prejudices againſt him were alſo inſuperable, as well for his moſt laudable Actions, as his greateſt Infirmities; ſo that when a young Noble-Man, at the Sight of St. Paul's, expreſs'd a Concern for the Archbiſhop's Commitment upon the Account of that venerable Fabrick, the Lord Brook ſharply reply'd, He hop'd to ſee the Day, when no one Stone of that Building ſhou'd be left upon another.

Steps towards the Tryal of the Earl of Strafford.

The Earl of Strafford's Caſe was now the great Subject of Diſcourſe both in the City and Country; and what ſhou'd be his Fate was the daily Conjecture of Thouſands in all Places of the Land. The new Reformers purſu'd him with ſuch a Zeal and Impetuouſneſs, as diſcover'd an inſatiable Thirſt after his Blood; yet they cou'd not bring their great Work to bear, till after four Months inceſſant Projection and Labour. Two exorbitant Steps were taken to expedite the Tryal: The Firſt, for a Committee to be ſettled of both Houſes, for the private taking of Preparatory Examinations, as was formerly obſerv'd; which was an Inquiſition altogether ſuſpicious and unprecedented, ſuch as was capable of extorting Evidences in any other crafty Proſecution of innocent Men. The Second was, For examining Privy-Counſellors upon Oath, concerning ſuch Matters as paſs'd at the Council-Table. This indeed cou'd not have been effected without the immediate Conſent of the King and his Council; and they, not conſcious of ill Myſteries, without weighing the Conſequences, unhappily yielded to the ſpecious Oratory of a Committee from both Houſes. The Damage this laſt Act brought upon the King and his Friends was irreparable: For beſides it ſerv'd to prove thoſe Words againſt the Earl which Sir Henry Vane ſo punctually remember'd; and beſides its proving a Terror to the Counſellors, to find they might be arraign'd for every raſh Word they had us'd there; it totally ſtifled and baniſh'd all future Freedom from the Board: Which laſt, as it appear'd, was more the Deſign of thoſe great Managers, than any Hopes of receiving further Information.

A Committee from Ireland,

For the more effectual carrying on this Work, in March a Committee came from the Parliament in Ireland, conſiſting moſt of Papiſts, and afterwards the principal Actors in the Rebellion; who at this Juncture were receiv'd with great Kindneſs, and added to the Committee for the Proſecution of the Earl. So that Ireland ſeem'd no leſs ingag'd in the Ruin of that unfortuate Lord, than England and Scotland; there being ſuch a Coreſpondence manag'd between London and Dublin, that whatever was acted in the Houſe of Commons in one Place, was ſoon after repreſented in the other. And as Sir George Ratcliff was accus'd here, as a Confederate with the Earl in his Treaſons; ſo moſt of thoſe who were in any Truſt under him in Ireland, and conſequently able to lay open the Grounds of the Counſels there, were impeach'd by the Commons in that Kingdom, ‘For endeavouring to ſubvert the fundamental Laws of the Land, and to ſet up an Arbitrary Power;’ which ſerv'd their Turn to ſecure their Perſons there, and exclude them from Councils, as it had done here in England.

The Manner of the Tryal debated.

Much Time was ſpent in conſidering the Manner of this important Tryal; as, ‘Whether it ſhou'd be in the Houſe of Peers? Who ſhou'd proſecute, Members appointed by the Commons, or the King's Council? Whether the Biſhops ſhou'd have Votes in the Tryal? Whether thoſe, who had been Peers ſince the Beginning of the Impeachment, ſhou'd be allow'd as Judges? Whether the Commons ſhou'd ſit uncover'd at the Tryal? And laſtly, Whether any Member ſhou'd be examin'd in Behalf of the Earl?’ who had ſent a Liſt of ſome Names, and deſir'd an Order to that Purpoſe. At length, it was agreed, ‘That the Tryal ſhou'd be in Weſtminſter-Hall, where Seats ſhou'd be built for the Reception of the whole Houſe, where with Difficulty they conſented to ſit uncover'd; and that the Committee which prepar'd the Charge ſhou'd proſecute, in the Name of all the Commons of England.’ As to the Biſhops Votes, they readily took the Advantage of an old Canon, which exempted the Clergy in Caſes of Blood; and ſo referr'd that Matter to the Lords, in whoſe Houſe they had good Aſſurance of Succeſs. But they wou'd not leave the other Point of the new Barons Votes to their Lordſhips Inclinations, but peremptorily demanded, ‘That no Peer created ſince the Impeachment, becauſe as Commoners they were concern'd in making that Accuſation, ſhou'd ſit as Judges at the Tryal.’ As for the Examination of ſome of their own Members in the Earl's Behalf, ‘They left it to the Choice of Perſons that were nominated, to be examin'd if they pleas'd;’ which they were allow'd to do, but not without ſome ſharp Animadverſions, That they ſhou'd take Care what they did.

The Lord-Keeper being indiſpos'd, the Earl of Arundel, notoriouſly diſaffected to the Earl, was choſen by the Lords to preſide in the Court. The new Barons were a little uncertain what to do in this nice Juncture; but ſome of them, particularly the Lord Littleton, follow'd the Biſhop's Example, and quitted their Right to judge in this Tryal. As to the Biſhops Themſelves, who were moſt likely to be ſerviceable to the Earl, they were daily terrify'd with the Cenſure that hung over their Heads for the late Canons, till to ingratiate themſelves, they ask'd to be excus'd in that Matter before an Order ſhou'd come for their Abſence. The Lord Clarendon charges the Biſhop of Lincoln, as principal Adviſer and Promoter upon this Occaſion, and betraying a Fundamental Right of the whole Order, to the Prejudice of the King, and the Ruin of the Earl; but Biſhop Hacket, who probably was better inform'd in this Particular, gives us a contrary Account, and a long and learned Speech ſpoken by that Prelate in the Houſe of Lords, to prove the Original and preſent Right of Biſhops to ſit in Judgment in Caſes of Blood. But whoever was moſt blameable, the Defection was irretrievable, and the noble Hiſtorian's Remark juſt: That tho' there might be ſome Colour for their Abſence, during the Time of the legal Tryal; yet when the Bill of Attainder was afterwards brought up to their Houſe, their Votes in that Bill were as neceſſary and eſſential, as any other of the Lords. Therefore he fairly concludes, ‘ It may be, their unſeaſonable, voluntary, unjuſt quitting it Then, made many Men leſs ſollicitous for the Defence of their Right Afterwards.

Cenſures upon it.

The famous Tryal begins.

The Solemnity of it.

2. After four Months Preparations, on Monday the 22d of March the famous Tryal began in Weſtminſter-Hall: A Tryal ſo famous, that if all Things be conſider'd, the high Nature of the Charge, the Greatneſs of the Accuſers, the Nobleneſs of the Defence, the Pompouſneſs of the Appearance, and the Conſequence of the whole, no Subject in England, and probably in Europe ever had the like; and indeed never was ſeen a more Solemn and Majeſtick Tribunal. Nor was it only a ſingle Tryal; for the King's Affections towards his People, the future Succeſs of the Parliament, and the Expectations of three Kingdoms, were all try'd, when Strafford was arraing'd. For the Place appointed, on both Sides the great Hall were ſpacious Scaffolds erected, nine ſeveral Degrees in Height; whereof ſeven were appointed for the Members of the Houſe of Commons, who were all there in a Committee; and the two upper Degrees were appointed for the Commiſſioners of Scotland, and the Lords of Ireland, who all join'd in the Accuſation. In the Centre of this Theatre, on a lower Aſcent, ſat the Peers of England in their Parliament Robes; the Earl of Arundel being created Lord High Steward, and the Earl of Lindſey Lord High Conſtable. Beyond the Peers, towards the upper End, was plac'd a Chair and Cloth of State for the King; on either Side of which was a cloſe Gallery for the King, Queen, and Prince to ſit in private. At the lower End of the State, were Places for the Ladies of the chief Quality, who conſtantly repair'd thither; and on the Right Hand, even with the Lords, was a Place with Partitions, for the Committee of Parliament, for them to retire and conſult, as Occaſion requir'd. On the other Side of this, was a Place made for the Earl Himſelf, with a Seat and Room for the Lieutenant of the Tower to be next to him; and Places for the Earl's Secretaries, and his Counſel to be near him.

The Manner of the Earl's Appearance.

Things thus prepar'd, about Seven in the Morning the Earl landed from the Tower, accompany'd with ſix large Barges, containing an hundred Soldiers for his Guard, and fifty Pair of Oars. Two Hundred of the Train'd Bands met him at the Stairs, and with the reſt attended him into the Hall; while the Entries at White-Hall, King-Street and Weſtminſter were carefully guarded by the Conſtables and Watchmen to keep out the meaner Sort and Multitude. About nine a Clock, the King, Queen and Prince enter'd the Hall, with divers Foreign Lords, and a numerous Train of Ladies; and immediately the Scaffolds were all fill'd with a glorious Show of the moſt illuſtrious Perſons of England, Scotland and Ireland, and ſeveral diſtant Nations. At the Earl's entrance into the Hall, the Porter, whoſe Office it was, inquir'd of Mr. Maxwell, Whether the Ax ſhou'd be carry'd before him or no: who anſwer'd, That the King had expreſly forbid it: Nor was it the Cuſtom of England to uſe that Ceremony, but only when the accus'd Party was to be put upon his Jury. Thus was the noble Lord brought to the Stage where he was to act his Part for his Life; his Habit was all black, wearing his George in a Gold Chain, his Countenance manly and majeſtick, his Perſon tall, but a little ſtooping under the Weight of his preſent Infirmities, his Behaviour exceeding graceful, and his Speech ready and ſtrong, pleaſing and captivating; eſpecially to the Ladies, who every Day took down in Writing all that they cou'd preſerve of his Charming Eloquence. The Confluence of the People was neither numerous nor inſolent, all of them ſaluted him both at his Landing and return; which with a generous Humility, he did moſt courteouſly receive and return; which ſhew'd the Falſeneſs of thoſe Rumours rais'd by malevolent Perſons, That the People were ſo inrag'd at him, that they were ready to tear him in Pieces. This Spirit was not now up, but was rais'd againſt him afterward.

The Managers againſt him.

The Articles.

The Managers againſt the Earl were Men of great Parts and Abilities, as Mr. Pym, Mr. Glyn, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Whitelock, Lord Digby, Mr. St. John, Mr. Palmer, Sir Walter Earle, Mr. Selden, Mr. Hampden, &c. Yet notwithſtanding he labour'd under all the Diſadvantages of making extempore Anſwers to ſtudy'd Accuſations and unknown Evidences, he ſoon ſhew'd that he was able to wreſtle with them all. Mr. Pym open'd the grand Charge, which conſiſted of twenty eight Articles, long, black and aggravated, according to the common Artifices in moſt Impeachments. In which were repreſented ‘ All the haſty Words or high Expreſſions, he had utter'd for this laſt thirteen Years; all the Acts of Paſſion or Power he had exercis'd in Yorkſhire, ſince he was Preſident of the North; all his Proceedings during his Lieutenancy in Ireland, as his Projects for Flax and Tobacco, his Billetting of Soldiers, and exerciſing Martial Law, his ſummary Proceedings againſt the Lord Mountnorris and Chancellor Loftus, his aſſuming a Power of Judicature at the Council-Table for Matters of Inheritance, &c. with ſome high Diſcourſes at the Board, and ſome extrajudicial Determinations in Caſe of Plantations; ſome caſual and light Diſcourſes at his own Table, and at publick Meetings; and laſtly, ſome Words ſpoken in the Privy-Council of England, after the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, and ſome Actings in Relation to the Scotch Nation.’ All which were urg'd and preſs'd againſt him, to make good the general Charge, ‘ That he had endeavour'd to overthrow the Fundamental Government of the Kingdom, and to introduce an Arbitrary Power.’ It is obſervable that the laſt Article ſerv'd more to make up the Number, than add to the Weight; for whereas ſome of the Articles charg'd him with being a mortal Enemy to the Scots, and doing them all poſſible Injuries, this charg'd him with giving them an Opportunity of ſeizing Newcaſtle and the Northern Counties; which was ſo improbable, that it was never urg'd againſt him.

Mr. Pym aggravates the Charge.

The Earl's Reply.

These Articles being read, and the long Anſwers to them, the next Day Mr. Pym proceeded to aggravate the Charge in a violent and Rhetorical Speech, fill'd with Artifices and Hyperboles. The main Points were, ‘ That it was Treaſon far beyond the Reach of Words, that He the Lieutenant, a native Subject and Peer of England, the prime Governor of Ireland, the Commander of his Majeſty's Forces, and a Proteſtant in Religion, had in ſuch a groſs and impious manner, recompenced his Majeſty's Favours, abus'd his Goodneſs, and drawn all his Dominions into Hazard and Peril of their Religion, Lives, Eſtates and Priviledges.--------We have that piercing Eloquence, the Cries and Groans, the Tears and Prayers of all the Subjects aſſiſting us: We have three Kingdoms, England, Scotland and Ireland, in Travel and Agitation with us, bowing Themſelves, like the Hinde in Job, to caſt out their Sorrows. After that he compar'd the Earl to the Adulterous Woman in the Proverbs, He wiped his Mouth, and with a brazen Face ſaid, he had done no Evil.’ The Earl with no leſs Moderation than Gracefulneſs ſtood up, and modeſtly recounted ‘ his Services done to the King and Crown of England, his Endeavours for the Advancement, as well of the Honour as the Profit of both Kingdoms in General, put in Particular that of Ireland: how he had aſſembled more Parliaments there, than in fifty Years before; that he had oppos'd divers unjuſt Projects and Monopolies, and improv'd the King's Revenue from fifty Thouſand, to an Hundred and Twenty Thouſand Pounds per Annum: That he had reſtor'd the Churches Maintenance, ſuppreſs'd the Outlaws, eſtabliſh'd Obedience to Royal Authority, and reſtrain'd the Tyranny and Uſurpation of Great Ones over the Commons; yet for the effecting of all theſe Actions, he reputed Himſelf the moſt weak and meaneſt Inſtrument.

His Complaint.

Theſe great Services in Ireland, being many of them manag'd with Power and a high Hand, and againſt the Bent and Intereſt of particular Perſons, were the chief Occaſion of the Complaints of that Nation, who took all Advantages from his preſent Impeachment: So that now a ſeal'd Paper was produc'd, which being open'd and read, appear'd to be ſent from the Parliament, declaring, ‘ That the Commons there had voted the Earl guilty of High-Treaſon.’ This being ſo ſeaſonably and artfully introduc'd by Way of Influence, the Earl was much tranſported, and cry'd out, There was a Conſpiracy againſt him to take away his Life! Upon which Mr. Pym gave a Shout, and the Committee requir'd Juſtice from the Lords againſt the Earl, ‘ who ſtanding Impeach'd of High-Treaſon, accus'd the Parliaments of two Kingdoms of a Conſpiracy againſt him.’ Hereupon the Earl, falling upon his Knees, humbly crav'd Pardon for the Inconſiderateneſs of the Expreſſion, proteſting ſeriouſly That he did not hereby intend either Parliament, but only ſome particular Perſons; and ſo the Matter was ſoon paſt over. But a new Burden was immediately laid upon him by the Committee, who offer'd to the Lords three new Articles, implying farther Miſmanagements in Ireland, and deſir'd, 'That the Earl might give a preſent Anſwer to them.' To which he reply'd, 'He expected not, that after the Cloſe of the Proceſs, any new Charge ſhou'd be given in: Yet leſt he ſhou'd ſeem to decline the Maintenance of his own Innocency, and the juſt Defence of his Honour, he was ready to hear them alledg'd, provided that a convenient Time were allow'd him to make his Reply.' But the Lords finding the Articles to be of no great Importance, he was urg'd to give a preſent Anſwer to them; which he accordingly did, with no leſs Dexterity than Reputation. Thus far they proceeded upon general Heads; which alone took up the Buſineſs of two whole Days.

1641. Car. 17.

His Anſwers to his Expreſſions,

3. This Famous Tryal continu'd eighteen Days, with great Variety of Pleas and Arguments, urg'd with great Subtlety on one ſide, and anſwer'd with as much Acuteneſs on the other. The particular Crimes charg'd againſt the Earl, beſides ſome high Expreſſions, were rang'd under three Heads, as, his Actions during his Government in Ireland, his Actions with Relation to Scotland, and thoſe in England ſince the Summons of the laſt Parliament. As to the Expreſſions and Diſcourſes that were laid to his Charge, he diſown'd ſome, and explain'd and put a fair Gloſs upon others, from the Reaſons and Circumſtances of the Debate. One Particular which was plauſibly urg'd againſt him, tho' ſpoken twelve years before, that in York he publickly ſaid, The little Finger of the Prerogative ſhou'd be heavier than the Loins of the Law, he quite inverted, and made it appear by two or three Perſons of Credit, that he ſaid, The little Finger of the Law was heavier than the Loins of the Prerogative: Yet this was one popular Inducement for his firſt Impeachment. Upon the whole, 'He hop'd no indiſcreet, paſſionate, or proud Words wou'd amount to Treaſon; but for Miſdemeanours, he was ready to ſubmit to their Juſtice.'

And to his Management in Ireland.

The Complaints as to the Iriſh Affairs were moſt numerous, and invidiouſly urg'd againſt him, having by his great Activity diſoblig'd many in that Kingdom. In his Anſwers he complain'd much, 'That by an Order from the Committee, appointed to prepare his Charge againſt him, all his Papers in Ireland, by which he ſhou'd make his Defence, were ſeiz'd, together with all his Goods, Plate and Tobacco, amounting to eighteen Thouſand Pounds, ſo that he had not wherewithall to ſubſiſt in Priſon. That thoſe Miniſters of State, who cou'd have given the beſt Evidence on his Behalf, were impriſon'd under the Charge of Treaſon; yet he profeſs'd he had not ſwerv'd from his Inſtructions, nor the Rules and Cuſtoms obſerv'd by other Deputies and Lieutenants. That the Monopolies of Flax and Tobacco were for the Good of the Kingdom, and the Benefit of his Majeſty; the former eſtabliſhing a moſt advantageous Trade, and the latter bringing a Revenue of above forty Thouſand Pounds to the Crown, improving Commerce, without Damage to the Subject. The Billetting of Soldiers, and exerciſing Martial Law, had been always practis'd by former Governours;' as he prov'd by the Confeſſion of the Earl of Cork, and Lord Wilmot, two Oppoſers, who wou'd not ſay more in his Favour than inevitably they muſt. However he ſaid, 'If it was Treaſon, it was ſo only in Ireland, and therefore he cou'd not be try'd for it here.' As to the Power of the Council-Table, he alledg'd, 'That in Ireland it had a large Juriſdiction by the Fundamental Cuſtoms of that Kingdom; and the Proceedings there had been with the Advice of the Judges, upon the Rights of the Crown, and Reaſons of State: That the Nature of that People requir'd a ſevere Hand and ſtrict Reins, which being looſ'd, the Crown wou'd ſoon feel the Miſchief.

The Lord Mountnorris's Caſe.

What preſs'd hardeſt upon him, in the Opinion of the Audience, were thoſe two Acts againſt the Vice-Treaſurer the Lord Mountnorris, and the Chancellor Loftus, which diſcover'd a Nature exceſſively imperious, and rais'd a greater Diſlike in unprejudic'd Perſons, than all that had been alledg'd againſt him. One Anneſley, Kinſman to Mountnorris, and Gentleman-Uſher to the Earl, had by Accident or Negligence ſuffer'd a Stool to fall upon the Earl's Foot while he was under a Fit of the Gout; which ſo ſenſibly provok'd his Patience, that it came to be the Diſcourſe at the Lord-Chancellor's Table, where one ſaid to the Lord Mountnorris, It was your Lordſhip's Kinſman that did this. Upon which he contemptuouſly anſwer'd, Perhaps it was done in Revenge of that publick Affront offer'd me by my Lord-Deputy formerly; but I have a Brother that wou'd not have taken ſuch a ſmall Revenge. This coming afterwards to the Earl's Ear, he caus'd his Lordſhip, as being an Officer in the Army under his Command, to be try'd by a Council of War, 'For moving Sedition, and ſtirring up the Soldiers againſt the General.' The Words being prov'd, he was depriv'd of his Treaſurer's Office, and his Foot Company, was committed to Priſon, and ſentenc'd to loſe his Head; and tho' by the Earl's Means he obtain'd the King's Pardon as to his Life, yet the reſt of the Sentence was fully put in Execution. This was aggravated as a prodigious Courſe of Proceeding; but the Earl dexterouſly ſhifted the Rigour and Severity of the Sentence from himſelf to the Council of War, 'Where he not only forbore to be preſent Himſelf, but forbad his Brother to appear, tho' he was an Officer of the Army; and conjur'd the Court to proceed without any Regard to Him. And when he had underſtood the Judgment of the Court, which was unanimous, he publickly declar'd, He ſhou'd not loſe a Hair of his Head; and immediately procur'd a Pardon from his Majeſty. He concluded that the Lord Mountnorris was an inſolent Perſon, and he took this Courſe to humble him; and ſhou'd be content if the ſame was taken to reform him, if it prov'd no more to his Detriment, than the other had been to Him.' Beſides this, the Lord Clarendon intimates a more private Reaſon: It ſeems the Lord Mountnorris, having by his active Induſtry rais'd himſelf from a low Condition to large Honours and Incomes, had uſually by ſervile Methods work'd himſelf into great Truſt with the Deputies at their firſt Admiſſion to the Government, informing them of the Defects and Overſights of their Predeceſſors; and whenever their Office was determin'd, and they return'd into England, he inform'd the State, and thoſe Enemies they had contracted, of all their Miſdemeanours, by which they were ſure to meet with Diſgrace or Damage. In this Manner he began with his own Maſter the Lord Chicheſter, and continu'd it to the Lords Grandiſon and Falkland; ſo there was this unhappy Dilemma, 'That either the Deputy of Ireland, while he continu'd ſuch, muſt deſtroy the Lord Mountnorris, or Mountnorris wou'd deſtroy him, as ſoon as his Commiſſion ended.' This Conſideration, together with the Vicioufneſs of the Man, made many look upon this Act with leſs Pity and Concern than the Matter it ſelf deſerv'd.

The Earl's Defence.

Chancellor Loftus's Caſe.

The Earl's Reply.

The other Caſe, of the Lord-Chancellor Loftus, is unaccountably omitted by Ruſhworth and the other Writers of this Tryal; ſo that we find it only in the Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory. This ſeem'd an Act of leſs Violence, becauſe it reach'd not Life, and had ſome ſhew of Regularity in the Proceeding; and that which was ill in it, aroſe from a nobler Root than the other. The Endeavour was, to force the Lord-Chancellor to ſettle more of his Land upon his Eldeſt Son than he thought fit, or was oblig'd by Law; all which he urg'd and order'd him to do, upon a Paper Petition preſented to him by the Hands of his Son's Lady, for whom the Earl had ſo great a Value and Eſteem, that it render'd his Juſtice more ſuſpected. The Chancellor refuſing Obedience, was thrown into Priſon, and had the great Seal taken from him, which he had kept with great Reputation of Ability for above twenty Years. In managing this Charge, ſeveral affectionate Letters, ſent from the Earl to that Lady, and found after her Death in her Cloſet, were expos'd in Court, rather to call in queſtion his Gravity and Diſcretion, than to diſcover Materials for the preſent Buſineſs. The Earl ſaid little more to it than 'That he hop'd, what Paſſion or Injuſtice ſoever was found in that Affair, there cou'd be no Treaſon; and ſince, upon an Appeal from the degraded Chancellor, the Cauſe had been review'd by his Majeſty in Council, and ſolemnly confirm'd, he had Reaſon to believe what he had done was very juſt.' But this was thought to have a Mixture of that Policy, before mention'd in the Caſe of Mountnorris: For the Chancellor, being a Man of deep Experience and Sagacity, had always been very ſevere to departed Deputies, and no ways ſubmiſſive to their full Power; ſo that carrying himſelf as the ſecond Perſon of the Kingdom, the Earl found a ſort of Neceſſity to humble a Man who had never receiv'd a Check before. Such was the Subſtance of the Proceedings with Relation to the Iriſh Affairs, which fill'd up more than half the Articles, and took up above half the Time of this great Tryal.

The Charge with relation to Scotland and England.

4. As to what related to the Scottiſh and Engliſh Affairs, the Parliament Managers charg'd the Earl with ſeveral Particulars, both in Words and Actions, that had a very black Appearance. 'That he had impos'd an unjuſt Oath upon all the Scots in Ireland, purſu'd it with Fines and Baniſhments, call'd them Rebels and Traitors, and threatned to root them out Stock and Branch: That he had promoted an Offenſive War againſt the Scots, labour'd to make a National Quarrel between them and the Engliſh, and ſpoke many high Words againſt Them, and for the King's exerting his Prerogative: That he had advis'd the King to a rigorous Exaction of Ship-Mony, and the Debaſing the Coin of the Nation, and that he had laid a Tax upon the County of York for the Subſiſtence of the Army, &c. All which Words and Actions, together with thoſe in Ireland, tho' ſeparately none cou'd be ſtrictly call'd Treaſon, yet conjointly, in their Opinion, they cou'd a-

The Earl's Anſwer.

‘ mount to no leſs; therefore they call'd the whole by the new Name of Accumulative-Treaſon.’ To all theſe Accuſations the Earl gave diſtinct and full Anſwers, with great Skill and Ability; and partly by invalidating Evidences, and partly by mitigating Circumſtances, and ſetting Matters in a proper Light, he made all Things appear not only leſs than Treaſon, but no very great Miſdemeanours. ‘Tho' he was willing to own the latter, occaſion'd eſpecially by a haſty and paſſionate Humour, made ſo by Nature and his Bodily Infirmities; yet he thought it a deplorable Thing, That his Houſe, his Table, his Bed, his private Diſcourſes, and his moſt intimate and boſom Friends, ſhou'd be ſearch'd and ſifted to the minuteſt Circumſtance, to find him guilty of Treaſon: Therefore he deſir'd the Lords to conſider Themſelves in his Misfortunes: their wiſe Anceſtors were glad to put Bands and Limits to this Lion Treaſon; but if they gave him the large Scope of Words to range in, he wou'd at laſt pull Them and Theirs in Pieces. Which ſhew'd the Danger of what was call'd an Accumulation of Treaſon, a Word taken from Cumulus, a Heap of Corn, ſo call'd becauſe ſome of the Individuals at leaſt are ſuch: But he deſir'd to know how that cou'd be call'd a Heap of Corn, when there was not one ſingle Grain in it.

The 23d Article moſt preſſing.

But becauſe there ſhou'd be ſome Ground for the Accuſation, the twenty third Article was moſt ſolemnly alledg'd againſt the Earl, as the very Hinge upon which the Treaſon was chiefly to hang: This was a Diſcourſe of the Earl's in the Cabinet Council, upon the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament. Sir Henry Vane, Secretary of State, and a great Enemy to the Earl, gave in Evidence, that the King at that Time having ask'd Them, Since he had fail'd of his Supplies, what Courſe he was next to take? the Earl anſwer'd, Sir, you have done your Duty, and your Subjects have fail'd in Theirs; therefore you are abſolv'd from the Rules of Government, and may ſupply your Self by extraordinary Ways: Purſue the War with Vigour; you have an Army in Ireland, with which you may reduce this Kingdom.

His Defence againſt it.

Upon this Teſtimony, which was differently repeated, the Earl deſir'd that the Earl of Northumberland, the Marqueſs of Hamilton, the Biſhop of London, and the Lord Cottington, might be ſeverally examin'd upon Oath; and they all declar'd, ‘ That they heard not the Earl ſpeak one Word of the Army in Ireland, or reducing this Kingdom.’ And theſe were the only Perſons preſent at the Debate, beſides the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Secretary Windebank, neither of which cou'd be examin'd, or wou'd be believ'd. The Earl poſitively deny'd the Words, ‘ alledg'd great Animoſity to be in Sir Henry Vane, whoſe Teſtimony was not only ſingle, which was inſufficient in the Caſe of Treaſon, but likewiſe ſuſpicious and improbable, ſince the Words were heard by no other of the Council: And if he had ſpoken thoſe Words, it cou'd not poſſibly be underſtood of England, but of Scotland, of which the Diſcourſe was occaſion'd, and for which that Army was known to be rais'd. Then he pathetically conjur'd their Lordſhips to conſider the fatal Miſchiefs that wou'd befall them and their Poſterity, if giving their Opinions in Political Matters ſhou'd be accounted Treaſon: Who wou'd be willing to ſerve the Publick, or what unfortunate Dilemma are they in; if being ſworn Councellors, they ſpeak not their Minds freely, they are guilty of Perjury; if they do, perhaps of Treaſon. Therefore tho' the Sword was two edg'd, and never ſo ſharp, he wou'd fear Him rather that cou'd kill the Soul, than them that cou'd only deſtroy the Body: If it be ſo, they had here this Rag of Mortality before them, worn out with numerous Infirmities, which if they tore into Shreds, there was no great Loſs; only in the ſpilling of his, they wou'd open a Way to the Blood of all the Nobility in the Land.

That Article reinforc'd.

This being a popular Article, and moſt likely to ſink the Earl, after they had gone through the whole Charge, except the laſt Article, they reinforc'd this; and Sir Walter Earle undertook to prove by ſeveral Reaſons, That the Priſoner deſign'd to land the Iriſh Forces in England, and not in Scotland; but theſe prov'd ſo weak in Themſelves, and the Anſwers ſo ſatisfactory, that the Lord Digby, to bring him off handſomly, told the Lords, ‘ That all their Proofs for that Article were not yet ready, and that this was only a Superfœtation of the Charge.’ The Queen, who was preſent at the Tryal, inquir'd Who that Knight was, whom the Lord Digby reliev'd? and being told his Name was Sir Walter Earle, ſhe ſaid, That Water-Dog cou'd bark, but not bite; but the reſt bit cloſe. As to the Earl's own Opinion of ſome of them, he freely told a private Friend, That Glynne and Maynard us'd him like Advocates, but Palmer and Whitelock like Gentlemen; and yet left out nothing material to be urg'd againſt him.

In Order to render this twenty third Article more effectual, upon Saturday three Days after the Cloſe of the Charge, the Commons Committee again deſir'd Liberty to produce ſome additional Evidences upon that Head. The Earl on the other Side crav'd the ſame Liberty for Himſelf, concerning ſome Teſtimonies not yet exhibited on his Behalf. This was ſtrongly oppos'd by the Committee, as not becoming a Priſoner at the Bar to preſcribe. But the Lords thought it equal and reaſonable, which occaſion'd a warm Debate, and at laſt a great Noiſe among the Commons, crying out, Withdraw, withdraw! all in ſuch confus'd and tumultuous Manner, that it caus'd both Fear and Admiration in the Spectators, who now began to feel the Pulſe of a diſtemper'd State. Both Houſes broke up, without ſo much as appointing the next Meeting; each Man's Countenance beſpoke Anger and Diſcontent, and nothing ſounded in Men's Ears all Sunday but Terrors and Fears of a preſent Diviſion and Breach between the two Houſes; ‘ That the Houſe of Commons wou'd declare the Earl a Traitor, and all ſuch Lords as were his Adherents; That he ſhou'd be no more heard in Publick, and that a Bill of Attainder ſhou'd be immediately drawn up againſt him, and nothing ſhou'd content them but preſent Execution.’ All Monday was ſpent in a Conference between both Houſes, without any Meeting in the Hall; when ſome of the Lords went ſo high as to tell the Commons, That it was an unnatural Motion for the Head to be govern'd by the Tail; That they hated Rebellion, as much as Treaſon; That the ſame Blood that enobled their Anceſtor, ran ſtill in their Veins, therefore they wou'd not be ſuppreſs'd by a Popular Faction. After long Debates, the Commons found it beſt to yield a little in this Matter; ſo the next Day was appointed for a new Meeting, when the Earl was to reſume his Defence.

The two Houſes diſagree.

A ſubtle Game between Mr. Pym and the two Vanes.

5. Having ſettled this Affair, the ſame Day in the Afternoon, the Managers in the Houſe found it neceſſary to play their new and laſt Game as to the Tryal; and accordingly an extraordinary Allegation was made, ‘ That ſeveral concurring Circumſtances did make one Witneſs as effectual as two.’ Therefore to give Sir Henry Vane's ſingle Evidence the Strength of two, which they found neceſſary in the Caſe of Treaſon, Mr. Pym, in an artificial Story, inform'd the Houſe, ‘ That ſome Months before the Meeting of this Parliament, he had viſited young Sir Henry Vane, and condoling the ſad Condition of the Kingdom, by reaſon of the many illegal Taxes, Sir Henry told him, That among ſome of his Father's Papers he had accidentally met with a Scheme of what Counſels were like to be purſu'd to the Ruin of the Kingdom. And accordingly he ſhew'd him a Paper of the Secretary his Father's own Writing, which had particulariz'd the Date and Reſult of the Cabinet-Council upon the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, with Hieroglyphicks to expreſs the Names of the Perſons concern'd in the Conſultation. The Matter was of that extraordinary Nature, that he begg'd a Copy of it, which the young Gentleman unwillingly conſented to, upon the Account of the Detriment it might bring upon his Father. That he had carefully preſerv'd the Copy, and with all Privacy, 'till the Beginning of this Parliament, which he conceiv'd a proper Time to make uſe of it; and that then, being convinc'd by many other Inſtances of the Earl's ill Affection to the Kingdom, it had excited him to move all that he had done againſt that great Perſon.’ Then he read the Paper in his Hand, the Title of which was, No Danger of a War with Scotland, if Offenſive, not Defenſive. In which Paper were the very Words that old Sir Henry Vane had ſworn againſt the Earl, concerning his Advice to bring over the Iriſh Army to reduce this Kingdom, and alſo ſome others that bore hard upon the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and the Lord Cottington. Having read this Paper, which conſiſted of Fragments and Minutes, he added, ‘ That thoſe Circumſtances of his, and young Sir Henry Vane's having ſeen the Original Reſults, and being ready to ſwear that what he had read was a true Copy of the other, might reaſonably amount to the Validity of another Witneſs; which the other Counſellors, mention'd in that Writing, who have given ſuch bad Advice, thought fit not to remember for their own Sakes.

A new Paper produc'd againſt the Earl.

Mr. Pym having ended his Part, young Sir Henry, with ſome Tokens of Diſorder, confeſs'd, ‘ That his Father being in the North, had ſent up his Keys, and order'd him to open his Boxes where the Evidences of his Lands were, that he might perfect a Deed concerning his Wife; in which Search, he had the Curioſity to examine a red Velvet Cabinet ſtanding with the reſt, where he found among others that Paper mention'd and read by Mr. Pym, which made ſuch an Impreſſion upon him, that he cou'd not but communicate the Secret to him, as a Perſon of better Judgment than himſelf. He was ſenſible this Diſcovery wou'd extreamly leſſen his Father's Opinion of him, but having been influenc'd by the Tenderneſs of his Conſcience towards his common Parent, his Country, he hop'd his Treſpaſs againſt his natural Parent wou'd find Compaſſion from that Houſe, tho' he had little Hopes of Pardon elſewhere.’ Upon this Confeſſion, the Father with a ſtern

Look and Show of Confuſion, roſe up and declar'd, 'That now the Ground of his Troubles, and the ſtrange Interrogatories ſo often preſs'd upon him, was fully diſcover'd; but the guilty Perſon ſhou'd certainly bear a Share in his Misfortunes. He own'd, that being in the North, he had ſent his Keys to his unhappy Son, having marry'd a virtuous Lady, to ſearch for what Evidences were neceſſary for her Settlement; by which Means thoſe Papers had been perus'd that had created him much of this Trouble. That, by his Majeſty's Conſent, he had burnt many of them, and among the reſt the Paper in Queſtion, of which that now read was a pretended Copy. That to the Particulars he cou'd add nothing more, than what he had ſworn upon his Examination, which he cou'd not deny to be exactly true, tho' by what he had been highly ſurpris'd withal this Afternoon, he found himſelf in an ill Condition upon that Teſtimony.

This Scene was ſo nicely acted between the Father and the Son, that it caus'd ſeveral Speeches to be made in Praiſe of the Conſcience, Integrity and Merit of the young Man, and a Motion to be made, 'That the Houſe wou'd enjoin the Father to be reconcil'd to his Son;' but for ſome time there was a ſtrange Diſtance obſerv'd between them. How unneceſſary and ridiculous ſoever this Story might appear at that Time to the World, and how ſcandalous and inconvenient to the Father and the Son, ſome believ'd that this Occaſion was taken to publiſh thoſe Reſults, only to give Notice to the Lord Cottington in what Danger he was, unleſs he wiſely quitted the Maſterſhip of the Wards to the Lord Say, who expected it. Tho' the principal Reaſon was, that they now found it impoſſible to conceal their Receiving their chief Information from the Secretary himſelf; therefore they thought fit to make this Intelligence publick, that it might be rather imputed to the Conſcience and Curioſity of the Son, than the Contrivance and Malice of the Father. However it was, this Paper was produc'd againſt the Earl the next Day, when he was to reſume all his Defences. To which he gave a ready and full Anſwer, 'in which he inſiſted upon the Incompetency of Sir Henry Vane's ſingle Teſtimony, which was ſuſpicious and dubious upon two Examinations; for he cou'd not remember any ſuch Words till the third time, and then he was not poſitive, but that he ſpoke thoſe Words, or the like; and Words might be like in Sound, and differ in Senſe. Then they were the more ſuſpicious, becauſe no other Perſon cou'd remember them; but if they had been ſpoken, it was contrary to all Reaſon and Probability to apply them to the Engliſh Nation, ſince there was never the leaſt Intention of landing the Iriſh Army in England, as the Lords of the Council were able to atteſt; and what was ſtill more remarkable, in the Iriſh Army there was not ſo much as one Troop rais'd at that Time.

His Anſwer to it.

The Earl having anſwer'd this additional Proof, the Lord Steward told him 'That if he had any thing to ſay further in his Defence, he ſhou'd now proceed.' Whereupon the Earl with great Preſence of Mind deliver'd himſelf in a long and noble Speech, in which he much complain'd of the Witneſſes againſt him, as being moſt of them profeſs'd Enemies and Papiſts; and having made a ſummary Repetition of all his former Defences, he concluded after this Manner. My Lords, I here ſtand charg'd with Accumulative or Conſtructive-Treaſon, a Word unknown to the common-Law, Statute-Law, or Practice, and which was never heard of from the Beginning of this Government till this time; ſo that I am queſtion'd for my Life and Honour upon a Law that cannot be ſhewn. Jeſu! Where has this Fire lain hid ſo many hundred Years, without Smoak to diſcover it, till it thus burſt forth to conſume me and my Poſterity? It is extream hard that Puniſhment ſhou'd precede Promulgation of a Law; what Man can then be ſafe? eſpecially when there is no Token ſet by which he ſhou'd know his Offence, no Admonition by which he ſhou'd avoid it. If a Man upon the Thames ſplit his Boat upon an Anchor, and the ſame has a Buoy floating to diſcover it, he is to charge his own Inobſervance; but if it has none, the Owner of the Anchor is to pay the Damage. My Lords, be pleas'd to ſhew that Regard to the Peerage of England, as never to expoſe your ſelves to ſuch Moot Points, ſuch conſtructive Interpretations of Laws; If there muſt be a Tryal of Wits, let the Subject be of ſomething leſs than the Lives and Honours of the Nobility. Therefore, caſt into the Fire theſe bloody and myſterious Volumes of Conſtructive-Treaſon, as the Primitive Chriſtians did their Books of curious Arts, and betake your ſelves to the plain Letter of our Laws, without being ambitious of being more learned in the Art of Killing, than our Fore-Fathers. It is now two hundred and forty Years, ſince any Man was touch'd for this alledg'd Crime; let us not awaken thoſe ſleeping Lions, to our Deſtruction, by raiſing up a few muſty Records, that have lain ſo many Ages neglected and forgotten. Do not through me wound the Intereſt of the Common-wealth, nor put ſuch inſuperable Difficulties upon Miniſters of State, that Men of Wiſdom, Honour and Fortune, cannot ſafely be employ'd by the Publick: If you weigh and examine them by Grains and Scruples, the Affairs of the Kingdom will lye waſte, no Man will concern himſelf who has any thing to loſe. My Lords, I would not have troubled you ſo long, were it not for the Intereſt of theſe DEAR PLEDGES, which a Saint in Heaven has left me. ----- At this his Breath ſtopt, and he melted into Tears for a ſhort Space; then recovering himſelf he thus proceeded. What I forfeit as to my own ruinous Cottage is nothing; but that my Indiſcretion ſhou'd extend to my Poſterity, wounds me to the very Soul. You will pardon my Infirmity; ſomething I ſhou'd have added, but my Voice and Spirits fail me; only I have learn'd, That the Afflictions of this preſent Life are not to be compar'd to the eternal Weight of Glory, which ſhall be reveal'd hereafter. And ſo, my Lords, even ſo, with all Tranquility of Mind, I freely ſubmit my ſelf to your Judgment; and whether that Judgment be of Life or Death, TE DEUM LAUDAMUS! Then lifting up his Hands and Eyes, he cry'd, In Te Domine confido, nè confundar in Æternum.

The Earl finiſhes his Defence.

Thus concluded this great Man, with a moſt moving and inimitable Graceſulneſs in Speech and Action; ſo that his Enemies confeſs'd, 'He was one of the greateſt Maſters of Perſuaſion, that that Age or any other have produc'd.' Mr. Whitelock, one of the Managers againſt him, concludes his Tryal in theſe remarkable Words, 'Certainly never any Man acted ſuch a Part, on ſuch a Theatre, with more Wiſdom, Conſtancy, and Eloquence, with greater Reaſon, Judgment and Temper, and with a better Grace in all his Words and Geſtures, than this great and excellent Man did; and, excepting ſome few, he mov'd the Hearts of all his Auditors to Remorſe and Pity.' Two of the Managers, the Lord Digby and Mr. Selden, became intire Converts, and quite deſiſted from any further Proſecution. At the Concluſion of the Earl's Defence, Mr. Glyn and Mr. Pym, in two long premeditated Speeches, endeavour'd to aggravate his Offences, and ſo both Houſes roſe. Thus ended this famous Tryal as to Matters of Fact; which, with ſome ſmall Intermiſſions, had continu'd from the twenty-ſecond Day of March to the thirteenth of April.

Opinions concerning it.

VI. 1. Upon the Cloſe of the Earl of Strafford's Tryal, all Mens Heads and Mouths were fill'd with Conjectures and Diſcourſes concerning this great Man's Fate; and as all Matters of Fact were finiſh'd, there was a ſtrange Pregnancy of Expectations as to Matter of Law, that was to determine this mighty Cauſe. But the Commons finding a great Defection in their Party, and that the Lords were not like to give Judgment as they expected, they reſolv'd to have no more publick Hearings, but proceeded to a more ſhort and effectual Way, which was to draw up a Bill of Attainder, and preſent the ſame to the Lords: 'Whereby firſt the Matters of Fact ſhou'd be declar'd to have been ſufficiently prov'd, and in the Matter of Law he had incurr'd the Cenſure of Treaſon, for intending to ſubvert the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom:' For they alledg'd 'That though he cou'd not be charg'd by the Letter of the Statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third, yet he was within the Compaſs of the Salvo, which provides, That the King and Parliament have Power to determine what is treaſonable, and what not; and they were confident the Lords wou'd comply with the Bill, tho' they wou'd not give Judgment of Treaſon without it.' This Motion was magnanimouſly oppos'd by the three great Lawyers of the Houſe, Selden, Holborne, and Bridgeman, who made it manifeſt 'That the Salvo in the twenty-fifth of Edward the Third was actually repeal'd, and that no Man cou'd now be convict of Treaſon, but by the Letter of that Statute, and likewiſe by the Mouths of two Witneſſes.' But it being put to the Vote, it was carry'd for the Bill, and a Committee appointed to draw it up.

The Commons proceed by Way of Attainder

The Lords fearing theſe Proceedings might open a Paſſage to the Ruin of their own Lives and Eſtates, the next Day in a Conference repreſented to the Commons 'That they wou'd go on the ſame Way they had firſt undertaken, and give a full Hearing to the Lord Strafford's Council in Matter of Law; and that they themſelves, as competent Judges, wou'd by themſelves alone give Judgment in the Cauſe; nor was there any other Courſe more ſuitable to the Practice and State of the Kingdom, the Safety of the Nobility, or to Equity or common Juſtice.' To this the Commons reply'd, 'That they were reſolv'd to go on with their Bill, and if their Lordſhips ſhould refuſe the ſame, they had Reaſon to fear a Diviſion and Rupture wou'd follow, to the infinite Damage of the whole Kingdom, becauſe no Satisfaction cou'd be given to the Subject, unleſs the Perſon, who had ſo much incroach'd upon their Rights, and diſcontented the People, might be puniſh'd as a Traitor.' Notwithſtanding this the Lords inſiſted upon their Rights, and the Reaſonableneſs of the Thing, and appointed 'Saturday the ſeventeenth of this Month for the Earl of Strafford to be heard by his Council in Weſtminſter-Hall, where the Commons, if they pleas'd,

The Lords proceed their own Way.

‘ might be preſent.’ The Commons cou’d not with Decency refuſe this Appointment, but at the ſame Time they us’d ſeveral Methods to intimidate thoſe Lawyers that ſhou’d be ſo hardy as to plead for a Man under their Diſpleaſure; and likewiſe declar’d, ‘ That they wou’d make no more publick Replies, becauſe of the Bill depending; only, if the Lords ſhou’d make any Scruple in Matter of Law, they wou’d be ready to give them Satisfaction, in a private Conference.

The Law-Part argu’d, by Mr. Lane, &c.

Upon the appointed Day, the Earl was brought to the Bar with his Council, which were Mr. Lane the Prince’s Attorney, Mr. Gardner Recorder of London, Mr. Loe, and Mr. Lightfoot. Theſe being admoniſh’d by the Lord-Steward to keep a reſpectful Diſtance, and not to meddle with Matters of Fact, Mr. Lane began, and with great Strength of Reaſon argued, ‘ That that Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward the Third, was a Declarative Law, and ſo not to be interpreted by Way of Conſequence, Equity or Conſtruction, but by the Expreſs Letter only: That it was a Penal-Law, and therefore cou’d by no Means admit of Conſtructions or Inferences; for Penalties were to enforce the keeping of what was known and certain, and not of conjectural and dubious Laws. As for the Salvo it ſelf, he affirm’d, That in the ſixth Year of Henry the Fourth a Petition was preferr’d in Parliament by the Nobility to have all Treaſon limited by Statute; That in that Parliament, an Act being made upon that Petition, that Salvo was to be repeal’d in all future Times; and that nothing ſhou’d be eſteem’d Treaſon, but what was literally contain’d in the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward the Third.’ The reſt of the Council ſpoke to the ſame Effect, and confirm’d all that had been ſaid by Mr. Lane. Whereupon the Lords and Commons adjourn’d; and the latter now more finding the Neceſſity of the Bill to effect their Purpoſe, reſolv’d that this ſhou’d be the laſt Day of the Earl’s Defence.

For the next Day after, the Commons enter’d into a Debate concerning the Bill of Attainder, and upon the Evidence of Sir Henry Vane’s Notes, voted the Earl guilty of High-Treaſon, order’d the Bill to be engroſs’d, and to be read the third Time upon the twenty firſt Day of April, to put an End to the whole Proceſs. Upon which Day, the Doors of the Houſe were carefully lock’d up, and a warm Debate aroſe; in which the Lord Digby, one of the Managers againſt the Earl, made a very remarkable Speech, and juſtly diſtinguiſh’d between a Proſecutor and a Judge.

The Lord Digby’s Speech againſt the Attainder.

In Proſecution, ſaid he, we are accountable only for our Induſtry or Remiſſneſs; but in Judgment we are reſponſible to God for its Rectitude or Obliquity: In Caſes of Life, the Judge is God’s Steward of the Party’s Blood, and muſt give a ſtrict Account for every Drop. He declar’d himſelf abſolutely unſatisfied with the main Ground-Work of their Bill, Sir Henry Vane’s Evidence and Notes, which he call’d disjointed Fragments of the venomous Part of Diſcourſes; without Reſults, or Concluſion of Counſels, which Secretaries only ſhou’d regiſter. Then for the Depoſitions, he obſerv’d, that upon three Examinations, they had vary’d every Time: So that he who twice cou’d not remember any thing of ſuch a Buſineſs, might well miſremember ſomewhat the third Time. Had there been any Probability or Proof of this of the Iriſh Army, he own’d it wou’d have diffus’d a Complexion of Treaſon over all, and been a Withe indeed to bind all the leſſer Branches into a Faggot of Treaſon. Then he warmly inveigh’d againſt ruining a Man and his Poſterity, upon a Law made à Poſteriori, and ſaid, Let the Mark be ſet on the Door, where the Plague is, and then let him that will enter, die. He concluded with a Motion to lay aſide the Bill of Attainder, and bring in another to ſecure the State from all future Miſchiefs that could ariſe from the Earl of Strafford.

This Speech was highly reſented by many in the Houſe, and the Lord was oblig’d to explain himſelf the next Day, which he did ſo much to the Diſadvantage of thoſe who were concern’d, that from that Time they proſecuted him with utmoſt Rage and Malice upon all Occaſions. At this Time a great Part of the Houſe was implacably diſpos’d towards the Earl’s Deſtruction, and no Arguments cou’d move or perſuade them to the contrary. It is remarkable that upon the main Debate, Sir Bevile Greenvile and Sir Alexander Carew, ſitting together, and ſerving both for the ſame County of Cornwall, Sir Bevile begg’d his Collegue to have ſome Remorſe, and ſaid, Pray, Sir, let it not be ſaid that any Member of our County ſhou’d have a Hand in this ominous Buſineſs, and therefore pray give your Vote againſt this Bill. To whom Sir Alexander violently reply’d;

Carew’s Zeal.

If I was ſure to be the next Man that ſhou’d ſuffer upon the ſame Scaffold, and with the ſame Ax, I wou’d give my Conſent to the paſſing it. All which preſagious Saying was afterwards exactly, and in every Circumſtance, verify’d and accompliſh’d.

The Bill paſſes the Commons.

After which Debate, the Bill paſs’d in the Houſe with only fifty nine diſſenting Voices, there being above two hundred in the Houſe.

1641. Car. 17.

The ſame Day Mr. Pym carry’d it up to the Lords, with a ſpecial Recommendation for Expedition, and an Aſſurance, ‘ That they were ready to juſtify its Legality.’ Thus was the Earl of Strafford’s Fate determin’d in the Houſe of Commons.

2. The Commons having finiſh’d this Point, they immediately proceeded to other Buſineſs, and particularly to the ſuppreſſing the Juriſdiction of the Court of York, which extended to the four Northern Counties, and which they look’d upon both as illegal and exorbitant.

Mr. Hyde againſt the Court of York.

Mr. Hyde, being Chair-Man of the Committee for this Matter, was imploy’d to repreſent the Inconveniencies of it to the Lords in a Conference between both Houſes; which he did in ſuch a handſome Speech, as occaſion’d his Parts and Abilities to be much obſerv’d, and ſeveral to move for the publick Thanks of the Houſe upon the Account of this Service. But the chief Leaders diverted them from it, alledging, That conſidering his Behaviour, he had too much Credit already; however the Northern Gentlemen ſhew’d themſelves very grateful to him upon ſeveral Emergencies. The Earl of Strafford, having been laſt Preſident of the North, and Judge of this Court with the moſt ample Authority, this Speech and Management of Mr. Hyde’s ſerv’d more to increaſe the general Indignation againſt him. Yet all Things ſeem’d to be at a ſtand in the upper Houſe; and no great Progreſs cou’d be made, till the Earl’s Buſineſs was diſpatch’d. All Men ſtood thoughtful and gazing; and they who treated for Promotions at Court, were ſollicitous to finiſh That, as what wou’d conclude all the reſt. The King was reſolv’d to move no further in it, till he might be ſecure of the Earl’s Life; which being done, he wou’d comply with any Thing; and the Earl of Bedford, who had the greateſt Authority with the violent Men, labour’d heartily to bring it to paſs; tho’, as Archbiſhop Laud tells us, before the Sitting of the Parliament, he had been one of the main Contrivers of the Earl’s Ruin.

On the ſame Day that Mr. Hyde made his Speech, he met at a publick Bowling-Green with the Earl of Bedford, who ſingling him out, familiarly diſcours’d with him upon the Earl of Strafford’s Caſe, and prophetically told Him,

The Earl of Bedford’s Diſcourſe with him.

‘ That that Buſineſs was a Rock upon which they ſhou’d all ſplit; and the Kingdom wou’d be deſtroy’d through the Heat of the Parliament. That his Majeſty was ſatiſfy’d, he had by his paſſionate Proceedings render’d himſelf uſeleſs for future Service, and was content that they ſhou’d inflict Baniſhment or perpetual Impriſonment upon him. That if by their own Judicatory they wou’d take his Death upon Themſelves, he wou’d not interpoſe by his Pardon; but ſince they were proceeding by an Act of Parliament, in which He himſelf muſt be a Party, he cou’d not with a ſafe Conſcience give his Aſſent to it; as having heard Nothing produc’d at the whole Tryal, which prov’d him a Traytor either in Fact or Intention.’ The Earl added, ‘ That he had done what he cou’d to perſuade his Friends to be ſatisfy’d with the Remedy propos’d by the King; and that he ſhou’d not deſpair of Succeſs, if the Earl of Eſſex cou’d be perſuaded to comply, who was hitherto very obſtinate. That he had left his Brother the Marqueſs of Hertford walking with him juſt by; and he deſir’d Mr. Hyde to go and endeavour to perſuade him to what was reaſonable.’ Mr. Hyde readily conſented, and the Earl of Eſſex, parting from the Marqueſs, jocoſely began to tell Him,

And that of the Earl of Eſſex.

‘ That he had that Morning perform’d a Service, which he knew he did not intend; that by his Speech againſt the Court of York he had reviv’d their Diſpleaſure againſt the Earl of Strafford, ſo that he hop’d they wou’d now proceed in the Bill againſt him with Vigour; which was the Effect, he was ſure he had no Mind to be the Cauſe of.’ Mr. Hyde confeſs’d, ‘ He had indeed no ſuch Deſign, and hop’d ſomewhat he had ſaid might induce them to proceed in another Method upon his Crimes. That he knew their Backwardneſs in the Bill proceeded from their Diſagreement upon the Point of Treaſons, which the longer they conſider’d, wou’d occaſion the more Difficulties. But if that was once declin’d, they ſhou’d all agree to inflict ſuch a Cenſure upon him, as wou’d abſolutely deprive him of all Power, that might prove dangerous to the Kingdom, or prejudicial to his Oppoſers.’ The Earl ſhook his Head, and reply’d, ‘ Stone dead has no Fellow! That if he were fin’d and condemn’d to perpetual Impriſonment, the King wou’d ſoon grant his Pardon and Eſtate, remit his Fines and give him his Liberty whenever he had Occaſion for his Service, which wou’d be as ſoon as the Parliament was ended.’ Mr. Hyde not being allow’d to preſs any farther at this Time, ſhortly after expoſtulated with the Earl, ‘ How unjuſtifiable it was for a Man to act contrary to his Conſcience; that he was ſatisfy’d if his Lordſhip was not fully convinc’d of the Earl of Strafford’s Guilt, the King cou’d never oblige him to vote for that Bill; and therefore he ‘ admir’d how he cou’d urge the King to do an Act which ‘ he had declar’d to be directly againſt his own Conſcience.’ To which the Earl warmly gave this final Anſwer, The King in Conſcience was oblig’d to conform himſelf and his Opinion, to the Advice and Conſcience of his Parliament. This was an unknown Doctrine newly maintain’d by their Divines, and of ſpecial Uſe in the Purſuit of their future Projects.

Complaints againſt Papiſts.

The King’s Anſwer.

Notwithſtanding all this, the Bill did not meet with that warm Reception in the Houſe of Peers, as the Commons expected; and tho’ a new Petition from the London Citizens gave it a freſh Puſh, yet the Lords found it a Buſineſs ſo intricate and perplext, that they thought it neceſſary to deſire a Conference with the Commons upon that Subject. Upon which they appointed Mr. St. John the King’s Sollicitor, at a ſet Day to juſtify the Bill by Law, in the Preſence of the Earl at the Bar. But in the mean Time they addreſs’d Themſelves to the King by Way of Petition for three Requeſts, namely, ‘ For removing all Papiſts from the Court; ‘ For diſarming of Them generally throughout the King- ‘ dom; and For Diſbanding the Iriſh Army.’ To which his Majeſty return’d particular Anſwers in a Speech to both Houſes at Whitehall: ‘ Firſt, that they all knew what Le- ‘ gal Truſt the Crown had in that Particular, therefore he ‘ ſhou’d not need to ſay any Thing to aſſure them, That ‘ he ſhou’d uſe it ſo, as there ſhou’d ariſe no juſt Cauſe of ‘ Scandal. For the Second, he was content it ſhou’d be ‘ done according to Law. And for the Third he had ‘ conſulted of that and its Difficulties, and ſo much wiſh’d ‘ the Diſbanding of all Armies, that he conjur’d them ‘ Speedily and heartily to joyn with him in Diſbanding of ‘ thoſe two in England.

Mr. St. John argues for the Attainder Bill.

The Commons, to give ſome Umbrage to their zealous Proceedings againſt the Earl, appear’d at the appointed Day with their great Champion Mr. Sollicitor St. John; who in the Preſence of the King, Lords and Commons, and the Priſoner Himſelf, ſtrenuouſly argu’d for the Space of an Hour, in Defence of the Bill of Attainder, and the Legality of it. This implacable Man, to remove all Impreſſions that had been made upon their Lordſhips, for Want of Proof, and Want of Law, boldly advanc’d two notable Propoſitions, and averr’d, That, in Way of Bill, private Satisfaction to each Man’s Conſcience was ſufficient, tho’ no Evidence had been given in at all. And as to Matter of Law he ſaid, We do indeed give Law to Hares and Deer, becauſe they are Beaſts of Chace; but it was never counted Cruelty or Foul Play to knock Wolves and Foxes on the Head, as they cou’d be found, becauſe they are Beaſts of Prey. It is juſtly obſerv’d, that the Law and Humanity were alike; the one being more fallacious, and the other more barbarous, than ever had been vented in ſuch an Auditory; which ſhew’d both the Spirit of the Perſon, and Temper of the Times. To all this the Earl made no Reply, but all along the Speech, by lifting up his Hands to Heaven to atteſt his Innocence, he ſeem’d to expreſs greater Eloquence by his Silence, than the other had done by his prolix Oration.

The King’s Speech in favour of the Earl.

Theſe popular and infectious Arguments ſoon began to operate, and they had ſuch Power over the Peers, that they began to ſhew a Propenſity towards the Bill, and eſteeming the Earl guilty of High-Treaſon, which more clearly appear’d in their Houſe next Day. The King having Notice of this, thought fit to try a new Experiment, and to ſatisfy his own Judgment and Conſcience, by calling both Houſes together on the firſt of May, and telling them in a Speech, ‘ That ſince it came to paſs, that he ‘ muſt have a Share in his Judgment concerning the Earl ‘ of Strafford, he thought it but neceſſary to declare his ‘ Conſcience. He was ſure they all knew he had been ‘ preſent from the Beginning to the Ending of that great ‘ Cauſe; and that he muſt tell them, That in his Conſcience ‘ he cou’d not condemn him of Treaſon: That it was not fit ‘ for Him to argue the Buſineſs; for a poſitive Doctrine beſt ‘ became the Mouth of a Prince: Yet he muſt needs tell ‘ them three Truths, which he was ſure no Man cou’d ‘ do ſo well as himſelf. Firſt, That he never had any In- ‘ tention to bring in the Iriſh Army into England, nor was ‘ ever adviſ’d ſo to do. Secondly, That there never was ‘ any Debate before him, either in publick Council or ‘ private Committee, of the Diſloyalty of his Engliſh Sub- ‘ jects. Thirdly, That he was never counſell’d by any to ‘ alter the leaſt of any of the Laws of England, much leſs ‘ to alter all the Laws. Nay he thought no Body durſt ‘ be ſo impudent as to move him to it; for if they had, ‘ he wou’d have made them ſuch an Example, as Poſterity ‘ ſhou’d have known his Intentions by it. That he yet deſir’d ‘ to be rightly underſtood, for tho’ he cou’d not condemn ‘ the Earl of High-Treaſon, yet he cou’d not acquit him of ‘ Miſdemeanours; and ſuch Miſdemeanours, that he thought ‘ him unfit either to ſerve Himſelf or the Common-Wealth ‘ in any Place of Truſt, no not ſo much as of a CON- ‘ STABLE. Therefore he left it to the Lords to find out ‘ ſome Way, as might ſatisfie Juſtice, and their own Fears, ‘ without oppreſſing his Conſcience.

The unhappy Effects of it.

This prov’d a very unfortunate Step, and quite contrary to the Conſent of the Earl and his Friends, and therefore the more ſtrange and ſurpriſing it was. All ſuppoſe that this Advice was given him by the Earl’s Enemies; and Father Philips, the Queen’s Confeſſor, in an intercepted Letter ſays it was done by the Earl of Briſtol and the Lord Savile. But the Lord Clarendon more expreſly charges it upon the Lord Say, who then endeavouring for the higheſt Preferments, did promiſe his Majeſty, He ſhou’d not be preſs’d in the Matter of the Earl of Strafford’s Life, if he wou’d make that Speech, as he did. And tho’ the Earl deſir’d to depend upon the Honour and Conſcience of the Peers, without his Majeſty’s Interpoſition, yet the repeated Aſſurances of the Lord Say did greatly deceive him, if not baſely betray him into this new Matter. The Event plainly ſhew’d the Miſtake; for the King was no ſooner return’d, than the Houſe of Commons in great Paſſion declar’d this laſt Act of the King’s to be ‘ The moſt un- ‘ parallel’d Breach of Privilege ever heard of; that if his ‘ Majeſty might declare his own Opinion of any Bills de- ‘ pending in either Houſe, it was fore-judging their Coun- ‘ ſels, and the moſt imaginable Obſtruction of Juſtice; ‘ therefore they were bound to ſtand by their Privileges, ‘ which were now too openly invaded and violated.’ They now began to betake Themſelves to new Arts, and to effect that by the Power of Tumults, which they had no Hopes of obtaining in a regular Method: And all that the King gain’d by this free Declaration of Himſelf, was to loſe much of the Affections of the People, whether he ſhou’d paſs the Bill or deny it. For if he paſs’d it, then it was to be imputed to the Neceſſity of his Affairs, not his Inclinations to the Good of his Subjects; and if he deny’d it, then it muſt have been eſteem’d a Refuſal of Juſtice to his People.

Great Complaints.

Marriage between the Prince of Orange and Princeſs Mary.

3. The next Day after this Speech, which was Sunday the Second of May, the Marriage between the Princeſs Mary, eldeſt Daughter to the King, and the young Prince of Orange, was ſolemniz’d at Whitehall with all ſuitable Pomp and Magnificence. This prov’d much leſs pleaſing to the Parliament and People, than when it was firſt propos’d, and great Numbers open’d their Mouths, and paſs’d Cenſures upon the King’s Management in this Affair. And the ſame Day ſome of the London Miniſters from their Pulpits began to blow up the Diſcontents of the People, in relation to the King’s Speech, and to ſhew the Neceſſity of Juſtice now to be acted upon ſome great Delinquents. This prov’d the Signal to new Outrages; for the very next Day, about five or ſix Thouſand Citizens, of the meaner Sort, arm’d with Swords or Battoons, came in a tumultuous Manner down to Weſtminſter, and having fill’d the Palace-Yards, and all the Entrances to the Parliament-Houſe, they ſtopp’d every Coach, crying out Juſtice, and Execution! and complaining of their Want of Trade and Bread, becauſe Juſtice was delay’d. Above a Thouſand of them beſet the Lord High-Steward’s Coach, with the ſame Outcry, and told him, Juſtice they had already, Execution they deſir’d, and wou’d have it. He reply’d, They ſhou’d have Juſtice, if they would have Patience; they ſaid, No, we have had too much Patience already, and before you part from us, we will have a Promiſe of Execution. He told them, He was going to the Houſe for that Purpoſe, and he wou’d endeavour to content them; upon which ſome of them cry’d, We will take his Word for once, and ſo with much Difficulty he got to the Houſe, where the Lords were ſo alarm’d, that moſt of them went back by Water. But the Earl of Holland, and Earl of Briſtol coming out to take Coach, they redoubled their Cry, and ſome of them told the latter, We know you are an Apoſtate from Chriſt’s Cauſe, we don’t crave Juſtice from You, but deſign to crave Juſtice upon You, and your falſe Son, the Lord Digby. Nor did they ſtop here, but ruſh’d into Weſtminſter-Abby, broke down the Organs, and robb’d the Veſtments and ſacred Furniture of the Church; and then with furious Clamours ran to the King’s Palace at Whitehall. There they proceeded to that Impudence, as to affront the King Himſelf by ſaucy and inſolent Replies, when his Majeſty from a Balcony, as they paſs’d by, deſir’d, That they wou’d keep at home, and mind their own Buſineſs. The Ringleader of this Rable was Cornelius Burgeſs, a furious Doctor of Divinity of the Puritan Party, who became famous in theſe ſort of Exploits, and was wont to cry out and bragg, Theſe are my Band-Dogs, I can ſet them on, and can take them off again, as I pleaſe.

Great Tumults.

In the mean time, ſome of the Juſtices of Peace, for impriſoning ſuch of the Rioters as they cou’d catch, were themſelves ſecur’d by the Houſe of Commons, who alledg’d, That it was free for all to come and petition the Parliament; tho’ they had ſhut the Gates of London againſt the Kentiſh Men that came to petition the contrary, and terrify'd others who deſign'd to have done the ſame. And when ſome diſcreet and good Men had deſir'd theſe Leaders in the Houſe to lay thoſe Spirits they had raiſ'd, they made Anſwer, That they ought rather to thank them as Friends. Nay, ſo far was the Parliamentary Dignity debas'd, that frequently Members of the Houſe of Commons repair'd to the Clubs of Apprentices, where they related, debated and examin'd the Affairs that paſs'd in Parliament, what was deſign'd to be done, what Poſts they themſelves were to act, and when. Hence their Tumults by this kind of Diſcipline, in a Manner came to be regular, being diſtributed into proper Claſſes and Fraternities, as of Watermen, Porters, Taylors, Shoemakers, &c. who under Pretence of Petitioning, flock'd together into Bodies, at the leaſt Hint from their Maſters; who whenever they found any Knot, which by other Arts they cou'd not unty, immediately betook themſelves to this Sword to cut it aſunder.

Many of the Commons join with the Mob.

The Names of the Straffordians.

And what was the moſt deſtructive Violation of the Freedom of Parliaments, they poſted up a Liſt of the Names of ſuch of the Commons as were againſt the Bill of Attainder, under the Name of STRAFFORDIANS, and ENEMIES TO THEIR COUNTRY; adding withal this Menace, Theſe and all other Enemies of the Common-wealth ſhou'd periſh with Strafford. Theſe were put up in ſeveral Parts of London and Weſtminſter; and becauſe their Names will not fill up too great a Part of this Hiſtory, we ſhall inſert them as following; The Lord Digby, the Lord Compton, the Lord Buckhurſt, Sir Robert Hatton, Sir Thomas Fanſhaw, Sir Edward Alford, Sir Nicholas Slanning, Sir Thomas Danby, Sir George Wentworth, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir William Carnaby, Sir Richard Win, Sir Gervaſe Clifton, Sir William Widdrington, Sir William Pennyman, Sir Patrick Curwen, Sir Richard Lee, Sir Henry Slingsby, Sir William Portman, Sir Gervaſe Hollis, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, Mr. Cooke, Mr. Ben. Weſton, Mr. William Weſton, Mr. Selden, Mr. Alford, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Herbert, Captain Digby, Serjeant Hyde, Mr. Tailor, Mr Griffith, Mr. Scowen, Mr. Bridgeman, Mr. Fettiplace, Dr. Turner, Captain Price, Mr. Price, Dr. Parry, Mr. Arundel, Mr. Newport, Mr. Holborn, Mr. Noel, Mr. Kerton, Mr. Pollard, Mr. Travannion, Mr. Jane, Mr. Edgecombe, Mr. Chichely, Mr. Mallery, Mr. Porter, Mr. White, Sir John Strangeways, and Mr. Warwick.

The Diſcovery of a great Plot.

4. During theſe Diſturbances, there hapned an Accident, which by the Management of the Commons was ſoon improv'd to the Ruin of the Earl, and afterwards to the bringing on the grand Civil War. This was a Diſcovery of ſeveral Meetings and Diſcourſes between ſome Perſons nearly related to the King's Service, and ſome of the Officers of the Army, concerning the high Proceedings of the Parliament, and ſome Expedients to reduce them to a better Temper; which was no ſooner hinted to ſome of the Leading Members, but the whole was ſhap'd into a dangerous and bloody Deſign againſt the Government. Accordingly Mr. Pym acquainted the Houſe, ‘ That there ‘ were Informations of deſperate Deſigns at home and ‘ abroad, to bring up the Army to awe the Parliament, to ‘ ſurpriſe the Tower, that the Earl of Strafford might eſ‑ ‘ cape; That Portſmouth was to be betray'd, and the French ‘ were ſuddenly drawing down an Army to the Sea Side.’ As dangerous as all this was repreſented, yet the whole was not publiſh'd to the Houſes till three Months after; tho' they made extraordinary uſe of it by Parts, from the Moment they receiv'd the Secret. It was uſual with Them, when they found the Heat of the Houſe abated, to inflame them again with ſome Diſcovery, or a Promiſe of a Diſcovery of ſome ſtrange Plot againſt Themſelves, which, tho' upon Examination they always vaniſh'd, yet being apply'd in critical Seaſons of Time, ſerv'd to allarm common Minds with Fears and Apprehenſions, and ſo induce them to comply with thoſe, who were moſt like to find Remedies for thoſe Diſeaſes, which they only cou'd diſcover. But this being a Matter of ſome Foundation, and of great Moment in the Conſequence, we ſhall ſhew the Particulars of this Plot in a more proper Place.

A new Proteſtation by the Parliament.

The firſt Effect of this Diſcovery, tho' at preſent general, imperfect, and much conceal'd, was the following Proteſtation made by the Commons: ‘ I A. B. Do in the ‘ Preſence of God, promiſe, vow and proteſt to maintain ‘ and defend, as far as lawfully I may, with my Life, Power ‘ and Eſtate, the true Reform'd Proteſtant Religion, ex‑ ‘ preſs'd in the Doctrine of the Church of England, againſt ‘ all Popery, and Popiſh Innovation within this Realm, con‑ ‘ trary to the ſaid Doctrine; and according to the Duty of ‘ my Allegiance I will maintain, and defend his Majeſty's ‘ Royal Perſon, Honour and Eſtate: Alſo the Power and ‘ Privileges of Parliaments, the lawful Rights and Liber‑ ‘ ties of the Subjects, and every Perſon that ſhall make ‘ this Proteſtation, in whatſoever he ſhall do in the lawful ‘ Purſuance of the ſame; and to my Power, as far as law‑ ‘ fully I may, I will oppoſe, and by all good Ways and ‘ Means endeavour to bring condign Puniſhment on all ‘ ſuch as ſhall by Force, Practice, Counſels, Plots, Conſpi‑ ‘ racies, or otherwiſe do any thing to the contrary in this ‘ preſent Proteſtation contain'd.’------This Proteſtation was by many accounted rather worſe than the Scotch Covenant; yet it found an eaſy Admiſſion in the Houſe of Commons, and alſo among the Lords, who all took it except the Earl of Southampton and the Lord Roberts, who alledg'd There was no Law to enjoyn it, and the Conſequence of ſuch voluntary Engagements might produce Effects that were not at firſt intended. However the Commons puſh'd it forwards, and order'd it to be taken throughout all England; and it was the more promoted, becauſe of two plauſible Effects it might produce. Firſt it was thought an Antidote both to expel and diſcover the Poyſon of the foremention'd Plot: Secondly, one Clauſe was look'd upon as a Preſervative againſt any Alterations in Church Government. But to undeceive all Perſons as to that Clauſe, the Commons made ſuch an Explanation, as ſhew'd that the Church and Biſhops were to expect no real Benefit from it.

Strafford's intended Eſcape.

A ridiculous Accident.

This being finiſh'd, ſtrict Enquiries were made by both Houſes into the intended Eſcape of the Earl of Strafford; concerning which Sir William Balfour, Lieutenant of the Tower, declar'd, ‘ That he was order'd by the King to ‘ receive a Hundred Men under Captain Billingſley into the ‘ Tower, and that the Earl offer'd him a great Reward if ‘ he wou'd favour his Eſcape, all which, in Fidelity to ‘ the Parliament, he refus'd.’ Several did much queſtion the Teſtimony of Balfour, as being a Scot, and an Enemy to the Earl; yet it immediately rais'd a new Out-cry in the City, where other conjectural Stories of this Deſign were added, to the great Encreaſe of the daily Tumults. Upon which Diſturbances the Lord Privy-Seal, in a Conference between both Houſes, acquainted the Commons with a Meſſage from the King and Council, ‘ That it was his ‘ Majeſty's Pleaſure that both Houſes conſider of ſome ‘ ſpeedy Courſe to ſettle Peace, and to prevent the like ‘ Tumults for the future.’ The ſame Lord alſo repreſented to them, ‘ That it was a great Hindrance to the ‘ paſſing their Bill of Attainder, their Lordſhips being in‑ ‘ compaſs'd with ſuch Multitudes, that they cou'd not be ‘ free in their Votes.’ But notwithſtanding, the Commons took no Notice, but ſtill propagated the News of Plots and Conſpiracies, which fill'd every Man's Ears, and had an odd Effect the next Day, tho' upon this trivial Occaſion. Sir Walter Earle was making a Report of a diſmal Deſign to blow up the Houſe of Commons, when Mr. Middleton and Mr. Moyle, two corpulent Men, and ſome others ſtanding up to hear the Report, a Board in the Gallery broke down with ſuch an Exploſion, that ſome believ'd the Houſe was really blown up; and Sir John Wray crying out, He ſmelt Gun-powder, they haſtily ruſh'd out of the Houſe, and frighted the People in the Lobby, who ran into the Hall crying out, The Parliament-Houſe was falling, and the Members ſlain, and all was turn'd into Hurry and Confuſion. Some of the Zealots took the Advantage of the Accident, and by Water gave the Allarm; ſo that the Drums beat, and a Regiment of Train-Bands march'd as far as Covent-Garden, and all the Rabble of Volunteers down to the Houſe to ſave the Parliament. This inconſiderable Accident, tho' at preſent it occaſion'd nothing but Sport and Laughter, did extreamly animate the Leaders of the Houſe, who now plainly diſcover'd the Influence they had over the Multitude, and that they were perfectly at their Beck and Devotion.

The Earl of Bedford's Death.

During theſe Diſtractions, the Earl of Bedford, having a Month before loſt his beloved Son, fell ſick at a Time when he might have been highly ſerviceable to the Earl of Strafford, and ſoon after dy'd of the Small-Pox. He had been aſſur'd of the Treaſurer's Staff, and had undertaken to preſerve the Earl's Life; but he who had been his mortal Oppoſer, was now ſnatch'd away before he cou'd make any Retribution. He dy'd much afflicted with the Paſſion and Fury he had found in his own Party, and upon his Death-Bed declar'd, He fear'd the Rage and Madneſs of this Parliament wou'd bring greater Miſchiefs upon the Kingdom, than the long Intermiſſion of thoſe Aſſemblies. His natural Wiſdom and Authority was now much wanting among the Lords, many of whom, as well as all the Biſhops, declin'd all Appearance in the Houſe. Yet the Attainder Bill went on but ſlowly; but in Concluſion, the Judges to give Countenance to the Matter, being ask'd their Opinion, the Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench deliver'd it as their unanimous Opinion, ‘ That upon all ‘ that their Lordſhips had voted to be prov'd, the Earl of ‘ Strafford doth deſerve to undergo the Pains and Forfei‑ ‘ tures of High-Treaſon.’ Upon which the Bill paſs'd the Houſe, but not without conſiderable Oppoſition; for all the Lords, except forty five, were abſent, and of thoſe it was carry'd but by ſeven Votes, twenty five being for, and nineteen againſt the Bill. But if his Friends, or only the Biſhops had been preſent, they might have more than counterpois'd the Votes for this fatal Bill; in which there was a ſpecial Proviſo, ‘ That this Act ſhou'd not be a Precedent, or take Place in any other Man's Caſe for the future.’ Thus was this great Man's Fate determined in the Houſe of Lords, upon Saturday the 8th of May; upon which Day they likewiſe paſs'd another Bill for perpetuating the Parliament, as fatal to the King, as the former was to the Earl.

New Tumults.

VII. 1. Thus far had both Houſes proceeded towards the Deſtruction of the Earl of Strafford; but the great Difficulty was yet to overcome, the procuring the Royal Aſſent, which was neceſſary to compleat this Tragedy. For this Purpoſe, immediately after the Bill had paſs'd in the upper Houſe, the Lords and Commons attended his Majeſty at the Banqueting-Houſe, to move him to this great Point; to which they receiv'd Anſwer, that upon Monday they ſhou'd know his Majeſty's Reſolution. About the ſame Time a Rabble of many thouſand People beſieg'd the Palace, crying out Juſtice, Juſtice! not without inſolent Threats and Expreſſions, what they wou'd do, if it was not ſpeedily granted.

The King conſults his Friends about the Bill.

All Sunday was a reſtleſs Day to the King, who had a violent Struggle within himſelf how to act in this ungrateful Affair; and certainly never was any poor Prince ſo miſerably haraſs'd between the Importunities of his Honour and Conſcience on one ſide, and the Fears of ſuch a publick Rupture as ſeem'd to threaten nothing but Deſtruction to himſelf and his Family. He ſummon'd his Privy-Council, his Judges, and five Biſhops, to aſſiſt and relieve him in this melancholy Exigency; but ſcarce any of them wou'd interpoſe their Opinion, to ſupport the Innocence or Magnanimity of their Maſter. The new Doctrine prevail'd with ſome, ‘ That no Man ſhou'd preſume to adviſe any thing in that Place, contrary to the Senſe of both Houſes;’ and others ſadly believ'd, ‘ That the Force and Violence offer'd to the King, wou'd before God and Man be a juſt Excuſe for whatſoever he ſhou'd do.’ All ſeem'd willing to ſhift off the Burthen from themſelves to others; the Counſellors referr'd the King to the Biſhops to inform his Conſcience, and the Biſhops referr'd him to the Judges, to ſatisfy him as to the Legality. The King particularly complain'd of the Judges, that they had not ſatisfy'd him, nor indeed durſt they give their Opinions freely for the Satisfaction of his Conſcience, their own being already over-aw'd and terrify'd, their very Courage and Reaſon having deſerted them in the common Extremity, and by their dubious Anſwers abuſing him, as he ſaid, not eaſing him of his Scruples.

The Opinion of the Biſhops.

The Biſhops concern'd in this Difficulty, were Uſher Primate of Ireland, Morton Biſhop of Durham, Williams Biſhop of Lincoln, Potter Biſhop of Carliſle, and Juxon Biſhop of London; of whom two have been ſeverely cenſur'd for their colluſive Manner of promoting the Bill. Archbiſhop Uſher is charg'd with diſtinguiſhing between the King's politick Capacity and his natural, his publick Conſcience and his private; as tho' he might condemn the Earl by the one, tho' the other told him he was innocent. But Sir Edward Walker has abſolutely clear'd him from the King's own Mouth; and the Lord Clarendon has as directly charg'd it upon Williams, whom by Miſtake he calls Archbiſhop of York. Biſhop Hacket does in Effect clear him of this Imputation, without knowing it was then charg'd upon him; and it ſeems the more probable, both becauſe the King himſelf made him Archbiſhop of York a few Months after, and becauſe it does not appear that any ſuch Advice was ever given in Publick. According to the beſt Hands, who have ſtrictly inquir'd into this Matter, the Advice that was given, was the unanimous Agreement of four Biſhops, Uſher, Morton, Williams and Potter, and to this Effect: ‘ That in this Caſe the Matter of Fact and the Matter of Law were to be diſtinguiſh'd: That of the Matter of Fact, his Majeſty himſelf might make a Judgment, having been preſent at all the Proceedings; where, if upon hearing the Allegations on either Side, he did not conceive the Earl guilty of the Crimes laid to his Charge, he cou'd not in Juſtice condemn him: But for the Matter of Law, what was Treaſon, and what was not, he was to reſt in the Opinion of his Judges, whoſe Office it was to declare the Law, and who were ſworn therein to carry themſelves indifferently betwixt him and his Subjects.’ This was the Reſult of their common Opinion, and Biſhop Hacket aſſures us, that there was none of theſe four but wou'd have paſs'd through Fire and Water, to have preſerv'd the unfortunate Victim. However it was, Biſhop Juxon remain'd inviolable and invincible in his Fidelity and Integrity, and Heroically told the King, That he ought to do nothing with an unſatisfy'd Conſcience, upon any Conſideration in the World: By which he gain'd a Reputation that ought to be render'd Immortal in Hiſtory; and throughout all the following Storm, he enjoy'd the greateſt Calm of any Man in the three Kingdoms.

The Earl's Letter to the King.

The King's former Promiſe of Protection muſt needs be very uneaſy to him in this Emergency; but what gave him moſt Relief was a Letter wrote by the Earl himſelf, who in an uncommon Strain of Gallantry, ‘ To ſet his Majeſty's Conſcience at Liberty, humbly beſeech'd him to paſs the Bill, for the preventing ſuch Miſchiefs as might happen by his Refuſal; and that he wou'd remove him out of the Way, towards that bleſſed Agreement, which he hop'd God wou'd for ever eſtabliſh between him and his Subjects. Then he added theſe Words, Sir, my Conſent herein ſhall more acquit you to God, than all the World can do beſides; to a willing Man there is no Injury done: And as by God's Grace I forgive all the World, with a Calmneſs and Meekneſs of infinite Contentment to my diſlodging Soul; So, Sir, to you I can give the Life of this World, with all the Chearfulneſs imaginable, in the juſt Acknowledgment of your exceeding Favours.’ This Letter was urg'd with great Plauſibleneſs for paſſing the Bill, by ſome that were about his Majeſty; and on the other Side nothing was ſounded in his Ears but Fears, Terrors, and repeated Threatnings of Tumults and Rebellions from every Quarter of the City, and every Corner of the Kingdom, to the Hazard of his Royal Conſort and Children. At laſt having wreſtled himſelf breathleſs, late at Night he yielded to Importunity and Neceſſity, and ſo ſign'd a Commiſſion to the Earl of Arundel, and two other Lords, to paſs the two fatal Bills, one for the Execution of the Earl of Strafford, and the other for the perpetuating the Parliament. Thus all Mankind, the King, the Queen, the Lords, the Commons, the Biſhops, the Judges, the City and the Multitude, did ſeverally contribute to the ſacrificing of one ſingle Victim: So that be the Crime great or ſmall, ſure never was any known more diffus'd and National. Nay the Earl himſelf ſeem'd to have given the main Stroak, who by endeavouring to perform an Heroick Action, perhaps did not enough conſider that he adviſ'd his Maſter to one beneath a King. His Majeſty was ſoon ſenſible of it, and always remember'd it with infinite Regret, and as the juſt Cauſe of all his Miſfortunes. It is obſerv'd that this Sin was one of thoſe which carry their own Puniſhment along with them, and naturally produce it, abſtractedly from the Remorſe of Conſcience, and the Chaſtiſement of Heaven. And Time made it plainly appear, That a good Maſter, who once forſakes his Servants, finds few that will adhere to him, when once he is forſaken by Fortune.

The King paſſes that and another fatal Bill.

2. After the ſigning theſe Bills, the King ſent Sir Dudley Carleton his Secretary to the Earl, to acquaint him with what was done, and the Motives to it, eſpecially the Earl's own Conſent. He receiv'd the Meſſage of Death with great Courage, yet Sweetneſs, but not without ſome Surpriſe and Aſtoniſhment, as if he did not believe the King's Aſſent. Some Authors ſay he lift up his Hands and Eyes to Heaven, and pour'd out this Scripture Ejaculation, Put not your Truſt in Princes, nor in the Sons of Men, for in them there is no Salvation! Immediately the Earl prepar'd himſelf for Death, and on Monday, after the Commiſſioners had paſs'd the Bill, he ſent an humble Petition to the Houſe of Lords, in which, ‘ He crav'd leave to return their Lordſhips moſt humble Thanks for their noble Compaſſion, he underſtood, they had ſhewn towards his innocent Children, whom now with his laſt Bleſſing he muſt commit to the Protection of the Almighty God, beſeeching their Lordſhips to finiſh this pious Intention towards them, in which he truſted the Honourable Houſe of Commons wou'd afford their Chriſtian Aſſiſtance.

The Earl's Petition to the Lords.

The King's Letter to the Lords.

In the mean time the King's Mind being fill'd with relenting Thoughts and melancholy Reflections, upon Tueſday he ſent a pathetick Letter to the Houſe of Lords, in which he told them, ‘ He had the Day before ſatisfy'd the Juſtice of the Nation by paſſing the Bill of Attainder; but Mercy being as inherent to a King as Juſtice, he deſir'd in ſome Meaſure to ſhew that likewiſe, by ſuffering that Unfortunate Man to fulfill the natural Courſe of his Life in a cloſe Impriſonment; ſo that if he ever made the leaſt Offer to eſcape, or directly or indirectly offer'd to meddle in any ſort of publick Buſineſs, he ſhou'd die without Proceſs. If this cou'd be done, without the Diſcontentment of the People, it wou'd be an unſpeakable Satiſfaction to him. Therefore, as in the firſt Place he did by this Letter earneſtly deſire their Approbation, and to endear it the more had choſen Him to carry it, who of all their Houſe was moſt dear to him, ſo he deſir'd that they wou'd in a Conference endeavour alſo to give Contentment to the Houſe of Commons.--------But if no leſs than his Life will ſatisfie the People, he muſt then ſay FIAT JUSTITIA; and ſo again recom'mended the Conſideration of his Intentions to them, and 'remain'd their unalterable and affectionate Friend. At 'the bottom of the Letter, as a Poſtſcript, he added, If he 'muſt die, it were Charity to reprieve him till Saturday.

Their Anſwer, and Diſcourſe with the King.

This Letter, all written with the King's own Hand, was deliver'd by the Hand of the young Prince, as the firſt Favour he had to ask of the Parliament, and was with much Attention read twice in the Houſe. After a ſerious but ſad Conſideration, the Houſe immediately reſolv'd to ſend twelve of the Peers Meſſengers to his Majeſty, humbly to ſignify, 'That neither of the two Intentions expreſs'd in the 'Letter, cou'd with Duty in them, or without Danger to 'his Conſort the Queen, and all the young Princes their 'Children, be poſſibly admitted.' This being ſignified to his Majeſty, he ſuffer'd no more Words to come from them; but out of a full Deſire to give Satisfaction to his Parliament and People, he told them, That what he intended by his Letter was with an IF, if it might be done without Diſcontentment to his People: If it cannot be, I repeat the ſame I wrote, Fiat Juſtitia. My other Intention for a few Days Reſpite, was upon Information, that his Eſtate was ſo diſtracted, that it neceſſarily requir'd ſome few Days for the Settlement of it. To which the Lords anſwer'd, 'Their Deſign was to be Suitors to his Majeſty 'for Favour to his Innocent Children, and that their Father's Proviſion for them might be confirm'd;' which was highly pleaſing to the King. At their Departure, they offer'd the King's Letter into his own Hands; but he was pleas'd to ſay, What I have written to you, I ſhall be content to have it Regiſter'd in your Houſe; in which you ſee my Mind, I hope you will uſe it to my Honour. Thus they parted, and all Hopes of Mercy or Reprieve were now at an End.

The Earl's Ability and Chriſtian Courage.

The Earl had now prepar'd himſelf for Death, which he look'd upon with all the Courage of a Man, and the Spirit of a Chriſtian; and in order to it had deſir'd the particular Aſſiſtance of Archbiſhop Uſher, the Primate of Ireland, who diſcharg'd his Duty with all Honour and Fidelity. Upon a full Diſcourſe with him, that learned Prelate told the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, That in all his Life he never knew any Lay-Man, that ſo well and fully underſtood Matters of Divinity, as the Earl did; and that his Reſolutions were no leſs firm and good. And to ſhew how inviolably ſteady he was to that Church in which he had been educated, he bravely rejected a moſt tempting Offer made to him at this time by his Brother-in-law Mr. Denzil Hollis. This Perſon being one of the great Leaders in the Houſe of Commons, came privately to him, and aſſur'd him, That if he wou'd employ his Power and Credit with the King, for the taking of EPISCOPACY out of the Church, he ſhou'd yet have his Life. To which the Earl very nobly reply'd, That he wou'd not buy his Life at ſo dear a Rate: An Anſwer no doubt very ſurpriſing to that Gentleman, and thoſe that ſent him.

His Meſſage to the Archbiſhop.

The Night before his Execution, he ſent for the Lieutenant of the Tower, and ask'd him, Whether it was poſſible for him to ſpeak with the Archbiſhop of Caterbury? and being anſwer'd that he cou'd not permit it without Order from the Parliament, Mr. Lieutenant, ſaid he, you ſhall hear what paſſes between us; it is not Time for me to plot Treaſon, or for him to plot Hereſie. To which the Lieutenant anſwer'd, he was limited, and deſir'd he wou'd petition the Parliament for that Favour. No, reply'd he, I have gotten my Diſpatch from them, and will trouble them no more; I am now petitioning a higher Court, where neither Partiality can be expected, nor Error fear'd: But, my Lord, ſaid he, turning to the Primate of Ireland then with him, what I would have ſpoken to his Grace of Canterbury is this: You ſhall deſire the Archbiſhop to lend me his Prayers this Night, and to give me his Bleſſing when I go out to Morrow, and to be at his Window, that by my laſt Farewell I may give him Thanks for this and all his former Favours. The Lord Primate immediately perform'd his Meſſage, and return'd with this Anſwer from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, That in Conſcience he was bound to do the Firſt, and in Duty and Obligation to do the Laſt; but he fear'd his Weakneſs and Paſſion wou'd ſcarce lend him Eyes to behold his laſt Departure.

He goes forth to his Execution.

3. And now we come to bring this prepared Victim to the laſt Scene of his Tragedy, which was compleated on Wedneſday the twelfth of May. Having prepar'd his Soul for this laſt Conflict, he chearfully came out of his Chamber, attended by the Lord Primate of Ireland, and ſeveral Gentlemen and Perſons of Quality, together with the Lieutenant and Wardens of the Tower. When he drew near the Archbiſhop's Lodgings, he ſaid to the Lieutenant, Sir, tho' I do not ſee the Archbiſhop, pray give me leave to pay my laſt Obſervance towards his Rooms; but the Archbiſhop being adviſ'd of his Approach, immediately came to the Window, upon which the Earl, making a profound Bow, cry'd, My Lord, your Prayers and your Bleſſing! The Archbiſhop lift up his Hands and beſtow'd both; but unable to ſupport this ſudden Effort, caus'd by the tendereſt Emotions of Friendſhip and Pity, he ſunk down to the Ground, as if his Soul wou'd have forc'd a Way to join the Earl's in its Paſſage to Eternity. The Earl bowing a ſecond time, cry'd Farewell, my Lord; God protect your Innocence! The Archbiſhop fearing that his Behaviour might be term'd Effeminacy, or an unbecoming Weakneſs, declar'd That he hop'd by God's Aſſiſtance and his own Innocence, that when his own expected Execution ſhou'd happen, the World ſhould perceive he had been more ſenſible of the Earl's Loſs, than of his own: And with good Reaſon, for that Gentleman was more ſerviceable to the Church, not to mention the State, than either himſelf, or any of all the Church-Men had ever been. Thus with a Countenance ſerene and auguſt, the Earl marched towards the Scaffold, more like a General to a Triumph, than a Criminal to his Execution. Marching out of the Tower, the Lieutenant deſir'd him to take Coach, leaſt the inrag'd People ſhou'd fall upon him and tear him in Pieces: No, reply'd he with an Air of Innocence and Courage, I dare look Death in the Face, and I hope the People too; have you a Care I do not eſcape, and 'tis equal to me how I die, whether by the Stroak of the Executioner, or the Rage and Madneſs of the People: If that may give them better Satisfaction, 'tis all the ſame to me.

The Archbiſhop's Teſtimony of him

His Diſcourſe with his Brother.

Being mounted upon the Scaffold on Tower-hill, in the Preſence of above a hundred thouſand Spectators, he made his Obeyſances, and began to take his ſolemn Leave of his Friends, who appear'd more deeply concern'd than himſelf. Obſerving his Brother Sir George Wentworth to weep exceſſively, Brother, ſaid he with a chearful Countenance, what do you ſee in me to deſerve theſe Tears? does my ſervile Fear betray my Guilt, or my aſſuming Boldneſs any Atheiſm? Think that this is the third Time you accompany me to my Marriage Bed: Nor did I ever throw off my Cloaths with more Freedom and Content, than in this Preparation to my Grave. That Stock muſt be my Pillow; here ſhall I reſt from all my Labours; no Thoughts of Envy, no Dreams of Treaſon, Jealouſies of Foes, Cares for the King, the State, or my ſelf, ſhall interrupt this eaſie Sleep: Therefore, Brother, pity my Enemies, who, beſides their Intentions, have made me bleſſed; rejoice in my Innocence, rejoice in my Happineſs. Then kneeling down, he made this glorious Proteſtation to thoſe about him on the Scaffold. I hope, Gentlemen, you believe that neither the Fear of Loſs, nor Love of Fame will ſuffer me to belye God and my own Conſcience at this Time: I am now in the very Door going out, and my next Step muſt be from Time to Eternity, either of Peace or Pain: To clear my ſelf before you all, I do here ſolemnly call God to witneſs I am not Guilty, ſo far as I can underſtand, of the great Crime laid to my Charge, nor ever had the leaſt Inclination or Intention to damnify or prejudice the King, the State, the Laws, or the Religion of this Kingdom, but with my beſt Endeavours to ſerve all, and ſupport all, SO MAY GOD BE MERCIFUL TO MY SOUL!

His Proteſtation.

His laſt Speech to the Spectators.

Then riſing up, he ſaid He deſir'd to ſpeak Something to the People and all the Spectators, to whom he addreſs'd Himſelf in a ſolemn Speech, of which this is the Subſtance. 'I am come hither by the Will and Pleaſure of God to 'pay the laſt Debt I owe to Sin, which is Death; and to 'ſubmit to that Judgment which has paſs'd upon me, which 'I do with a quiet and contented Mind. I thank God, I 'freely forgive all the World; and I thank God, that I 'can truly ſay, That in all the Imployments I have had the 'Honour to ſerve his Majeſty, I never had any Thing in 'my Intentions, but what tended to the joint and individual 'Proſperity of King and People; tho' it has been my ill 'Fortune to be miſunderſtood. There is one Thing in 'which I deſire to clear my ſelf: I did always think the 'Parliaments of England the happieſt Conſtitution that 'any Kingdom liv'd under, and next under God the beſt 'Means to make the King and his People happy: So far 'have I been from being againſt Parliaments. For my 'Death, I here acquit all the World, and beſeech the God 'of Heaven heartily to forgive them that contriv'd it; 'Tho' in the Intentions of my Heart I am not guilty of what 'I die for.------I wiſh this Kingdom all the Proſperity and 'Happineſs in the World; I ever did it living, and now 'dying it is my Prayer: Yet I earneſtly deſire every One 'that hears me to conſider ſeriouſly, Whether the Reformation of a Kingdom ſhou'd be written in LETTERS 'OF BLOOD; Let me never be ſo unhappy, as that 'the leaſt Drop of my Blood ſhou'd riſe up in Judgment 'againſt any one of You: I acquit you all, but fear you are 'in a dangerous Road. My Lord Primate, I here profeſs, 'and with that I ſhall conclude, that I die a true and obedient Son to the Church of England, in which I was born 'and educated; Peace and Proſperity be ever with it! I deſire heartily the Forgiveneſs of every One, for any raſh 'and unadviſed Act, or for any Thing done amiſs: And 'ſo, my Lords and Gentlemen, farewell: Farewell all 'Things of this World.

His laſt Meſſage to his Wife and Children.

His Execution.

Upon finiſhing his Speech he ſaluted all the Noblemen and conſiderable Perſons on the Scaffold; then giving them his Hand, and deſiring them all to joyn with him in Prayer, he kneel'd down, and continu'd his Devotions for a Quarter of an Hour. Then riſing up and turning to his Brother Sir George Wentworth, he ſaid, Brother, carry my Bleſſing to my eldeſt Son, and charge him from Me, That he fear God, continue an obedient Son of the Church of England, and a faithful Subject to the King: That he retain no private Grudge or Revenge towards any upon my Account; and bid him Beware not to meddle with Church Livings, for that will prove a Moth and Canker to him in his Eſtate. He alſo ſent his Bleſſing to his Lady and his Daughters, and conculded, One Stroak will make my diſconſolate Wife Husbandleſs, my dear Children Fatherleſs, and my poor Servants Maſterleſs, and ſeparate me from my dear Brother, and all my Friends; but let God be to You and Them All in All. After this, taking off his Garments, to make himſelf ready, he ſaid, I thank God, I am now no more afraid of Death, but do as chearfully put off my Cloathes, as ever I did when I went to Bed. Then having ſeveral Times recommended his prepar'd Soul to the Mercies of God, he ſubmitted his Neck with moſt Chriſtian Magnanimity to the Stroak of the Axe, which at one Blow took off his Head, before he had fill'd up the Number of fifty Years. Many of the Spectators, who had formerly been prejudic'd againſt him, were now infinitely affected with the Courage and Chriſtianity of his Death; but others at Diſtance, and more in the City had contrary Sentiments: For the greateſt Demonſtrations of Joy immediately ran through London and the neighbouring Parts; and many who came purpoſely to Town to ſee the Execution, rode back in Triumph, waving their Hats in all publick Places, and crying, His Head is off, his Head is off! committing great Inſolencies againſt ſuch as were not ready to ſolemnize this Feſtival. His Body was embalm'd, and bury'd in Yorkſhire among his Anceſtors; but for the Honour of his Memory, Archbiſhop Uſher ſoon after declar'd to the King, That he had ſeen many dye, but never ſaw ſo White a Soul return to its Maker. At which Expreſſion, this compaſſionate Prince was ſo tenderly affected, that he turn'd aſide and paid ſome Tears to the Manes of the illuſtrious Sufferer.

His Greatneſs and Fortune.

Thus fell the tall Cedar of the Wood, the greateſt Subject in Power, not leſs in Wiſdom, and little leſs in Fortune, at that Time in the three Kingdoms; who cou'd well remember the Time, when he led the ſame People who afterwards purſu'd him to his Ruin. Cardinal Richlieu was ſo ſenſible of his Abilities, that he ſaid, The Engliſh were ſo fooliſh, that they wou'd not let their wiſeſt Head ſtand upon its own Shoulders. His Authority and Station may be compar'd to the Earthy Mounds or Sea-Banks, which being ſwept away by a Storm, leave all the In-Land to be drown'd by Popular Tumult. He was ſo formidable to the Scotch, that it is ſaid he fell a Sacrifice more to their Fear, than their Revenge; yet one Man, whom he moſt deſpis'd, was the principal Cauſe of his Death. His main Misfortunes, as Archbiſhop Laud obſerves, were owing to the publick Envy of the Nobility; and his ſerving a mild and gracious Prince, who knew not how to be made Great. We have already given his full Character, in the Beginning of the ſecond Chapter in the firſt Book; therefore ſhall only obſerve, that as he met with a double Retaliation for his Severity to the Duke of Buckingham, ſo he ſhew'd a ſignal Inſtance, that no Power and Abilities can protect a Man, where his Pride and Haughtineſs remain uncorrected. His Riſe was too quick, his Life too proſperous, and his Pride too predominant; which at laſt Heaven ſtrangely puniſh'd, by bringing his Deſtruction upon him by two Things he moſt contemn'd, the People and Sir Henry Vane. Here was firſt open'd that Fountain of Blood, which ſoon encreas'd to a Deluge, and overflow'd three Kingdoms; and this ſingle Act gave infinite Diſturbance to the pious King, even to the Day of his Death. The King had certainly avoided this, according to Sir Philip Warwick, had not falſe Counſellors ſo prevail'd on the Queen's Fears, that in Reſpect of her own and Children's Safety, he quitted his firſt Reſolutions. This fatally diſcover'd his Weakneſs, and Mr. Pym too juſtly boaſted to his Friends, Since we have got the King to part with Strafford, he can deny us Nothing. This ſeems to have been fully verify'd before the Words were ſpoken; for with the very ſame Drop of Ink he ſign'd the Attainder-Bill, he ſign'd that for the Continuance of the Parliament; as if it were impoſſible for his Royal Prerogative to ſtand, when Wentworth the great Support of it was fallen; ſo that a new Government was to take Life from the Death of this great Man.

An Account of the fatal Bill for the Continuance of the Parliament.

4. The Occaſion of this laſt fatal Bill aroſe from very plauſible Pretences: The vaſt Expence of the two Armies was no otherwiſe ſupply'd, than by borrowing great Sums of Mony in the City; the Subſidies being daily deferr'd and retarded upon other ſpecious Reaſons. Hereupon the Leaders of the Commons, taking Advantage of a contriv'd Emergency, acquainted the Houſe, 'That there was now 'no Hopes of borrowing more Mony; That thoſe who had 'already chearfully lent upon the Honour and Juſtice of 'the two Houſes, began to conſider, how deſperate that 'Security muſt be, in caſe the Parliament were diſſolv'd; 'the Fears of which were confirm'd and augmented in the 'Diſcovery of the late Plot; which, tho' not publiſh'd as 'to every Particular, gave them Reaſon to think there were 'no good Intentions towards the Parliament.' This was no ſooner offer'd, but the Reaſonableneſs of the Objection was inforc'd, and the Neceſſity urg'd of ſome Expedient to ſatisfy the People of his Majeſty's gracious Intentions and Reſolutions, which upon this and other Occaſions were highly magnify'd and extoll'd. And no Way cou'd be thought ſo ſecure as a new Act to be made, 'That this 'Parliament ſhou'd not be adjourn'd, prorogu'd, or diſ'ſolv'd, without their own Conſent.' We are aſſur'd that the Firſt Motion of this was made by Mr. Waller in private to the leading Members; who now were ſenſible that the Act for Triennial Parliaments was not ſufficient to anſwer their great Ends and Purpoſes; therefore this was promoted in the moſt critical Juncture, and at the ſame Time back'd with Promiſes of ſeveral, who offer'd to procure large Sums, if the Act might paſs.

This met with an univerſal Reception, and a Committee was immediately appointed to withdraw and prepare a ſhort Bill for that Purpoſe, which in leſs than an Hour was finiſh'd and brought into the Houſe. It was ſuddenly read twice and committed, an Expedition then not known in Parliament, and the next Day carry'd up to the Lords, who deſir'd a Conference with the Commons upon that Subject; where the only Difference was about the Indefiniteneſs of the Time. The Earl of Mancheſter, who manag'd it for the Peers, offer'd the Commons to fix it to two, three, five, or ſeven Years. To which the Sollicitor St. John, their Manager, very ſubtilly anſwer'd, God forbid that we ſhou'd be forc'd to ſit one Year; for as ſoon as the Armies are disbanded, the Neceſſity will be at an End; and no Occaſion afterwards to inſiſt on the Act: But if it paſs for an indefinite Time, we ſhall have Credit to disband the Armies, and ſatiſfy all Debts; and when the Act is once paſs'd, we ſhall quickly diſpatch both. The Commons inſiſted on their Bill, and the Lords in that Hurry of Noiſe and Confuſion, when the Mob was increaſing, likewiſe conſented; and the King, by the Importunity of thoſe about him, in the Agony of the other Diſpatch, ſign'd it with the Act of Attainder; ſo this fatal Act perfectly ſtole into the Nation, when all Mens Minds were intent upon the great Buſineſs of the Earl of Strafford.

Cenſures upon it.

The Miſchiefs of this Conceſſion were beyond all Remedy and Relief; and the Wiſdom of the King was not only reflected upon abroad, but condemn'd at home by his own Fool Archy, who ſaid, He did not know whether the King was the greater Fool to grant it, or the Parliament the greater Knaves to ask it. All Mankind were ſurpris'd at this Act, and many believ'd there muſt be ſome Politick End in it, or ſome ſiniſter Deſign of cutting thoſe Knots by the Sword which had been made by the Pen. But his Actions ſoon after, as well as the Proteſtations in his Book, clear him from all ſuch Imputations; and have made it manifeſt that it proceeded from as great a Confidence as ever any Prince had in his Subjects, a Confidence ſo great as did not a little ſully his Diſcretion and Management. Many Reflections have been made upon this unprecedented Grant; and it has been often thought, that if the King, inſtead of paſſing the two Bills, had diſſolv'd the Parliament, or put himſelf at the Head of his Army, he might have prevented the future Miſchiefs. But upon an Examination of all the preſent Circumſtances, ſuch as the Prevalency of the Faction in both Houſes, the Rage of the People, the Uſe made of the late Proteſtation and Plot, the Conſtitution of the Council-Table, the Treachery of the King's Adviſers, the Threats towards his Royal Conſort, and the Unſtable Fidelity of the Army at this Time, infinite Difficulties will ſoon appear. Therefore whoever ſeriouſly reflects upon all Theſe, will find the Part the King had to act, was not only harder than any Prince, but than any private Gentleman had ever ſuſtain'd; and that, upon the Accidents which have ſince hapned, it was much eaſier to determine what was Not to have been done, than at That Time to have foreſeen what cou'd have been done to extricate himſelf out of this unfortunate Labyrinth.

The Promiſes of the Parliament.

Thus was the Conſtitution of the Nation alter'd from a well regulated Monarchy, to a new and unknown Species of a Common-Wealth. It had been obſerv'd by ſome of our Kings, That Parliaments were the beſt Phyſick for the Land, but that Nation muſt ſoon be in a languiſhing Condition, that was always taking Phyſick; and much worſe, where it liv'd upon that inſtead of common Food; as it ſoon appear'd in the preſent Caſe. However the Parliament made great Promiſes towards the contrary Effect, and the ſame Day the two Bills were paſs'd, the Commons by Mr. Treaſurer return'd their humble Thanks to his Majeſty, aſſuring him, That they wou'd make him as GLORIOUS a Potentate, and as rich a Prince, as any of his Predeceſſors. How far this was made good, will be ſeen in the Sequel of the Hiſtory.

The Temper of the People.

I. FROM this unhappy Period of Time we are to look upon the Form of the Engliſh Government as new modell'd, and ſo far alter'd, that it has rais'd a Doubt among ſome ſort of Writers, Whether thoſe who afterwards took up Arms againſt the King, cou'd be Legally term'd Rebels, till another Period of Time, when by his Majeſty's Impriſonment, and their Votes of Non-Addreſſes, they had put it beyond all Queſtion. For by paſſing this laſt Act of Continuance, the King had made the two Houſes ſo far Independent upon himſelf, that they immediately acquir'd an uncommon Authority, and a Sort of Natural Right to inſpect and cenſure his Actions; and being ſupported with real Power, varniſh'd with the moſt ſpecious Pretences, the preſent Reformers found innumerable Ways to effect their Deſigns. The new-gain'd Power was modeſtly us'd in the Beginning; ſo that when the King came to the Houſe, the Day after the Earl of Strafford's Execution, and paſs'd three Bills, 'For ſhortning of Michaelmaſs-Term, For preſſing of Mariners, and For the Remainder of the ſix Subſidies;' it was obſerv'd that the Temper and Spirit of the People, both in and out of Parliament, was wonderfully calm and compos'd, as tho' no further Danger was to be expected.

The Incroachments of the Commons.

A ſtrange Inſtance.

But this inchanting Proſperity was too great to be born with Moderation; for in a ſhort Time the Houſe of Commons much more exceeded in Point of their Privileges, than ever they had before, and more diſregarded the Concurrence of the Lords. And now finding they cou'd not be diſſolv'd without their own Conſent, they proceeded to call any Power they thought fit to aſſume, A Branch of their Privilege, and any Oppoſing or Queſtioning that Power, A Breach of their Privileges; which all were bound to defend by their late Proteſtation, and of which they made Themſelves the only proper Judges. This was ſoon carry'd to unheard-of Exorbitancies; and from hence they call'd whom they pleas'd Delinquents, receiv'd all Complaints, and committed to Priſon, after ſuch a Manner, as had never been done or attempted before this Parliament. And, as if all other Privileges of Peers, and the King himſelf had been ſwallow'd up in theirs, upon the Lords rejecting a Bill ſent up to them, 'To compel all Perſons to take the late Proteſtation;' and the Earl of Southampton and the Lord Roberts having refus'd to take the ſame, as was formerly hinted, they by a Vote declar'd with great Fury and Contempt, 'That the Proteſtation was fit to be taken by every Perſon that was well affected in Religion, and to the Good of the Common-wealth; and therefore, That what Perſon ſoever ſhou'd refuſe it, was unworthy to bear Office in the Church or Common-wealth:' And further order'd, 'That the Vote ſhou'd be printed, and that the Knights and Burgeſſes ſhou'd ſend down Copies of it to the Places for which they ſerv'd.' Thus far did they arrive within a few Weeks after their new acquir'd Power. This, ſays the noble Hiſtorian, was the moſt inſolent Affront to the Lords, the King, and the Juſtice of the Nation, and the moſt deſtructive to Parliaments, and conſequently the moſt unparallel'd Breach of Privilege, that any Age had been guilty of. And yet when ſome of the Peers had bravely reſented it, in order to a Reparation, Means was found out to engage the King himſelf to interpoſe, and cauſe them ſilently to paſs over this open Violation and Indignity.

A Change in the publick Miniſtry.

Car. 17.

But before this great Flight, the Power of the Commons was become ſo formidable, that the greateſt Perſons knew not how to withſtand it, ſo that within a few Days after the Fall of the Earl of Strafford, ſeveral of the chief Officers of State voluntarily reſign'd their Places. The Lord Cottington gave up his Place of Maſter of the Wards, which was conferr'd upon the Lord Say; Biſhop Juxon reſign'd his Place of Lord High-Treaſurer into the Hands of five Commiſſioners; the Marqueſs of Hartford was ſworn Governour of the Prince, in the Room of the Earl of Newcaſtle; and in the Place of the late Earl of Strafford, the Earl of Leiceſter was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Theſe Alterations were thought of ſome Advantage to the King's Affairs; and there hapned an Accident about the ſame Time which probably might have encreas'd that Expectation: Some Paſſion aroſe at a Committee of the Lords between the Earl of Pembroke, then Lord-Chamberlain of the Houſhold, and the Lord Mowbray, eldeſt Son to the Earl of Arundel, and from exaſperating Words proceeded to an Attempt of Blows; for which Miſdemeanour they were both ſent to the Tower by the Houſe of Lords: And the King, who had been long diſpleas'd with the indiſcreet inſolent Carriage of the Earl, took that Advantage to ſend for the Staff, and immediately put it into the Hands of the Earl of Eſſex, who took it without any Heſitation. It was believ'd that this Favour to the moſt popular Man in the Kingdom, wou'd have had a ſignal Influence upon the whole Party; but inſtead of that they look'd upon it rather as a Mark of Puniſhment upon the Earl of Pembroke, for his Affection to them and Enmity to the Earl of Strafford, than of Eſteem to the Earl of Eſſex; ſo that, unhappily for the King, they were really more incens'd with the Diſgrace of the one, than they were oblig'd with the Preferment of the other.

Deſigns againſt the Church.

2. One of the deepeſt Deſigns, and perhaps longeſt intended, was the Overthrow of the preſent Conſtitution of the Church; but in this great Work they met with ſeveral Impediments, and frequent Diſcouragements. For they who had in their Hearts made the moſt deſtructive Reſolutions againſt the Church, durſt not yet impart their ſecret Wiſhes to thoſe Friends, whoſe Authority gave them the greateſt Credit. And what added to the Difficulty was how to erect a new Edifice, in the Room of the old: For their own Clergy, whoſe Hands they produc'd in great Numbers, complaining of Grievances and Innovations, were far from being unanimous in the Matter or Manner of what they wou'd have alter'd. There was ſtill leſs Conſent among their Lay Friends, who cou'd not agree upon any new Models, as Mr. Oliver Cromwell did in Effect own to Sir Thomas Chichely and Mr. Warwick, who diſcourſing with him in the Houſe as to Matters of Religion, he reply'd, I can tell you, Sirs, what I wou'd not have; tho' I cannot tell what I wou'd. However it was, many were reſolv'd to run all Hazards; ſo they might ruin the preſent Eſtabliſhment.

A Bill againſt the Biſhops Votes, &c.

After they had made the reſtraining Vote, formerly mention'd, 'To take away all Biſhops Votes in Parliament, and Power in the Star-Chamber, and all Clergy-mens Commiſſions of the Peace,' they proceeded to turn the ſame into a Bill; which was particularly countenanc'd by all the popular Lords, who obſerv'd, 'They cou'd ſeldom carry any thing directly contrary to the King's Intereſt, by reaſon of the Number of the Biſhops; and they believ'd, That the Church cou'd receive no Damage by the Clergy's having fewer Diverſions from their Spiritual Charges.' This Argument was urg'd in the Houſe of Commons; and to prevail with ſome who earneſtly deſir'd the Biſhops might ſuffer no ſuch Diminution of their Honour and Authority, it was alledg'd, 'That the Scots were ſo reſolutely ingag'd in a Combination with the Generality of the People, againſt the Government of the Church, that if the Biſhops were not remov'd, their Army wou'd never march out of the Kingdom; but if this Bill were once paſs'd, ſuch a Number in both Houſes wou'd be ſo well ſatisfy'd, that the more violent Party wou'd be unable to purſue their Deſigns.' This prevail'd over Men of excellent Judgment, and unqueſtionable Affections, who at that Time really believ'd, 'That the paſſing this Act was the only Expedient to preſerve the Church.' The Lord Falkland was for ſome time of this Opinion, having been deceiv'd by the Artifices of Mr. Hampden, who had aſſur'd him, That if the Bill might paſs, there wou'd be nothing more attempted to the Prejudice of the Church; which, that Lord thought, as the World then went, would be no ill Compoſition.

Rejected by the Lords.

When the Bill was carry'd up to the Lords, many of the greateſt Men of that Houſe, who began to feel the Weight of the Empire the Leaders of the Commons had exercis'd over them and others, and obſerving they had further Deſigns in View than they own'd, fell from them, and took the Opportunity of diſcovering themſelves upon the Debate, in which they ſeverely declaim'd againſt the Houſe of Commons, 'For preſuming to meddle with an Affair that ſo immediately concern'd Themſelves; that if they might ſend up a Bill one Day to take a whole Claſs out of their Houſe at once, they might the next Day by another cut off the Barons, or ſome other Degree of the Nobility.' Theſe and other Arguments were urg'd with a Warmth and Vigour they had not before expreſs'd; ſo that tho' the whole Party, who had never been before oppos'd, made themſelves ſecure of carrying it; yet notwithſtanding all they cou'd alledge, the Biſhops appear'd ſuch a Fundamental Part of the Conſtitution, that the Lords wou'd not ſo much as commit the Bill, but threw it quite out upon a ſecond Reading. This caſt ſuch a Damp upon the Spirits of the governing Party in both Houſes, that they were really at a Stand; for they were not now ſure they ſhou'd be able to carry any Thing; for the Majority, that threw out this Bill, might oppoſe them in any other Matter of Moment; beſides the Influence it wou'd have in the Houſe of Commons, and elſewhere: For they well knew, ‘ That ‘ a great many follow'd them upon no other Ground, but ‘ a Belief that they wou'd carry all before them.

A ſecond Bill againſt Biſhops, &c,

This happen'd a little before the Fall of the Earl of Strafford; but ſhortly after his Death, and their new acquir'd Power, upon the 20th of May, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, and ſome others, prevail'd upon the warm Sir Edward Deering to preſent a ſhort Bill, drawn up by Mr. St. John, ‘ For ‘ the utter Eradication of all Biſhops, Deans and Chapters, ‘ with all Chancellors, Officials, and Officers belonging to ‘ them.’ That ingenious and indiſcreet Gentleman, with a bare haſty Peruſal of the Bill, deliver'd it from the Gallery with a ſhort Extempore Speech, and a cloſe Application of a Sentence in Ovid, Immedicabile Vulnus Enſe recidendum eſt. As ſoon as the Title of it was read, which was almoſt as long as the Bill it ſelf, it being the Overthrow of many Acts of Parliament, and deliver'd without Leave, it met with ſuch a Reception as might naturally mortify a fine Speech-Maker. Yet being ſupported by Mr. St. John, the Compoſer, and ſome others, it was once read; but without any Queſtion put, it was laid aſide for a conſiderable Time; many believing ‘ There was no Deſign ‘ to purſue it, but that it was only preferr'd to expreſs a ‘ Neglect towards the Lords.

However, after a few Weeks, when the Houſe grew hotter, the Bill was call'd for, read a ſecond time, and referr'd to a Committee of the whole Houſe; in which Mr. Hyde was put into the Chair, tho' an Enemy to the Bill, purpoſely that he might not give them Trouble by frequent ſpeaking, and too much obſtruct their Deſigns. The firſt Day the Committee ſat full ſeven Hours, and determin'd, ‘ That every Day the Chair-man ſhou'd report the Reſolu‘ tions to the Houſe, which ſhou'd fix them before it roſe.’ This unprecedented Method continu'd for near twenty Days, which caus'd the Attendance to be ſo tedious, that moſt of thoſe who abhorr'd the Bill left the Houſe at Dinner-time, and never ſtay'd for the Determination, while the impatient Proſecutors of it continu'd to the laſt. Which caus'd the Lord Falkland to make this ſharp Obſervation, That they who hated Biſhops, hated them worſe than the Devil, and they who lov'd them, did not love them ſo well as their Dinner.

But without Succeſs.

However the Chair-Man gave ſome Stop to their Career, by entangling them in their own Queſtions, by inlarging himſelf in his Reports, and ſometimes by reporting two or three Votes directly contrary to each other: So that after all their long Debates, they found themſelves oblig'd by other Buſineſs to lay aſide the Bill for above a Year after: And Sir Arthur Haſlerigg declar'd in the Houſe, That hereafter he wou'd never put an Enemy into the Chair. All that the Commons did this Seſſion further with Relation to the Church, was to fix a Brand of Impeachment upon Biſhop Wren, for ſeveral Innovations and Superſtitions; and to ſecond it with an Impeachment of twelve more Biſhops in the Houſe of Lords, for their Canons and Proceedings in the late Convocation; as may be ſeen more at large in the common Collectors.

The Caſe of Tonnage and Poundage.

3. Before the Commons had proceeded thus far, they had reſolv'd to fix the great Buſineſs of Tonnage and Poundage, the beſt Branch of the King's Revenue, of which we have more than once given ſome Account. The King having enjoy'd this Benefit ever ſince his Acceſſion to the Throne, it was propos'd, ‘ That a Bill ſhou'd be ſpeedily ‘ prepar'd for the granting It, as had been uſual, for Life, ‘ leſt the Crown by long Poſſeſſion might plead Preſcription, ‘ without the Donation of the People.’ But ſoon after it was politickly alledg'd, ‘ That the Bill cou'd not be ſo ‘ ſpeedily prepar'd, by reaſon of the many juſt Exceptions ‘ made by the Merchants to the Book of Rates, lately made ‘ by the Farmers of the Cuſtoms, when the Earl of Port‘ land was Lord-Treaſurer.’ Therefore it was further propos'd, as the beſt Expedient both to preſerve his Majeſty's Revenue, and the People's Right of Giving, ‘ That a Tem‘ porary Bill ſhou'd paſs for granting the ſame to the King ‘ for two Months only, when a new Book of Rates might ‘ be made, more advantageous to his Majeſty's Revenue; ‘ and then a compleat Act might paſs.’ To this Purpoſe a Bill was brought in, the Preamble of which ‘ renounc'd ‘ and declar'd, not only againſt any Power in the Crown of ‘ levying Tonnage and Poundage, without Conſent of Par‘ liament, but alſo any Power of Impoſition upon any Mer‘ chandize whatſoever, and in any Caſe whatſoever;’ which had been conſtantly practis'd in the beſt Times by the Crown, and never yet declar'd againſt in Parliament. Yet this quietly paſs'd both Houſes, as a Matter not worth debating.

The King paſſes the Bill with a Speech.

In Expectation and Confidence, that they wou'd make glorious Additions to the State and Revenue of the Crown, his Majeſty readily join'd with them, and ſuffer'd himſelf to be ſtripp'd of all that he had left, and of the ſole Stock of Credit he had to borrow any Sums of Mony. Accordingly about ſix Weeks after the Parliament's new Government, on the 22d Day of June he paſs'd the Bill; and in a Speech to both Houſes he declar'd, ‘ That he did wil‘ lingly accept their Offer, as a Teſtimony and Beginning ‘ of their dutiful Affections, and that in due Time they ‘ wou'd perform their Promiſes when they had Leiſure: ‘ And he doubted not but they wou'd ſee by his paſſing that ‘ Bill, the Truſt he had in their Affections, hoping the ſame ‘ from Them to Him.’ Adding theſe Words, Therefore in this particular Bill, I hope you will know, that I do freely and frankly give over the Right which my Predeceſſors have ever challeng'd, which tho' diſputed in their Times, was never yielded till now. Therefore you will underſtand this but as a Mark of my Confidence, to put my Self wholly upon the Love and Affection of my People for my Subſiſtance. ---- ---

His Majeſty's Readineſs, as to this and other Compliances, made ſuch an Impreſſion, that the Day before the Bill paſs'd, Sir Edward Deering himſelf in a long Speech acknowledg'd, That the King had yet deny'd them nothing, uſing theſe Words, We are all bound unto the Goodneſs of his ſacred Majeſty, (God preſerve Him and His for it) none of all our Bills, none of our Petitions this Parliament, have miſcarry'd in his Royal Hand, but have been all compleated with the Royal Aſſent.

The paſſing this Bill was ſoon after ſucceeded with further Conceſſions from his Majeſty, who found further Occaſion to exerciſe his Patience. For now the Commons, having gain'd ſufficient Strength by the Help of their ſure and chargeable Friends the Scots, thought it full time to be freed of the great Burthen of the two Armies. In order to which, and to ſhew themſelves bountiful to their Aſſiſtants, beſides the ſix Subſidies formerly mention'd, they now paſs'd a general Poll-Tax, according to all Mens Qualities, which rais'd vaſt Sums of Mony; part of which was afterwards employ'd in the Wars againſt the King. The Bill was preſented to the King with two others, one for aboliſhing the High-Commiſſion Court, and the other the Star Chamber. The King was deſirous to conſider of the two laſt, for ſome time, and wou'd at firſt have only paſs'd the Pole-Bill, which being intimated to the Houſe of Commons, they voted, ‘ That all Three ſhou'd be paſs'd, or none at all:’ Notwithſtanding which the King paſs'd that for Poll-Mony, and demurr'd on the other Two, till underſtanding the great Heats in the Parliament, two Days after, the 5th of July, he came to the Houſe of Lords, where in a Speech to his Parliament, he declar'd, ‘ That he cou'd not but be ‘ ſenſible of thoſe Reports of Diſcontent, which he heard ‘ ſome had taken for his not paſſing thoſe Bills before; ‘ and that he thought it very ſtrange, they ſhou'd expect his ‘ paſſing two Bills of that Importance, without taking Time ‘ to conſider of them; they being an Alteration of thoſe ‘ Fundamental Laws, Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, which many ‘ of his Predeceſſors had eſtabliſh'd. That he wonder'd ‘ how they cou'd poſſibly harbour any Diſcontent, if they ‘ did but remember how much and what he had done for ‘ this Parliament; as his granting the Judges to hold their ‘ Places Quam diù ſe bene geſſerint, his Bounding the Foreſt‘ Laws, declining of Ship-Mony, eſtabliſhing the Subjects ‘ Property in Tonnage and Poundage, ſubmitting to Trien‘ nial Parliaments, doing Juſtice to Delinquents and Papiſts, ‘ &c. concluding to all graciouſly, That he wou'd omit ‘ Nothing which ſhou'd give them juſt Content.’ And then he paſs'd the two Bills for taking away the Star-Chamber and High-Commiſſion Courts.

Bills paſs'd againſt the Star-Chamber and High-Commiſſion.

An Account of thoſe two Courts.

We have already ſaid ſomething of both theſe famous Courts, which were now intirely aboliſh'd beyond Hopes of Revival. We ſhall only add, That the firſt had been continually a Defence of the Royal Prerogative, and Bulwark for the Liberty of the Subject againſt the Oppreſſions of Great Men, and ſuch extraordinary Villanies, as the common Courts of Juſtice cou'd not meet with; the Want of which caus'd Judge Hales afterwards to ſay at an Aſſize at Cambridge, That ſince the putting down of that Court, he believ'd in a few Years there had been more Frauds and Perjuries unpuniſh'd, than there had been in one hundred Years before: Yet many were ſo haſty in deſtroying this Court, that after an unprecedented Manner the Bill paſs'd with but once Reading in the Houſe of Commons. The other Court, the High-Commiſſion, had been by Statute erected in the Firſt of Queen Elizabeth, in the Room of a larger Authority before exerciſed by the Pope, and deſign'd for a Preſervative againſt Popery and Schiſm, and was as great a Curb to the Incontinence, Lewdneſs and Profaneneſs of Great Men, as the Star-Chamber had been to their moſt unlimited Acts of Subtlety and Infidelity ſupported by Power and Riches. To this Bill was added a Clauſe, which took away the Coercive Power of Biſhops, Chancellors, Archdeacons, &c. which in Effect was to take away the Power of Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures; ſo that inſtead of Reformation, it was an Inlet to the moſt ſcandalous Offences, leaving Inceſt and Adultery upon the Level with the ordinary Liberties of Society. This being perceiv'd by the King, and that the Body of the Bill exceeded the Title, he made a Pauſe, but in two Days he was brought to a Compliance; in which ſome Biſhops, and other well-meaning Perſons have been blam'd. As to the Ruin of theſe two Courts, which might have been of excellent Uſe both to Church and State, we ſhall only ſay in general, That beſides the preſent over-bearing Torrent, it proceeded from the ſame Cauſes that have been deſtructive or weakning to the beſt of all Inſtitutions, the Imprudences and Exorbitancies of ſeveral, whoſe chief Intereſt and Endeavours were to ſupport Them.

A Cenſure.

His Majeſty having paſs'd the two Bills, after a ſhort Mention of a Journey he deſign'd ſpeedily to take into Scotland, he propos'd ſome Matters very acceptable to the Parliament, the Deſires of his Nephew the Prince Elector Palatine; which were, ‘ That he ſhou'd ſend an Ambaſſador to the Diet then to be held at Ratisbone; and fearing leſt in that Negotiation he ſhou'd not receive ſo good an Anſwer as he might in Juſtice expect, he intended in his own Name to publiſh a Manifeſto, which he yet wou'd not reſolve upon, without the Conſent and Advice of his Parliament; and therefore he referr'd the Matter to their Conſideration.' Which Manifeſto was ſoon after made by the full Conſent of both Houſes, and Sir Thomas Roe, a Member of the Commons, and a Gentleman of great Abilities, was ſent to the Emperor at Ratisbone, but without any good Succeſs.

A Motion about the Elector Palatine.

At the ſame Time Mary de Medices, the Queen Mother of France, according to the Deſire of the Parliament, was to take her leave of England; but Mony being wanting for the Proviſion of her Journey, the Commons allotted ten thouſand Pounds to her, out of the Poll-Mony. This illuſtrious Lady had arriv'd in England almoſt three Years before, and had ſo long been a continu'd Expence to the King, her Son-in-law, of a Hundred Pounds per Diem; which, beſides the Jealouſies of the People, prov'd a new Addition to his Wants and Neceſſities. Her Regency in France had not been very fortunate, nor according to the Intereſt of that Kingdom; where her Actions had been ſuch, that the King her Son wou'd not harbour her in his own Dominions. Neither cou'd ſhe be admitted into the Territories of her Son-in-law, the King of Spain; nor durſt the States of Holland ſuffer her to tarry in theirs, for fear of offending Cardinal Richlieu. So that ſhe was oblig'd to retire to Cologn, where ſhe liv'd the reſt of her Days in extream Indigence; thus becoming a ſtrange Example of the Inſtability of Human Fortunes, that ſo great a Queen, and Mother of ſo many mighty Princes, ſhou'd want a quiet Harbour for her Age.

The Departure and Death of the Queen Mother of France.

4. But to return to the Parliament, where all Things tended more and more to Alterations and Incroachments, and where many Things were ſtill wanting to perfect the Deſigns of the grand Leaders. Nothing did more effectually promote, and ſet them forwards, than the Belief of the Plot formerly mention'd; which being their great Engine of Operation, we promis'd to relate the Particulars; which ſhall be done, as well from the Earl of Mancheſter's Memoirs, as the Lord Clarendon and others. It had its firſt Riſe, as was formerly hinted, from ſeveral Meetings and Diſcourſes between ſome Perſons concern'd in the King's Service, and ſome Officers of the Engliſh Army, relating to the high Proceedings of the Parliament, and ſome Expedients to reduce them to a better Temper. The Field Officers and Commanders of the Army continu'd chiefly at London, ſeveral of them being Members of both Houſes, while the Army it ſelf was left to the Care of Sir Jacob Aſtley; and the Differences between the King and Parliament, with the Supply of the Scotch Army, and the Neglect of the Engliſh, caus'd Diſcontent among the Engliſh Officers, and ſeveral private Meetings and Conſultations. They had been too obſequious before in the Parliament, but being diſoblig'd by the Importunities of the Scots, and the Forwardneſs of the Commons, they began to exert themſelves upon this Occaſion. Of the three hundred Thouſand Pounds voted to the Scots, the Commons had order'd a Third Part to be paid at Midſummer; but in the mean Time by a preſſing Paper they pretended great Neceſſity, and demanded a preſent Supply of twenty five thouſand Pounds, to which the Parliament readily yielded: For tho' they had but fifteen thouſand Pounds in Readineſs, yet they took Occaſion to borrow ten thouſand out of that fifty thouſand Pounds lately allotted for the Supply of the Engliſh Army, who were in far greater Neceſſity than the Scots. Whereupon the Lord Piercy, Brother to the Earl of Northumberland, Commiſſary Wilmot and Colonel Aſhburnham, all Members of the Commons, ſitting, together and diſguſted, Wilmot ſtood up and told the Speaker, That if ſuch Papers of the Scots cou'd procure Monies, he doubted not but the Officers of the Engliſh cou'd ſoon do the like.

A particular Account of the pretended Plot.

Car. 17.

This caus'd ſome Diſturbance, but cou'd not prevent the Scots receiving the Mony; wherefore to redeem what had been done amiſs, and reſtore Themſelves to his Majeſty's Favour, they conſider'd how to diſpoſe the Army to ſuch a Declaration of their Duty towards the King, as might make others deſpair of being able to uſe it to his Prejudice. For that Purpoſe they had ſeveral Meetings with ſome of more immediate Truſt in both their Majeſties, and form'd themſelves into a private Juncto, and put themſelves under an Oath of Secrecy. The chief Actors in this Buſineſs were the Lord Piercy, Mr. Henry Jermin, both Favourites of the Queen, Sir John Conyers, Wilmot, Leg, Pollard, Oneal, and Aſhburnham; who reſolv'd to draw up a Paper by Way of Petition to the King and Parliament, deſiring, ‘ Firſt, Mony for the Army; Secondly, not to disband before the Scots; Thirdly, to preſerve Biſhops Votes and Functions; and Laſtly, to ſettle his Majeſty's Revenue. In this they alſo applauded his Majeſty's great Condeſcenſions to the Scots and the preſent Parliament, eſpecially that laſting Pledge of Security the Bill for Triennial Parliaments: Notwithſtanding which, there had been ſuch Tumults and Exorbitancies, that they thought themſelves oblig'd to offer their Service, and to wait upon his Majeſty for the Suppreſſing them and all Oppoſers.' This Petition was ſign'd at the bottom C. R. as a Token of his Majeſty's private Allowance, and was carry'd down to the Army, and ſign'd by ſome Officers; but it was ſoon quaſh'd, and no more heard of, till afterwards it was repreſented in the moſt hideous Colours in the Houſe of Commons.

The chief Actors.

The Meetings ſtill continu'd between ſome of the Army Officers, and ſome of the King's Servants, and others were by ſpecial Directions of his Majeſty introduc'd into their ſecret Councils; particularly Colonel Goring, a brave and profligate Commander, who unſucceſsfully endeavour'd for the Admiſſion of Sir John Suckling. At his firſt Meeting, having heard the whole Deſign, which was only ‘ To obſerve and defend the Laws, that the King might not be compell'd by the Army of the Scots, to conſent to the Alteration of the Government of the Church, nor by the Power of any diſcontented Perſons, to ſubmit to a Diminution of his juſt and legal Authority;' he told them, That thoſe Reſolutions wou'd conduce little to his Majeſty's Service; That their only Way was to march the Army directly up to London, and ſo far Awe the Parliament, as to make them do what the King ſhou'd command. Every Perſon in the Company ſhew'd a perfect Abhorrence to ſo odious a Propoſal; yet chiefly diſcours'd upon ſuch Objections as render'd it fooliſh and impracticable, and ſo broke up the Meeting. But Goring, whoſe Ambition was not anſwer'd in the Promiſe of being Lieutenant-General of the Army, and finding others in the Secret whoſe Perſons he hated, and whoſe Fidelity he ſuſpected, thought it wou'd tend moſt to his Security and Advantage to reveal the Conſpiracy: And being vers'd in all the Methods of Falſhood, he diſcover'd all, and more than all, to thoſe who pretended the greateſt Care for the Common Good; intimating how much he was ſurpris'd with the Horror of the Deſign, and how faithful he wou'd be to the Common-wealth; yet at the ſame Time pretended an Abhorrence at Court to the Parliament Proceedings, and offer'd to ſerve his Majeſty by the moſt open Force of Arms.

Colonel Goring diſcovers them.

He made the firſt Diſcovery to the weak Earl of Newport, and ſo to the Lord Say, Kimbolton and others; to whom he made a Proteſtation of his Fidelity to the Parliament, and his Readineſs to run all Hazards for the Service of it; deſiring them to make what Uſe of it they thought fit for their own and Common Security, but not to bring him in as an Accuſer, without manifeſt Neceſſity. The Lords ſoon communicated the Deſign to ſome ſelect Members of the Houſe of Commons, by whoſe Advice it was agreed, ‘ That Goring ſhou'd repair to his Government at Portſmouth, and that upon his Departure, the Perſons who were chief Actors in the Deſign, ſhou'd be apprehended.' But private Notice being given to the Lord Piercy and Mr. Jermyn, they prevented the Proſecution of the Parliament by their Eſcape out of England. The Lord Piercy with ſome Hazard and Difficulty took Shipping in a private Port in Suſſex; Mr. Jermyn ventur'd upon Goring's Faithfulneſs to him, and brought him a Warrant under the King's Hand to ſee him ſafely tranſported in one of his Frigots, which he carefully obey'd, tho' at the ſame Time the Parliament had ſent Orders, which they had obtain'd under the Great Seal, to apprehend him, which he pretended came too late. At the ſame Time he took an Oath, likewiſe adminiſter'd under the Great Seal, ‘ To be true and faithful to the King and Parliament, to keep the Town of Portſmouth for their Uſe, and not to deliver it but by both their Conſents.

Piercy and Jermyn fly.

Upon this the Commons thought it neceſſary that Colonel Goring ſhou'd own the Diſcovery of the Deſign; and immediately he was ſent for by the Houſe, of which he was a Member, where he gave a particular Account of the whole, ſufficiently diſadvantageous to the Lord Piercy, Mr. Jermyn, and the reſt. His Evidence, and the Flight of the two Gentlemen, made a ſtrong Impreſſion upon the Houſe; all which was ſtrangely aggravated by the uſual Artifices of Mr. Pym, ſo that the Nation was ſoon allarm'd with the Noiſe of a dangerous Plot, and a bloody Deſign againſt the Government. The Belief of all this Plot was propagated in general Terms, and with cunning Reſerves as to Particulars, which were to ſerve for future as well as preſent Purpoſes. But it immediately produc'd the Proteſtation, formerly mention'd, and extreamly puſh'd forwards the Ruin of the Earl of Strafford. After which it was partly laid aſleep for five or ſix Weeks; yet ſtill it was politickly reſerv'd to help them out in any Difficulty or Emergency, and to blow up the Heat of the Houſe, whenever they thought it too much abated. And in this Management they often met with unuſual Accidents for the Support of their Credit.

Uſes made of the Plot.

Whenever the Court Party in the Houſe ventur'd to propound any Thing for Majeſty's Service, and the promis'd Settlement of his Revenues, they were preſently ſilenc'd by the Leaders with the Odiouſneſs of the late Plot, which they ſaid was not yet fully diſcover'd; but poſitively declar'd, ‘ That there had been a Deſign and Project, not ‘ only to poyſon the Affections of the Army towards the ‘ Parliament, but to bring that Army up to London, purpoſely to awe Them: That the Confederates in this Deſign had taken an Oath to oppoſe the Removing of Biſhops out of the Houſe of Peers, to maintain and defend ‘ the King's Prerogative to the utmoſt Extent, and to ſettle ‘ his Majeſty's Revenue: That they had Reaſon to fear ‘ the King's own Concurrence, or at leaſt his Approbation ‘ of this Deſign: For they had full Proof, That a Paper ‘ had paſs'd his Majeſty's Peruſal, full of ſevere Invectives ‘ againſt the Parliament, and an Offer of Service to defend ‘ his Majeſty's Perſon, which imply'd It was in Danger. ‘ And the better to encourage all the Officers of the Army ‘ to ſign it, his Majeſty himſelf had written a C. and an R. ‘ in Token of his Approbation.' Moſt Mens Minds were ſtrangely mov'd with Diſcourſes, ſo methodically and confidently averr'd; which ſerv'd not only to defeat whatever was offer'd in his Majeſty's Behalf, but even to diſcountenance the Disbanding the Armies, and the Return of the Scots into their own Country. Colonel Goring, the main Diſcoverer, was careſs'd by the leading Members, as a true Friend to the Publick; and the Lord Digby, for invalidating his Evidence, and aſperſing his Fidelity, was publickly expell'd the Houſe. This was only to ſhew their Reſentment; for on the ſame Day he was call'd by his Majeſty's Writ into the Houſe of Peers, dated the 10th of June.

Exclamations againſt it.

Lord Digby expell'd the Houſe.

After they had play'd with this Plot, and given the Houſe Heats and Colds for three Months, by applying Parts of it upon caſual Emergencies; and finding, that tho' it had done them great Service in advancing their own Credit, and blaſting the King's Honour, yet they were ſtill without their Court Preferments, they reſolv'd to ſhew their laſt Effort, and produce their whole Evidence. In which, They had a particular Mark of God's Favour, as they call'd it, by means of the Lord Piercy, who meeting with great Difficulties and Delays in his intended Eſcape, to extricate himſelf, was privately induc'd by Mr. Pym to write a certain Letter to his Brother the Earl of Northumberland, which in effect ſerv'd to blow up all the Companions, and furniſh'd the Committee with what they call'd A double Evidence. For immediately upon the Receipt of that Letter from the Earl, they inform'd the Houſe, ‘ They were ‘ now ready for a compleat Diſcovery;' and thereupon produc'd both Colonel Goring's Evidence, and the Lord Piercy's Letter, which being compar'd, agreed in ſeveral Particulars. Tho' there was a very little Shew of Proof of a real Deſign or Plot, to bring up the Army to awe the Parliament; yet ſeveral Things concurr'd to make the World believe it to be more than imaginary; as Mr. Pym's ſpecious poſitive Narration of the Whole, before the Evidence was read; The denying what was now prov'd and confeſs'd by Mr. Wilmot, Aſhburnham and Pollard, upon their former Examinations, the Flight of the Lord Piercy, Mr. Jermyn, and ſome others, and the Mention of ſome Clauſes in the Petition, ſigned C. R. and ſome envious dark Glances, both in Goring's Examination and Piercy's Letter, at the King and Queen, as if they knew more than was expreſs'd: All which ſo tranſported the Houſe, that taking all that was ſaid for Proof, they quickly voted, ‘ That there was a Deſign of bringing up ‘ the Army to force the Parliament;' reſolv'd to accuſe the Lord Piercy and Mr. Jermyn of High-Treaſon; committed the three Members to ſeveral Priſons, and expell'd them the Houſe, that their Places might be fill'd, as ſhortly they were, with ſome more fit for their Deſigns; gave Colonel Goring publick Thanks, ‘ For preſerving the Kingdom and Liberties of Parliament;' and alarm'd the People with Jealouſies for their Safety, and fill'd them with univerſal Applauſe for their ſingular Wiſdom and Vigilancy.

The Plot voted to be real.

This is the trueſt Account we can find of that Plot, which as much alarm'd the City of London, as the famous Conſpiracy of Catiline did that of Rome. T. May, and the Parliament Writers, ſeem very ready to believe the Reality of it; but the Lord Clarendon expreſly ſays there was no Plot at all; yet it cannot be ſaid to have been wholly without Foundation. In moſt Plots, whether real or pretended, there is ſomething ſo dark and myſterious, that Poſterity know not how to make an exact Judgment; therefore in this, we ſhall only obſerve, That the Intereſt of ſome, and the Credulity of more, had ſuch a prevailing Effect, as to bring about theſe vaſt Conſequences: It ſerv'd to produce the famous Proteſtation; to inflame the People againſt the Earl of Strafford; to procure the Bill for the perpetual Parliament, the Source of all the publick Calamities; to fruſtrate all Overtures made for his Majeſty's Revenues; to leſſen the general Reverence and Duty to both King and Queen; to retain the Scotch Army, and conſequently prevent the King's being disbanded; to incenſe both Houſes againſt the Biſhops; to blaſt the Reputation of the Earl of Newcaſtle, a moſt zealous Friend to his Majeſty, as if he had been to command the Army; and likewiſe to inhance their own Eſtimation with the People, as if they were the only Guardians of Religion, Law and Liberty. In ſhort, it ſunk ſo deep in the Hearts of many, that at laſt it fatally broke out in the Demand of the Militia, which actually brought on the enſuing War. This firſt appear'd in a ſhort time after the Parliament had voted the Certainty of this Plot, by a Bill brought in by Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, but drawn up by Mr. St. John, for the ſettling the Militia by Sea and Land; which, tho' proving too difficult for this preſent Juncture, ſufficiently ſhew'd the Leaders Deſigns at this very Time.

The fatal Effects of it.

5. During theſe ſtrict Examinations and Proceedings, the Judges of the Land were brought under the Cenſure of the Houſe of Commons, and ſix of them, Berkley, Bramſton, Crawly, Davenport, Trevor and Weſton, were impeach'd at the Lords Bar, as guilty of many Crimes, but eſpecially the promoting of the Ship-Mony. The Charges againſt them were introduc'd by the Rhetorical Speeches of Mr. Pierepoint, Mr. Waller and Mr. Hyde; the latter of whom diſplay'd all the Sails of his Eloquence, and declar'd to their Lordſhips, That there cou'd not be a greater Inſtance of a ſick and languiſhing Common-wealth, than the Buſineſs of this Day.-------'Tis no Marvel, that an irregular, extravagant, arbitrary Power, like a Torrent, has broken in upon us, when our Banks and Bulwarks, the Laws, were in the Cuſtody of ſuch Perſons.-----That the great Reſolution in Ship-Mony, was a Crime of ſo prodigious a Nature, that it cou'd not be eaſily ſwallow'd and digeſted by the Conſciences even of Theſe Men: But as they, who are to wraſtle or run a Race, by Degrees prepare themſelves by Diet, and leſſer Eſſays for the main Exerciſe; ſo Theſe Judges enter Themſelves, and harden their Hearts by more particular Treſpaſſes upon the Law, before they cou'd arrive at that univerſal Deſtruction of the Kingdom by Ship-Mony. All which Impeachments had no other Effect at preſent, than to keep the King's Friends in an intire Awe and Silence.

The Judges impeach'd.

Mr. Hyde's Exclamations.

Moſt of the Biſhops were likewiſe impeach'd, as was before hinted; and to oblige the Preſbyterians, and bring all Things under a thorough Reformation, the Commons made an Order for removing all ſcandalous Pictures, Croſſes and Figures then within the Churches, as they did not long after for thoſe without. This was chiefly left to the Management of Sir Robert Harlow; and this zealous Knight impartially took down the Croſs in Cheapſide, Charing-Croſs, and other like Monuments, even to the common Signs in the Streets; for every thing that had the leaſt Form of a Croſs, was accounted ſuperſtitious and damnable.

6. All this Time the two Armies were continu'd at a vaſt Expence, without any apparent Reaſon; only it was whiſper'd among many, That the Scots wou'd not return home, till the Bill againſt Epiſcopacy was paſs'd. Hereupon his Majeſty by a Meſſage to the Parliament, declar'd, ‘ That he deſir'd both Armies might be disbanded with all ‘ poſſible Speed; for the better effecting of which, he had, ‘ upon the Reſignation of the Earl of Northumberland, ‘ appointed the Earl of Holland General of his Army, and ‘ deſign'd immediately to ſend him thither: That his Majeſty Himſelf, according to a Promiſe made formerly to ‘ his Scottiſh Subjects, and for the better perfecting the ‘ Peace, reſolv'd once more to viſit That his Native Kingdom, and nam'd fourteen Days after as the Time his

A Meſſage from the King.

‘Progreſs was to begin; and therefore wiſh'd them againſt that Time to prepare ſuch Acts for the Good of the Kingdom, if any yet remain'd to be aſk'd him, as were to receive his Majeſty's Approbation.’ Notwithſtanding which, they ſpent moſt of their Time upon other Matters without finiſhing the Pacification Act, or taking Care for the diſbanding the Army; for ſtill they were unwilling totally to part with their beloved Brethren.

Two Errors ſuppoſ'd to be committed by the King.

It was thought that at this Time the King committed two ſeveral Errors; the firſt, his making the Earl of Holland his General, and the ſecond his Progreſs into Scotland. As to the firſt, it was wonder'd that he did not make Choice of the Earl of Eſſex, whom he had lately made Lord Chamberlain, and probably by this new ſeaſonable Engagement wou'd in Time have become his perfect Creature. For tho' he was proud and ambitious, he was naturally faithful and conſtant, and very capable of being oblig'd; and being almoſt a declar'd Enemy to the Scots, he wou'd have been ſtrict in all Things relating to the Honour of his Maſter, or the Engliſh: In ſhort, he might have been deceiv'd, but could never have been corrupted, either by Hopes or Fears of what the two Houſes cou'd have done to Him. But in promoting the Earl of Holland, the other, who had been partly promis'd the Favour, had Reaſon to be offended; as if the King had diſtruſted him, and made him his Chamberlain, more to bear the Envy of his diſplacing the Earl of Pembroke, than for any Regard had to his own Merit and Honour. Then the Earl of Holland was obnoxious to the preſent prevailing Party, by his Vigour in that invidious Office of Juſtice in Eyre, and other Particulars, ſo far, that they knew he durſt not offend them; but on the contrary wou'd purchaſe their Favour and Protection at any Price, as it ſufficiently appear'd afterwards. The other Error, as it was believ'd, was the King's deſign'd Progreſs into Scotland, which queſtionleſs was with a Proſpect of obliging and gaining that Nation. But many of his Friends doubted of that Succeſs; and the politick Biſhop of Lincoln, now in Favour with him, begg'd of his Majeſty to defer that Journey, and to conſider ‘That the Scotch wou'd reveal all he did or ſaid amongſt them to their Aſſociates at Weſtminſter; that having been tumultuous for two Years, it was next to impoſſible to pacify them on a ſudden; and knowing the preſent Condition of his Majeſty, they wou'd look upon no Courteſie as Kindneſs, but Fear. Therefore, continued he, keep near to the Parliament, all the Work is within thoſe Walls: do what you can to win them Man by Man: For ſome of the Commons are preparing a Declaration to make your Government odious; ſtir not till you have mollify'd the grand Contrivers with Preferments. The King was too fix'd to be mov'd by any Arguments, nor cou'd he at preſent endure to be near Weſtminſter; for one of the Bed-Chamber was heard to ſay, That nothing made him remove ſo far from his Court and Council, as the Tedious ſneſs of Intelligence brought him every Minute, with variety of Gloſſes and Opinions upon it.

The Commons againſt the King's Journey to Scotland.

However the Commons were very apprehenſive of the new Progreſs, and a very active Member with a deep Sigh cry'd out, We are all undone! and when the appointed Time drew near, the Houſe fell into a perplex'd Debate, in which many expreſs'd dark and doubtful Fears of his Majeſty's Safety, not without ſome Inſinuations, ‘That if the King were once with his Army, he might probably liſten to new Counſels before he conſented to diſband it; and at laſt concluded, To deſire the Lords to concur with them in a Petition to the King, to defer his Journey till the Act of Pacification was paſs'd, the Armies diſbanded, and other Acts prepar'd for the Good of the Kingdom;’ without mentioning any prefix'd Time when they ſhou'd be ready. The Majority of both Houſes being againſt the Journey, they accordingly addreſs'd the King, who anſwer'd, ‘That they having had ſuch long Notice of his Deſign for that Journey, he wonder'd they ſhou'd defer preparing what was neceſſary for his Approbation before he went: That he was content to comply with their Requeſts ſo far as to put it off a Fortnight longer, till the tenth of Auguſt, in which Time they might prepare whatever was of Importance, and it was not poſſible for him to exceed it.

This Time being gain'd, they mov'd but ſlowly in the Diſbanding, or in the Act of Pacification, but ſtill dwelt upon Fears and Jealouſies, &c. So that when the peremptory Day again drew near for the King's Departure, on a Saturday in the Afternoon, they again fell into a violent Paſſion againſt the deſign'd Journey; and in hopes of hindering or deferring of it, after an unprecedented Manner they ſat all the next Day, which they excus'd by a ſhort Declaration, ſhewing their Regard to the Sabbath Day. But finding they cou'd prevail no farther with his Majeſty, than whereas he intended to begin his Progreſs on Monday after Dinner, to ſtay till Tueſday Morning, they earneſtly propos'd, ‘That he wou'd leave a Power with ſome Perſons to paſs ſuch Acts as ſhou'd go through both Houſes in his Abſence, and conſtitute a Cuſtos Regni to ſupply the Government till his Return.’ But when they found ſuch a Commiſſion, to confirm ſuch Acts as were not paſs'd both Houſes at the Date of that Commiſſion, wou'd be illegal; and that if the King deſir'd to ſatisfy them, both the Power and Perſon of a Cuſtos Regni would require great Conſideration; they were at laſt contented with a Commiſſion to the Earl of Eſſex, of Lieutenant-General on that ſide Trent, and with the King's paſſing ſuch Bills as were prepar'd for the Royal Aſſent. The ſame Day, which was the tenth of Auguſt, the King ſet forwards in the Afternoon upon his Journey to Scotland, accompany'd with the Prince Elector, the Duke of Lenox, now created Duke of Richmond, and the Marqueſs of Hamilton.

The King begins his Journey.

The Account of the Bills paſs'd.

The Bills paſs'd were moſt of them of great Importance, as ‘An Act of Pacification between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland;’ for the effecting of which, all the Scots Demands, formerly mention'd, were granted, whoſe Arrival and Stay coſt England eleven hundred thouſand Pounds, beſides Damages, as the Earl of Briſtol declar'd in a Conference between both Houſes; and the Effect was to purchaſe an inglorious Peace from an invading Enemy. The other Laws were, ‘An Act for the Certainty of the Meets, Bounds and Limits of all the Foreſts in England;’ which prov'd a great Benefit and Eaſe to the People: ‘An Act for the Prevention of vexatious Proceedings touching the Order of Knighthood;’ by which his Majeſty releas'd to his People as unqueſtionable a Due, as any Service he can claim: ‘An Act for the free making Salt-Petre and Gun-Powder within the Kingdom;’ which had been part of the Prerogative and Revenue of the Crown: ‘An Act againſt divers Oppreſſions and Incroachments in the Stannery Courts;’ which likewiſe extended to all inferior Courts and Proceedings throughout the Kingdom: Laſtly, ‘An Act declaring unlawful and void the late Proceedings touching Ship-Mony, and for vacating all Records and Proceſſes concerning the ſame;’ in which ſome Clauſes aſſert the Subjects Liberty and Property, beyond what was done by the famous Petition of Right.

With the Redreſs of all Grievances.

By paſſing of theſe Acts, together with ſome others formerly mention'd, as the Triennial Act, that for Tonnage and Poundage, thoſe for taking away the Courts of High-Commiſſion and Star-Chamber, beſides that unparallel'd one for perpetuating the Parliament, there did not remain a Grievance or Inconvenience, real or imaginary, that was not fully redreſs'd, or more than counterbalanc'd by the King's numberleſs Conceſſions. The Legal Grievances were remov'd by limiting of Knighthood, bounding the Foreſts and Stannery-Courts, and taking away the High-Commiſſion and Star-Chamber. The Illegal ones were redreſs'd by the Tonnage and Poundage Bill, and that for deſtroying the Ship-Mony; and the Triennial Bill had put an End to that call'd a Fundamental Grievance, The Diſcontinuance of Parliaments. The reputed Authors of theſe Grievances were all given up to the Juſtice of the Parliament, not one protected from Puniſhment, but at the Houſes Pleaſure ſuffer'd Death, Impriſonment, or Fine, or elſe ſav'd themſelves by Flight. So that in nine Months time greater Alterations were made in the Conſtitution, with Relation to the Liberty of the Subject and the Diminution of the Prerogative, than had been known in ſome hundreds of Years. The Steps made by the Parliament, and the Conceſſions by the King, were ſo exorbitantly large, that Foreigners ſtood amazed at it; and an ingenious French Hiſtorian ſays, ‘It is hard to decide, who had the greateſt Cauſe to bluſh, the King for always Granting whatever his Subjects inſolently demanded, or the Subjects for continually Demanding what their King was compell'd to grant.’ However it was, here was not only a Redreſs of all juſt Grievances, but Real Security given againſt them for the future. Therefore from this Period of Time impartial Poſterity may beſt judge, which Side was moſt blamable in the ſucceeding Tranſactions; and how far the Ruin of all the Reformers afterwards may be ſaid to be the Natural, as well as the Juſt Conſequence of their Proceedings.

II. 1. The Parliament continu'd Sitting for about a Month after the King's Departure for Scotland; and notwithſtanding his Majeſty's great Conceſſions, they proceeded with as much Jealouſy, as if he had granted nothing; and were particularly apprehenſive of the new Obligations that were like to be laid upon the Scots. Therefore, having given Orders for diſbanding the Armies, by way of Spies, they appointed a Committee of Lords and Commons to attend his Majeſty in Scotland; to be preſent when the Act of Pacification ſhou'd be tranſacted there, and preſerve that good Correſpondence that was begun between the two Nations; and indeed to form the next Year's Deſigns, and contrive new Laws in one Kingdom, by the Copies of what ſhou'd be enacted in the other. Among the Peers nam'd, only the Lord Howard of Eſcrick went, together with Sir Philip Stapleton and Mr. Hampden. The firſt was the younger Son of the Houſe of Suffolk, who marrying a Perſons appointed to attend the King.

The Lord Howard,

Neice

And Sir Philip Stapleton.

Neice to the late Duke of Buckingham, was by him made a Baron; but that Dependance expiring by the Death of the Duke and his Wife, and having no proper Qualifications to promote him, gradually ſunk from his Attendance upon the Court, and ſhortly after from his good Wiſhes to it, becoming implicitly devoted to the late prevailing Party: In Confidence of which he was deputed to this new Employment, to be intirely govern'd by Sir Philip Stapleton and Mr. Hampden. Sir Philip was a Gentleman by Birth, but being a Branch of a younger Family, had but a ſlender Fortune of about five hundred Pounds a Year in Yorkſhire, where he had ſpent much of his Time in the cuſtomary Diverſions among Dogs and Horſes. Being return'd in Parliament, he join'd with his Neighbours, Hotham and Cholmondley, and growing intimate with the whole Party, he ſoon appear'd rather to be without good Breeding, than to be incapable of it; and ſo they aſſociated him with Mr. Hampden in this new Imployment, to be ſeaſon'd by the Inſtructions of ſo great a Maſter.

The Earl of Holland's Defection.

The Commons Partiality.

The King being arriv'd at York, where he found neither Army disbanded, his General the Earl of Holland attended and begg'd of his Majeſty that He might make a Baron, which then might have been ten Thouſand Pounds Advantage to him; but whether the King fear'd his chuſing One that might prejudice him in the Peers, or was unwilling to inlarge that Number, he thought fit at that Time to refuſe his Suit. This ſo diſoblig'd the Earl, that tho' he parted with all the Appearance of Loyalty, yet having been inform'd by Sir Jacob Aſhley and Sir John Conyers of ſome frivolous Paſſages in the late Tampering with the Army, that had not yet been divulg'd, as ſoon as the King had left the Place, he ſent a Letter to the Earl of Eſſex, to be by him communicated in Parliament, 'That he found there 'had been ſtrange Attempts to debauch and pervert the 'Army, but he did not doubt he ſhou'd be able to prevent 'any Miſchief.' The whole Letter was couch'd in ſo myſterious a Senſe, that Men were eaſily perſuaded it related to ſome unheard-of Diſcoveries; and by the Date it bore, it ſeem'd to reflect on ſomething the King Himſelf ſhou'd have attempted. So that it ſerv'd to revive their old Fears, and infuſe new Apprehenſions into the People, every Man drawing what Senſe he thought fit, from what none of them cou'd rightly underſtand. And when a Queſtion aroſe in the Houſe of Commons, 'Whether Wilmot, 'Aſhburnham and Pollard ſhou'd have their Officers Pay, 'then lying under the Charge of the late Plot;' it was paſſionately alledg'd 'That ſuch Men ought not to receive 'their Pay, who had forfeited their Truſt.' Yet ſtill it was urg'd 'That they had the Security of an Act of Par'liament for their Payment;' and at length one told them, That they were abſolutely pardon'd by the late Act of Oblivion and Pacification between the two Kingdoms. This prov'd an allarming Sentence, which caus'd many to change their Opinions, and to come to this ſtrange Declaration, That they cou'd have no Benefit by that Act of Parliament, becauſe then the ſame might be as well apply'd to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. And thus it was thought ſufficient, to exclude them both from that Benefit and their Mony; leſt they might be admitted to it for a certain Reaſon, which might prove advantageous to another, to whom they had no Inclination to be favourable.

Their further Incroachments.

The Lords oppoſe them.

Soon after the King began his Progreſs, upon a Motion of Adjourning the Houſes till after Michaelmaſs, which met with a general Approbation, many Members of both Houſes, willing to refreſh themſelves after ſuch long Abſence from Home, and eſpecially to avoid the Plague which began to rage in the Town, went into the Country; and others, who remain'd in Town, were leſs careful to attend the publick Service, but betook Themſelves to the moſt agreeable Diverſions; ſo that in leſs than three Weeks after the King's Departure, there were not left above twenty Lords and a hundred Commoners in both Houſes. This was the Advantage that the Leaders wanted, and being indefatigable in their Attendance and Proceedings, now readily aſſum'd to themſelves the Conſultation of the higheſt Matters both in Church and State. From their preſuming to adviſe what was to be done out of the Kingdom, in Reference to France and Spain, they took the ſame Liberty of conſulting and declaring what was unfit within the Walls of the Church; and therefore they enter'd upon a Debate of the Engliſh Liturgy, at that Time much reverenc'd throughout the Kingdom, and propos'd, 'That in Regard of tender Con'ſciences, there might be Liberty to lay it aſide:' Which Propoſition, tho' made in a thin Houſe by thoſe of the greateſt Influence, was ſo unacceptable, that by the Major Part it was voted, 'That it ſhou'd ſtill be duly obſerv'd.' Notwithſtanding this Rub, the next Day, when many concern'd in the Debate were abſent, contrary to the Rules of Parliament they ſuſpended that Vote, and Reſolv'd, 'That 'the ſtanding of the Communion-Table ſhou'd be chang'd 'in all Churches, the Rails pull'd down, and the Chancel 'levell'd with the reſt of the Church, and that no Man 'ſhou'd preſume to bow at the Name of Jeſus:' Which zealous Reſolutions were carry'd up to the Lords, expecting from the ſmall Number remaining, to find no Oppoſition from thence. But the Lords for the Major Part being ſenſibly offended that the Commons ſhou'd preſume to interpoſe in a Matter out of their Juriſdiction, and diſturb the Peace of the Church by ſuch unprecedented Inſolence, were ſo far from joyning with them, that they directed a former Order of their Houſe, made in January laſt, to be printed, requiring, 'The Divine Service to be perform'd 'as appointed in the Acts of Parliament in this Realm; 'and that whoſoever diſturb'd that wholeſome Order, 'ſhou'd be puniſh'd according to Law;' and accordingly inform'd the Commons; who ſtill eagerly purſu'd their own Order, and requiring all the Commons of England to ſubmit to their Direction, declar'd, 'The Order of the 'Lords was obtain'd by the Conſent of no more than E'leven of that Houſe, and that Nine others diſſented from 'it; and therefore they ſhou'd pay no Obedience to it.' Whereas in Reality, it was an Order made in full Parliament ſeven Months before, and was by the preſent Majority directed to be printed upon that emergent Occaſion.

A publick Thankſgiving.

The Scots Triumph.

About the ſame Time finding in the Act of Pacification, 'That there ſhou'd be a publick and ſolemn Thankſgiving 'for a Peace between the two Nations,' but no particular Day fix'd, the Lords and Commons aſſum'd to themſelves the Power of appointing it; and to that End iſſu'd out an Ordinance, 'That it ſhou'd be kept on the ſeventh 'of September following, throughout England and Wales;' which was accordingly obſerv'd. Mr. Marſhall and Dr. Burgeſs, the two Trumpets of the Times, preach'd before the Houſe of Commons; and the ſeditious Miniſters in all Pulpits took Occaſion from the Day to extol the Parliament and the Scots, and inſtil as much Malignity into the People againſt the contrary Party, as their Wit and Malice cou'd ſuggeſt. Beſides all this, an Order had been made by both Houſes, to which his Majeſty's own Conſent had been obtain'd, 'That on the ſame Day of Thankſgiving 'the Loyalty and Faithfulneſs of the King's Scotch Sub'jects might be made known in all Places, and particular'ly in all Pariſh Churches of his Majeſty's Dominions, by 'the ſeveral and reſpective Miniſters of each Church.' By which they did not only conquer, but Triumph; and this was to be a ſort of Shibboleth for the Clergy; for whoever blam'd the Scots, or declin'd the Declaration of their Loyalty and Fidelity, were ſure to be eſteem'd Malignants, and upon the leaſt Complaint put into Cuſtody as Delinquents.

The Parliament adjourns.

A ſtanding Committee.

After that Day's Solemnity, and the Recommendation of ſome of their own unconformable Miniſters, to be Lecturers in the Churches about London, whom the Incumbents were oblig'd to receive; when they apprehended, that by Reaſon of ſo many abſent Members, they ſhou'd not have enough to make up a Houſe, they yielded to a Receſs; and on the ninth of September they adjourn'd themſelves to the twentienth Day of October next, after they had ſat about ten Months: Each Houſe conſtituting an unheard-of Committee to meet twice a Week, or oftner upon Occaſion, to tranſact ſuch Buſineſs, during the Receſs, as they were empower'd to do by their Inſtructions; by which the Power of the Parliament was kept up to the full Height.

The Armies disbanded.

The Death of the Earl of Rothes.

About the ſame Time the Armies were disbanded, that had been ſuch a Burthen to the Kingdom, and the Earl of Holland return'd in great State to Kenſington, where he was immediately viſited and complimented by all the preſent Leaders, to whom he declar'd himſelf fully of their Party; and he arm'd them with ſeveral Informations of ſome Occurrences in the late Army, that might be wreſted to the King's Diſadvantage; diſcover'd to them the private Diſcourſes of the King to him when he thought him in his Intereſt; and all that Sir Jacob Aſhley and Sir John Conyers had repos'd with him, when they believ'd him devoted to his Majeſty's Service; together with what he had heard that the Queen ſaid or did, which might increaſe their Hatred againſt her Majeſty; tho' it was by her Means that he had formerly been ſupported againſt all the Power of Portland, Strafford and Canterbury. As one great Man deſerted his Majeſty, ſo at the ſame Time another, who was returning to his Side, dy'd when he was likely to do him greateſt Service. This was the Earl of Rothes, one of the moſt zealous Promoters of the Scotch Troubles, and a mortal Enemy to the Earl of Strafford, having been often heard to ſay They won'd have his Head. He is ſaid to have been a Man of great Abilities and much Honour; but ſoon after the King had intirely gain'd him, and rely'd upon his great Power and Intereſt in Scotland, where he was making his Progreſs, he made a baſe and diſhonourable End in Rottenneſs and a ſcandalous Diſtemper, as Archbiſhop Laud tells us in his Hiſtory; which his Friends conceal'd as much as they cou'd, by conveying him from London to Richmond ſome Time before his Death.

The King's Speech to the Scotch Parliament.

2. But to return to the King, who riding Poſt from London travell'd above three hundred Miles in leſs than four Days Time, and arriv'd at Edinburgh upon the fourteenth of Auguſt, with a ſmall Retinue of his Nobility. Three Days after in a long Speech to a full Parliament he declar'd, ‘That nothing had been ſo diſpleaſing to Him, as thoſe unfortunate Differences happening between him and his People; and Nothing he more deſir'd, than to ſee that Day, wherein he hop'd not only to ſettle thoſe unhappy Miſtakings, but rightly to know, and to be known to his Native Country.’ He further declar'd, ‘If Love to his Native Country had not been a Chief Motive to his Journey, other Reſpects might eaſily have found a Shift to do that by a Commiſſion, which he came to perform Himſelf. Which conſider'd, he cou'd not doubt of ſuch real Teſtimonies of their Affections, for the Maintenance of that Royal Power he enjoy'd, after an Hundred and eight Deſcents; and which they had profeſs'd to maintain, and to which their own National Oath did oblige them.’ Laſtly he aſſur'd them, ‘That the End of his Coming was To perfect whatſoever he had promis'd, and withal to quiet all Diſtractions among them, which he deſign'd to perform not ſuperficially, but fully and chearfully; for he cou'd do nothing with more Chearfulneſs, than to give his People a General Satisfaction. Wherefore not offering to endear Himſelf by Words, he deſir'd in the firſt Place, to ſettle what concerns the Religion and Juſt Liberties of his Native Country, before he proceeded to any other Act.

The Treachery of the King's Dependents.

The Lord Balmerino, a Man of ſufficient Parts and Abilities, was elected Preſident of the Parliament, who together with his Father had receiv'd many Favours from the Crown; therefore many judg'd he wou'd be tender of the King's Honour and Intereſt. But the Riſque he formerly run in his Tryal, rais'd ſuch high Reſentments, that no Obligations had that Power of him, as to make him gratify his Majeſty in the leaſt Particular. Other Perſons, who had been loaded with Favours, either openly or ſecretly continu'd to work againſt Him; and Sir Thomas Hope, his Advocate, by the Help of his flattering Carriage to his Majeſty, prov'd a ſingular Friend to the Covenanters: And what was worſe, Mr. Murray of the Bed-Chamber, who had with all Tenderneſs been preferr'd from his Childhood, prov'd treacherous, and diſcover'd the King's Letters and Secrets to his greateſt Enemies. And the King was ſo unfortunate, that he had not one Counſellor about him, beſides the Duke of Lenox, and a very few Followers, who had either Affection to his Perſon, or Reſpect to his Honour: Yet being of unqueſtionable Integrity himſelf, he cou'd not endure to entertain any ſuſpicious Thoughts of thoſe he had once plac'd his Truſt in. As to the Marqueſs of Hamilton and his Brother Lanerick, of whom there had been ſuch Preſumptions of Infidelity; the King having it ſo often under both their Hands, That might their Souls periſh, if they left any Thing undone in their Power, to get a Compliance from the Parliament, he ſtill kept to his former intire Confidence in them.

A Plot pretended in Scotland.

The publick Proceedings for a while went on very ſmoothly in the Parliament, the King giving Way to every thing that was propos'd, ſo that the Aims of many were diſappointed for the preſent; therefore ſome Things were preſs'd, that they ſuppos'd his Majeſty wou'd not conſent to, purpoſely to procure a Breach. And at length, about the middle of October, upon a private Infirmation made to the Earl of Argyle, as he alledg'd, concerning a Plot form'd by the Earl of Crawford, Colonel Cocheran, and Lieutenant Colonel Stuart, to aſſaſſinate the Marqueſs of Hamilton and himſelf; theſe two, with ſome Followers, in a great Confuſion withdrew to Kinneil, twelve Miles from Edinburgh. Several ſuggeſted to the King that the Plot was but pretended, only to cauſe the Parliament to break up; upon which, the Day after their Retreat, his Majeſty came haſtily up to the Parliament, accompany'd with many Noblemen and five hundred Gentlemen, and in a Speech, which reflected much upon the Marqueſs of Hamilton, he prevail'd with the Parliament to continue Sitting, notwithſtanding the others Abſence. The Royaliſts were very urgent with his Majeſty to have them declar'd Enemies, and attempted ſome Things againſt them, which they thought very practicable; but ſuch was his Compliance, that on the contrary he conſented in Parliament to confine the three ſuppos'd Plotters, and invited Hamilton and Argyle to return, who were the next Day receiv'd very graciouſly at Holyrood-Houſe. The Lord Clarendon tells us, that the Earl of Montroſs privately aſſur'd his Majeſty, ‘That in the paſt Tranſactions, Hamilton had been no leſs faulty and falſe to him than Argyle,’ and frankly undertook to have them both diſpatch'd; but the King abhorr'd the Expedient, tho' ſo much for his own Security: How far this might accidentally give Credit to the Notion of a Plot, we know not; only upon a ſtrict Examination, nothing material was found in it, ſo that the three pretended Plotters were enlarg'd, and the whole became a Matter of Ridicule.

The Effects of it in England.

But this Plot had a greater Influence at London; for upon the firſt Rumour of it, the Engliſh Committee at Edinburgh immediately diſpacht a dark perplex'd Account of it to Weſtminſter, with many ambiguous Expreſſions concerning the probable Conſequences of it; covertly inſinuating, ‘That the Deſign might look farther than Scotland.’ And theſe Diſpatches reaching London the Day before the Parliament was to meet after the late Receſs, all the prevailing Party endeavour'd to perſuade others, ‘That the Deſign of Neceſſity muſt aim at higher Matters, than the Aſſaſſination of thoſe Lords at Edinburgh.’ And as ſoon as the Houſe ſat, and the Committees Letter from Scotland was read, it was mov'd, ‘That a Meſſage might be ſent to the Houſe of Peers, that the Earl of Eſſex, whom the King had left General on this ſide Trent, might be deſir'd to order ſuch a Guard as he thought ſufficient for the Security of the Parliament;’ which was done accordingly, and continu'd till they thought fit to have others. All which was done purpoſely to amuſe the People, as if the Parliament was in ſome imminent Danger. And this prov'd very ſeaſonable for Mr. Pym and his Committee that ſat during the Receſs, who having committed ſeveral Exorbitancies, both as to Church and State, were in ſome Danger of being queſtion'd even by the Parliament; but this Rumour prov'd a fortunate Diverſion and a Skreen, and gave a Credit to their Proceedings.

The King's vaſt Conceſſions in Scotland.

3. In the mean Time the King in Scotland proceeded with all imaginable Conceſſions to that Nation, reſolving to oblige and ingage the Inhabitants at any Expence, to the Diminution both of his Honour and Prerogative. Accordingly that which ſhou'd have been an Act of Oblivion, prov'd a Defence and Juſtification of whatſoever they had done, and their firſt Tumults term'd ‘Effects of their Duty to his Majeſty:’ So that whoever, in Purſuance of their Allegiance, had oppos'd or reſiſted them, were declar'd Criminal, and were the only Perſons exempted from the Benefit of that Oblivion. The exorbitant Acts of their Aſſembly, which had expell'd all Biſhops from it, and declar'd themſelves to have a Power of inflicting Eccleſiaſtical Cenſures upon the King himſelf, were declar'd lawful; and the Government of the Church by Archbiſhops and Biſhops, condemn'd as contrary to the Word of God; and therefore were utterly extirpated, and their Lands given to his Majeſty, his Heirs and Succeſſors. Then in Conſideration that the King muſt of Neceſſity be abſent from his native Kingdom, it was thought fit, ‘That the abſolute Government thereof ſhou'd be entruſted with the Lords of the Secret Council, who were likewiſe made Conſervators of the Peace of the two Kingdoms, during the Intervals of Parliaments, by whom theſe Lords were to be nam'd, and which once in three Years was to aſſemble without any Summons from the King, if by ſuch a Day he neglected to publiſh ſuch Summons.’ And for the ſame Reaſon, ‘All great Officers, as Chancellor, Treaſurer, Secretary, and the reſt, were to be appointed by Parliament, or in the Interval by the Lords of the Secret Council;’ without the leaſt Regard to his Majeſty's Choice or Approbation.

His Rewards and Preferments to his Enemies.

As the King had conſented to the intire aboliſhing of Epiſcopacy, ſo he gave away all the Church Lands to thoſe who had diſcovered them not to have been in proper Hands before; a Matter of fatal Conſequence to the Church of England. And having obtain'd a Pardon for his Friends, upon Condition they came not in his Preſence, he made Uſe of the little Remainder of his Sovereignty, the conferring of Titles, in obliging and honouring his Enemies. Accordingly the Earl of Argyle was made a Marqueſs, the great General Leſley made Earl of Leven and Keeper of the Caſtle of Edinburgh, Lord Lindſey made Earl of Lindſey, Lord Lowdon Earl of Lowdon, Lord Almond, the Lieutenant-General, made Earl of Calender, the Lairds of Dudo and Arburthnet made Viſcounts, Mr. Andrew Murray made Lord Balvaird, and Mr. Alexander Gibſon and Mr. Archibald Johnſton were Knighted, and the latter had a liberal Penſion beſtow'd on him. Many of the prime Covenanters obtain'd great Penſions; and the King's Bounty extended to many Church-Men, his greateſt Oppoſers: Mr. Henderſon, the moſt eminent of the Brethren, had the Rent of the Royal Chappel beſtow'd upon him, a Revenue equal to a Biſhoprick; Mr. Gilleſpie had a large Penſion ſettled upon him; and the Profeſſors in the Univerſities had their Proviſions liberally augmented by the Revenues formerly belonging to the Biſhops.

Cenſures upon it.

Theſe extraordinary Conceſſions and Favours caus'd various Diſcourſes and Opinions concerning the Meaning of this State-Policy, and occaſion'd many who had adhered to his Majeſty, to decline all publick Buſineſs; and ſome of them were wont to ſay, That Men ought to act according to Conſcience and Honour, but if any engag'd for him out of Hope of Reward, they might eaſily be diſappointed. And the Lord Carnwarth took the Liberty to ſay in a publick Audience, That he wou'd go to Ireland, and join with Sir Phelim Oneal, the chief of the Rebels there, and then he was ſure the King wou'd prefer him.

The Scots Returns and Promiſes:

But inſignificant.

Theſe unparallel'd Favours were not without ſome conſiderable Returns of obliging Words and Promiſes of a dutiful and loyal Behaviour for the future; and ſo far they proceeded as to revive and publiſh thro' the Realm an old Statute which ordain'd, 'That it ſhould be deteſtable and 'damnable Treaſon in the higheſt Degree, for any of the 'Scots Nation conjunctly, or ſingly, to levy Arms, or a'ny Military Forces, upon any Pretence whatſoever, 'without the King's Royal Commiſſion.' And many of them privately aſſur'd the King, That as ſoon as the late Storm ſhould be perfectly calm'd, they wou'd repeal whatever was now unreaſonably extorted from him. General Leſley, now Earl of Leven, was ſo tranſported with his Majeſty's Beneficence, that lifting up his Hands to Heaven, he wiſh'd, That they might rot off, if ever he acted more againſt ſo gude a King; and he told the King himſelf, That he wou'd not only refuſe to ſerve againſt him, but whenever his Majeſty wou'd require his Service, he ſhou'd have it, without ever asking what the Cauſe was. But the Scotch Cauſe was too great to be damp'd or interrupted by Promiſes and Obligations; as it ſoon after began to ſhew it ſelf in the Earl of Lauderdale, who after he had receiv'd a Gift from the King of a Lordſhip worth twenty thouſand Marks a Year, appear'd ſo zealous for it, that he declar'd at a publick Meeting, That he wou'd live to ſee the Cauſe not only go through England, but alſo carry'd to the Walls of Rome.

The Scotch Parliament breaks up.

The King's Departure.

In the mean time, the Parliament having finiſh'd all Buſineſs, broke up upon the 17th of November; in the Cloſe of which, the Earl of Lowdon in the Name of the Nobility, and young Sir Thomas Hope in the Name of the Gentry, made congratulatory Speeches to his Majeſty, 'For having given them full Satisfaction in all Things, 'both as to their Religion and Liberties;' and the great Guns of the Caſtle were diſcharg'd, as a ſolemn Eccho to their ſeveral Orations. And alſo that Night, in the great Hall of Holyrood-Houſe, the King magnificently feaſted all his Nobility, and parted with mutual and endearing Farewels: So that it became a publick Saying, That he departed a contented King from a contented People. The next Morning the King began his Journey towards London, and ſo took his final Leave of his Native Kingdom, after he had continu'd in it a little above three Months. Much happier might it have been for him, if he had never ſeen the Nation; for his Progreſs and Continuance in Scotland ſeem'd to have been only that he might make a more perfect Deed of Gift of that Kingdom, than he cou'd have done without going in Perſon. In ſhort, he at once unravell'd that elaborate Web, which had took up more than forty Years in finiſhing, by the great Pains and Treaſure both of his Father and Himſelf. And by the Profuſeneſs of his Conceſſions he created a new Thirſt in his Engliſh Parliament, tho' it began to be almoſt inſatiable before; cauſing them to believe, 'That now he wou'd yield to e'very Thing they cou'd propoſe:' And even ſome, who really hated the Scots, and abhorr'd their Proceedings, ſcorning to be over-reach'd and cauſeleſly diſtinguiſh'd in the publick Favours, out of Malice to Them, joyn'd and concurr'd in the greateſt Exorbitancies. As to the Enemies of the Church of England, they concluded their Work more than half done, when the King Himſelf in Effect had declar'd 'Arch-Biſhops and Biſhops contrary to the 'Word of God;' which, beſides the Ruin of his Affairs, prov'd a very ſenſible Affliction, and Wound to his Conſcience, almoſt all the reſt of his Life.

The Rebellion in Ireland.

III. I. To compleat the Miſeries of three Kingdoms, about three Weeks before the King left Scotland, there aroſe a ſudden Storm in Ireland, or rather an impetuous Hurricane that bore down all before it. It was a Rebellion ſurpriſing and prodigious, as has been ſcarce known in any Age; ſuch as can hardly be parallel'd for the numberleſs Acts of Perfidiouſneſs and Barbarity; and the firſt Sound of it came like a moſt terrible Thunder-clap to the Engliſh Nation, which prov'd of infinite Miſchief to the King's Affairs. This aſtoniſhing Concuſſion broke out in all Parts of the Kingdom upon one Day, the 23d of October; which by a cloſe and deep Conſpiracy of the Iriſh took Effect after an unheard-of Manner. The Papiſts and old Natives, taking Advantage of the preſent Poſture of Affairs in England, reſolv'd to deſtroy all the Engliſh Proteſtants, and to ſecure the Kingdom in their own Hands. Their Deſign upon Dublin was miraculouſly diſcover'd the Night before it was to be executed, and the Surpriſal of the Caſtle prevented; and the principal Conſpirators, who were to undertake it, as Mac-Mahon, Mac-Guire and others, apprehended. But in the other Parts of the Kingdom, they exactly obſerved the appointed Day, without hearing of the Diſappointment of their Friends in Dublin: So a general Inſurrection of the Iriſh ſpread it ſelf like a Deluge over the whole Country; in ſuch an inhuman and mercileſs Manner, that forty or fifty Thouſand of the Engliſh Proteſtants were maſſacred, without Diſtinction of Age, Sex or Quality, before they ſuſpected any Danger, or cou'd provide for their Defence, in Towns or elſewhere. In ſum, the Cruelties and Barbarities were innumerable and incredible, ſuch as might melt down the moſt obdurate Hearts in the World, as we find in Sir John Temple, and other Writers.

The Heads of it.

The chief Man and Ringleader in this Inſurrection was Sir Phelim Oneale, a Gentleman of Engliſh Education, once a Proteſtant of Lincoln's-Inn, who with his Brother, and ſome others, carry'd on their Deſigns with ſuch Regularity and Secrecy, that no ſufficient Diſcovery cou'd be made. And indeed at this Time there was ſuch outward Appearances of a ſettled Tranquility, that ſcarce any Suſpicion remain'd: For the ancient Prejudices and Animoſities, which had frequently been ſhewn between the Iriſh and the Engliſh, ſeem'd now to have been bury'd in a Conjunction of their Affections and National Obligations. The two Nations had now liv'd together forty Years in Peace with great Security and Satisfaction, which had in a manner conſolidated them into one Body, faſtned with all thoſe Bonds of Friendſhip, Alliance and Conſanguinity, as might have form'd a perpetual Union between them. Therefore it is the more needful to inquire into the Cauſes of ſo ſudden and ſtrange an Alteration, and the Occaſions and Inducements that theſe miſerable People had to venture upon ſuch daring Attempts, and run ſuch deſperate Hazards.

The Cauſes of it.

Firſt, they obſerv'd, that by the Engliſh Governors they were generally look'd upon as a Conquer'd Nation, and ſeldom treated like natural or free-born Subjects; and particularly complain'd, that upon the Account of the laſt Rebellion under Tyronne, ſix whole Counties were forfeited to the Crown, and very little reſtor'd to the Natives, tho' ſeveral of them were innocent, but a great Part beſtow'd by King James on his Countrymen the Scots, who had made notorious Incroachments upon them: For which End they had ſent Commiſſioners to the Engliſh Parliament with ſuitable Complaints; but were diſmiſs'd with a ſhort and diſobliging Anſwer. Secondly, they believ'd their ancient Religion in imminent Danger; for they found that ſince the Beginning of the long Parliament in England, unuſual Severities were us'd againſt the Papiſts in England, and both Houſes ſollicited by Petitions from Ireland to have thoſe of that Kingdom treated with the like Rigour: Eſpecially when they heard it was alledg'd by ſome of the Leaders in the Houſe of Commons, That the Converſion of the Iriſh Papiſts was to be effected with the Bible in one Hand, and the Sword in the other; that they would not leave a Prieſt in Ireland, but extirpate their Superſtition and Nation. Thirdly, the Example of the Scots was a particular Incitement and Encouragement, as appear'd from the firſt Diſcoverers, who declar'd, They did all in Imitation of Scotland, who by that Courſe enlarg'd their Privileges: And the Confeſſion of the Lord Mac-Guire does not obſcurely hint, That the Earl of Argyle, then at the Head of the Scotch Covenanters, was privately working the Iriſh into ſome Conſpiracy againſt the King; declaring, That if the King endeavour'd to ſtir Ireland againſt them, he wou'd kindle ſuch a Fire There, as wou'd hardly ever be extinguiſh'd. Fourthly, the taking off the Earl of Strafford did not a little contribute to the enſuing Tragedy, whoſe Vigour and Vigilance kept them regular and obedient; but when his Eye was taken off their Actions, and his Hands from the Reins of the Government, it advanc'd more in a few Months, than it had in many Years before, as appears from the fore-mention'd Confeſſion. Laſtly, the Army of Eight Thouſand Men, rais'd for the Suppreſſing the Scots, being by the Inſtance of the Engliſh Parliament disbanded, the Country was annoy'd by thoſe Soldiers, who wou'd not return to their former Employments, but were ready for any bloody Enterprize: And tho' the Spaniſh Ambaſſadors deſir'd to take them into the Service of their Maſter, the Parliament Leaders oppos'd it, and defeated the Deſign; for which Piece of Service, Mr. Pym is ſaid to have receiv'd five Thouſand Pounds from the French Ambaſſador. This ungovern'd Army, together with the encreaſing Diſſenſions between the King and his Parliament, was the greateſt Encouragement of all, and caus'd the Iriſh not only to hope for an Inlargement of their Privileges, but a Breaking off their Yoak and Dependency upon the Crown of England. From all theſe Particulars, as an ingenious Writer obſerves, we may naturally draw this Concluſion: 'That they who comply'd 'with the Scots in their Inſurrection; They who diſmiſs'd

1641. Car. 17.

'the Iriſh with ſo ſhort impolitick an Anſwer, and threatned the Extirpation of their Religion; They who took off the Earl of Strafford's Head, and They who hinder'd the disbanded Troops in Ireland to go for Spain, may juſtly be ſaid to have been the true Cauſe of the horrid Inſurrection of the Iriſh.

The Rebels Pretenſions.

Religion was the moſt open and plauſible Pretence of theſe Rebels, therefore, following the Scotch Steps, they form'd a Sort of a Popiſh Covenant, 'Declaring in the Sight of God and the World, That they wou'd endeavour the Advancement and Preſervation of his Majeſty's Service and Intereſt, having no other Deſign and Intent, but only the free Exerciſe of their Religion, and the Abolition of ſuch Laws as render the Catholicks uncapable of any Office, Place, Commodity or Profit, to the extraordinary Decay of their Eſtates, Education and Learning.' But becauſe all their Inducements and Pretenſions wou'd not totally ſeduce many of the Iriſh, who ſtill retain'd ſome Love to the Engliſh, and ſome Reverence to their Government, their Leaders, Sir Phelim Oneale and others, invented an infernal Stratagem, to perſuade Them, 'That they took up Arms for the Defence of the King, and the Defence of his lawful Prerogative againſt the Puritanical Parliament in England, who had invaded it in many Parts, and That what they did was by his Majeſty's Approbation and Authority.' And to gain the greater Credit to this Fiction, they produc'd and ſhew'd a Commiſſion, to which they had fix'd an Impreſſion of the Broad Seal, which they had taken off from a Grant of the Lord Caulfield's at Charlemont Caſtle; which made it no difficult Matter to perſuade rude and unexperienc'd Perſons to believe it a real Commiſſion from the King. All which in a ſhort Time was clearly detected, as well by ſeveral Iriſh Rebels taken Priſoners, as Engliſh Proteſtants, who eſcap'd their Fury; particularly Dr. Maxwell, a conſiderable Divine, in his Examination and Depoſition upon Oath declar'd, That while he was their Priſoner, he ventur'd to expoſtulate with them For abuſing the King in ſo groſs a Manner: To whom they reply'd, That in all Wars, Rumours and Lyes ſerv'd many Times to as good a Purpoſe as Arms, and that they wou'd not diſclaim any Advantage: But for the Queen, becauſe ſhe was a Catholick and had Enemies enough, they wou'd diſcharge the People from ſpeaking of Her as the Abettor of the preſent Troubles. This wicked Contrivance made a ſtrange popular Impreſſion; and gave Riſe to that ſcandalous and moſt improbable Story, that the King Himſelf was a private Promoter of this Rebellion: It gave them mighty Advantages in the Beginning, and help'd forwards the gaining of many Places and Conqueſts, the Particulars of which are here omitted, as being ſomewhat too Foreign to an Engliſh Hiſtory.

Their forg'd Inſtrument.

England amaz'd.

2. The King had not left Scotland when the News of this Rebellion arriv'd in England, where it flew like Flaſhes of Lightning throughout the Kingdom, with all the hideous Circumſtances of Terror and Amazement. Every Day, and almoſt every Hour produc'd new Meſſengers of Miſery, who brought further Intelligence of the Vaſtneſs of the Conſpiracy, and of the mercileſs Cruelty of the Rebels, who ſhamefully robb'd, and ſtripp'd, and barbarouſly tormented and murder'd ſo many Thouſands of Proteſtants, contrary to all the Rules of common Reaſon and Humanity. So that a ſtrange Sort of Fright and Fury was ſoon diffus'd through the Nation; which produc'd infinite Conjectures, and prodigious Imaginations in the Heads of moſt Men.

The Parliament ſurpris'd.

It was upon a Sunday Night when the firſt Intelligence came to the Earl of Leiceſter, the Lord-Lieutenant at London, who immediately ſummon'd the Lords of the Council, and inform'd them of the Condition of Ireland. The Houſe of Peers having been adjourn'd for three Days, and the Commons being to meet next Morning, the Council reſolv'd to go in a Body to the Houſe, as ſoon as it met, and give an Account of what they had heard of this Conſpiracy; all which they did with the uſual Form and Solemnity, and ſo departed. Moſt Mens Heads having been intoxicated with the Belief of Plots and treaſonable Deſigns, this News caus'd a profound Silence, and a kind of a Conſternation in the Houſe. They were perfectly at a Loſs, ſince the Affair itſelf ſeem'd to be out of their Cognizance; and the Communication of it ſerv'd only to prepare their Minds how to act when they had further Intelligence, and when they ſhou'd hear what the King himſelf thought convenient to be done.

Shortly after they were reliev'd by the King's own Letters from Scotland, which acquainted them, 'That it was no raſh Inſurrection, but a contriv'd Rebellion, ſuch as muſt be proſecuted with a ſharp War; the Management of which he wholly committed to their Care and Wiſdom, and depended upon Them for the Carrying it on, &c.' This new Conceſſion hapned according to their Deſire; and immediately they form'd a Committee of both Houſes 'For the Conſideration of the Affairs of Ireland, and Providing of Men, Mony and Arms, for the Suppreſſing that Rebellion;' the Lieutenant of Ireland being one of the Committee, which ſat every Morning with a great Appearance in the Painted Chamber. And this Reference gave the Houſes another conſiderable Step to a ſeparate Power; acting in this Matter without the King, and enforcing ſeveral Orders with as much Effect, as if they had been legal Statutes; beſides the borrowing Monies and conferring Offices, and doing other Acts that gave them Poſſeſſion of a large Power and Dependence; the Miſchief of which, tho' in the Beginning little obſerv'd, was afterwards very ſenſibly felt by the King and his Friends. Nay ſome of the artful Managers, being wholly diſappointed of their Preferments, took all Occaſions to inſinuate, 'That this Rebellion was contriv'd and fomented by the King, or at leaſt by the Queen, for the Advancement of Popery; and that the Rebels publiſh'd and declar'd, they had the King's Authority for all they did:' Which Calumny, tho' void of all Truth and Probability, made a deep and laſting Impreſſion upon the Minds of ſober and moderate Men, who till then had much diſlik'd the violent Proceedings of the Parliament.

Great Advantage to the Parliament.

3. The Credit of the Leaders in the Houſe of Commons had of late been much ſupported by the Rumours of ſome new Treaſon and Plot againſt the Kingdom; as one Day 'A Letter from beyond Sea of great Forces to invade England; another, A Plague-Plaiſter ſent to murder Mr. Pym; and no Occaſion omitted to ſpeak of the Evil Counſellors about the King.' Yet notwithſtanding they met with ſuch Oppoſition as might have extreamly endanger'd their Intereſt and Sway in the Houſe; till this Rebellion gave them a new and unexpected Authority. By which means they brought to a full Birth that which might have prov'd abortive, namely their large and famous REMONSTRANCE of all the Grievances in the Kingdom from the King's Acceſſion to the Throne to that very Day, fill'd with innumerable Invectives and ſevere Reflections upon the King, Queen and Council. The Houſe ſeem'd generally againſt ſuch a dangerous Expedient, many believing it both Unneceſſary and Unſeaſonable: 'Unneceſſary, ſince all thoſe Grievances had been fully redreſs'd, and the Liberty and Property of the Subject really and effectually ſecur'd for the future; and Unſeaſonable, after the King had graciouſly granted them every Thing they had deſir'd; and after ſo long Abſence, and the happy Compoſing of the Diſorders of another Kingdom, to be welcom'd home with ſuch a Volume of Reproaches, for the Crimes of others which he Himſelf had reform'd, was a Thing not to be incourag'd, or endured.' Notwithſtanding all which, the other Party deliver'd themſelves with as high Expreſſions againſt the Government as ever, inſinuating, 'That without a ſeaſonable Care to diſappoint ſome Counſels, ſtill entertain'd, they were in danger of loſing all the good Acts they had obtain'd:' And at length prevail'd to have a Day ſet apart in which the Remonſtrance ſhou'd be retaken into the Conſideration of the whole Houſe. And in the mean Time they made uſe of all their Credit and Cunning to perſuade particular Men, 'That the paſſing the Remonſtrance was the only Expedient to preſerve thoſe good Laws they had already made;' applying to different Perſons, according to their particular Inclinations and Humour; aſſuring many, 'It was only deſign'd to mortify the Court, and curb the Malignant Party, then encreaſing in the Houſe; which being done, it ſhou'd remain after that in the Clerk's Hands, and never be publiſh'd.

Their Grand Remonſtrance.

A great Debate concerning it.

By theſe and the like Artifices they gain'd ſeveral, and promis'd Themſelves Succeſs; and when the Day came that was to determine all, they ſpent the whole Morning in other Debates, and towards Noon call'd for the Remonſtrance; but when ſome urg'd it was then too late to enter upon it, with great Difficulty they conſented it ſhou'd be deferr'd till the next Morning, and every Clauſe particularly debated. Mr. Oliver Cromwell, tho' as yet of no great Intereſt in the Houſe, was a violent Promoter of it, and ask'd the Lord Falkland Why he was for deferring it, ſince that Day wou'd ſoon have determin'd it! He anſwer'd, There wou'd not have been Time enough, for ſure it wou'd take ſome Debate: The other reply'd, A very ſorry one; concluding by the Computation they had made, it wou'd meet with a ſlender Oppoſition. But he ſoon found Himſelf miſtaken; for the next Morning the Debate being enter'd upon about nine a Clock, it continu'd all that Day, and all that Night till three in the Morning, with great Warmth and Paſſion on both Sides. Many of the King's Friends were abſent, and others, unprovided againſt ſo tedious a Debate, through Faintneſs had retir'd; ſo that at laſt they carry'd it by only nine Voices;* at which Time one declar'd, That it look'd like the Verdict of a ſtarv'd Jury:

At the Breaking up of the Houſe, the Lord Falkland ask'd Mr. Cromwell, Whether there had been a Debate? To which he anſwer'd, He wou'd take his Word another Time, and aſſur'd him with a Whiſper, That if the Remonſtrance had not paſs'd, he wou'd have ſold all he had the next Morning, and never have ſeen England more; and he knew many other honeſt Men of the ſame Reſolution. So near was the poor Kingdom at that Time to its Deliverance; as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, who then under the Name of Mr. Hyde made a brave Oppoſition in the Houſe againſt it. Sir Edward Deering, who had been ſo ſerviceable to the Party, now made his laſt Speech againſt it; and Mr. Palmer and ſome others made their open Proteſtations againſt it, for which Mr. Palmer was ſent to the Tower. So that in two Days Time, they not only paſs'd this fatal Remonſtrance, but alſo order'd it to be printed. This was determin'd upon the twenty fourth of November, the very Day before the King arriv'd at London from his long Journey.

The Subſtance of it.

The Remonſtrance it ſelf, in its full Length, wou'd take up many Pages in this Hiſtory, and may be ſeen in the Collections of Husbands, Ruſhworth, and Nalſon. As to the Subſtance, it 'treats the King as a third Perſon, and obliquely charges and reproaches him with all the Grievances in his Reign, as Billeting Soldiers, Loans and Benevolences, Exactions for Knighthood, Coat and Conduct Mony, Foreſt Oppreſſions, Tonnage and Poundage, Ship-Mony, all Sorts of Monopolies, Council-Table, Star-Chamber, High-Commiſſion, &c. beſides the Diſſolution of all the Parliaments; many of which had been redreſs'd in the fourth Year of his Reign, and the reſt within leſs than three Months ſince. Beſides Grievances, it enumerated all the Misfortunes of the Reign, as the ill Succeſs againſt Cadiz, the War with France and Loſs of Rochelle, and the Loſs of the Palatinate, tho' in his Father's Reign; not forgetting the Troubles ariſing from Scotland, and even thoſe of Ireland. In a Word, it omitted not the leaſt falſe Step in Government, or paſſionate Exerciſe of Power, or ſeeming Misfortune to the Nation, from the Death of King James to the preſent Time: And all this repreſented with a moſt artificial Mixture of Truth, Fallacy and Falſhood, with the moſt aggravating Circumſtances, and the moſt pathetical Expreſſions to move the People, that the general Obſervation of the Wiſe, and the particular Animoſity of the Diſaffected, cou'd ſuggeſt to the Prejudice of the King. And yet the Authors of it conclude, That if their Methods were obſerved, they doubted not but God wou'd crown this Parliament ſo as to be the Foundation of more Honour and Happineſs to his Majeſty, than ever yet was enjoy'd by any of his Royal Predeceſſors. This was the ſecret Work of many Days, and was the moſt unreaſonable and moſt inexcuſable Tranſaction that had yet paſs'd the Houſe of Commons; and indeed it was a magnificent Libel againſt the King and his whole Reign, an Original for all Libels to copy from, drawn up by a few fine and ſubtle Heads, and cramm'd down the Throats of many more; which ſtill might have been prevented, had not the Majority of the Houſe been too defective both in their Courage and their Vigilance.

A Reflection upon it.

For this Reaſon the noble Hiſtorian wonders how thoſe Men, who had induſtriouſly aſſum'd their Country's Truſt, cou'd anſwer to God and their own Conſciences, for that ſupine Lazineſs, Negligence, and unſeaſonable Abſence, which were the firſt Inlets in thoſe Inundations; by which Means a handful of Men came to preſcribe Laws to a far greater Number, and gradually converted or reduc'd the whole Body to their Opinions. But then he ſeems to turn it upon this notable Obſervation: Whoever reflects upon the ill Arts us'd by theſe Men to prevail upon the People in general; their abſurd Lies, to win the Affections, and corrupt the Underſtandings of the Weak; their bold Scandals, to confirm the Wilful; their boundleſs Promiſes to gain the Ambitious; and their abject Flatteries, to captivate the Vulgar; wou'd hardly give himſelf leave to uſe thoſe Weapons, no not for the Preſervation of three Kingdoms.

The King's Return from Scotland.

VI. 1. Such was the preſent State of Affairs when the King return'd from Scotland, after he had been near four Months abſent from London, where many things began to appear with a melancholy and boding Aſpect. Yet notwithſtanding the ſeveral Contrivances to leſſen the Reputation of the Court, the City of London made noble Preparations to receive his Majeſty, who arriv'd upon Thurſday the twenty-fifth Day of November. Sir Richard Gourney, than Lord-Mayor, was a Man of ſingular Wiſdom and Courage, and expreſs'd great Indignation to ſee the City ſo corrupted by the amuſing Artifices of factious Perſons; and therefore attended upon his Majeſty, at his Entrance into Moor-Fields, with all the Luſtre and good Countenance, and all the Loyalty and Duty, that cou'd poſſibly be ſhewn. The King was highly ſatisfy'd, and in Anſwer to the Recorder's Speech, thank'd the good Citizens for their hearty Expreſſions of Love to him, and declar'd, That he cou'd not expreſs the Contentment he receiv'd, becauſe he now ſaw that all thoſe Tumults and Diſorders had only riſen from the meaner Sort of People, and that the Inclinations of the better and main Part of the City had been ever Loyal and Affectionate to his Perſon and Government. After this he was conducted through the City with the utmoſt Splendor and Solemnity, and the greateſt Acclamations of Joy, that had been known upon any Occaſion; and at Guildhall, he with his Royal Conſort and Children, the Prince Palatine, and the whole Court of Lords and Ladies, were all magnificently feaſted and entertain'd, with ſuch a Grandeur and excellent Management as ſcarce ever was known. In concluſion, his Majeſty was attended by the whole City, and ſurrounded by the repeated Bleſſings of the People, to his Palace at Whitehall, where he parted from the Lord-Mayor with the moſt obliging and condeſcending Indearments.

The City's great Entertainment.

The next Day the King went to Hampton-Court, where he deſign'd to have paſs'd the Winter; and few Days after the Recorder, the two Sheriffs, and ſix Aldermen were ſent with an Addreſs to his Majeſty, 'in which they diſown'd the late Tumults in Weſtminſter, and petition'd both their Majeſties to make their Reſidence this Seaſon at the Palace of Whitehall.' They were moſt graciouſly receiv'd, nobly entertain'd, and every one of them Knighted, except two who had receiv'd the Honour before. And the King was pleas'd further to declare, 'That tho' he and the Queen had purpos'd to Winter at Hampton-Court, yet for the Sake of their Body, and the conſiderable Citizens of London, who had no Hand in the late Diſorders, he wou'd with all convenient Speed return to keep his Chriſtmaſs at Whitehall.' All which he ſhortly performed, to the general Satisfaction of the Citizens, who for the better Part were very ſincere in their Affections to their Prince; and cou'd they have kept the governing Power in their Hands, they wou'd have given further Teſtimonies of their Loyalty: But in a ſhort Time, by the exquiſite Cunning and Management of the prevailing Party in the Houſe of Commons, they were gradually diſpoſſeſs'd by Force and Tumults, not only of all Power of aſſiſting the King, but of protecting themſelves from the increaſing Inſults of theſe Times.

The King conſents to repair to Whitehall.

2. In the mean Time the King found himſelf under greater Diſadvantages than ever, from the Houſe of Commons, having no Servant there of Intereſt, Ability, or Reputation, or of Faithfulneſs and Affection to his Service. Nor had he, for this laſt Year, any worthy Counſellor about his Perſon, fit to be us'd or truſted in theſe hazardous Times; and then again he had been too backward in the preferring the chief Leaders in the Houſe, who being then fill'd with Expectations as well as back'd by Intereſt, might have been of infinite Service to him. However, to retrieve as much as he cou'd, having diſcharg'd Sir Henry Vane from being Secretary and Treaſurer of the Houſhold, he at laſt made Choice of a Triumvirat of extraordinary Men, the Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepeper, and Mr. Edward Hyde, all three Members of the Houſe of Commons, frequent Speakers, without any Relation to the Court, and generally luke-warm as to the King's Intereſt. Theſe for ſome Time lay hid, and were not diſcern'd; and their Advices and Pens were moſt us'd upon emergent and important Diſputes between the King and the two Houſes. But now they came to be more publickly known, and implacably envy'd by the prevailing Party; for the Lord Falkland was made Secretary of State, Sir John Colepeper made Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Hyde had ſuch Preferment promis'd to him, as ſhou'd be worthy of his Acceptance.

The King chuſes a new Counſel, conſiſting of

The Lord Falkland.

Every one of theſe Perſons had ſome Excellencies, diſtinct from the other two: The Lord Falkland, a noble Gentleman of thirty two Years of Age, was wonderfully belov'd by all that knew him, a Man of prodigious natural Parts, of an immenſe Wit and Judgment, and an admirable Memory, that retain'd all it read or heard; all which he as rhetorically ſet forth upon every Occaſion. He was ſuperior to all thoſe Paſſions and Affections which attend vulgar Minds, and was guilty of no other Ambition than that of Knowledge and Learning, of which he was a compleat Maſter, and to which he was a glorious Benefactor. Yet he was ſomewhat Hypochondriack in his Temper; therefore Men of Buſineſs often found that in him, which they did not practiſe themſelves, nor perhaps would not, if they cou'd have imitated him. But that which made all lovely and engaging was his great Humility and Goodneſs, and what crown'd all his Excellencies was his unqueſtionable Probity and Sincerity. This made him ſometime doubtful, and indeed ſcrupulous, whether he ſhou'd accept of this high Office from the King, being apprehenſive both of the Duty of his Place, and the Expectations of the Court. However this had ſtill ſuch an Effect upon his Conſcience, that he never cou'd comply with two Cuſtoms common to his Office, the uſual Way of employing Spies, and the opening of other Mens Letters; one he thought to be againſt Juſtice, and the other againſt Humanity.

Sir John Colepeper,

Sir John Colepeper was Knight of the Shire for Kent, and a Perſon of unblemiſh'd Reputation and known Abilities, whoſe Education and Converſe in the World had been in part military, which hinder'd him from being ſo excellent in polite Acquiſitions. And tho' he was inferior to the laſt in point of Learning, he had as great a Memory; and having an univerſal Underſtanding, and a quick Conception, the Warmth of his Fancy gave him a very ready Elocution, ſo that he had the Name of an excellent Speaker. He commonly ſpoke at the Concluſion of a Debate, and has been often heard to enumerate the ſeveral Opinions of at leaſt ten Perſons, in order as they ſpoke, and diſtinctly and methodically anſwer every one; ſo that no Man more gather'd a general Concurrence to his Opinion than he: Which was the more remarkable, becauſe his Perſon, and Manner of ſpeaking were not very taking; ſo that he prevail'd purely by the Strength of his Reaſon, inforc'd with a ſufficient Confidence. Yet his Apprehenſion was judg'd better than his Reſolution; and he commonly ſhew'd an Eagerneſs and Fervency in his Temper, that render'd him leſs ſociable and gracious than his two Collegues.

Mr. Edward Hyde,

Mr. Edward Hyde was of a ſprightly and agreeable Converſation, of an extraordinary Induſtry and Activity, and of a great Confidence; which, as Sir Philip Warwick obſerves, made him ſoon at home at a Court. His natural Parts were very forward and ſound, his Learning very good and competent, and he had a Felicity both of Tongue and Pen; all which made him readily hearken'd to, and much approv'd: And having ſpent much of his Studies in the Law, his Diſcourſe and Writings became more ſignificant; and his very Stile and Language were very ſuitable to Buſineſs, but ſtill thought a little too diffus'd and redundant. So it was afterwards known, that tho' there was always a Concurrence of the Judgments of his two Collegues, that it was his Pen that was principally employ'd. Hence it was that the King's Propoſitions, Meſſages, Replies and Declarations were ſo well anſwering to the Rules of the Houſe, and the Nature of the Subject, and ſo found much better Acceptance with the World, than thoſe of the Houſe of Commons. This for a Time was very advantageous to his Majeſty's Service; for it drew the Curtain, and publickly expos'd the Deceitfulneſs and unwarrantable Deſigns of the Parliament Projectors, and the Reaſonableneſs of the King's Propoſitions. Yet a wiſe Lord, who had a great Influence on them all, often complain'd, That their Wit and Elegancy, which was very delightful, would not long laſt uſeful; ſince Conteſts between a King and his Parliament cou'd not be ſeparated from the ill Conſequences that attended the reſt of the Subjects; and that the ſeeing ſuch Things treated with Elegancy and Irony, wou'd rather beget a Perverſeneſs than a Complacency in the People; therefore he was wont to ſay, Our fine Pen will hurt us. He had certainly a great Inſight into Human Nature and Policy; and not long after his Reception at Court, he ſet about that famous Hiſtory of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England, &c. which has ſo nobly diſplay'd the conſummate Abilities of this Perſon.

Theſe eminent Perſons, tho' they were great Maſters of Reaſon, yet cou'd not pretend much to Experience; for they were to underſtand a Court, a Camp, and a Council-Board, all at the ſame Time. So that being to pilot a Ship through a tempeſtuous Sea, they never yet ventur'd on, it is rather to be wonder'd that they did ſo well, than that they made ſome Errors, as Sir P. Warwick obſerves. But the Lord Clarendon diſcovers the Matter further, and tells us That the King had made a Reſolution to be ſolely advis'd by theſe Three in Parliamentary Affairs, but in a few Days fatally ſwerv'd from it. Without naming the Queen, he intimates that this proceeded from the Lord Digby, who had a large Share of the King's Favour, and had been particularly inſtrumental in the Promotion of theſe three Perſons; therefore is here to be Characteriz'd as a fourth Man, who in many Caſes govern'd all Things.

And the Lord Digby.

George, Lord Digby, was eldeſt Son to the preſent Earl of Briſtol, who having been expell'd the Houſe of Commons, was call'd by the King's Writ into the Upper Houſe. He was a Man of very extraordinary Parts by Nature and Art, and of an Education as accompliſh'd as any Perſon in that Age; a gallant and beautiful Perſon, of great Eloquence and Gracefulneſs in his Diſcourſe, tho' with ſome little Affectation, and of ſo univerſal a Knowledge, that he never wanted Subject for Converſation. He was heroically brave and enterpriſing, and equal for the moſt part to the greateſt Affairs, but at the ſame time the unfitteſt Man to conduct them, being hurry'd on by a ſuperior Ambition and Vanity, and a Confidence in Himſelf, which ſometimes intoxicated, tranſported and expos'd him. He much affected Aſtrology, and his fatal Infirmity was, that he too often thought difficult Things very eaſy, and had ſo much of the Romantick Spirit, and of ſuch ſuperfine Policies, that all his ſhining Excellencies cou'd ſeldom make him proſperous either to Himſelf or his Maſter; and to him was apply'd the Obſervation, That there are ſome Things, which have more Wonder in them, than Worth. By this unhappy Compoſition he often involv'd himſelf in unſucceſsful Deſigns; and the King himſelf was moſt unfit to be ſerv'd by ſuch a Counſellor, being too eaſily inclin'd to ſudden Enterpriſes, and as eaſily ſtartled, when once attempted. So that ſometimes unhappy Counſels were propos'd, and Reſolutions taken, without any Communication with either of the Three, who had been ſo lately admitted to an entire Truſt.

Promotions in the Church.

Beſides theſe Promotions in the State, the King made ſome others in the Church about the ſame Time. Dr. Williams, the late Popular Biſhop of Lincoln, was tranſlated to the Archbiſhoprick of York, with Leave to hold his Deanery of Weſtminſter three Years in Commendam, and Dr. Winniff, Dean of St. Paul's ſucceeded him in the Biſhoprick of Lincoln. Dr. Duppa, Biſhop of Chicheſter, was tranſlated to Salisbury; and Dr. King, Dean of Rocheſter, preferr'd to Chicheſter: Dr. Hall, Biſhop of Exeter, was tranſlated to Norwich; and Dr. Brownrigg, Maſter of Katharine-Hall in Cambridge, promoted to Exeter: Dr. Skinner, Biſhop of Briſtol, was remov'd to Oxford; and Dr. Weſtfield of Great St. Bartholomew's, London, advanc'd to Briſtol: Dr. Prideaux, the King's Profeſſor of Divinity in Oxford, was preferr'd to the See of Worceſter; and that of Carliſle was given in Commendam to Arch-Biſhop Uſher the Primate of Ireland, during the Troubles in that Kingdom. Theſe were all Men of great Note and Eminency in the Church, frequent Preachers, and for the moſt part noted for being Anti-Arminians; which was a Character then not only popular, but gracious to the Leaders in the Houſe of Commons. But notwithſtanding the Merits of the Perſons, the Promotions were ſo little pleaſing in that Place, that they ſerv'd more to encreaſe their Fury, and to haſten the Overthrow of Epiſcopacy.

3. In the mean Time the Houſe of Commons proceeded with their uſual Fervour, and ſhew'd themſelves diſſatisfy'd with every Thing that was done. The Lord-Mayor's great Entertainment of the Court had given them new Diſquiets; but they were more diſoblig'd, when immediately after, the King commanded the Guards, that had attended the Houſe in his Abſence, to be diſcharg'd. This particularly diſguſted thoſe Members who thought it a piece of State, and pretended it to be a needful Security; ſo that the Commons petition'd the King to continue them, but two Days after his Return. To which, when the King anſwer'd, 'That he wou'd order ſome Train-Bands to 'wait for a few Days, tho' he knew no Cauſe they had of 'Fears, and it was a great Trouble to his Subjects to perform that Service, and gave ſtrange Apprehenſions and 'Jealouſies to the People;' they were by no means ſatisfy'd with a Guard of the King's Diſpoſal. Therefore they appointed a Committee to draw up Reaſons for one of their own, and deſir'd ſuch a Guard might be under the Command of the Earl of Eſſex, in whom they cou'd confide; which indeed foreboded the raiſing of an Army, and the chuſing of their own General.

The Parliament Guards diſcharg'd.

The King's Speech to both Houſes.

To qualify the encreaſing Heats, ſeven Days after his Return, the King came to the Houſe of Peers, where the Speaker of the Commons preſenting him with a Bill for a further Continuation of Tonnage and Poundage, with a very complimenting Oration, his Majeſty told them in a Speech to both Houſes, 'That tho' his Stay had been longer than he expected, yet he had made all the Haſte that 'the Settlement of the Scotch Affairs would admit; in which 'he had ſuch good Succeſs, that he cou'd confidently 'affirm to them, That he had left that Nation a moſt peaceable and contented People. That, having before his Journey ſettled the Liberties of his Subjects, and given the 'Laws a free and orderly Courſe, he expected at his Return to have found his People reaping the Fruits of them, 'by living in Quietneſs and Satisfaction; but inſtead of 'that, he found them diſturb'd with Jealouſies, Frights 'and Allarms of dangerous Deſigns and Plots, and Guards 'ſet to defend both Houſes: Which he ſaid not, as doubting the leſſening of his Subjects Affections in his Abſence, for with great Comfort he remember'd The joyful Reception he found at his Entry into London; but rather, becauſe his Preſence wou'd diſperſe thoſe Fears, 'having a perfect and true Affection to his People, as ever 'any Prince had, or as good Subjects cou'd poſſibly deſire. 'And he was ſo far from Repenting of any Act paſs'd this 'Parliament, for the Good of his People, that he proteſted, if it were to do again, he wou'd do it; and wou'd yet grant what further cou'd be juſtly deſir'd in Point of Liberty, or Religion. Then he recommended to them the Buſineſs of Ireland, and concluded all with a Declaration of his ſeeking his People's Happineſs; for their Flouriſhing was his greateſt Glory, and their Affections his greateſt Strength.

The Remonſtrance preſented, with a Petition.

This healing and qualifying Speech had little or no Effect upon the Houſe of Commons, who but the Night before had preſented him with their grand Remonſtrance, formerly mention'd, together with a Petition, in which among numerous Complaints, they eſpecially deſir'd three Things. ‘First, That his Majeſty wou'd deprive the Biſhops of their Votes, and abridge the immoderate Power of the Clergy, &c. Secondly, That he wou'd remove all evil Counſellors, and employ only ſuch as his Parliament might have Cauſe to confide in; And laſtly, That he wou'd forbear to alienate any of the forfeited Eſtates in Ireland, which might accrew to the Crown by reaſon of this Rebellion. If all which were perform'd, they promis'd to ſupport his Royal Eſtate with Honour and Plenty at home, and with Power and Reputation abroad.' This with the Remonſtrance was preſented on the firſt Day of December; and ſhortly after both Petition and Remonſtrance were by Order printed, and with great Induſtry publiſh'd throughout the Kingdom: Tho' the King courteouſly deſir'd them not to publiſh either, till he ſhou'd ſend his Anſwer, which he did ſoon after; firſt to their Petition, in which he declar'd

The King's Anſwer,

‘Himſelf ſenſible of the Diſreſpect in printing the Remonſtrance, but for the main Particulars of their Petition, he deſir'd them to conſider That the Biſhops Rights were grounded upon the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and Conſtitution of Parliaments. As to evil Counſellors, he deſir'd them to name the Perſons, produce Proofs againſt them, and to forbear general Aſperſions: Then as to the Iriſh Lands, he ask'd them, Whether it was ſeaſonable to declare Reſolutions of that Nature, before the Events of War be ſeen; concluding with his Thanks for their Care of that Kingdom, and their ſeveral great Promiſes.

And Declaration.

This Anſwer made no Impreſſion upon them, but they proceeded in their accuſtomed Manner, uſing many private Methods of vilifying the Court, and making many dark Glances with Relation to the Iriſh Rebellion; all which increas'd the daily ſpreading of the fatal Remonſtrance. Therefore as a Preſervative againſt the Virulence and Infection of that Paper, which now began to inflame the Nation, the King publiſh'd a ſolemn Declaration to all his loving Subjects, in which, without the leaſt Sharpneſs and Return of the Language he had receiv'd, ‘He anſwer'd to all the Fears and Jealouſies that had made Impreſſion on the Minds of the People, with Reference to their Religion, their Liberties, or their Civil Properties. He declar'd his inviolable Steadineſs as to Religion, in Oppoſition to Popery, and was willing to make Allowances to Diſſenters of tender Conſciences: He mention'd the numerous Conceſſions he had made, and the gracious Acts he had paſs'd, for the Redreſs of all Sorts of Grievances, real or imaginary: He inſiſted how ready he had been to give up all ill Miniſters, that he had protected no one Perſon againſt whom the Parliament had excepted, nor promoted any this Seſſion, but what were in particular Eſtimation with the People: He promis'd to comply with any Thing that cou'd reaſonably be demanded by his Subjects; and particularly lamented the miſerable Condition of the poor Proteſtants in Ireland: And concluded with conjuring all his good Subjects, by all the Bonds of Love, Duty and Obedience, to joyn with him in the Recovery of the Peace of that Kingdom, and the Preſervation of the Peace of This.' All which may be ſeen at large in Husband's and Nalſon's Collections, and in a great Meaſure in the Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory; but is no where to be found in Ruſhworth.

The Preſſing Bill promoted.

4. In the mean Time Letters came daily from Ireland, preſſing for Relief of Men, Mony and Proviſions, which were not haſtned equal to Mens Expectations, tho' it had been more than once recommended by the King to both Houſes. The ſlow raiſing of Men was imputed to the Difficulty of getting Volunteers; and therefore a Bill was prepar'd for Preſſing, which ſoon paſs'd the Houſe, and was ſent up to the Lords. It was hardly to be imagin'd, that Men cou'd be wanting within three Months after the Army was disbanded in the North; but their Buſineſs was to get Power, not to raiſe Men; and therefore they made uſe of the Stratagem, to transfer the Power of preſſing Men from the King to Themſelves: For in the Preamble of this Bill they declar'd, ‘That the King cou'd in no Caſe, but upon an Invaſion from a Foreign Power, preſs a Free-born Subject.' This was an unknown Doctrine to the Lords, and ſeem'd much to derogate from that Royal Power, which was neceſſary to preſerve his Subjects, or aſſiſt his Allies; and therefore the Attorney-General now took the Courage to deſire of the Lords, ‘That he might be heard on the King's Behalf, before they conſented to a Clauſe ſo prejudicial to his Prerogative.' This reaſonable Stop put an unreaſonable one upon the Affairs of Ireland: The Commons order'd their Committee to meet no more about that Buſineſs, and declar'd, ‘That the Loſs of Ireland muſt be imputed to the Lords; who were too ſenſible of the Inconveniences that aroſe by their former Compliance, to be enſnared by the ſame Arguments.

Mr. St. John's Cunning.

Still new Intelligence came from Ireland, deploring the miſerable State of the Proteſtants, who having undergone all kinds of Torments and Calamities, came over in vaſt Numbers into England, in a wretched ſtarving Condition. In this Strait they knew not how to proceed, for whatever Speeches they made concerning the Lords, it was manifeſt they wou'd bear the whole Reproach: Beſides, the King might from hence take Occaſion to remove the Buſineſs out of their Hands, and manage it himſelf by his Council, which wou'd prejudice their Reputation and Intereſt, and very much embaraſs their Projections. To remedy which, the Subtle Mr. St. John went privately to his Majeſty, and declar'd, ‘How much he was troubled at the Interruption given by the Commons, who unreaſonably inſiſted upon a Preamble ſo prejudicial to his Royal Prerogative. That it wou'd be very happy, if an Expedient cou'd be found out to remove that Impediment, ſo fatal to the Iriſh Affairs;' and adviſ'd his Majeſty to come to the Houſes, and expreſs his Princely Zeal for the Relief of Ireland, and then taking Notice of the Preſſing Bill depending, to offer, ‘That the Bill, to avoid further Diſputes, might paſs with a Salvo Jure to the King and People, referring ſuch Diſputes to Times that cou'd better bear them.' This Advice was follow'd by the King, in a ſhort Speech made on the fourteenth of December; which effectually gain'd their Point, which theſe Leaders cou'd hardly have compaſs'd any other Way. For now the divided Lords and Commons immediately united in a Petition to the King, in which they complain'd of a Violation of their Privileges, and declar'd, ‘That it was their ancient and undoubted Right, That his Majeſty ought not to take notice of any Matter depending in either Houſe, but by their Information and Agreement, or to declare his Approbation or Diſlike of any Thing, till in due Courſe it be preſented to him: They declar'd againſt his Majeſty's late Speech, and humbly beſought him, he wou'd not for the future break in, or interrupt them, but wou'd declare the Name of ſuch Perſon, by whoſe Miſinformation he was induc'd to it, that he might be puniſh'd as he deſerv'd; which they thought the ſureſt Way to procure and confirm a Confidence and Unity between Him and his People.

The Bill paſs'd.

After this they no more conſider'd Ireland, till this manifeſt Breach ſhou'd be repair'd, namely by paſſing the Bill; and therefore when the King, by the Earl of Eſſex, offer'd to raiſe by Commiſſions ten thouſand Volunteers for the Service of Ireland, ‘Provided the Houſe wou'd declare, That they wou'd pay them;' the Propoſal was wholly rejected. For they were both unwilling ſuch a Number of Men ſhou'd be rais'd by the King's Direction, fearing they might prove too much at his Devotion; and that any Method ſhou'd be purſu'd than what they propos'd Themſelves. So that at length, after the Intervention of ſeveral other Matters hereafter to be mention'd, the King conſented to paſs the Bill, with that remarkable one againſt the Biſhops Votes in Parliament.

The Militia Bill brought in.

5. This Preſſing-Bill prov'd a great Step to another of ſtill greater Conſequence, namely that for ſettling the Power of the Militia in the Hands of proper Perſons. All which was chiefly manag'd by the Artifices of Mr. St. John, who, notwithſtanding his Oaths as Solicitor-General, declar'd, ‘That the Power of the Militia was not inveſted in the King; and accordingly he brought in a Bill with ſeveral Blanks for Commiſſioners Names. And when it was by ſome alledg'd, ‘That by this all Power wou'd be taken from the Crown,' he in a cunning Speech inſinuated, ‘That the Bill took no Power from any One who had it, but provided to give a Power were it was not; which, as far as he knew, might fall to the King's Share, and he hop'd it wou'd be ſo.' With this Anſwer the Bill was receiv'd, notwithſtanding all Oppoſition, and once read; which was all that the Contrivers at preſent deſir'd, leaving the Completion of it to a more favourable Opportunity.

Agreeable to this new Opinion, the Commons took great Offence at the King's Removal of their ſure Friend Sir William Balfour from being Lieutenant of the Tower, and putting in Colonel Lundsford to that important Truſt. Tho' the King by Way of Recompence had given Sir William three thouſand Pounds, rais'd by the Sale of ſome of the Queen's own Jewels, yet that wou'd not ſatisfy: For the Majority of the Commons were afraid of Sir Thomas Lundſford, and drew up Reaſons of his being unfit for that Place, and wou'd recommend Sir John Coniers to it. The Lords refus'd to joyn in any ſuch Addreſs, declaring it 'To be an Intrenchment upon his Majeſty's Prerogative.' Upon which the Commons made a ſeparate Declaration of Colonel Lundſford's 'being unfit to be Lieutenant of 'the Tower, as being a Perſon whom the Commons of 'England cou'd not confide in;' and enter'd a Proteſtation againſt the Lords Refuſal to joyn with them. After which they ſent two of their own Members to the Earl of Newport, Conſtable of the Tower, to deſire him to reſide there, and take Cuſtody of it, and encourag'd and read in their Houſe a Petition of ſome of the Common-Council, and other Citizens, for the Security of the Tower, and let the Lord-Mayor acquaint the King, That there wou'd be an Inſurrection of the Apprentices of London, if Colonel Lundſford was not remov'd. So that, after three Days Continuance, upon December the twenty ſixth the King was forc'd to diſplace him; giving the Poſt to Sir John Byron, a Perſon not pleaſing, becauſe not recommended. However it gave ſome Satisfaction, to find the King's Counſels ſo ill fix'd, as to be made alterable by their Clamours.

The Apprentices Petition.

New Tumults.

At the ſame Time an unuſual Petition was preſented and read in the Houſe of Commons, in the Name of the Apprentices, and others, whoſe Times are lately expir'd in and about the City of London, directed to the King and both Houſes of Parliament; in which they complain'd of 'Great Miſchiefs coming upon them, occaſion'd by the 'Papiſts, Prelates, and their Party; and notwithſtanding 'the unweary'd Endeavours of the Houſe of Commons, 'deſperate Men had been incourag'd to plot againſt the 'Peace and Safety of the Kingdom; witneſs the unheard 'of Cruelties acted by the Papiſts in Ireland; therefore 'they deſir'd that Care might be taken of all eminent Papiſts, the Laws againſt Jeſuits put in Execution, and 'that Prelacy might be rooted up, &c.' This, and other like Papers being printed and diſpers'd, and the Multitude incourag'd by Dr. Burgeſs and other furious Teachers, the former Methods of Tumults were ſpirited up; and great Numbers of the meaner ſort of People gather'd about the Houſe of Peers, roaring out, No Biſhops! no Popiſh Lords! affronting, and calling ſuch as they did not like, by the Name of Rotten-hearted Lords; being now further diſoblig'd at the King's Removal of the Earl of Newport from being Conſtable of the Tower. Hereupon the Houſe of Peers, at a free Conference with the Commons, complain'd of thoſe Tumults, alledging, 'Such 'Diſorders wou'd make their Freedom queſtionable, and 'caſt a Blemiſh upon thoſe good Laws already made, and 'prevent making any more; therefore deſir'd they wou'd 'joyn with them in a Declaration for ſuppreſſing ſuch 'Riots.' This Conference was no ſooner reported than laid aſide by the Commons, for handling of Matters of more weighty Concern.

They are encourag'd by the Commons.

The Inſolences of theſe Tumults increas'd after a dangerous Manner; and when many diſſolute profane People, who had broke into Weſtminſter Abby, and wou'd have pull'd down the Organs, and ſome Ornaments of the Church, were repell'd by the Dean and others, they threaten'd, They wou'd come in greater Numbers, and pull down the Church it ſelf. Which caus'd the Lords again to ſend to the Commons, and to deſire a Concurrence in the Declaration; but the Conference cou'd not be obtain'd, the Debate being ſtill adjourn'd to ſome other Time, after ſeveral Speeches to juſtify and commend the Peoples Affections: In which ſome declar'd They wou'd not diſcourage their Friends, for this was a Time they muſt make uſe of all Friends; and Mr. Pym himſelf ſaid, God forbid they ſhou'd by any Means diſhearten People from obtaining their juſt Deſires in ſuch a Way. Upon this, the Lords requir'd the Advice of the Judges, What Courſe they might lawfully take to ſuppreſs theſe Tumults; and thereupon directed the Lord-Keeper to iſſue out a Writ upon the Statute of Northampton to the Sheriff and Juſtices, to ſet a ſtrong Watch in ſuch Places as they judg'd moſt convenient, to hinder that riotous Conflux of People to Weſtminſter to the Diſturbance of their Conſultations. In Obedience to which, the Juſtices of the Peace appointed Conſtables to ſtand at the Waterſide, and other Places, with a ſtrong Watch, to prevent that tumultuous Reſort. But this was no ſooner effected, than the Conſtables were ſent for by the Houſe of Commons, who examining their Warrants, requir'd them to diſcharge their Watches. And tho' it appear'd that what was done was in purſuance of a legal Writ under the great Seal; without conferring with the Lords about it, they voted the ſetting ſuch a Watch A Breach of Privilege; and one of the Juſtices, who according to his Oath had executed that Writ, was for that Offence ſent to the Tower.

They encreaſe.

Upon this publick Encouragement all the factious turbulent People about the Town aſſembled themſelves by the Sound of a Bell, or ſome other Token, as well by Night as Day, in the Fields or ſome other proper Place, to conſult and be directed by thoſe who had the Diſpoſal of them. And a Meeting of this Nature being held in Southwark, in a Place where their Arms and Magazine was kept, the Conſtable, a Man of Sobriety and an Enemy to ſuch ſeditious Acts, went in amongſt them to obſerve their Motions; but he was no ſooner diſcover'd, but he was reproach'd, beaten and dragg'd, in ſuch a barbarous Manner, that he hardly eſcap'd with Life. Of this Complaint was ſolemnly made to the next Juſtice of the Peace; whereupon the Sheriff was directed by Writ to impanel a lawful Jury to enquire into that dangerous Riot. But this was reſented by the Commons as an Act that infring'd their Privileges: For it was by the Leaders alledg'd, 'That the 'Meeting was made by godly and well-affected Perſons, 'with no other Deſign but to prepare a Petition againſt 'Biſhops; and that the Conſtable, who was a Friend to 'Biſhops, came in to hinder a Subſcription to ſo wholeſome 'a Petition.' Upon this the Houſe order'd an Injunction to the Under-Sheriff of Surrey, 'Not to ſuffer any 'Proceedings to be made upon any Inquiſition, in 'which any Perſons were concern'd, who met together to ſubſcribe a Petition to be preſented to their 'Houſe.

Their Inſolence.

Thus all the Barriers of the Law were thrown down, and the Chriſtmas Holy-Days giving ſtill more Licence to the People, the Conflux grew more numerous about Weſtminſter; the Mob ſometimes in their Paſſage making a Stand before White-hall, where beſides the uſual Outcry of No Biſhops! No Popiſh Lords! wou'd call out, We will have no more Porter's-Lodge, we will ſpeak with the King when we pleaſe. Coming near the two Houſes, they pull'd Papers out of their Pockets, and getting ſome convenient Place, read the Names of ſeveral Perſons aloud, calling them Diſſaffected Members of the Houſe of Commons, and many of the Peers, Falſe, evil and rotten-hearted Lords. They threatned to pull down the Lodgings where the Biſhops lay; attempted to force the Doors of the Abby, where a ſtrong Guard was conſtantly kept, and inſulted the Perſons of ſome Biſhops in their Coaches: And had not the Arch-Biſhop of York, who had been reckon'd a Favourer of their Party, met with a ſeaſonable Reſcue, it is probable they wou'd have murder'd him. So that all the Biſhops, and ſeveral Members of both Houſes, from this Time withdrew from their Attendance in Parliament, out of a real Apprehenſion of endangering their Lives. Beſides the ſeditious Dr. Burgeſs, Captain Ven, a Member of Parliament for the City of London, who had been a Ringleader in the Mob againſt the Earl of Strafford, was a great Promoter and Incourager of theſe Tumults; and when thus much was offer'd to be prov'd in the Houſe, and that he had us'd this Method for fear the worſer Party ſhou'd get the better of the good Party, the Parties were appointed to attend many Days, and never admitted to be heard.

From hence began the Terms of Cavalier and Roundhead.

The King, according to the City's Petition, kept his Chriſtmas at White-hall, where, beſides the uſual Retinue, many Officers of the late Army, who waited for their Arrears and ſome Employment in the Iriſh War, upon ſeeing the Inſolence of the Multitude, and the Danger threatning the Court, offer'd their Service as a Guard to his Majeſty's Perſon, and were entertain'd with more Ceremony, than was thought ſeaſonable for all the preſent Diſtempers. Theſe Officers, provok'd at the ſeveral Inſults of the vile Crew, treated them firſt with Words of great Contempt, which being return'd with equal Scorn, Blows were faſtned upon ſome of the moſt Pragmatical, which produc'd ſome ſlight Cuts, and a little Blood. Among the Words that were then thrown about, a Reformade, call'd David Hide, cry'd, He wou'd cut the Throats of thoſe Round-headed Dogs that bawl'd againſt Biſhops: From whence began the Terms of Roundheads and Cavaliers, which afterwards ſerv'd to diſtinguiſh the two Parties; the former being a contemptible Foot-Rabble, and the latter the King's Houſe-Officers. This was look'd upon by the Commons like a Levying of War by the King, and they took all care to aggravate the poor People's Sufferings that came with their Petitions; and afterwards it was repreſented as a juſt Judgment upon the King, to have his Scaffold plac'd on the ſame Spot where the firſt Blood was drawn in this Conteſt. Some briſk Gentlemen of the Inns of Court did alſo offer their Service to guard his Majeſty, but were only civilly receiv'd and diſmiſs'd. This, with the other, caus'd the Commons to call more loudly for a Guard for themſelves under the Command of the Earl of Eſſex; and in the mean Time they order'd the Bailiff, and other Officers of Weſtminſter to ſet a double Watch and Guard upon the twenty ninth of December at Night. And to improve and ſecond this Invention, ſome of their cunning

Agents made hideous Out-cries in the City, That all People ſhou'd riſe for their Defence, for the King and the Papiſts were coming to fire the City, and cut their Throats. Which prodigious Report, back'd with the ſuſpicious Orders of the Commons, ſo inflam'd the People for want of Sleep and cool Thoughts, that theſe imaginary Dangers wrought them up to the ſame Height of Frenzy, that the moſt real Miſchiefs cou'd have effected.

The Biſhops Proteſtation.

6. During the Height of theſe Tumults, the Biſhops finding themſelves driven from the Parliament, and in Danger even of their Lives, twelve of them met at the Lodgings of the Archbiſhop of York; where conſulting how to preſerve their ancient Rights, the Archbiſhop drew up a Petition and Proteſtation, which he declar'd to be agreeable with former Precedents. It was directed to the King and the Lords aſſembled in Parliament, and the Subſtance was to 'Declare and Proteſt againſt all 'Laws, Orders, Votes and Determinations, as in them'ſelves void and of none Effect, which in their Abſence, 'ſince the twenty-ſeventh Inſtant, have already paſs'd; as 'likewiſe againſt all ſuch, as ſhall hereafter paſs, during 'the Time of their forc'd and violent Abſence from the 'ſaid honourable Houſe.' Subſcrib'd York, Durham, Litchfield and Coventry, Norwich, St. Aſaph, Bath and Wells, Hereford, Oxford, Ely, Glloceſter, Peterborough and Llandaff. This Paper was put into the Lord-Keeper Littleton's Hands, to be us'd with Tenderneſs and Caution, and not to be read, till his Majeſty, by the Invitation of the Biſhops, ſhou'd ſit with the Peers in the Houſe, and then to read it in the Audience of the King and the Lords, and not before. But the Lord-Keeper, willing to take the Advantage of ingratiating himſelf to the prevailing Faction, to which he knew himſelf ſufficiently obnoxious, and finding what Uſe might be made of it by prejudic'd Minds, read the ſame openly in the Houſe of Lords: And when he found ſome of the Party apprehenſive enough of Miſconſtruction, he aggravated the Matter as highly offenſive, and of dangerous Conſequence. Therefore, not without great Heat and Vehemence, and with an ill Preface, it was ſent down to the Houſe of Commons; ſome of the Lords ſaying, The Hand of God now appear'd in bringing that to paſs, which otherwiſe they never cou'd have effected.

They are impeach'd of High-Treaſon,

And ſent to the Tower.

The Commons entertain'd it very heinouſly, and were very quick in their Reſolutions; Mr. Glynne loudly exclaim'd againſt it, and cry'd, It was no leſs than High-Treaſon! and ſome compar'd it, and even preferr'd it to the Powder-Plot. One indeed was willing to clear the Biſhops from Treaſon and the Tower, but thought they were ſtark mad, and ought to be ſent to Bedlam. Another, who had great Influence, after the Debate was over, declar'd, They might with as much Reaſon be charg'd with Adultery. But the preſent Fury of the Houſe ran ſo high, that within half an Hour's Conſideration, the ſaid twelve Biſhops were impeach'd by the Commons of England of High-Treaſon. The Uſher of the Black-Rod was commanded to find them out, and bring them to the Bar of the Houſe of Peers, which by reaſon of their different Lodgings cou'd not be effected till eight at Night, when being brought together, their Crime was ſignify'd to them, and an Order made for their Commitment to the Tower; only Durham and Litchfield, by reaſon of their Age and Infirmities, found the Favour to continue with the Black-Rod. This was done upon the 30th of December, with great Triumph of Bells and Bonfires; and they remain'd in Cuſtody, till after the Bill to deſtroy their Votes in Parliament was paſs'd, which was not till ſome Months after. Here the two Archbiſhops were reconcil'd, but not ſuffer'd to ſee each other; and here the Biſhops by Turns preach'd every Sunday to a large Auditory of Citizens, till the Time of their Enlargement. Their Commitment was ſucceeded by a greater Number of Libels, Ballads, and ſcandalous Papers than ever had been known before, which were thrown about and diſpers'd by all the Methods that ill Manners and ill Nature cou'd invent.

The Commons cenſur'd.

Yet the King receiv'd no great Prejudice from this high exorbitant Way of proceeding; for tho' it made the Guilty dread their Tribunal, yet it very much leſſen'd that Reſpect and Veneration that had formerly been entertain'd for Parliaments; and this laſt Action, relating to the Biſhops, being ſo very extraordinary, gave great Scandal to all ſober unprejudic'd Perſons. For tho' the thing it ſelf might be an Act of Indiſcretion, ſome Expreſſions in it unskilful and unwarrantable, and the Method of preſenting it irregular, for which they or the Lord-Keeper were anſwerable to the Peers; yet every one knew there cou'd be no ſuch thing as Treaſon in it; and therefore the End of the Commitment, and the Uſe all perceiv'd they deſign'd to draw from it, render'd it the more odious: And by this Means, the abſent Members of both Houſes, which were three Parts in four, and many of thoſe who had been preſent, abhorr'd their Proceedings, and became more diligent in their Attendance. And indeed many wiſe Men began to be highly ſcandaliz'd to ſee his Majeſty ſo ill us'd by his own Servants, and thoſe very Perſons he had oblig'd with ſo much Bounty and Munificence; and to ſee how much Ambition and private Intereſt was cover'd under publick Pretences. Thoſe who were truly zealous for the Preſervation of the Laws, Religion, and Intereſt of the Nation, were as careful to preſerve the Royal Honour and Dignity: So that That which was call'd the King's Party in both Houſes, really conſiſted of ſuch as were Strangers to the Court, and were Men of the beſt Fortunes and Reputation in their ſeveral Counties; having been always very zealous in the Preſervation of their juſt Rights, and, as much as they cou'd, oppos'd all illegal Impoſitions. While the King's own Privy-Counſellors, excepting a very few, and almoſt all his own Servants, that had long been under him, either oppos'd him in Publick, or privately betray'd him.

The Death of Bp. Davenant,

Bp. Montague,

Bp. Thornborough,

Judge Crook,

Sir Henry Spelman.

Sir Henry Marten,

Mr. Burhill,

Mr. Eaton,

Thus ended the old Year 1641, for a Concluſion of which, we ſhall relax the Reader's Thoughts with an Account of the Deaths of ſome eminent Men, who were ſo happy as to ſee none of the approaching Miſeries; and theſe were three Biſhops, one Judge, two Knights, and two Divines. The Biſhops were, Firſt Dr. John Davenant, Biſhop of Saliſbury, a celebrated Anti-Arminian, who had formerly been Margaret-Profeſſor of Divinity, and Maſter of Queen's Colledge in Cambridge, and after that ſelected by King James to go over to the Synod of Dort; and laſt of all for his ſound Learning, deep Divinity, and unblemiſh'd Life, he was juſtly preferr'd to the Biſhoprick of Saliſbury; where, after twenty Years Poſſeſſion, he ended his Days in Peace and Honour. The next was Dr. Richard Montague, Biſhop of Norwich, one of the Arminian Party, whom formerly we have more than once mention'd, a Perſon of vaſt and general Learning, who in King James's Reign had defeated the then thought matchleſs Selden, in his Hiſtory of Tythes, by which and other Writings he gain'd great Reputation, and afterwards ſeveral Preferments, (notwithſtanding the Reſentments of the Parliament,) particularly the Biſhoprick of Chicheſter, and laſtly that of Norwich; where he ſhew'd himſelf a warm and vigorous Prelate, and a great Oppoſer of the Puritan Party. The third was Dr. John Thornborough, who had by Queen Elizabeth been made Biſhop of Limerick in Ireland, and afterwards by King James tranſlated to Briſtol, and laſtly to Worceſter, where he continu'd twenty five Years; ſufficiently noted for his Learning, Wiſdom and Courage, and other Accompliſhments, as well of a Gentleman as a Biſhop, who dy'd full of Years, the ninetieth of his Age. The Judge that dy'd was Sir George Crook, one of the Juſtices of the King's-Bench, an old and eminent Lawyer, whoſe Reports and Arguments have been highly valu'd, and his Integrity further eſteem'd for his open oppoſing the Ship-Mony; tho' in that great Caſe, in his Judgment for Mr. Hampden, he wholly diſlik'd the Man, and declar'd he was a dangerous Perſon, and that Men had beſt take heed of him. Notwithſtanding his Diſſent, the King retain'd a great Reſpect for him, and when he begg'd his Quietus, by reaſon of his great Age, he diſmiſs'd him with an Allowance of his full Revenues, and a publick and honourable Acknowledgement of his Fidelity. The two Knights were Sir Henry Spelman, and Sir Henry Marten: The former was a Norfolk Gentleman, who had his Education in Trinity Colledge in Cambridge, and Lincolns-Inn, where he gain'd a thorough Knowledge of the Laws and Cuſtoms of this Kingdom, and became one of the moſt renowned Antiquaries in the Nation, as his elaborate Works teſtify: In ſum, he was highly eſteem'd, as well for his great Wiſdom and Experience in Publick Affairs, as his ſingular Learning and Piety. The latter, Sir Henry Marten, was a famous old Doctor of the Civil Law, who had gone through ſeveral Offices in Doctors Commons, till he was made Judge of the Prerogative; in all which Places he ſignally diſplay'd his admirable Skill in the Civil Law; for which the Wiſe and the Learned held him in particular Veneration, to the Day of his Death, which this Year hapned in the eighty firſt Year of his Age. The two Divines were Dr. John Burhill, and Mr. John Eaton, one in in Norfolk, and the other in Suffolk: The former was Rector of Northold in Norfolk, a Perſon of extraordinary Reading and profound Judgment, a great Linguiſt, and well vers'd in the Fathers and School-Men; who was highly eſteem'd by the great Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom he was a prime Aſſiſtant in his famous Hiſtory of the World. The other, Mr. Eaton, was Miniſter of Wickham-Market in Suffolk, and a Divine of a peculiar Mold, very Paradoxical in his Opinions, and accounted a great Antinomian, and one of the Founders of that Sect, for which he more than once ſuffer'd Impriſonment; but by Means of his

Zeal,

Zeal, his exemplary Patience and Piety, he was exceedingly extoll'd in the Neighbourhood, and his Memory ſtrangely valu'd for many Years after his Death.

And Sir Anthony Vandyck.

Beſides theſe of our own Country, we muſt not omit a Foreigner that reſided here, namely that ſupreme Maſter of the Art of Painting, Sir Anthony Vandyck, whoſe inimitable Pencil has inrich'd and adorn'd the Nation with the fineſt Heads in Europe. He was a Flemming by Birth, of the City of Antwerp, brought up under the greateſt Maſter of the Age, Sir Peter Paul Rubens; and travelling through ſeveral Nations, he was entertain'd and nobly encourag'd by the Engliſh Court, where ſhewing the Perfection of his Art, and gaining great Riches, he dy'd in the City of London, about a Year after his Maſter Rubens, in the fifty firſt Year of his Age.

Six Members of Parliament impeach'd of Treaſon.

V. I. The Parliament had now arriv'd to an exceeding Height of Power, under the Name of Redreſſing Grievances and Reformation, but eſpecially by the Help of unknown Diſcoveries, ſecret Plots, and ſtrange Conſpiracies, as well as the late Iriſh Rebellion and Cruelties. But their large Step towards Sovereignty, and their extravagant Proceedings, particularly this laſt relating to the Biſhops, began to ſink their Reputation; ſo that they wanted ſomething altogether New to ſupport their Credit, that had been rais'd by ſo many Accidents. It is juſtly believ'd that the angry Party, who were no longer appeas'd by Promiſe of Preferments, muſt have given over all further Deſigns for the Alteration of the Government in Church and State, had not the volatile and reſtleſs Spirit of the Lord Digby driven the King upon an unſeaſonable Enterprize, which gave them all their deſir'd Advantages. And this was at once to impeach ſix of the Heads of the Party of High-Treaſon, one Lord, and five Commoners, namely the Lord Kimbolton, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Hollis, Sir Arthur Haſlerigg, and Mr. Strode. The Charge againſt them conſiſted of ſeven Articles, the Subſtance of which was, ‘ That they had endeavour'd to ſubvert the Fundamental Laws and Govern‘ ment of the Kingdom, to deprive the King of his Regal ‘ Power, to alienate the Affections of his People, to draw ‘ the late Army to Diſobedience, and to ſubvert the very ‘ Rights and Beings of Parliament; and that they had in‘ vited and encourag'd a Foreign Power to invade this ‘ Kingdom, and had rais'd and countenanc'd Tumults, ‘ and conſequently had levy'd War againſt the King and ‘ Parliament.' As to theſe ſix Perſons, we have already given the Character of all but Sir Arthur Haſlerigg and Mr. Strode. The former was a Gentleman who ſerv'd for Leiceſterſhire, of a very great Eſtate, of a moroſe and haughty Temper, but of no great Abilities; yet ſo much in Favour with the preſent Leaders, that in the Beginning of this Parliament, Mr. Holford for declaring at his Election, They had choſen a Knight who had more Will than Wit, was ſent for as a Delinquent; and indeed he was occaſionally us'd by the Party, like the Dove out of the Ark, to try what Footing there was to be found. Mr. Strode ſerv'd for a Borough in Devonſhire, and was one of the fierceſt Men of the Party, and of the Party only for his Fierceneſs; for which he obtain'd the Name of a Parliament-Driver. In ſhort, theſe two were no ways equal to the other four; and tho' their Violence and Fury was as conſpicuous and tranſcendent as any, yet their Reputation and Intereſt to carry a Cauſe, otherwiſe than in a Concurrence, was ſo ſmall, that they gain'd Credit and Authority only by their being joyn'd with the reſt, who had indeed a powerful Influence, within and without the Houſe.

The Commons Votes upon it.

The Matter being concerted, without the Knowledge of the Triumvirate, Falkland, Colepepper and Hyde, who ought to have been conſulted, upon the third Day of January, his Majeſty by Warrant commanded Sir William Killigrew and Sir William Flemming to repair to the Lodgings of the fore-mention'd Perſons, and to ſeal up their Trunks, Studies and Chambers; and likewiſe by his Attorney-General, Sir Edward Herbert, demanded the Delivery of the five Members of the Commons, whom, together with the Lord Kimbolton, he ſent a Serjeant at Arms to apprehend. The Lords were a little allarm'd, but without ſecuring the Lord Kimbolton, took a Day's Time to conſider of the Matter, 'till they found the Senſe of the Lower Houſe, who had now the greateſt Authority. The Commons having ſecret Intelligence, were not ſurpris'd, but had provided againſt the coming of the Serjeant by a Vote and Order, ‘ That if any Perſon what‘ ſoever ſhall come to the Lodgings of any Member of ‘ that Houſe, and offer to ſeal the Trunks, Doors, or ‘ Papers of any of them, or ſeize their Perſons; ſuch ‘ Member ſhall require the Aid of the Conſtable to keep ‘ ſuch Perſons in ſafe Cuſtody, till the Houſe ſhall give ‘ further Orders: That if any Perſon whatever ſhall ‘ offer to arreſt or detain any Member of that Houſe, it ‘ ſhould be lawful for ſuch Member to ſtand upon his ‘ Guard, and make Reſiſtance, and for any Perſon to aſ‘ ſiſt him, According to the Proteſtation taken to defend the ‘ Privileges of Parliament.' So that when the Serjeant had deliver'd his Warrant, he was no more call'd in; but a Meſſage ſent to the King, ‘ That the Members ſhou'd ‘ be forth coming, as ſoon as a legal Charge ſhou'd be ‘ preferr'd againſt them;' and Copies of the Order being given to the accus'd Perſons, the Houſe adjourn'd till the next Day.

The King's Deſign upon the Members.

Upon this Interruption, the King was, contrary to his Inclination, put upon a further Enterprize, which caus'd infinite Damage, which was to go Himſelf in Perſon, and ſuddenly to ſurpriſe and demand the five Members in the Houſe the next Day. To this he was driven on by the Romantick Humour of the Lord Digby; but it ſeems the Queen her ſelf was more deeply engag'd, as it appears from a private Account given by Sir William Cook of Norfolk, from Mr. Architel Grey, Brother to the Lord Grey of Groby. By which we underſtand, that the King, being apprehenſive of the Hazard of the Attempt which had been agreed on at Night, went the next Morning to the Queen's Apartment, and finding the Counteſs of Carliſle with her Majeſty, he retir'd with her into her Cloſet, and there diſcours'd with her about the Conſequence of the Deſign, urg'd many Reaſons againſt it, and expreſs'd his Reſolution not to put it in Execution. Upon which the Queen cou'd no longer contain, but broke out into theſe angry and paſſionate Words, Alle, Poltron, Go, pull theſe Rogues out by the Ears, or never ſee my Face more! which it ſeems unhappily determin'd the whole Matter. All which was over-heard, and preſently diſcover'd to Mr. Pym by the forenam'd Counteſs, an intriguing States-Woman, who in her old Age took as much Pleaſure to diſplay her Wit, as in her Youth ſhe did to illuſtrate her Beauty. The Lord Clarendon ſeems not to have known the Diſcoverer of this Deſign, but rather thinks it was Mr. Murry of the Bed-Chamber; but, beſides this Account of Mr. Grey's, Sir Philip Warwick, and ſeveral other Writers are pretty expreſs, That Carliſle was the Lady that ſent the ſecret Intelligence, and gave the five Members an Opportunity of eſcaping before the King got to the Houſe.

He goes to demand them in the Houſe of Commons.

It was in the Afternoon when the King arriv'd at the Houſe of Commons, attended only by his own uſual Guard, and ſome few Gentlemen, who join'd themſelves in the Way; and commanding all his Attendants to wait at the Door, and give Offence to no Man; He, with his Nephew the Prince Elector, went into the Houſe, to the great Amazement of all, who ſeem'd ſtartled at his ſudden Preſence. Yet the Speaker aroſe and left the Chair to his Majeſty, who caſting his Eyes about, demanded Whether thoſe five Members were in the Houſe? to which he readily reply'd, That he had neither Eyes to ſee, nor Tongue to ſpeak any Thing but what he was commanded by the Houſe. Whereupon the King, ſitting down in the Chair, declar'd to them, That he was very ſorry for that Occaſion of coming to them; that yeſterday he had ſent his Serjeant to apprehend ſome who by his Command were accus'd of High-Treaſon, to which he expected Obedience, and not a Meſſage. Tho' no King cou'd be more careful to maintain their Privileges than Himſelf, yet in Caſes of Treaſon no Perſon had a Privilege; therefore he came to know, if any of the Perſons he had accus'd for no leſs Crime than Treaſon, were there, for he wou'd have them whereever he found them. Then caſting his Eyes again about the Houſe, he ſaid, He perceiv'd the Birds were all flown, but expected they ſhou'd be ſent to him, as ſoon as they return'd thither: Aſſuring them, Upon the Word of a King, that he never intended any Force, but wou'd proſecute them in a Legal Way; but if they were not ſent him, he wou'd take his own Courſe to find them. And thus he left them; but he was ſcarce gone out, when the whole Houſe was in an Uproar, many crying out Privilege! Privilege! ſo loud, that the King heard their Exclamations; and ſo forthwith adjourn'd till the next Day: At which Time they met with a great Heat and Rage, aggravated every Circumſtance of this unparallel'd Action, and peremptorily voted it ‘ A high Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, ‘ and inconſiſtent with the Liberty and Freedom thereof: ‘ And therefore conceiving they cou'd not, with Safety to ‘ their own Perſons, or Indemnity to the Rights of Par‘ liament, ſit there any longer, without a full Vindication ‘ of ſo high a Breach, and a ſufficient Guard they might ‘ confide in, for which both Houſes had in vain been hum‘ ble Suitors to his Majeſty; they order'd the Houſe ſhou'd ‘ be adjourn'd for ſeven Days, till the eleventh of this ‘ Month; and in the mean Time a Committee ſelected ‘ out of the Houſe to ſit in the City at Guild-Hall, to con‘ ſider of the important Affairs of the Kingdom; and that ‘ the Committee for the Iriſh Affairs ſhou'd ſit in the ſame

A Proclamation againſt the Members.

2. The King ſoon began to be ſtartled at this new Enterprize, but to ſhew ſome Steadineſs, the ſame Night a Proclamation was prepar'd to prevent the Perſons accus'd from flying out of the Kingdom, and to forbid all Perſons to receive or entertain them; when it was ſufficiently known they had all remov'd to their ſure Fortreſs the City: Not that they were afraid to venture themſelves in their own Lodgings, where they knew no Man wou'd have preſum'd to touch them, but that the City might ſee that they look'd on That as the Sanctuary of their Privileges, and ſo teach them to feel an early Concernment for them. Nor were they miſtaken in their Deſign; for notwithſtanding the Care and Vigilance of the Lord-Mayor, the City was all the Night in Arms, ſome deſign'd for that Employment running from one Gate to another, and crying out, The Cavaliers were coming to fire the City! and ſome adding, The King himſelf was at the Head of them. To allay theſe unfortunate Diſturbances, the Lord Digby, who had behav'd himſelf with as little Integrity as Wiſdom, prevail'd upon the King to go into the City next Morning, and at Guild-Hall to inform the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of the Grounds of his Proceedings. He further offer'd to go with a ſelect Company of Gentlemen, to the Houſe where the accus'd Perſons were lodg'd, and to bring them away alive, or leave them dead in the Place; but his Majeſty cou'd not approve of ſuch Enterprizes.

The King repairs to the City.

The next Morning the King, who was not ignorant of that Night's Tranſactions, ſent to the Lord-Mayor to call a Common-Council, and about Ten went himſelf to the Guild-Hall, attended only with three or four Lords, where he told the Corporation, 'He was very ſorry to hear 'they entertain'd ſuch Apprehenſions of Danger: That 'they might judge how much he rely'd upon their Affections for his Guard, he had brought none with him: 'That he had accus'd ſeveral Perſons of High-Treaſon, 'againſt whom he deſign'd to proceed in a Legal Way; 'and therefore preſum'd they wou'd not harbour them in 'the City:' And uſing other gracious Expreſſions concerning his Religion, and the Eſteem he had for them, and telling one of the Sheriffs, who was thought leſs devoted to him, that he wou'd dine with him, he departed without that chearful Applauſe, that might have been expected from this unuſual Favour. And as he paſs'd through the City the rude People flock'd together, crying out, Privilege of Parliament! Privilege of Parliament! and one Walker an Iron-monger cry'd out, To your Tents O Iſrael! and threw a Paper, with the ſame Words, into the King's own Coach. However the King, tho' much mortify'd, purſu'd his Reſolution, and having dined with the Sheriff, he return'd to Whitehall, and the next Day iſſu'd out the forementioned Proclamation for the Apprehenſion of the accus'd Members; and at the ſame Time the Articles of their Charge were printed and diſpers'd.

The City's Petition.

Notwithſtanding the Oppoſition of the Lord-Mayor, and the moſt ſubſtantial Aldermen, the Majority of the Common-Council prevail'd to ſend a Petition to the King in the Name of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London, which was deliver'd the Day after with great Solemnity at Whitehall. In which they complain'd 'Of the great Succeſs of the bloody Rebels in Ireland; the diſmiſſing of a Perſon of Honour 'and Truſt from being Lieutenant of the Tower; the fortifying Whitehall in an unaccuſtom'd Manner, and ſome 'Men there abuſing and wounding divers Citizens in their 'Paſſage; the Diſcovery of ſeveral Fireworks in the 'Hands of Papiſts, and the Miſunderſtanding between his 'Majeſty and his Parliament; but eſpecially his late going 'with an armed Force into the Houſe of Commons: All 'which tended not only to the Decay of all Trade, but to 'the Deſtruction of the Proteſtant Religion, and the Lives 'and Liberties of all his Subjects. Wherefore they pray'd 'his Majeſty to redreſs all theſe Grievances, and to reſtore the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members, according to the Privileges of Parliament.' The King found the Torrent too ſtrong for him to decline the Petition, therefore he attempted to divide and reduce them by a moſt gracious Accommodation to their affected Fears and Apprehenſions, and the ſame Day return'd them an Anſwer to every Particular of their Petition; all which, tho' uncommonly obliging and condeſcending, cou'd not mollify the Promoters, or bring them to a better Temper.

The Proceedings of the Parliament Committee in London.

3. In the mean Time the ſelect Committee, appointed by the Houſe of Commons, were buſily employ'd in the City, and were four Days in examining Witneſſes, and drawing up a Declaration againſt the King's late Attempt upon their Houſe. This Committee, which conſiſted of twenty five conſiderable Men, at their firſt Meeting found a Guard of ſubſtantial Citizens in Arms ready to attend them, and a Committee of the Common-Council to bid them Welcome into the City, and to aſſure them, 'That 'Care ſhould be taken to ſecure all their Members from 'Violence;' and further to acquaint them, 'That the 'Common-Council, in Contemplation of what they 'might ſtand in need of, had likewiſe nominated another 'Committee of Aldermen and Common-Council-Men, 'who ſhou'd meet at a proper Place, at thoſe Hours the 'Committee of the Houſe ſhou'd meet, that they might 'better know their Pleaſure, and take Care to ſee it obey'd.' Thus they had provided for a mutual Communication and Confederacy, before the Committee enter'd upon Buſineſs; in which they began with deſcanting upon the King's Way and Manner of coming to the Houſe, and all he did there. The ſeveral Members mention'd all they wou'd undertake to remember, of what the King ſaid, or did, upon his going to the Houſe, or his returning from it; others reported, what ſome of the Great Men, who waited upon his Majeſty, ſhou'd ſay, and gave every idle Word its Commentary; and none of the King's Servants, who had Orders to attend, had the Courage to refuſe the Summons, or anſwering the Queſtions put to them, tho' often impertinent and diſreſpectful to their Maſter. All ſuch Examinations as diſcover'd any extravagant Diſcourſe of any looſe Fellow, who accidentally threw himſelf into the Company, tho' he had no Relation to the King's Service, were diligently enter'd and publiſh'd; but ſuch as declar'd and prov'd the King's poſitive Command againſt any Force or Diſorder, and his ſtrict Charge to prohibit all from following him into the Houſe, were as cunningly ſuppreſs'd and conceal'd.

Their Declaration.

Having brought Things to the proper Height, and directed the Sheriffs of London to appoint a Guard for the Houſes when they ſhou'd ſit at Weſtminſter, the accus'd Members, who lodg'd all the Time in the City, were conducted in great State to the Committee, where they ſat, when the famous Declaration was compleated and agreed on by the Commons. In which they ſet forth a moſt formidable Narrative of the late Tranſaction, and among other Particulars, 'That his Majeſty came to the Houſe 'attended by a Multitude of armed Men in a Hoſtile 'Manner, to the great Terror and Diſturbance of all the 'ſitting Members: That upon full Examination it appear'd, ſeveral Soldiers, Papiſts and others, about five 'Hundred in Number, came with him to the Houſe, and 'that ſome of them with their Piſtols cock'd near the 'Door, ſaid, I am a good Marks-man, I can hit right; 'others ſaid, Pox take the Houſe of Commons, let 'em be 'hang'd! what ado is here with the Houſe of Commons? 'and others ſaid, A Pox of God confound them! and as the 'King return'd, they ſeem'd highly diſcontented, asking, 'When comes the WORD? That queſtionleſs, if the Word 'had been given, they wou'd have cut all the Throats of 'the Houſe of Commons. After which they declar'd it a 'traiterous Deſign againſt the King and Parliament, and 'call'd his Majeſty's Proclamation againſt the Members, 'a Paper falſe, ſcandalous and unlawful; and in Concluſion declar'd, they cou'd not have ſufficient Vindication, 'till his Majeſty ſhou'd declare the Names of thoſe who 'adviſ'd him to theſe Acts, that they might receive condign Puniſhment.' This ſtrange Declaration, ſo contrary to the known Rules of Law, and Practice of Parliament, was no ſooner fram'd by the Committee, than it was publiſh'd in Print throughout the City and Kingdom, before it was confirm'd by, or reported to the Houſe; to the Diſhonour of their Proceedings, but more to the Detriment of the King's Affairs at this Juncture.

Strange Tumults and Preparations in the City.

For nothing now was ſeen but Hurry and Tumult in the City, and nothing heard but Breach of Privilege, and Plots againſt the Parliament; the People running about in Multitudes, as if they had loſt their Senſes, as well as their Duties. Many began to cry out, That the King was not fit to live, and others, That the Prince wou'd govern better; ſo much had he loſt by the expoſing of his Dignity and Majeſty in the Houſe of Commons, and in the Guild-Hall. There was a wonderful Change in the Minds of all Sorts of People; all the former Noiſe of Plots and Conſpiracies, which had been often Matter of Ridicule, was now thought to be built upon good Grounds; and what hitherto had been only whiſper'd of Ireland, was now talk'd aloud, and publiſh'd in Print, with other ſeditious Libels and Pamphlets. The Shops of the City were generally ſhut up, and the People in all Places at a Gaze, as if they only waited for Directions, and were prepar'd for any Enterprize. But what gave the greateſt Terror to the Court was, the Preparations made in the City to conduct the accus'd Members in Triumph to the Parliament, and that the whole Militia ſhou'd attend them, while the Seamen and Mariners appear'd in the ſeveral Veſſels upon the Thames. To make all ſure, they ſent a little Army, with ſome Field-Pieces along with them, which paſſing by Land and by Water on each Side Whitehall, with a Noiſe hourly encreaſing, it was thought convenient to withdraw the Guard of Middleſex Train'd-Bands, and ſo the Paſſage became clear.

The King reſolves to retire.

This was interpreted at Court as the Beginning of a War, and the King being highly provok'd, took a Reſolution to retire with all his Family to Hampton-Court; for which he has been very much blam'd, and this has been reckon'd as one of the unfortunate Errors of his Life. Sir Richard Willis, then a brave Officer under him, has often among his Friends condemn'd this falſe Step, and declar'd it was the Opinion of all about the King, that he ought not to leave Whitehall at that Juncture. He further added, that when he was ready to remove, Mr. William Peirpoint, a famous Member of Parliament, afterwards very active againſt him, came to him, and fell upon his Knees, begg'd and intreated him not to ſtir at this Time, That if he went away, a Civil War muſt enſue, and that if he tarry'd, a little Patience wou'd bring all Things to a right State again. But the King finding the Indignities offer'd to his Family, wou'd not hearken to the Advice; but took a Method that threw him vaſtly backwards as to future Preparations; which if it does not vindicate his Policy, it ſerves to ſhew his Innocence as to any Warlike Deſigns at that Time. So much ſeems acknowledg'd by Roger Coke, when he tells us that the Lord-Mayor, with Sir George Whitmore, Sir Henry Garoway, and other loyal Citizens, waited upon his Majeſty, and engag'd to guard him with ten thouſand Men, if he wou'd ſtay; and told him, If he went, he wou'd leave the City open for the Members to do as they pleas'd, and that they were ſure to be firſt undone: The King told them, He was reſolv'd; to which Sir Henry Garoway ſorrowfully reply'd, Sir, I ſhall never ſee you again. The ſame Day, which was the tenth of January, the King, with all the Royal Family, retir'd to Hampton-Court, and never more ſaw his Palace of Whitehall, till he was brought as a Malefactor to ſuffer upon the Scaffold.

He leaves Whitehall.

Before his Departure he ſent to the Earls of Eſſex and Holland to attend him in his Journey, to which by their Domeſtick Offices they were particularly oblig'd. The Earl of Eſſex reſolv'd to go, and was preparing accordingly, when the Earl of Holland came privately, and aſſur'd him, That if they went, they ſhou'd be both murder'd at Hampton-Court: Upon which they left the King to his ſlender Retinue, in a more abandon'd Condition than ever they had known him, and in the greateſt Need of Comfort and Counſel; and inſtead of attending their Maſter in that Emergency, they went to the Committee then ſitting in the City, who knowing they had been invited to wait upon their Majeſties, receiv'd them with particular Satiſfaction. The Marqueſs of Hamilton, who had ſecur'd himſelf with the Parliament, ſtaid behind by the King's own Conſent, who particularly allow'd him To make uſe of all Means for his own Preſervation. So that the King in a few Days Time was fallen from a Height and Greatneſs that his Enemies fear'd, to a Lowneſs, that his own Servants durſt hardly avow their common Attendance; being left in a moſt diſconſolate and perplex'd Condition, agreeable enough with what Mr. Hampden had declar'd, when he was ask'd What farther they expected from the King? namely, That he ſhou'd commit Himſelf, and all that is His, to our Care. The manifeſt Weakneſs on the King's ſide, and the prevailing Power on the other, made it almoſt every Man's private Intereſt to forſake his Majeſty, and joyn with the Parliament: He had neither Arms, Mony nor Credit to withſtand a Torrent ſo rapid and ſwelling; therefore Nothing but a Senſe of Honour, Loyalty or Gratitude, or the Hardſhips he ſuſtain'd, cou'd have brought ſo many great Men to have joyn'd with him in the enſuing War: So true was Mr. Pym's bold Speech to the Earl of Dover, That if he look'd for Preferment, he muſt comply with them in their Ways, and not hope to have it by ſerving the King.

The King's low Condition.

VI. 1. From this Time there was a final Separation between the King and the Parliament, tho' a long Correſpondence was preſerv'd by Meſſages, Replies, &c. and from this Time we may reaſonably date the Levying War in England, for whatſoever was afterwards manag'd, was built upon the preſent Foundations. For on the next Day after the King's Departure, according to ſolemn Appointment, the accus'd Members, about two in the Afternoon, remov'd from their Lodgings in the City towards Weſtminſter, under the Guard of the Sheriffs Train'd-Bands of London and Weſtminſter, and attended by a tumultuous Conflux of many Thouſands of People, clamouring againſt Biſhops and Popiſh Lords, and for Privilege of Parliament! Some as they paſs'd by Whitehall crying with all Contempt, What is become of the King and his Cavaliers? The Soldiers carry'd upon the Top of their Pikes, or upon their Hats, the former Proteſtation of the Parliament, and many of them carry'd the printed Votes of the King's laſt Breach of their Privileges. At the ſame Time the Thames was guarded, from London-Bridge to Weſtminſter, with more than a Hundred Lighters and Long-Boats, laden with ſmall Pieces of Ordnance, and adorn'd with Colours and Streamers, as ready for an Engagement. Captain Skippon, who belong'd to the Artillery Garden, was by an unheard-of Commiſſion made Major-General of the City Militia; a Perſon who had ſerv'd long in Holland, and from a Common Soldier arriv'd to the Place of a Captain, and the Reputation of a good Officer; an illiterate Man, who had been bred long enough abroad to bring home a Diſaffection to the Church and State, tho' otherwiſe a Man of Order and Sobriety, and generally free from the Vices incident to Camps and Armies. Having conducted the accus'd Members to the Houſe of Commons, they there immediately extoll'd the Kindneſs they met with in the City, and their Zeal to the Parliament, and proceeded to declare It became the Honour of the Parliament to protect and defend them. Upon which the Sheriffs were call'd in, and told by the Speaker, after he had given them the Thanks of the Houſe, 'That they ſhou'd have an Ordinance of Parliament for their Indemnity, declaring that they had done nothing upon this Occaſion, but what was legal and juſtifiable.' Then the Maſters and Officers of Ships were call'd in, and receiv'd moſt hearty Thanks for their Kindneſs; and Captain Skippon was appointed to attend with ſuch a Guard as he thought ſufficient every Day at Weſtminſter.

The Buckinghamſhire Petition.

The next Day, ſeveral Knights, Gentlemen and Freeholders of the County of Buckingham, to the Number of four or five thouſand, came to London, riding every one with a printed Proteſtation upon his Hat, and preſented a Petition to the Houſe of Commons, 'in which they complain'd of the late Breach of Privilege, by the King's going to the Houſe, and came to tender their Service, being firmly reſolv'd to live by them, or die at their Feet.' The Houſe return'd their particular Thanks, and let them know, 'The Parliament was ſufficiently ſecur'd by the great Care of the City, and therefore they might return home till further Occaſion requir'd them, of which they ſhou'd have timely Notice.' One of them ſaid, 'They had another Petition, which they deſign'd to prefer to the King, but deſir'd to be advis'd, whether that Houſe wou'd vouchſafe to recommend it, or whether they ſhou'd deliver it themſelves.' For this they receiv'd freſh Thanks, and were advis'd, 'That ſix or eight of them ſhou'd preſent it to his Majeſty in the Name of the reſt; for the Houſe was ſo ſenſible of their Diſcretion, that they knew they were able to manage ſuch a Buſineſs.' Having met with this Reception, they preſented another Petition to the Lords, much to the ſame Effect, but further pray'd their Lorſhips to co-operate with the Commons in the great Work of Reformation, &c. And having met with no leſs Civility than from the Commons, they repair'd with their Petition to the King, in which they declar'd themſelves 'amaz'd, that Mr. Hampden, their own Repreſentative, ſhou'd among others be accus'd of High-Treaſon; which through their Sides was a wounding the Judgment and Care of thoſe who had made Choice of theſe Members,

The poor King was peſter'd with this, and the like Petitions from other Places, which were daily diſpers'd, to the further Encreaſe of the preſent Diſturbances; which caus'd the King within two or three Days to remove from Hampton-Court to Windſor-Caſtle, where he was leſs expos'd to any ſudden popular Attempt. And finding his laſt Action to have made ſo ſtrange an Impreſſion, he by two ſeveral Meſſages to the Parliament declar'd 'That he wou'd wave his Proceedings againſt the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members, and be as careful of their Privileges, as of his own Life or Crown; and to put an End to all Diſputes, he afterwards offer'd a general Pardon.' But all his gracious Offers met with no Succeſs: For, the Members being now plac'd upon their Throne, they firſt provided and declar'd, 'No Member of Parliament ſhou'd be arreſted upon any Pretence whatſoever;' and, contrary to their former Declaration in the Caſe of Sir George Ratliff, added, 'That even in Caſe of Treaſon, no Member ought or cou'd be proceeded againſt, without firſt informing the Houſe of the Charge and Evidence againſt him, and receiving their Leave and Direction in it.' And that Men might be more cautious for the future how they were concern'd in bringing any Reproach upon them, they appointed a Committee to frame a Charge againſt the Attorney-General Herbert, for preſuming to accuſe any under their Protection; which was prepar'd accordingly, and proſecuted with that Vigour, that in a little Time they got a Sentence from the Lords to diſable him from being Member, Aſſiſtant or Pleader in either Houſe, and to commit him to Priſon during the Pleaſure of the two Houſes.

A falſe Alarm.

2. About two or three Days after the King had left Whitehall, the Parliament and City were alarm'd with new Dangers from Kingſtone near Hampton-Court; where it it was reported that many Papiſts, and deſperate Officers were gather'd to ſeize the County Magazine, under the Command of the Lord Digby, then found to be a Papiſt, and Colonel Lundsford, who was ſaid to be of ſo monſtrous an Appetite, That he wou'd eat Children. Theſe were ſaid to appear with Troops of Horſe in a Warlike Manner, to the Terror of the King's Subjects; and it was given out, that they deſign'd for Portſmouth. Of all which there was no other Foundation than the Lodgment of ſome disbanded Officers at Kingſtone, whither the Lord Digby, accompany'd with Colonel Lundsford, went in a Coach and ſix Horſes to give them a Viſit. Theſe ſix were all the Horſe that appear'd there; yet this ſerv'd to encreaſe the preſent Fears and Jealouſies, and immediately the Commons order'd 'That the Train'd-Bands of Suſſex and Hampſhire ſhou'd be ſent to ſuppreſs the ſaid Forces, and to prevent the carrying of Arms or Ammunition to Portſmouth. And to make the greater Noiſe, they ſeiz'd upon Colonel Lundsford, and ſent him to the Tower; and accus'd the Lord Digby of High-Treaſon in the Houſe of Peers, for levying War againſt the King and Parliament. But being ſenſible of their Rage and Hatred, he fled beyond Sea.

The Commons accuſe the Lord Digby.

Their Power.

They ſecure Portſmouth and Hull.

Arm'd with theſe popular Pretences, both Houſes being now in Union, they in one Day executed three Acts of Sovereignty, of as high a Nature as any they attempted before the War: The firſt in commanding the Sheriffs of London, ſupported by their new Major-General Skippon, to guard or rather beſiege the Tower of London, and prevent the going in of any Proviſions, and the going out of any Arms or Ammunition. The ſecond, in ordering the Governor of Portſmouth to admit no Man into the Town or Fort, or any thing to be diſpos'd of there, without an Order from the King ſignify'd by both Houſes of Parliament. The third, in diſpoſing of the Government of the Town of Hull, which they did upon this Occaſion: When the late Army was disbanded in the North, the King order'd the Artillery, Arms, and Ammunition belonging to it, ſhou'd be remov'd to Hull, where they were ſtill kept; and his Majeſty deſign'd it ſhou'd remain there as a Magazine upon all Exigencies, having ſent the Earl of Newcaſtle thither with a private Commiſſion to the Governor, to engage by his own Intereſt ſuch of the Country as were neceſſary to ſecure the Magazine. But whatever the King did, tho' it were never ſo privately tranſacted, was ſoon diſcover'd to thoſe, from whom it ſhou'd moſt have been conceal'd. So finding a Pretence of calling the Earl away to the Houſe of Peers, both Houſes mov'd the King 'to have the Magazine remov'd from Hull to the Tower of London; ſince the Country apprehended ſome Deſign in keeping ſo much Ammunition in the Northern Parts.' But not receiving a ſpeedy Anſwer from the King, they now ſent down one of their own Members, Sir John Hotham, whoſe Eſtate lay not far from the Place, to be Governor of Hull, and to draw in ſuch of the Country as he thought fit for the Turn. But becauſe Sir John was not abſolutely devoted to the prevailing Party, they ſent his Son, likewiſe a Member of the Houſe, in whom they more confided, to be an Aſſiſtant to, or rather a Spy upon his Father. The young Gentleman immediately expreſs'd his Zeal for the Service in a ſhort preſaging Speech to the Speaker, crying out, Fall Back! fall Edge! I will go down, and perform your Commands.

They appoint a Committee in Grocers-Hall.

Theſe were the firſt Tryals they made of their Sovereignty over the Militia and the Forts of the Nation, while their main Bill was yet in Agitation, and was a clear Indication of what they deſign'd to do, when it ſhou'd be paſs'd; which they haſtned with all Expedition, every Day exerciſing the King's Patience with ſome diſagreeable Meſſage, concerning their Privileges, requiring Vindication and Reparation, and the Names of thoſe Perſons, who had encourag'd the late Proſecution. Yet ſtill ſome Mens Minds began to relent, and to abate of their unnatural Fervour; therefore to preſerve the common Apprehenſion of Danger, and keep warm the Eſteem their Darling the City had for them, they propos'd to adjourn both Houſes into the City of London; but finding that to be ſomething dangerous, they thought it ſufficient to adjourn their Houſes for ſome Days, and to appoint Committees, arm'd with greater Power than the Houſes themſelves, to meet in the City; which, for the Conveniency of the Common-Council, took their Places in Grocers-Hall. The Advantage they reap'd by this Removal from their more convenient Seats at Weſtminſter was exceeding great; for beſides the Fears they had infus'd, and the Obligations they had laid upon their City Friends by being among them, they were generally ſure of having ſuch a Committee as they deſir'd: For as ſome out of Supineneſs or Indignation wou'd forbear their Attendance in ſo inconvenient a Place, ſo a great many, who often embarraſs'd their Counſels, were deter'd from appearing, out of Fear of indecent Affronts, if not of Danger, their Names being publiſh'd to the tumultuous Rabble, as diſaffected Perſons, and by that Means call'd The Malignant Party. And further they found that in ſuch a Committee they cou'd diſpatch their Deſigns with greater Secrecy and Expedition, than in either Houſe of Parliament, where ſometimes they met with unforeſeen Obſtructions.

The Fears of the City.

Here they conſulted with their moſt inward Friends, and form'd new Remonſtrances, and many Embryos, which afterwards were brought to their full Birth; and here they found the beſt Means to increaſe the Fears and Terrors of the common People, which were now blown up and heighten'd to a Degree ſcarce to be believ'd by Poſterity. Indeed almoſt every extravagant Story began to be receiv'd as Truth; and all Mens Heads began to be intoxicated, and their Mouths fill'd with the Sounds of Plots, Conſpiracies, and unaccountable Projects. Sometimes, when the People were in their Retirement at Divine Worſhip, they were diſtracted and frighted from it with Alarms, 'That the Papiſts were all up in Arms, and were juſt ready to fire their Houſes, and mix their Blood with their Prayers.' Other Times they were told 'That there were Forces kept in Grotts and Caves under Ground, and wou'd in the Night break out into the midſt of the City, and cut all their Throats:' And what was more Prodigious, and tho' extream ridiculous, yet had not a few Believers among the Rabble, 'That there were deep Deſigns by Gun-Powder to blow up the Thames, and choak them with the Water in their Beds.' Thus were the People taught to diſreſpect and hate their Prince, and by bloody News from every Quarter inſtructed and inured to that Cruelty they vainly fear'd, and to adore thoſe by whoſe Counſels they were deliver'd from ſuch unexpected Dangers.

The King's Meſſage to both Houſes.

3. In the mean time the King continu'd at Windſor, waiting the Iſſue of this Storm; and finding his former Meſſages diſregarded, the Houſes united, and the Scotch Commiſſioners drawn in, under the Pretence of a Mediation, to joyn with them, he reſolv'd to ſend ſuch a Meſſage to both Houſes, as might at leaſt divide thoſe who wiſh'd well to the Publick from the Miniſters of Confuſion: And therefore on the 20th of January, by a written Meſſage propos'd to them, 'That for the preventing thoſe manifold Diſtractions in the Kingdom, they wou'd ſpeedily take into Conſideration whatever they held neceſſary, as well for the Support of the Regal Authority and Settlement of the Revenue, as the preſent and future Eſtabliſhment of their Privileges, Eſtates, and Liberties, the Safety of the true Religion now profeſs'd in the Church of England, and the ordinary Ceremonies, in ſuch a Manner as might leave room for no juſt Offence: Which, when they had ſo form'd into one entire Body, ſuch as He and They might be better able to judge of them, He wou'd then make it appear, What ſmall Grounds ſome Perſons had for the Jealouſies they ſeem'd to apprehend, and how ready he wou'd be, not only to equal, but to exceed the moſt indulgent Princes in their Acts of Grace and Favour to their People: So that if theſe preſent Diſtractions did not by the Bleſſing of God end in a happy Accommodation, He wou'd then be ready to call Heaven and Earth, God and Man to Witneſs, that he had not fail'd on his Part.

The Houſes divided.

The Lords receiv'd the Meſſage with great Signs of Joy, and deſir'd the Commons to join with them in returning their Thanks to his Majeſty for his Gracious Offers, and to aſſure him; 'They wou'd immediately conſider what he had propos'd.' This occaſion'd a Diviſion between the Houſes; for beſides the Commons inſiſting upon Reparation for their accus'd Members, when they drew up an Addreſs of Thanks, they particularly deſir'd, 'That to warrant their Confidence, and remove their Jealouſies, that they might ſatisfy his Majeſty in the Method he propos'd, he wou'd immediately commit the Tower to the Government of ſuch as they ſhou'd recommend to him.' In this the Lords differ'd from them, as well becauſe the Naming a Governor there was the King's peculiar Right, as that it was already in the Hands of Sir John Byron, a Perſon of as fair a Reputation in every Reſpect, as any Gentleman in the Kingdom. The Commons were highly concern'd that the Lords had once more the Courage to diſſent from them, therefore reſolv'd to preſs the King upon their own Account; in order to which they once more muſter'd up their Friends in the City, and by their Emiſſaries taught the People a new Language.

The Commons promote new Petitions.

All Petitions now muſt require 'The Kingdom to be put into a Poſture of Defence, as the only Security againſt the many Plots and Conſpiracies on Foot, and Protection

'againſt their own Fears and Jealouſies.' Theſe began ſoon to ſwarm from all Quarters; the Eſſex Men pray in their Petition, 'That the Tower of London may be committed to ſafe Hands, the Train'd-Bands truſted with approv'd Perſons, and the Privilege of Parliaments aſſerted.' That from Colcheſter declar'd 'againſt Biſhops, 'and for Liberty of Conſcience, deſiring Church Diſcipline to be better eſtabliſh'd, and their Town better fortify'd.' More came from Devonſhire, Somerſetſhire, Middleſex and Hartfordſhire, 'For putting the Kingdom into 'a Poſture of Defence, and the Forts into ſafe Hands, 'excluding Biſhops, Popiſh Lords, &c. And another came in the Name of the Merchants that carry'd Bullion to the Mint, alledging. 'They durſt not carry their Bullion to the Tower, as uſual, being unſatisfy'd with the 'preſent Lieutenant, therefore deſir'd he might be remov'd.

The London Petition.

But that which prov'd moſt ſerviceable to the Commons, was the Petition of the Corporation of London, who having been deſir'd to lend them a Hundred Thouſand Pounds againſt the Iriſh Rebels, declar'd, 'They cou'd not oblige 'the Houſe, by reaſon of the many Obſtructions at preſent; The Bill for preſſing Soldiers for that Service, was 'ſtill depending with the Lords; the Cinque-Ports were 'not put into ſafe Hands; the Kingdom not put into a Poſture of Defence; the Lieutenant of the Tower not remov'd; Privileges of Parliament not vindicated; Delinquents not puniſh'd; and the Biſhops and Popiſh Lords 'not put out of the Houſe of Peers: Therefore in Concluſion they proteſted before God and the High Court of 'Parliament, that if any further Calamity befel their Dear 'Brethren in Ireland, it ought not to be charg'd to them, 'but to ſuch as obſtructed the ſpeedy Cure of the foremention'd Evils.' This and ſeveral other Petitions were concluded to be us'd as full Materials for a Conference with the Lords, who were thereby to be reminded of their Duty. This was left to the Management of Mr. Pym, who for his Greatneſs began to be call'd King Pym, who after he had read the Petitions of their Lordſhips; he made a famous long Speech, declaring. 'That in them they 'might hear the Voice, or rather the Cry of all England, 'the Groans and miſerable Complaints of all; for the Agony, Terror and Perplexity in which the Kingdom labour'd, was Univerſal, all Parts affected with it.' After a formidable Enumeration of all the Evils of the Nation, and the Obſtructions which the Commons had faithfully endeavour'd to remove, he concluded with a Declaration, 'That the Commons wou'd be glad to ſave the 'Kingdom with their Help and Concurrence; but if their 'Lordſhips ſhou'd fail, it ſhou'd not hinder them from doing their Duty: And whatever became of the Kingdom, 'they ſhou'd be ſorry that Poſterity, in reading the Hiſtory 'of this preſent Parliament, ſhou'd find the Commons 'were enforc'd to ſave the Kingdom ALONE; and that 'the Peers declin'd any Part in the Honour of it, tho' they 'were ſo highly concern'd, in reſpect of their great Eſtates, 'and eminent Degrees of Nobility.' The Conference being ended, the Speaker return'd Mr. Pym the Solemn Thanks of the Houſe, for ſo worthily performing his Service, requiring him to print his Speech; which was accordingly done, that the People might know, beſides thoſe Reproaches upon the King, how backwards and negligent the Lords were of their Welfare and Safety.

Mr Pym's Speech.

The Commons Petition for the Militia, &c.

The very next Day, January 26, the Commons, without the Lords Concurrence, petition'd the King in their own Name; and after a Return of moſt humble Thanks for his Majeſty's late gracious Meſſage, they ſaid, 'They had deſir'd the Peers to joyn with them in a humble Requeſt to 'his Majeſty, to commit the Tower, and other Principal 'Forts of the Kingdom, into the Hands of ſuch as ſhou'd 'be recommended to him by both Houſes, wherein their 'Lordſhips had refus'd to joyn with them. But ſtill they, 'confiding in his Majeſty's Goodneſs to his People, in all 'Humility beſeech'd him, that the Tower, and other Principal Forts, and all the Militia of the Kingdom, might be 'entruſted in the Hands of ſuch as the Commons ſhou'd 'recommend to him; not doubting a ſpeedy and gracious 'Anſwer to that humble Requeſt, without which the diſtracting Fears of the Kingdom muſt, in all Probability, 'overwhelm it in Miſery and Ruin.' The King without any Diſcompoſure ſent them a ſoft Anſwer, in which he aſſur'd them, 'That tho' the Nomination of thoſe, to 'whom the Cuſtody of the Forts and Caſtles were to be 'committed, was an inſeparable Flower of the Crown; 'yet he wou'd leave them to the Juſtice of his Parliament, 'if through Miſinformation, he had conferr'd ſuch a Truſt 'upon any undeſerving Perſon: And that when any particular Courſe for Ordering the Militia ſhou'd be digeſted 'by his Parliament, and propos'd to him, he wou'd return 'ſuch an Anſwer as ſhou'd be agreeable to his Honour, 'and the Safety of his People; conjuring them not to be 'tranſported with cauſeleſs Fears and Jealouſies.

The King's Anſwer.

Tho' in their Reply the next Day, They acknowledg'd it 'An inſeparable Flower of the Crown to diſpoſe the 'Command of the Forts and Caſtles of the Kingdom, and 'that the Militia by Law was ſubject to no Command but 'the King's Authority;' yet being ſo deeply involv'd, they reſolv'd to ſet up their Reſt upon that Stake, and to go through with it, or periſh in the Attempt. And firſt they inſulted the Lords, who ſtill diſſented from them in two other Bills beſides the Militia, that for preſſing Soldiers for Ireland, and that for taking away the Biſhops Votes in Parliament; and taking an Advantage from an inconſiderate Expreſſion of the Duke of Richmond's in the upper Houſe, they aſſum'd an Authority to queſtion him, and all that vindicated him. And now having driven ſo many Lords, beſides the Biſhops, from the Houſe, and in a great Meaſure taught the reſt how to behave themſelves, they once more reſolv'd to make uſe of their old Friends in the City; who now, under a new and more allow'd Stile of Petitioners, flock'd in vaſt Numbers to Weſtminſter, and deliver'd two notable Petitions to the Houſe of Commons, one from the Porters, fifteen Thouſand as they ſaid in Number, and the other in the Name of many Thouſands of Poor People, in and about the City of London. The Porters with great Eloquence exclaim'd againſt 'The Prevalence of an adverſe, malignant, blood-ſucking, rebellious 'Party, who inſulted the Privileges of Parliament, and fomented the Iriſh Rebellion; which if not puniſh'd, they 'ſhou'd be forc'd to Extremities not fit to be nam'd, and 'make good the Saying, That Neceſſity has no Law: They 'had nothing to loſe but their Lives, which they wou'd 'willingly expoſe, in defence of the Houſe of Commons, 'according to the Proteſtation.' The Beggars declar'd, 'That their Oppreſſions were ſo great, by means of the 'Biſhops and Popiſh Lords, that they knew not where to 'get Bread; Want and Neceſſity, breaking the Bounds of 'Modeſty, wou'd force them to lay hold on the next Remedy to remove the Diſturbers of the Peace, and the 'Hinderers of the happy Proceedings, who ought to be 'publickly laid open to the World: And they cry'd out 'for the Lord's Sake to be heard, that their Religion, Lives 'and Welfare might be precious in their Sight, that the 'Loins of the Poor might bleſs Them.

Two ſtrange Petitions to the Parliament.

The Houſe, according to its uſual Condeſcenſion, order'd Thanks to be return'd by the Speaker to theſe ſtrange Petitioners, aſſuring them, 'They had then their very 'Complaints under Conſideration:' To whom ſome of the Rabble reply'd, according as they had been taught, 'That they never doubted the Houſe of Commons, but 'they heard all ſtuck in the Lords Houſe, and they deſir'd 'to know the Names of thoſe Peers, who hinder'd the 'Agreement between the good Lords and Commons;' Which they preſs'd with unheard-of Inſolence, and were prevail'd upon to withdraw with much ſeeming Unwillingneſs, while the Houſe took the Buſineſs into a further Conſideration. And tho' many of the Members, of whom ſome had been inſulted by theſe Petitioners at their coming to the Houſe, inſiſted, 'That it wou'd be a great Blemiſh 'to their Counſels, if they were encourag'd in ſuch licentious Proceedings;' They were again call'd in, and told, 'That the Houſe of Commons wou'd perſiſt, as they had 'begun, in endeavouring to relieve them; and did not 'doubt, when they deliver'd their Petition to the Lords, 'which they were going to do, but the Cauſes of thoſe 'Evils wou'd be diſcover'd, and ſome ſpeedy Means taken 'for Redreſs; therefore adviſ'd them patiently to expect a 'further Anſwer.' Accordingly the Petition, after a ſolemn Reading, was deliver'd to the Lords at a Conference; which being ended, Mr. Hollis was ſent to the Lords to deſire them to joyn with the Commons in their Requeſt to the King concerning the Militia, and boldly added, If that Deſire was not comply'd withal, he wiſh'd thoſe Lords, who were ready to concur, wou'd diſtinguiſh themſelves, that thoſe, by whom they were ſent, might know who were againſt them. Upon which the Lords reſum'd the Debate, which the Earl of Northumberland open'd with a Profeſſion, That whoſoever refus'd to joyn with the Commons in that Particular, were, in his Opinion, Enemies to the Common-wealth; tho' the major part of the Houſe had deny'd twice before to joyn with it. Yet when his Lordſhip was queſtion'd for that Unparliamentary Language, all the Party adhered to him, crying out, They were of the ſame Opinion! The Mob were waiting at the Door to put in Execution whatever they were directed: So that many of the Lords, out of a generous Indignation to ſee their Honours and Liberties proſtituted by Themſelves to the People, and others afraid at this Time to perſiſt in their former Reſolutions, withdrew; and the major Part of the reſt concluded to joyn with the Commons in their Requeſt concerning the Militia.

The Inſolence of the Multitude.

The Lords forc'd into a Compliance with the Commons.

Thus the Houſe of Lords fatally ſubmitted to the Commons; and in Conſequence of it, by means of a new Petition from Surrey, within a few Days after they condeſcended to paſs the two Bills, which had lain ſo long deſperate

They joyn in two main Bills.

ſperate while they ſat with Freedom in the Houſe; that for Preſſing Men for Ireland, and that for taking away the Biſhops Votes in Parliament. By this laſt Bill they did, according to their Power, deſtroy one of the three Eſtates of the Kingdom, and in Effect became their own Murderers; for by weakening their own Vitals, and narrowing their very Foundation, they gave the Commons an Occaſion afterwards of treating their whole Body in the ſame manner, to the Ruin of them and the Monarchy of England. Which Conſequence might have been foreſeen, had they hearkned to the Marqueſs of Dorcheſter, who upon this Occaſion ſolemnly ask'd the Peers in the Houſe, Which of your Lordſhips can ſay, he ſhall continue a Member of this Houſe, when at one Blow ſix and twenty Members are cut off? The Parliament having accompliſh'd theſe great Things, both Houſes adjourn'd into the City of London, to lay the Scene for new Action; and thus concluded the tumultuous and buſie Month of January, in a Year that is ſtill remember'd by Way of Proverb and Diſhonour.

The King's new Deſigns.

VII. 1. The two Houſes being now united by the Conceſſions and Submiſſion of the Peers, the King found himſelf under exceeding great Difficulties how to proceed: He plainly perceiv'd that the Leaders wou'd accept of no reaſonable Compoſition, but were gradually ſtealing ſo much Power into their own Hands, as not to fear what was remaining in his; and that they had got the Art of impoſing upon Mens Underſtandings againſt their own Reaſons, by perſuading them they were in Danger of an Invaſion, when the King was not only in Peace Himſelf, but moſt other Nations ſo engag'd in War, as to deſire his Amity and Aſſiſtance; and That there was a Deadneſs of Trade, and a growing Poverty throughout the Kingdom, when the like Plenty and Trade had never been known. He reſolv'd therefore to reſide at a greater Diſtance from London, and poſitively to deny the paſſing any Act, except what related to Ireland, till he had a full Proſpect of what they deſign'd to demand, and what Return they wou'd make for all his Conceſſions. The Truth is, when the King perceiv'd his ill Succeſs in the Caſe of the five Members, and that the Petitioners were no better than an Army, govern'd by thoſe he had no Reaſon to truſt; and that all who expreſs'd any Zeal for his Service wou'd be remov'd from him, under the Notion of Delinquents, he reſolv'd the Queen ſhou'd remove to Portſmouth, and Himſelf to Hull; that being ſecured in thoſe Places of Strength, where his Friends might alſo meet with Protection, he would ſit quiet, till the furious Party cou'd be brought to Reaſon. But both Bed-chambers being inhabited by diligent Spies, this important Secret was diſcover'd to thoſe who obtain'd the Orders before-mention'd, concerning Hull and Portſmouth; for which Reaſon, and a Promiſe from ſeveral Lords, That they wou'd vigorouſly unite to ſupport the Regal Power, together with the extream Fear the Queen had of Danger, particularly of being impeach'd of High-Treaſon, as ſhe was inform'd, that Counſel was laid aſide; and it was concluded, 'That the Queen ſhou'd tranſport her 'ſelf into Holland, with the Princeſs Mary, marry'd to the 'young Prince of Orange, there patiently to expect an Amendment of the Affairs in England; and the King retire 'to York, and liſten to no Particulars, till he found how 'far the Alterations wou'd extend.' But they only publiſh'd the firſt Reſolution relating to the Queen; both their Majeſties being under ſuch preſſing Wants, that the Queen was forc'd to ſell or coin her private Plate for her neceſſary Expences, the Exchequer being empty, or the Miniſters of the Revenue without Power, for the Officers were enjoyn'd by the Commons to pay no Mony without their Conſent.

Both Houſes Petition for the Militia, &c.

The King's Anſwer.

In the midſt of theſe miſerable Difficulties the King at Windſor was encounter'd with two Petitions from the united Houſes of Parliament; the Firſt; the ſame in Effect with what the Commons had lately ſent, 'For his delivering up the Tower, with all the Forts and Militia of England into their Hands;' and the Second, 'in two Days, 'to produce what Proof there was againſt the accus'd 'Members.' He now found that theſe Members were too Powerful for Him, or the Law, and therefore he reſolv'd to think no more of Them, but agreeable to his former Condeſcenſions, now declar'd, 'He wou'd wholly decline any Proſecution of them.' The other, concerning the Militia, gave him greater Trouble; for tho' he was poſitive never to conſent to it, yet till all Things were prepar'd for the Queen's Journey, and his own Removal, he choſe rather to delay than deny it, expecting alſo, that tho' they were united in the Matter, they might be divided as to the Perſons to be truſted; and therefore he told them in his Anſwer, 'When he knew the Extent of the Power deſign'd for thoſe who were to command the Militia, and 'how long He himſelf muſt execute no Power without 'the Advice of the Parliament, then he wou'd put ſuch 'Perſons as both Houſes ſhou'd recommend to him, into 'the Forts, and over the Militia; provided they nam'd 'none againſt whom he had juſt and unanſwerable Exceptions.

The King yields up the Tower.

With this Anſwer, tho' it was no real Conſent, they were highly encourag'd, ſince it ſerv'd to unite the Minds of the Vulgar to them, who ſtruck in with their Proceedings juſt as they ſaw their Undertakings were like to prevail. And that they might preſerve and keep up the King's Inclinations to gratify them, the ſame Day they return'd a Meſſage of Thanks, and deſir'd his Majeſty in the mean time to make Sir John Coniers Lieutenant of the Tower, whom they repreſented as a Perſon of great Merit: Which being likewiſe deſir'd by Sir John Byron, who had been forc'd to ſubmit to ſuch Reproaches as were very uneaſie to a generous Mind, having been brought upon his Knees at the Bar of both Houſes as a Delinquent, his Majeſty thereupon comply'd. This was ſuch an Inſtance of his yielding upon Importunity, that from that Time they look'd upon themſelves as poſſeſs'd of the whole Militia of the Kingdom. The parting with a Place of that Importance has been thought a very falſe Step in the King, or at leaſt a plain Proof that at this Time he had no Thoughts of a War: Which is agreeable with what the old Earl of Briſtol declares in his famous Apology, 'That nothing ſo 'much terrify'd his Conſcience from taking Arms againſt 'the King, or more confirm'd him in his Duty of adhering 'to him, than the certain and infallible Knowledge he had 'of the King's unfeign'd Deſires and Endeavours to have 'prevented the War:' An Authority that will ſtand good againſt a thouſand Opinions and Conjectures.

The King demands Reparation againſt Mr. Pym.

But in vain.

2. While all Care was taken to forward the Queen's Journey, the King, who had receiv'd ſo many Expoſtulations from the Commons, reſolv'd in his Turn to expoſtulate with them, and try what Reparation they were inclined to give him, who had exacted ſo much from him. All the ſubtle Arts had been us'd to charge the Progreſs of the Iriſh Rebellion upon the Court; and indeed his Majeſty was ſo nearly touch'd with theſe odious Imputations, which had pernicious Effects upon the Minds of the People, that he was forc'd to comply with many Things contrary to his Judgment, to obviate greater Inconveniencies, which he ſaw riſing againſt him by thoſe ſcandalous Suggeſtions. Notwithſtanding which, they took all Occaſions to charge him with whatever Omiſſions were found in that great Work; as Mr. Pym had more particularly done in his famous Speech formerly mention'd at the Conference with the Lords; where he ſaid, That ſince the Stop put upon the Ports againſt all Iriſh Papiſts, many of the chief Commanders, now at the Head of the Rebels, had been ſuffer'd to paſs by his Majeſty's immediate Warrant. Of this the King took no Notice, to avoid Breach of Privilege, till he ſaw the whole Speech printed by the Order of the Commons; upon which, in a Letter to the Speaker, he deſir'd Reparation for this unjuſt Aſperſion. To which they were ſo far from ſubmitting, that in their Reply they declar'd 'It contain'd nothing but what was agreeable to the 'Senſe of the Houſe,' and nam'd ſome Perſons that had obtain'd Paſſes before the Order of Reſtraint, and were yet remaining in England. Upon which the King ſent another Meſſage, in which he expreſly declar'd, 'That none 'of thoſe, who headed the Rebels, had paſs'd by his Warrant or Conſent, and expected in common Juſtice that 'they ſhou'd name the very Perſons, or acknowledge their 'Miſinformation.' But notwithſtanding this, and whatever cou'd be urg'd, they were ſo averſe to any Acknowledgment, that when they found the King ſtill inſiſted on his Demands, and that many thought it his Due, they confidently ſet forth another Declaration of ſeveral Perſons Names, who they ſaid had paſs'd by the King's own Licence, and were then at the Head of the Rebels; of whoſe Names the King had never heard before, to whom no Paſſes had been granted, neither did he believe there were ſuch Men in Nature; and left the People to believe as they found themſelves influeuc'd by his Majeſty's poſitive Denial, or their own peremptory Affirmation.

Lectures ſet up.

All noble and generous Minds were ſtrangely mov'd with theſe Proceedings of the Parliament, whoſe Leaders were now become implacable, and were reſolv'd to remove all thoſe who oppos'd any Thing they had deſir'd, or fill'd up a Place they deſign'd for ſome other in whom they cou'd confide. Their Ends being fix'd and reſolv'd on, ſcarce any Means or Methods were left untry'd; and to warm the Zeal of the People, they appointed weekly Lectures to be generally ſet up, which were perform'd by the moſt ſeditious and turbulent Preachers that cou'd be found; which ſtill produc'd more Petitions againſt Biſhops, Popiſh Lords, and all that they thought fit to call Malignants. But for thoſe Petitions that were on the other Side, that pray'd for the Preſervation and Security of Epiſcopacy and the Regal Prerogative, they were not only diſcountenanc'd and rejected, but the Promoters oftentimes ſent for as Delinquents; linquents; by which Means an infinite Number of Hands was ſilenc'd, and fell to nothing. And this became their uſual Method, receiving and cheriſhing all mutinous and unheard-of Petitions, and ſtifling ſuch as beſought the Continuance and Vindication of the ſo long celebrated Government in Church and State, the prime Leaders not being aſham'd in publick Debates to aver, That no Man ought to petition for the Government eſtabliſh'd by Law, becauſe he already had his Wiſh; but they that deſir'd an Alteration, cou'd not otherwiſe make known their Deſires; therefore were to be countenanc'd. And becauſe the Houſe of Lords ſometimes cou'd not comply with their exorbitant Steps and Reſolutions, they began to make new Diſtinctions between the Major and the Melior Part of the Houſe; and Mr. Pym himſelf made a Motion, That the Major Part of the Houſe of Commons, and the Minor of the Lords, might be eſteem'd as an Authentick Concurrence of both Houſes; as Sir P. Warwick tells us.

Reaſons for paſſing the Bill againſt Biſhops Votes.

Arm'd with theſe two-edg'd Weapons they puſh'd forwards the Bill againſt the Biſhops Votes, which incapacitated them, and all the Clergy, from holding any Temporal Juriſdiction or Office whatſoever. The King being preſs'd for his immediate Conſent, he return'd Anſwer, ‘It was a weighty Matter, and deſerv'd a little Conſideration.’ But their Zeal wou'd admit of no Delay, therefore the ſame Day they ſent again, and gave him their Reaſons for his preſent Compliance: One of which was, ‘The Grievances the Subjects labour'd under by the Biſhops Temporal Juriſdiction, and their Intereſt in the Houſe of Lords:’ A ſecond, ‘The happy and ſatisfactory Concurrence of both Houſes in their Abſence:’ A third, ‘That in paſſing this Bill, his Majeſty wou'd give them a comfortable Pledge of his gracious Condeſcenſion to the Remedies of thoſe Evils, which wou'd be offer'd to him, when this was paſs'd.’ Reaſons ſufficient to have convinc'd him, if he had been inclinable to concur with them: For in effect it was to perſwade him to agree with them in this, that for the future he might be able to deny them nothing. However thoſe about his Majeſty, who were really devoted to his Service, tho' in this Point miſtaken in their Judgments and the Conſtitution of the Kingdom, perſwaded him, ‘That the paſſing this Bill was the only Way to ſave the Church; by which many Members in both Houſes wou'd be fully ſatisfy'd, and join in no further Alterations; whereas if they were diſappointed in this, they wou'd be for extirpating Root and Branch, and demoliſhing the whole Fabrick of the Church. They further alledg'd, That his Royal Aſſent was ſtrongly ſolicited for two Things of great Importance, tho' not of equal Concernment to the Sovereign Power; the firſt, this Bill concerning the Biſhops; the other, the Militia; which if he ſhou'd grant, he wou'd thereby ſtrip himſelf of all Regal Power: That he wou'd not be able to refuſe both; but by conſenting to the former, in which he parted with no Matter of Moment, he wou'd perhaps not be preſs'd in the latter.’ Biſhop Hacket tells us that Sir John Colepeper in particular, by all Proteſtation of Faith declar'd, If this was paſs'd, The Lords and Commons wou'd preſs his Majeſty to no more Bills of that unpleaſing Nature.

The King is perſwaded to paſs it.

Theſe Arguments, tho' coming from Men of unqueſtionable Fidelity to the King and Church, prevail'd not ſo much with his Majeſty, as the Perſwaſions of the Queen; who in this is believ'd, not only to have been guided by her own Fears, but by her Prieſts, and private Inſtructions from France. However, beſides the foregoing Reaſons, it was alledg'd ‘That her Safety very much depended upon paſſing this Bill; which if refus'd, the Parliament would ſtop her Journey towards Holland, and her Perſon be in Danger, either by the Tumults which might eaſily break out from Weſtminſter to Windſor, or by the Inſurrections of the Countries, in her Paſſage from thence to Dover. Whereas, if the Bill was paſs'd, and by her ſpecial Interceſſion, ſhe wou'd lay an extraordinary Obligation upon the Nation, and leave a grateful Remembrance of her Favour to the People, which wou'd prove highly advantageous to her in her Abſence; and ſhe ſhou'd be thank'd for acquiring that by her Goodneſs, which otherwiſe wou'd be afterwards extorted from the King.’ Theſe and other Intimations were ſo importunately infus'd into the King, that upon his Arrival with the Queen at Canterbury, contrary to his moſt poſitive Reſolution, he conſented, and ſent a Commiſſion for paſſing both that Bill, and the other about preſſing Soldiers. This was compleated upon the 14th Day of February, to the great Triumph of the City, which celebrated the Joy with Bells, Bone-fires, and Illuminations. At the ſame time the King ſent a Meſſage to both Houſes, ‘That he was aſſur'd his Paſſing theſe two important Bills ſo ſuddenly, wou'd teſtify to his Parliament, that he deſir'd nothing more than the Satisfaction of his Kingdom. And as he concurr'd for Ireland in all their Propoſitions made for that Service, ſo he wou'd leave nothing undone for their Relief, which ſhou'd fall within his Power, nor wou'd refuſe to venture his own Perſon in that War, if they thought it convenient, for the Relief of that miſerable Kingdom.’

Becomes a great Sufferer by it.

Theſe were the two laſt Bills of Moment that the King ever paſs'd, which farther diveſted him of his Regal Authority. That concerning the Biſhops prov'd a great weakning to his whole Party, not only as it loſt him ſo many in the Houſe of Peers, but as it influenc'd others, whoſe Minds were in Suſpence, as when Foundations are ſhaken. Beſides, they who were beſt acquainted with the King's Diſpoſition, had great Reaſon to believe, that no Exigency cou'd have prevail'd with him to conſent to an Act ſo contrary to his Peace and Intereſt; and therefore cou'd never after be ſure he wou'd deny any Thing that was importunately demanded: And ſo either withdrew themſelves from thoſe Conſultations, purpoſely to decline the Envy and Danger of oppoſing them, or patiently ſuffer'd themſelves to be carry'd by the Torrent, and agree to any Thing that was boldly attempted. Beſides the King by his Compliance to this Bill, too much approv'd of the Circumſtances of its paſſing, which had been by direct Violence, almoſt Force of Arms: In which Caſe, as the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, he ought not to have confirm'd the moſt politick, or the moſt pious Conſtitution. The King indeed was a double Sufferer by it, both as it weakned his Friends, and as it wounded his Conſcience: And we find it was one of thoſe three Things that lay heavieſt on him, in the Time of his Solitude and Sufferings, as appears by this Paſſage in one of his Prayers, Was it through Ignorance that I ſuffer'd innocent Blood to be ſpilt by a falſe pretended Juſtice? Or that I permitted a wrong Way of Worſhip to be ſet up in Scotland? Or injur'd the Biſhops in England?

The Ordinance for the Militia.

3. Having gain'd ſuch Benefits and Advantages, it was naturally expected that the Houſes ſhou'd have made ſome Returns of Duty and Acknowledgment for ſuch Favours; but their Thirſt, as well as their Power being increas'd, they were ſo far from obliging his Majeſty, that upon the ſame fourteenth of February, they proceeded to three unprecedented Acts of Contempt upon the Sovereign Power. The firſt was their Perfecting of their famous Ordinance for the ſettling of the Militia, which was the moſt avow'd Foundation of all the Miſeries that follow'd. It began with theſe Words, ‘Whereas there hath been of late a moſt dangerous and deſperate Deſign upon the Houſe of Commons, &c.’ and for that Reaſon they thought fit to put the whole Power of the Sword into the Hands of ſuch as were nam'd in a particular Liſt, ſent to the King with this Ordinance, namely thirty ſix Lords, and three Commoners, beſides ſome of inferior Note in the City of London. That the Reader may ſee who were at this Time to be confided in, we ſhall mention their Names as following: The Marqueſs of Hartford, the Earls of Holland, Warwick, Eſſex, Salisbury, Bedford, Rutland, Pembroke, Northumberland, Bullingbrook, Leiceſter, Stamford, Clare, Exeter, Suffolk, Nottingham, Cumberland, Lincoln, and Carbery; the Lords Brook, Pagit, Say, Howard of Eſcrick, Willoughby of Parham, North, Strange, Roberts, Gray of Wark, Shandois, Dacres, Kimbolton, Wharton, Spencer, Herbert, Fielding, and Littleton; and Sir John Banks, Sir Henry Vane Senior, and Mr. Denzil Hollis.

Letters intercepted.

A ſecond Act of the ſame Day was the breaking open a Letter directed to the Queen's Majeſty, which they had intercepted from the Lord Digby; who for his own Safety had tranſported himſelf into Holland; from whence he wrote to his Friends in London, to acquaint them where he was, and to accommodate himſelf with ſuch things as he wanted. Among theſe Letters there was one to Sir Lewis Dives, his Brother-in-law, which by the Treachery of the Bearer was brought to the Houſe of Commons, who finding it to come from a Fugitive, made no Scruple of opening it; and ſeeing one inclos'd in it for the Queen, they open'd that alſo; for which they made a frivolous Excuſe, when they ſent a Copy of it to her Majeſty. The Letter to the Queen had theſe Words, If the King betake himſelf to a ſafe Place, where he may avow and protect his Servants (from Rage I mean and Violence, for from Juſtice I will never implore it) I ſhall then live in Impatience and Miſery, till I wait upon you. But, if after all he hath done of late, he ſhall betake himſelf to the eaſieſt and compliant eſt Ways of Accommodation, I am confident that then I ſhall ſerve him more by my Abſence, than by all my Induſtry. In that to Sir Lewis Dives were theſe Words, God knows I have not a Thought to make me bluſh towards my Country, much leſs Criminal; but where Traitors have ſo great a Sway, the honeſteſt Thoughts may prove moſt treaſonable. At which, thoſe who thought themſelves touch'd, were ſo highly offended, that within two Days after they a ſecond Time charg'd him with High-Treaſon; and becauſe no Words in the Letter cou'd riſe up to that Offence, they accus'd him of raiſing War againſt the King; which cou'd bear Relation to nothing he had done, but what we obſerv'd before, when, to the great Terror of the King's Subjects, he was ſeen in a Coach with ſix Horſes at Kingſton. A third Act of that Day, was an Impeachment preferr'd to the Lords againſt the Attorney-General Herbert, for obeying the King's Commands ſo far as to contrive the Articles of High-Treaſon againſt the Lord Kimbolton, and the five Members; the penal Conſequences of which we have already mention'd.

The Commons Power increaſes.

And now the Commons, who daily receiv'd Petitions from ſeveral Counties in England, profeſſing all Allegiance to them, begin to reign without Control, the Lords agreeing, or rather ſubmitting to all their Propoſals; inſomuch, that when the Houſe of Peers had bail'd the twelve Biſhops in the Tower, the Day after the Bill for taking away their Votes was paſs'd, the Commons in great Indignation expoſtulated with them, and order'd them immediately to be recommitted. So they intimated to their Agents in the Country, that they ſhou'd make ſmall Entries upon the Militia, which in ſeveral Places they did, liſting and training Themſelves under the Names of Volunteers; which gave them Opportunity of uniting themſelves, and of providing Arms and Ammunition againſt any Exigency. The Tower of London was at their Command, and Hull was their own; the Mayor of which Place they had lately ſent for, and reprimanded for ſaying, The Billetting of Soldiers upon them was againſt the Petition of Right, and for refuſing to deliver up his Truſt to Sir John Hotham; and after a moſt expenſive Attendance, he was forc'd to ſubmit to their Commands. Then for Raiſing Mony, they had a fair Pretence, the Relief of Ireland; for which End they prepar'd an Act 'For the Payment of four hundred Thouſand Pounds, to ſuch Perſons as were appointed by Themſelves, and to be apply'd to ſuch Uſes as the two Houſes ſhou'd direct;' which was accordingly confirm'd by the King, by which means he gave them a Stock of Credit to raiſe Mony upon any Emergency: And this cou'd not well be avoided; for the King had formerly committed the Management of the Iriſh War to them; and they being ingag'd for the Arrears due to the Officers of the Northern Army, and the three hundred Thouſand Pounds to the Scots, his Majeſty was forc'd to paſs that Act with ſuch general Clauſes, as empower'd them to apply the Mony to other Ends than thoſe to which it was given, as it prov'd afterwards.

The Queen and Princeſs Mary depart for Holland.

4. During theſe reſtleſs Motions of the Parliament, the King remov'd from Canterbury to Dover with his Queen, and his Daughter the Princeſs Mary, an admirable young Lady not eleven Years of Age; who upon the twenty third Day of February embark'd with the Queen for Holland, and never ſaw her Father more. The Queen took with her ſeveral of the Jewels of the Crown; which prov'd very ſerviceable to her and her Husband afterwards; and being once on Ship-board, the King immediately return'd to Greenwich, whither he had order'd the Marqueſs of Hertford, lately made Governor of the Prince of Wales, in the room of the Earl of Newcaſtle, to bring his Charge. Which being underſtood by the Parliament, they immediately ſent a Meſſage to his Majeſty, in his Return from Dover, deſiring, 'That the Prince might not be remov'd from Hampton-Court, for at that Time it wou'd promote Fears and Jealouſies in the Hearts of his loyal Subjects;' and at the ſame Time requir'd the Marqueſs by an expreſs Order not to ſuffer the Prince to go to Greenwich. But that Lord choſe rather to obey the King than Them, and ſo conducted his Highneſs to his Father; upon which ſome Members were ſent from both Houſes to Greenwich, 'To bring the Prince from thence to London;' but contrary to Expectation they found the King arriv'd, and ſo thought it not convenient to perform that Command. The Reaſon of this ſtrange Attempt proceeded from an Information they had receiv'd from a Member of the Commons, one Griffith, a young Welſh-Man of great Licentiouſneſs, and a bold Follower of the Court for Preferment; who having been diſappointed at Dover of being made of the Prince's Bed-Chamber, told his Companions, That ſince he cou'd not make himſelf conſiderable by ſerving the King, he wou'd in diſſerving him: And ſo poſting away to London, he publickly inform'd the Houſe, 'That if ſpeedy Care was not taken, they ſhou'd loſe the Prince; for, to his Knowledge, there was a Deſign to carry him into France.' This ſenſeleſs Information fix'd him in their Favour; and, having Malice ſufficient to ſupply his Want of Parts, he was taken into Truſt, and us'd as their Bravo to juſtify their Proceedings in publick Houſes: And Mr. Hampden himſelf was obſerv'd to take him in his Arms, and tell him, His Soul rejoyc'd to ſee, that God had put it into his Heart to take the right Way.

The King's Anſwer concerning the Militia.

The King being at Greenwich, on the twenty-eighth of February he ſent to both Houſes a full Anſwer to their Petitions, and their Ordinance concerning the Militia, in which he 'excepted againſt the Preamble of their Ordinance, that declar'd a late dangerous and deſperate Deſign upon the Houſe of Commons; and a Vindication of Himſelf with Relation to the accus'd Members; he ſaid he was willing to admit of that Recommendation for the Perſons nam'd to be the Lieutenants of the ſeveral Counties; only he thought it inconſiſtent with Juſtice to alter the Government of London, and ſuch other Corporations, as by ancient Charters had the Power of the Militia granted them: To the reſt he ſhou'd be ready to grant ſuch Commiſſions, as he had done this Parliament to ſome Lieutenants by their Advice; but he cou'd not diveſt himſelf of that juſt Power, which God and the Laws of the Land had committed to him for the Defence of his People, and place it in the Hands of others for an indefinite Time. Therefore whereas he found that ſome Perſons had already preſum'd to intermeddle with the Militia, he expected his Parliament ſhou'd enquire into the Particulars, that all ſuch might be proceeded againſt according to Law.

Votes upon it.

The Two Houſes before this had entertain'd ſome Hopes of his Majeſty's Compliance, but now being tranſported to Fury, they voted, 'That whoever had adviſ'd the King to give that Anſwer, were publick Enemies to the Kingdom. That if his Majeſty ſhou'd perſiſt in that Denial, it wou'd endanger the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, unleſs the Wiſdom and Authority of the Parliament apply'd ſome ſpeedy Remedies to prevent it: That ſuch Parts of the Kingdom, as had already put themſelves in a Poſture of Defence, had done Nothing but what was juſtifiable, and approv'd by both Houſes.' Theſe, and ſuch other Reſolutions being immediately publiſh'd, that their diſtant Friends might know how to act, they diſpatch'd a ſelect Committee of both Houſes to the King, now remov'd to Theobalds, and in a formal Petition aſſur'd Him, 'That his unexpected Denial had much encreas'd the Apprehenſions they lay under, of the publick Calamities of the Kingdom; therefore were forc'd in all Humility to proteſt, That if he perſiſted in his Denial, the Diſtempers of the Kingdom were ſuch as wou'd endure no longer Delay, but that they muſt be oblig'd to diſpoſe of the Militia in ſuch a manner, as had been preſented to him, and they reſolv'd to do it accordingly. They deſir'd him to remove thoſe wicked Counſellors that interpos'd between his Goodneſs and his Wiſdom; that he wou'd be pleas'd to reſide near London and his Parliament, and likewiſe be pleas'd to continue the Prince in thoſe Parts. And laſtly they declar'd, That by the Laws of the Land, the Power of the Militia cou'd not be granted any Corporation, without the Concurrence of the Parliament, and that they who had put themſelves in a Poſture of Defence, concurr'd with the Direction of both Houſes, and were juſtifiable by Law.'

And a Petition.

The King's Anſwer to it, at Theobalds.

As ſoon as the Petition was read, rous'd with Indignation, he told the Committee, He was ſo amaz'd, he knew not what to anſwer: They ſpoke of Jealouſies and Fears; but let them lay their Hands to their Hearts, and ask Themſelves, Whether he might not be as well diſturb'd by Fears and Jealouſies? and if ſo, their Meſſage had nothing leſſen'd them. For the Militia, he had thought ſo much of it before he ſent his Anſwer, and knew it was ſo agreeable to what they cou'd juſtly ask, and he honourably grant, that he ſhou'd not alter it in any Point. For his Reſidence near them, he wiſh'd it might be ſo ſafe and honourable, that he had no Cauſe to abſent Himſelf from Whitehall; they might ask Themſelves whether he had not? For his Son, he wou'd take that Care of Him, which ſhou'd juſtify him to God, as a Father; and to his Dominions, as a King. To conclude, Upon his Honour he had no Thought but of Peace and Juſtice to his People; which he wou'd by all fair Means ſeek to preſerve and maintain, relying upon the Goodneſs of God for the Preſervation of Himſelf, and his Rights. This being ſuddenly, and with unuſual Quickneſs ſpoken by the King, they were much daunted; and preſently retired themſelves to take into Conſideration the Terms of it, that there might be no Difference in the Reporting it to the ſeveral Houſes. As ſoon as the Committee was ſet, the Earl of Newport call'd out his Brother the Earl of Warwick to ſpeak with him; who ſpeedily return'd with this Account from the Earl of Newport, That the King was then ſo preſs'd to give a more ſatisfactory Anſwer, that he was confident they ſhou'd have ſuch a one, if they wou'd but defer their Departure for a ſmall Time. To this the whole Company ſeem'd to aſſent with much Chearfulneſs, when ſuddenly young Sir Henry Vane, a dark Enemy to all Accommodations, declar'd himſelf to wonder at it, and ſaid, Is there any Perſon here, who can undertake to know the Parliament's Mind; whether this which we have, or that which is call'd a more Satisfactory Anſwer, will be more pleaſing to the Houſes?

Sir Henry Vane's Cunning.

Houſes? For my Part I cannot; and if there be any that can, let him ſpeak. To this no Man was ſo bold as to give an Anſwer, and ſo having agreed upon their Report, they departed; which ſhews how eaſily one ſubtle ill-diſpos'd Perſon may overthrow a general good Intention. This Paſſage is taken from an anonymous Writer of noted Curioſity and Reputation.

Reſolutions and Orders.

As ſoon as the Report was made to the two Houſes; upon the ſecond of March they came to ſeveral Reſolutions, in Subſtance, 'That the King's Anſwer was a Denial, concerning the Militia; That the Kingdom ſhou'd be forthwith put into a Poſture of Defence, in ſuch a Way as had been formerly agreed on by both Houſes; That a Declaration ſhou'd be ſpeedily ſent to the King, containing the Cauſes of their juſt Fears and Jealouſies, and to make it appear there was no Reaſon to entertain any againſt them.' At the ſame Time they order'd, 'That all the Lord-Lieutenants in England, whoſe Commiſſions were granted from the King under the great Seal, ſhou'd immediately bring them in, to be cancell'd as Illegal. And they further ſent a Meſſage to the High Admiral of England, the Earl of Northumberland, ordering him, 'forthwith to give effectual Directions for the Equipping all his Majeſty's Ships, that they might at a ſhort Warning be fit for Sea; and that he wou'd ſignify to all Maſters and Owners of other Ships, as might be of uſe to the publick Defence, that they wou'd do a grateful Service to the King and Parliament, if they wou'd likewiſe prepare the Ships, ſo as to put to Sea upon any emergent Occaſion.' Thus all Things began to appear with the threatning Face of War and Deſolation.

The Parliament's large Declaration.

5. Before the Leaders cou'd bring Things to the Height, they were forc'd to fly to their laſt Weapon, beſides the Sword, which was a large Declaration, or Remonſtrance of the ſeveral Cauſes of their Fears and Jealouſies, which might ſerve as a Second Part to their former grand Remonſtrance, being drawn with no leſs Art and Subtlety. In it they declare, 'That the Deſign of altering Religion had been carry'd on by thoſe of greateſt Authority about the King for divers Years: That the War againſt Scotland was procur'd in Order to that Deſign: That the Rebellion in Ireland was contriv'd here in England, as appears from many Preſumptions gather'd from ſeveral Examinations. They likewiſe ſpeak of the King's Attempt for bringing his Army againſt the Parliament; of his Warrants granted contrary to Promiſe for Tranſportation of Jermyn, and other Delinquents; of that great Breach of Parliament Privilege in coming to the Houſe of Commons in a Warlike manner; of the Lord Digby's appearing in Arms at Kingſton; and of the many Advices they have had from Foreign Parts, of dangerous Alterations and Deſigns now in Hand. Theſe, they ſay, are ſome of the Grounds of their Fears and Jealouſies; but for the King's Fear to reſide near London, that was altogether without Ground, proceeding from evil and trayterous Counſels only to perplex the Common-wealth; affirming, That his Majeſty's Abſence wou'd cauſe Men to believe, that it is out of Deſign to diſcourage the Undertakers, and hinder the other Proviſions for relieving Ireland; that it wou'd hearten the Rebels there, and all diſaffected Perſons in this Kingdom. More particularly, they ſaid, They had laid their Hands upon their Hearts; they had ask'd themſelves in the ſtricteſt Examination of their Conſciences; they had ſearch'd their Affections, their Thoughts, conſider'd their Actions; and they found none that cou'd give his Majeſty any juſt Occaſion to abſent himſelf from Whitehall.'

The ſevere Proceedings of the Commons.

When this ſtrange Declaration was debated, the prevailing Party behav'd themſelves with that Pride and Impetuoſity, that they wou'd ſuffer no Oppoſition in Diſpute; inſomuch that they ſent Sir Ralph Hopton to the Tower, for objecting againſt ſome Expreſſions in it, as unworthy the Reverence due to the King; and for ſaying upon the Clauſe, that mention'd the many Advices they had from Foreign Parts, That they grounded their Opinion of the King's Apoſtacy upon leſs Evidence, than wou'd ſerve to hang a Man for ſtealing a Horſe. And their Carriage was ſo notoriouſly terrible in this Particular, of accuſing all who were not of the ſame Opinion with themſelves; that Mr. Trelawny, a Member of the Commons, and a ſubſtantial Merchant, was expell'd the Houſe, and thrown into Priſon, for having formerly ſaid to a Friend in private, That the Houſe cou'd not appoint a Guard for themſelves without the King's Conſent, under Pain of High-Treaſon; which a Fellow, who pretended to overhear it, was brought to prove, when the Perſon himſelf, to whom the Diſcourſe was made, declar'd, That he ſaid, It might be imputed to them for High-Treaſon: And afterwards in Purſuance of their Diſlike, when the War began to break out, they again committed this honeſt Gentleman, ſeiz'd upon his great Eſtate, and ſuffer'd him to periſh in Priſon for want of common Relief. Nay, their old Friend Sir Edward Deering, cou'd not eſcape their Fury, who for not going their full Lengths, and publiſhing his Book of Speeches, which they thought reflected upon ſome of their Friends, was likewiſe expell'd the Houſe, and ſent to the Tower; and the Book was order'd to be burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman. Then to prevent little People from opening againſt them, one Sanderford, a Taylor of London, being convicted at the Bar of the Houſe for calling the Earl of Eſſex and the Earl of Warwick by the Name of Traytors, and for wiſhing King Pym and Sir John Hotham both hang'd, beſides a Fine, they condemn'd him one Day to be pillory'd in Cheapſide, and from thence to be whipp'd to the Fleet, and another Day to be pillory'd in Weſtminſter, and from thence to be whipp'd to Bridewell, where he was to be kept to work during his Life: A Sentence more ſevere, than had ever been pronounc'd in the Star-Chamber, againſt the greateſt Breakers of the eſtabliſh'd Law.

The Declaration preſented to the King at New-Market.

The King's Expoſtulations.

Upon the ninth Day of March, the new Declaration was preſented to the King at New-Market, by a Committee of both Houſes; among whom were the Earls of Holland and Pembroke, who had both been ſingularly oblig'd to his Majeſty. The reading of it, and by the Earl of Holland, ſoon began to raiſe the King's Paſſion and Indignation; ſo that when they came to mention the Tranſportation of Mr. Jermyn, contrary to the King's Word, he call'd out, That is falſe; and being a ſecond time touch'd upon, he ſaid, It is a Lye; and when he was told it related not to the Date but the Execution of his Warrant, he ſaid, It might have been better expreſs'd; it is a high Thing to tax a King with Breach of Promiſe. After the Declaration was read, with ſome additional Reaſons for his Majeſty's Return and Continuance near the Parliament, the King told them, He cou'd not have believ'd the Parliament wou'd have ſent him ſuch a Declaration, had he not ſeen it brought by ſuch Perſons of Honour; and then fell to expoſtulate with them for the Hardſhips they had thrown upon him, when he had Reaſon to have expected a Vindication againſt Mr. Pym's unjuſt Accuſations; and ſince the many ſeditious Pamphlets and Sermons, and the great Tumults ſtill unpuniſh'd, were ſufficient Grounds for his Fears. Then he concluded with this pathetical Speech, What wou'd you have? Have I violated your Laws? Have I deny'd to paſs one Bill for the Eaſe, and Security of my Subjects? I do not ask you, what you have done for Me. Are my People tranſported with Fears and Apprehenſions? I have offer'd as free, and general Pardon as your ſelves can deſire. God ſo deal with Me, and Mine! as all my Thoughts and Intentions are upright, for the Maintenance of the true Proteſtant Profeſſion, and for the Obſervation and Preſervation of the Laws of the Land: And I hope God will bleſs and aſſiſt thoſe Laws for my Preſervation.

He abſolutely refuſes the Militia.

This being ſpoken ſuddenly, and with unuſual Warmth, and demanding a further Time to anſwer the Declaration and Reaſons, the Committee deſir'd, 'Since that was all the Anſwer they were like to carry back, his Majeſty wou'd be pleas'd to give them what he had ſpoke in Writing;' which he did the next Morning. At which time the Earl of Holland again urg'd him to reſide nearer to his Parliament; to which the King briefly anſwer'd, I wou'd you had given me Cauſe; but I am ſure this Declaration is not the Way to it. Upon which the Earl of Pembroke told him, That the Parliament had humbly beſought his Majeſty to come near them; the King reply'd, He had learnt by their Declaration, that Words were not ſufficient. His Majeſty being then mov'd by the Earl of Pembroke to expreſs what he wou'd have, ſaid, He wou'd whip a Boy in Weſtminſter School, that cou'd not tell that by his Anſwer. And being ask'd by the ſame Perſon, Whether the Militia might not be granted for a Time? He ſharply reply'd, By God, not for an Hour! you have ask'd that of me in this, was never ask'd of any King, and with which I will not truſt my Wife and Children. Ye ſpeak of ill Counſels, but I am confident, the Parliament has had worſe Informations, than I have had Counſels. Then for the Buſineſs of Ireland, he ſaid, It will never be done in the Way you are in; four Hundred will never do that Work; it muſt be put into the Hands of One: If I were truſted with it, I wou'd pawn my Head to finiſh it; and tho' I am a Beggar my ſelf, I can find Mony for That.

Seditious Preachers moſt encourag'd.

This was the firſt Thing of Moment, and indeed one of the greateſt that the King had deny'd the Parliament; in which he reſolv'd to perſiſt, and which they reſolv'd to extort from him, tho' to their own Ruin and Deſtruction. And as ſoon as the Committee return'd, they order'd their Declaration to be printed, and carefully diſpers'd Abroad, that the World might ſee upon what Terms they ſtood; and all poſſible Care was taken to infect the Hearts and Affections of the People, and to cruſh thoſe who expreſs'd the leaſt Diſlike to their High Proceedings. Above all, they took Care to place ſuch Preachers and Lecturers in the moſt populous Places, as were well known to abhor the preſent Government, both as to Church and State; many of whom were recommended, and directly impos'd upon Pariſhes, by the Houſe of Commons; and others by particular Members, whoſe Reputation was moſt current in the Houſe: And all Canonical Clergymen were induſtriouſly diſcountenanc'd, impriſon'd, or forc'd to a tedious Attendance upon the Houſe, under the unhappy Imputation of ſcandalous Miniſters. Which general Charge extended to all, whoſe Inclinations they diſlik'd, or whoſe Opinions they ſuſpected. Then, that they might be ſure to be as ſtrong and abſolute by Sea, as they were by Land, they order'd the Lord High-Admiral to ſend them the Names of thoſe Captains who were to be employ'd that Summer, that they might be ſerv'd by ſuch, in whom they cou'd confide; which his Lordſhip exactly obſerv'd. By which they help'd to free him of thoſe Officers whom he cou'd not fairly have diſcharg'd; and ſtruck out the Names of thoſe, of whoſe Affections or Relations they cou'd not be ſecure. Such were the large Steps they made, within a few Days time.

The King's Meſſage from Huntington.

6. The King, according to his former Reſolution, of which few were acquainted, thought it Time now to remove to York, which was a Place very convenient to receive thoſe, who were willing to attend him; and that publick Notice might be given of it, he ſent a Meſſage from Huntington to both Houſes, letting them know, ‘That he intended to make his Reſidence for ſome Time at York, and deſir'd them to haſten their Succours for Ireland; in which Affair he wou'd waſh his Hands from the leaſt Imputation of Remiſſneſs. And that he might leave nothing unattempted to beget a good Underſtanding between him and his Parliament, he thought it requiſite to declare, That as he had been ſo tender of their Privileges, as to retract any Act of his, which had been thought to have encroach'd upon them; ſo he expected them to be equally tender of his known Prerogatives, among which this was a Fundamental One, That his Subjects cou'd not be oblig'd to obey any Act or Injunction, which was not authoriz'd by his Conſent. Therefore he requir'd Obedience from all his loving Subjects to the Laws eſtabliſh'd; and that they preſum'd not, upon any Pretence of Order and Ordinance, to which Himſelf was not a Party, to execute any Thing relating to the Militia, which was not warrantable by thoſe Laws.' He alſo once more reminded them of his Meſſage of the 20th of January laſt, viz. ‘That they wou'd ſpeedily prepare ſuch Acts, as they ſhould judge fit for the preſent and future Eſtabliſhment of their Liberties, &c.'

Several Votes and Reſolutions in Parliament.

This Meſſage, which arriv'd on the 16th of March, threw the Houſes into a greater Heat and Fury, than ever had been known before. For the very Day before they had voted and reſolv'd, ‘That the Ordinance of the Militia was no ways contrary to the Oath of Allegiance; That all Commiſſions under the Great Seal to Lieutenants were void; and that whoever executed any Power over the Militia, by Vertue of any Commiſſion of Lieutenancy, without the Conſent of Parliament, was to be reputed an Enemy to the Peace of the Kingdom.' Then they agreed upon this remarkable Propoſition, ‘That the Kingdom had been, and ſtill was, under ſuch imminent Danger from Enemies abroad, and a Popiſh Party at home, that there was an unavoidable Neceſſity of putting it in a Poſture of Defence, for the Safeguard both of King and People; and that the Lords and Commons, apprehenſive of the Danger, and ſenſible of their Duty, had in ſeveral Petitions addreſs'd for the diſpoſing the Militia in ſuch a Way, as the Wiſdom of both Houſes had determin'd as moſt proper for the preſent Exigence of the Kingdom; to which his Majeſty had ſeveral Times refus'd his Royal Aſſent.' Upon which Propoſition they made this grand Reſolve, ‘That in that Caſe of extreme Danger, and of his Majeſty's Refuſal, the People ought, by the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, to obey the Ordinance of both Houſes concerning the Militia; and that ſuch Perſons, as ſhou'd be appointed Deputy Lieutenants, and be approv'd of by both Houſes, ſhou'd receive their Commands, and enter upon the Execution of their Offices.' All which Reſolutions were order'd, the ſame Night, to be printed and publiſh'd: So that when the King's Meſſage, which was read the next Morning, appear'd directly againſt them, they were ſurpris'd, and imagin'd it to have been made in Town, and impos'd upon them; but upon Recollection, and a particular Examination of the Meſſenger, they were ſatisfy'd with the Reality of it, and ſo proceeded to this new Vote, ‘That thoſe who adviſ'd his Majeſty to abſent himſelf from his Parliament, and promoted that Meſſage, were Enemies to the Peace of the Kingdom, and ſtood juſtly ſuſpected of favouring the Rebellion in Ireland.' Then for the Matter itſelf, they reſolv'd to inſiſt upon their former Votes; and withal declar'd, ‘That when both Houſes of Parliament, which is the Supream Court of Judicature in the Kingdom, ſhall declare what the Law of the Land is, to have that not only diſputed, but contradicted, and a Command publiſh'd not to obey it, was a high Breach of the Privilege of Parliament.' And this likewiſe they caus'd to be ſpeedily publiſh'd; leaſt the King might perſuade his Subjects, That an Order of theirs, without his Conſent, was not Obligatory. This laſt Reſolution, by which the Law of the Land, and conſequently the Liberty of the Subject, was reſolv'd into a bare Vote of the two Houſes, gave all ſober Men to underſtand the fatal Period of Both was approaching, and a Foundation laid for all the Confuſion and Calamities that follow'd.

Further Proceedings and Projections.

The King's removing to York put them in preſent Pain for their Government of Hull, and therefore they immediately reſolv'd, ‘That no Forces whatſoever ſhou'd be admitted into the Town, without the Conſent of both Houſes;' which Order was ſent thither by a particular Expreſs. And the People being now prepared concerning the Militia, and taught in Caſe of extreme Danger to obey their Ordinance, they were in the next Place to find out that Extremity, which might warrant their Proceedings: To which End they produc'd Letters without any Name, pretended to be written from Amſterdam, importing, ‘That there was an Army ready in Denmark to be tranſported into England, and to be landed at Hull; the Confirmation of which, they ſaid, they had receiv'd from a Perſon of Reputation at Newmarket; adding, That there were likewiſe Forces in France ready to be ſhipp'd off for Hull.' And tho' this appear'd ſufficiently groſs and abſurd to wiſe Men, yet it prov'd of double Uſe to them; for it both countenanc'd their Orders to Sir John Hotham their Governor, and render'd the King's Reſidence in thoſe Parts ſuſpected. Theſe Alarms of Foreign Forces they aggravated with other Advices, ‘That the Papiſts of England deſign'd an Inſurrection;' therefore they proceeded in preparing a Bill to ſecure thoſe of them of the beſt Quality, and greateſt Intereſt, enjoyning the Oath of Supremacy with the utmoſt Rigour. But in their Zeal againſt the Papiſts, they wou'd not admit the King to have any Share; therefore when they heard his Majeſty had iſſu'd out a Proclamation, ‘Commanding the due Execution of all the Laws againſt Popiſh Recuſants, without Favour or Connivance,' they immediately ſent for the Sheriffs of London, and publickly examin'd them, ‘Why ſeven Prieſts, who were in Newgate, and had been long condemn'd, were not executed? the Reaſon of which they well knew. And when the Sheriffs reply'd, ‘They had receiv'd a Reprieve for them under his Majeſty's Hand,' they took Care by publiſhing it in Print, to weaken the Credit of the new Proclamation; and particularly appointed thoſe they were ſending with a new Declaration to the King, to move, ‘That the ſeven condemn'd Prieſts might be executed according to the Judgments they had receiv'd.'

The Ways for raiſing of Mony.

They began now diligently to collect whatever Sums of Mony had been granted by former Acts, and fram'd a new Bill for raiſing four hundred Thouſand Pounds, to pay the Arrears due to the Scots, and to carry on the War in Ireland. Among other Projects for raiſing Mony, they had this Way of encouraging Men to be Adventurers in the Reduction of Ireland. They concluded, ‘That in ſo general a Rebellion, much Land wou'd be forfeited to the Crown, and that thoſe who wou'd advance Mony towards the Suppreſſion of the Rebels, ſhou'd be ſatisfy'd out of ſuch Forfeitures.' Theſe Propoſitions being agreed upon by both Houſes, and preſented to the King, at a Time when he knew not how to refuſe any Thing relating to Ireland; his Majeſty therefore, without conſidering whether that Courſe wou'd make the Rebels deſperate, and ſo retard the Reduction of that Kingdom, conſented; and withal declar'd, ‘He was ready to give his Royal Aſſent to ſuch Bills as ſhou'd be brought to him for the Confirmation of theſe Propoſitions.' This Anſwer, together with their Propoſitions, they caus'd forthwith to be printed: Their Committees in all Places ſolicited Subſcriptions, the moſt active ſubſcribing firſt for the Encouragement of others; and they delay'd preſenting the Bill to the King, till they had rais'd great Sums of Mony, and procur'd Perſons of all Conditions to ſubſcribe. Many came in out of Covetouſneſs to raiſe Fortunes, having in ſome Parts of the Country five Hundred Acres of Land allow'd them for a Hundred Pounds; and ſome out of pure Fear to ingratiate themſelves with the Powerful Party, which made this new Project the Standard of Mens Affections, and a Tryal how far they might be rely'd on. This done, and the Propoſitions digeſted into a Bill with ſuch Clauſes as in Effect put it out of the King's Power to make any Peace with the Rebels, tho' upon the moſt advantageous Terms, they ſent it to his Majeſty, who now found himſelf oblig'd to paſs it.

Notwithſtanding all theſe Preparations, the War was carry'd on by ſuch ſlow Steps, that the Iriſh Rebels daily increas'd in Strength; and by the Rumour of theſe Propoſitions, enlarg'd their Power: For many Perſons of Honour and Fortune, who till then had ſat ſtill, and were really or ſeemingly averſe to the Rebellion, joyn'd with them as being deſperate, and believing the Parliament had decreed both the Suppreſſion of their Religion, and the Extirpation of their Nation. And queſtionleſs, they were willing to drive them to any Extremity, out of Revenge and Contempt, as a People eaſie to be cruſh'd, and that the War might be continu'd; fearing an Union in that Kingdom might prejudice their Deſigns at home; whereas, by this Means, they had now an Opportunity to raiſe both Men and Mony, which they might be able to employ upon more preſſing Occaſions. Nor did they want Reaſon to expect, That the King's Conſent to this ſevere Decree, wou'd diſcourage his Popiſh Subjects from any extraordinary Acts of Duty and Affection; or at leaſt render him leſs regarded by Foreign Princes of that Perſuaſion. Theſe Matters thus ſettled, for the Eaſe of both Houſes, they appointed the whole Buſineſs of Ireland to be manag'd by Commiſſion under the Great Seal of England, and nam'd four Lords and eight Commoners for that Province, whom they recommended to the King, and were to receive their Inſtructions from none but themſelves. In this Condition were the Affairs of England and Ireland, when the King arriv'd and ſettled at York, on the nineteenth Day of March; which drew on a full Period to the famous and reforming Year of One Thouſand Six Hundred and Forty One.

The King arrives at York.

Car. 18.

VIII. 1. The King, who had lately been driven about with ſome Hazard to his Perſon, and more to his Attendants, arriving at York began to breath in freſh Air; and he ſoon found himſelf more at Eaſe, and in a Condition much more ſafe and eligible than before. Moſt Perſons of Quality of that great County, and of thoſe adjacent, reſorted to him, and many Perſons of Condition from London, and the Neighbouring Parts, who had not the Courage to attend upon him at Whitehall, or near his Parliament; ſome out of a Senſe of Duty or Gratitude, and others out of Indignation againſt the Parliament's Proceedings; ſo that in a ſhort Time the Court appear'd with ſome Luſtre. And thereupon he reſolv'd to treat with the two Houſes in a different Manner than before, and to let them plainly know, 'That as he wou'd deny them Nothing becoming Them to aſk, ſo he wou'd condeſcend 'to Nothing unreaſonable for Him to grant: That he 'wou'd have Nothing extorted from him, but wou'd ſhelter himſelf wholly under the Law, ſo as to grant any 'thing by which he was oblig'd by Law, and to deny 'them whatever the Law had put in his Power.' Accordingly he ſent them a Declaration, in anſwer to that they had preſented to him at Newmarket, which ſufficiently ſhew'd the Unreaſonableneſs of their Demands. And when they ſoon after ſent him a Petition again to deſire the Militia out of his Power, in which they told his Majeſty, 'That about the Time of his paſſing the many good Bills, 'ſome Deſign had been ſet on Foot to deprive them of the 'Fruits of them;' he defy'd 'The Devil and them to 'prove that there was any ſuch Deſign; and therefore demanded full Reparation in that Point, that he might be 'clear'd in the Sight of all the World from ſo notorious 'and falſe an Imputation.'

The King's Reſolutions.

This Sort of Steadineſs and Reſolution might the laſt Year have been of infinite Service to his Majeſty; but now Matters were carry'd to a Height, too much thought incurable, or inextricable, by the wiſeſt Counſellors. Yet the Leaders were much perplex'd with theſe quick Anſwers the King gave them, which convinc'd them he wou'd be no more hector'd into Conceſſions he thought unreaſonable; but his demanding Reparation for the Breach of his Privileges, and ſo fighting them with their own Weapons, gave them ſtill greater Trouble; apprehending that the People might ſhortly believe the King's Pretenſions to be more equitable. And tho' ſome few, who thought themſelves too far advanc'd to retire, were glad theſe Paper Skirmiſhes were ſo ſharp, which they believ'd inlarg'd the Wound, and made it paſt Cure; yet the Major Part, who had been led to join with them out of a Preſumption, That the King wou'd at laſt yield to the Importunity of their Demands, wiſh'd themſelves fairly diſengag'd. And ſome of the fierceſt of them did at that time profeſs, That if any Expedient cou'd be found to reconcile the Buſineſs of the Militia, they wou'd no more venture upon ſuch high Demands. Even the Earl of Eſſex was ſtagger'd, and confeſs'd to his Friends, That he wiſh'd the Parliament wou'd proceed more moderately, and the King who had given ſo much, might receive ſome Satisfaction. But thoſe of the Court, whoſe Ingratitude had been moſt flagrant, cou'd not bear that the youngeſt Courtier ſhould be the oldeſt Convert; and therefore by repeating what the King and Queen had formerly ſaid of him, and what Thoughts his Majeſty had of him at preſent, they perſuaded him, That his Condition was too deſperate to recede. And the Lord Clarendon is of Opinion, that even at this Time, they had rather a Deſign of making themſelves powerful with the King, and great at Court, than of leſſening the Authority of the one, or reforming the Diſcipline of the other; tho' he owns it as unqueſtionable, that there were ſome few in the Number that look'd further.

The Parliament perplex'd.

Car. 18.

But this Expectation of Greatneſs began more to ſink, when the King at this Time ſuddenly took away the Staff from the Earl of Eſſex, and the Key from the Earl of Holland; the one being Chamberlain of the Houſhold, and the other firſt Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber. The Removal of theſe two Favourites of the Parliament, was owing to a Promiſe his Majeſty had made to the Queen before her Departure, but cou'd not ſafely execute it in that low Condition. She had been poſitive in this Reſolution, eſpecially with relation to the Earl of Holland, whoſe Ingratitude and Defection ſhe ſo much reſented, that ſhe declar'd, She wou'd never live in the Court, if he kept his Places. This caus'd the King to be inexorable, when his Friends, who were inform'd of his Reſolution, urg'd the Unſeaſonableneſs of this Alteration; and when they truly foretold him, That theſe two, who were not ſo deeply ingag'd as ſome of the Party, being depriv'd of their Offices, wou'd be able to do more Miſchief, and ready to imbark in the moſt deſperate Attempts. And it is juſtly believ'd, that if the Earl of Eſſex had ſtill kept the Staff, by which he was charg'd with the Defence of the King's Perſon, he wou'd never have been perſuaded to have taken upon him the Command of an Army againſt him; and that it would have been vaſtly difficult, if not impoſſible at this Juncture, for the Parliament to have rais'd an Army, if this very Earl had not conſented to be their General. Nor did the King find it very eaſie to effect this Alteration; for the Lord-Keeper Littleton wholly declin'd being concern'd in it; and when the Lord Falkland ventur'd to undertake and perform the ungrateful Office, both Houſes reſented it with bitter Expreſſions againſt Evil Counſellors, and concurr'd in a Vote, 'That whoſoever preſum'd to accept either of thoſe 'Offices, ſhou'd be reputed an Enemy to his Country:' And ſo proceeded with greater Heat in the Buſineſs of the Militia, and other Matters moſt trenching upon the King's Authority.

The Earls of Eſſex and Holland diſcarded by the King.

Cenſures upon it.

From the Land Militia they caſt their Eye upon the Royal Navy, and when that Year's Fleet was to be equipp'd, they ſent a formal Meſſage to the Lords, 'That 'the Earl of Northumberland, Lord-Admiral, might be 'mov'd to appoint the Earl of Warwick his Admiral of 'the Fleet for that Year's Service, and that the Earl of 'Warwick might be deſir'd to take that Office upon him.' The Lords thought the King's Approbation ought firſt to be had; but the Commons judg'd it ſuperfluous, ſince the Lord-Admiral had the abſolute Diſpoſal of all the Offices in the Fleet, therefore only made Uſe of their own Names; and the Earl of Warwick, without waiting for the King's Conſent, declar'd, He was ready to undertake the Employment. But this being publickly tranſacted, the King thought fit to interpoſe and declare his Pleaſure, ſo that the Lord-Admiral might not plead Ignorance; and therefore he commanded Mr. Secretary Nicholas to write to the Earl of Northumberland, 'That his Majeſty expected Sir John Pennington ſhou'd be continu'd in the 'Command of the Fleet.' This Letter being communicated to both Houſes, the Commons, to ſave the Earl from conteſting ſingly with the King, conſented to join with the Lords in a Meſſage to his Majeſty, which they directed the Keeper to incloſe in a Letter to the Secretary: The Subſtance of which was, 'That ſince the Lord-Admiral's Indiſpoſition had hinder'd him from commanding 'in Perſon, they had recommended the Earl of Warwick 'in his Room; therefore they deſir'd his Majeſty, That 'that noble Perſon might not be longer detain'd from the 'Service, out of Reſpect to Sir John Pennington, or any 'other Perſon whatſoever.' The King immediately diſpatch'd an Anſwer to the Lord-Keeper; in which he told him, 'He wonder'd both at the Form and Matter 'of the inclos'd Paper, it being neither Petition, Declaration, or Letter; and he believ'd it was the firſt Time 'the Houſe of Commons had aſſum'd the Nomination of 'the chief Sea-Commander: But it added to his Wonder, 'that having already appointed Sir John Pennington, another ſhou'd be offer'd to him; therefore he had reſolv'd not 'to alter his Determination.' Tho' this Anſwer ſeem'd to diſcompoſe them, it was no more than they expected; and pretending they had many Things of Moment to alledge ledge againſt Sir John Pennington, they mov'd the Lords that he might be ſent for, and examin'd upon ſeveral Particulars. In the mean Time, while they cauſ'd him to attend for his Examination, the Earl of Warwick, who was urg'd to prepare himſelf for the Service, made no Scruple of undertaking it; and the Earl of Northumberland granted his Commiſſion, without the King's Conſent. By which his Majeſty was ſo ſenſibly touch'd, that he was not willing any Officer he eſteem'd ſhou'd accept an Employment under the Earl of Warwick; which ſhortly after he found great Reaſon to repent. Thus, in no long Time, the Power of the Fleet fell gradually into the Hands of the Parliament.

They make the Earl of Warwick chief Commander.

The King offers to go in Perſon into Ireland.

2. The King had been now about three Weeks at York, where his Court and Attendants daily encreas'd; when finding, that notwithſtanding all the Proteſtations he cou'd make, the Buſineſs of Ireland was ſtill invidiouſly objected againſt him, as if he wanted Zeal in ſuppreſſing that Rebellion, he ſent a Meſſage to both Houſes, in which he declar'd, 'He had firmly reſolv'd to go in Perſon, to chaſtiſe and reduce thoſe deteſtable Rebels in Ireland; and farther advertis'd them, that towards the Work he deſign'd to raiſe a Guard for his own Perſon, of two thouſand Foot and two hundred Horſe, to be arm'd at Cheſter from his Magazine at Hull, the Charge of which he deſir'd the Parliament to add to their former Undertakings for that War, and if their Pay ſhou'd be thought too burdenſome, he was willing, by the Advice of his Parliament, to ſell or mortgage any of his Parks, Lands, or Houſes, towards the Supply of that Service.' He further offer'd them a Bill of his own concerning the Militia, 'which he ſhou'd be glad to find thankfully receiv'd; if otherwiſe, he call'd God and the World to judge, on whoſe Part the Default was;' and laſtly declar'd, 'before he parted from England, he wou'd take all due Care to entruſt ſuch Perſons with ſuch Authority in his Abſence, as ſhou'd prove to the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom, and the happy Progreſs of the Parliament.

This Meſſage ſurpris'd and diſcompos'd them more than any they receiv'd before or after: For by this Means they were like to loſe the Management of the War of Ireland, which upon the King's Expedition wou'd be taken out of their Hands; and the King wou'd probably in a ſhort Time recover one entire Kingdom to his Obedience, and be conſequently enabled to maintain the Subjection of the other two. However, by making ſeveral Impreſſions upon ſeveral Affections, they found it a Matter of no great Difficulty to produce an almoſt unanimous Diſſent to that Journey: And therefore they diſpatch'd a Magiſterial Anſwer to the King, intermixt with ſeveral Reaſons againſt this new Deſign, 'which being propounded to them, not as Matter wanting the Advice of his Parliament, but as a Thing already reſolved on, they held it their Duty to declare, That if he perſiſted in his Purpoſe, he wou'd much endanger his Royal Perſon and Kingdoms, and other Proteſtant States in Chriſtendom. Therefore they had unanimouſly reſolv'd, never to conſent to any Levies to be rais'd by his Majeſty for that his intended Expedition; and if ſuch Levies ſhould be made without their Conſent, they ſhou'd be forc'd to interpret the ſame to be rais'd to the Terror of his People, and Diſturbance of the publick Peace; and held themſelves bound by the Laws of the Kingdom, to apply the Authority of Parliament to ſuppreſs the ſame. They declar'd they cou'd obey no Commiſſioners he ſhou'd leave behind, and deſir'd him to leave the Management of that War to his Parliament, according to his Promiſe: For the Succeſs of which, they again beſought him to return to his Parliament, and that he wou'd reject all Counſels and Apprehenſions, prejudicial to that Faithfulneſs and Allegiance they always bore to his Majeſty, and ſhou'd ever make good with their Lives and Fortunes.

The Parliament reject the Propoſal.

The King's Anſwer.

To this the King immediately return'd a long Anſwer, in which he expreſs'd himſelf 'troubled and aſtoniſhed, to find a Miſunderſtanding of his Meſſage, and a Diſappointment of the Approbation and Thanks he thought he had deſerv'd from them. He inſiſted upon his Sincerity, and the Hopefulneſs of the Deſign, and anſwer'd to their ſeveral Reaſons againſt it. As to his coming near his Parliament, he ſaid, he expected they ſhou'd have ſent him Word they had taken ſuch Courſes for the ſuppreſſing Tumults and unlawful Aſſemblies, and puniſhing all ſeditious Pamphlets and Sermons, to remove all his Fears of that kind, before they preſs'd his Return to London. In Concluſion, he wiſh'd they wou'd examine their Meſſages to him, with the ſame Strictneſs they did thoſe they receiv'd from him, and then they would find many Expreſſions in them, that were warranted only by their own Authority; to which indeed he forbore to give an Anſwer, leſt he ſhould be tempted, in a juſt Indignation, to expreſs a greater Paſſion, than he was yet willing to put on. This meeting with no Succeſs, the King laid aſide any further Thoughts of the Deſign; and from this Time they were freed from the Apprehenſion of his Majeſty's perſonal Expedition into Ireland; which Deſign had been ſuddenly undertaken, and not ſufficiently digeſted for the Exigencies of the preſent Time. It had been projected partly by Way of Experiment, and ſo it prov'd; for it gave the Party a new Cauſe of Triumph, that they had been able directly to threaten him out of what he pretended he had firmly reſolv'd.

The Project laid aſide.

Advantages gain'd by the Parliament.

This Diſadvantage was improv'd by the other Propoſition attending it concerning the Militia; which being ſent, upon a Suppoſition that the Expedition wou'd be approv'd of, brought that Buſineſs into a new unhappy Debate. His Majeſty had, by the Attorney-General, preſented a Bill to the Houſe of Lords, granting the Militia for one Year to the Perſons nam'd by the Parliament, ſubject to his own Authority, and that of the two Houſes jointly; but the Alterations the two Houſes had made in it, before they return'd it again for the Royal Aſſent, were ſuch, and there was indeed ſo great a Difference between the Bill ſent by the King, and that preſented to him, that it cou'd not reaſonably be imagin'd he wou'd conſent to it. This being the firſt publick Bill he had refus'd, he gave them his Reaſons, and by Way of Expoſtulation ask'd them, What all Chriſtian Princes wou'd think of him, and how they wou'd value his Sovereignty, after he had paſs'd ſuch a Bill? This had no Effect upon them, and it had been happier for his Majeſty, if the firſt Motion of the Bill had never begun from him; for upon the rejecting the Bill with the Alterations they had made in it, they cunningly perſuaded the People that he now refus'd to conſent to what had been firſt offer'd and propos'd by himſelf: While his own Party were as much concern'd to find ſo expreſs a Prerogative offer'd to be divided, as was allow'd in the King's own Bill; and that it was poſſible for him to ſhrink from his firmeſt Reſolves, in a Point that naturally wou'd not admit of the leaſt Diviſion or Diminution.

The King's Deſign to ſecure Hull.

3. In the mean Time the King had enter'd upon a new and greater Enterprize, which had been the main Motive of his Journey into the Northern Parts. His great Magazine of Arms and Ammunition, now more conſiderable than that in the Tower of London, was ſtill continu'd at Hull, as was formerly obſerv'd, under the Government of Sir John Hotham, a Gentleman of an ancient Family, very rich both in Land and Mony; and tho' plac'd there by the Parliament, not ill affected to the Government, nor ready to ingage in a War. He being there with only ſome of the Train'd-Bands, the King reſolv'd to make a Journey thither himſelf, with his uſual Train, and there ſtay till he had ſecur'd the Place and Magazine. This Reſolution was conceal'd with the niceſt Care; yet as ſoon as he arriv'd at York, it was eaſily ſuſpected that he had an Eye upon that important Place; therefore they made an Order in both Houſes, That the Magazine ſhou'd be remov'd from Hull to the Tower, and order'd Ships for the Tranſportation. Upon which his Majeſty reſolv'd to make no longer Delay; and being perſuaded by ſome, that if he went in Perſon, Sir John Hotham wou'd neither be willing nor able to keep him out of the Town, and that the Poſſeſſion of ſuch a Poſt and Magazine wou'd make the Parliament more modeſt and tractable, he took the Opportunity of a Petition from the Gentlemen of Yorkſhire, who pray'd, 'That the Magazine might ſtill be continu'd at Hull for the Security of the Northern Parts;' and fix'd upon St. George's Day, the 23d of April, to effect this great Deſign.

He goes to the Town.

The Day before he ſent his young Son the Duke of York to the Town, attended by the Prince Elector and ſome other Perſons of Honour, who took it for no other than a Journey deſign'd for the Pleaſure and Curioſity of the Duke; and they were receiv'd by Sir John Hotham with all becoming Civility and Duty. The next Morning early the King himſelf, attended by two or three Hundred of his own Servants and Gentlemen of the Country, rode thither from York; and coming within a Mile of the Place, Sir Lewis Dives was ſent before, to let Sir John know his Majeſty wou'd dine with him that Day, which extreamly ſurpris'd him. He was a Man of a timorous Nature and perplex'd Underſtanding, and had accepted of this Employment from the Parliament out of a Preſumption, that the preſerving that Magazine from the King's Poſſeſſion, wou'd prevent any poſſible Rupture. Being in great Confuſion, and conſulting with ſome of the chief Magiſtrates and Officers, they perſuaded him not to ſuffer the King to enter into the Town; ſo that his Majeſty coming an Hour after his Meſſenger, found the Gates ſhut, the Bridges drawn, the Walls mann'd, and all Things in Readineſs as for the Reception of an Enemy. Sir John Himſelf, from the Walls, with great Profeſſions of Duty and Expreſſions of Fear, declar'd to his Majeſty, He durſt not open the Gates, Sir John Hotham refuſes him Entrance:

being truſted by the Parliament: The King told him, He believ'd he had no Order from the Parliament to ſhut the Gates againſt Him, or keep him out of the Town. He reply'd, His Train was ſo great, that he ſhou'd not be able to give a good Account of the Town. Upon which the King offer'd to enter with only twenty Horſe, and to have the reſt ſtay without; which the other refuſing, the King deſir'd him to come to him, That he might confer with him, upon his Princely Word of a ſecure and ſafe Return. And when he excus'd himſelf from that ſmall Civility, his Majeſty told him, This unparallel'd Act of his wou'd produce ſome diſmal Effect; that after ſuch Indignity he muſt immediately proclaim him Traytor, and proceed againſt him as ſuch; that his Diſobedience wou'd probably bring many Miſeries and much Blood upon the Kingdom, all which he might prevent by performing the Duty of a Subject; therefore he wiſh'd him to think ſadly of it, and ſtop the Riſe of ſo many Calamities, which muſt lye all upon his Conſcience. The Gentleman with much Diſtraction in his Looks, talk'd confuſedly of the Truſt he had from the Parliament, and then fell on his Knees, and prophetically wiſh'd, That God wou'd bring Confuſion upon Him and His, if he were not a loyal and faithful Subject to his Majeſty; but in Concluſion utterly deny'd his Majeſty Entrance into the Town.

For which he is proclaim'd a Traytor.

Upon which, the King having waited a conſiderable Time, and given Sir John an Hour's Space to return an Anſwer, at length proclaim'd Him a Traytor by two Heralds at Arms; which the other receiv'd with ſome Expreſſions of Undutifulneſs and Contempt. Thus the King, after he had receiv'd the Duke of York and his Retinue, was forc'd to retire that Night to Beverly, ſix Miles from that Place; and the next Day return'd to York, full of Trouble and Indignation for this high Affront, which he foreſaw wou'd produce infinite Miſchiefs. The Gentlemen of the County look'd upon it as an open Declaration of War againſt the King, expreſs'd a mighty Senſe and Paſſion on his Majeſty's Behalf, and offer'd to raiſe the Power of the Country, and take the Town by Force. And it is juſtly believ'd, that had the King with the Forces of the Nobility and Gentry, which he cou'd have then commanded, boldly attack'd the Town, and gain'd a Surrendry of it, with a generous Mercy to the Inhabitants and ſmall Garriſon, and an exemplary Juſtice upon Sir John Hotham the Governour, it had been the moſt proper Time to begin the War, and might have put a ſpeedy Period to it. But this may be call'd one of King Charles's fatal Hours, which wou'd not allow him to lay hold on the moſt uſeful Expedients: War was too remote from his Thought, and he believ'd any thing more eligible than an abſolute Rupture. Which well agrees with what a French Hiſtorian ſays of this unfortunate Prince, 'That it was his peculiar Defect, never to make uſe of Neceſſary Extreams, before he had made Tryal of ſeveral Uſeleſs Precautions.'

The King, being weak in Power as well as Will, again flew to the Paper Combate, and complain'd to his Parliament of Sir John Hotham's Treaſon and Diſloyalty, and from Them demanded Juſtice againſt him according to Law. This produc'd a Sett of new Meſſages and Replies, too long to be here fully inſerted: Only that on one Side his Majeſty inſiſted upon his Sovereign Right to the Town, and his Legal Property in the Magazine, and demanded of them, 'What Title any of his Subjects had to his Houſe and Land, that he had not to his Town of Hull; and what Right any Man had to his Mony and Goods, that he had not to his Magazine and Ammunition? And if the Arms, bought with his own Mony, were ever His, when and how that Property left him?' He likewiſe inſiſted, 'That War had now been actually levy'd againſt him, and that Sir John Hotham was a Traytor, according to the Statute of the 25th of King Edward the Third; unleſs the bare ſitting of a Parliament ſuſpended all Laws, and he was the only Perſon in England againſt whom no Treaſon cou'd be committed. And then quoted Mr. Pym's own Words, If the Prerogative of the King overwhelm the Liberty of the People, it will be turn'd to Tyranny; if Liberty undermine Prerogative, it will grow into Anarchy, and ſo into Confuſion.' On the other Side, the Parliament voted, 'That Sir John Hotham had done Nothing but in Obedience to their Commands, and that the Declaring one of their Members a Traytor, was a high Breach of the Privilege of Parliament, and being without Proceſs of Law, was againſt the Liberty of the Subject, and the Law of the Land.' And for a Ground of his Son's Reſidence in Hull, they likewiſe voted, 'That if Sir John Hotham, by Force or Accident ſhou'd loſe his Life, his Son ſhou'd ſucceed him in the ſaid Government.' In a particular Declaration they vindicated their Proceedings, inſiſted upon publick Rights, and boldly aſſerted, 'That they had done Nothing contrary to his Majeſty's Royal Sovereignty in the Town, or his Legal Propriety in the Magazine.'

New Meſſages, Replies, &c.

This Declaration or Meſſage, in which they made a further Demand for the Militia, was ſent to the King by a ſelect Committee, the Lord Howard of Eſcrick, the Lord Fairfax, Sir Hugh Cholmly, Sir Philip Stapleton, and Sir Henry Cholmly, who were to reſide at York, and be Spies upon his Actions. His Majeſty was ſo ſenſible of their Deſign, by their Temper and Behaviour, that he told them, He lik'd not ſuch Superiors near him, who ought to be very careful of their Carriage, ſince then the Country was viſibly well affected; and if he found any Declenſion, he knew whom to impute it to; and ſhou'd be forc'd to uſe them in another Manner, than with Reference to their Perſons he ſhou'd be willing to do. They anſwer'd with a ſullen Confidence, That they ſhou'd carry themſelves according to their Inſtructions, and the Truſt repos'd in them by the two Houſes of Parliament. Yet notwithſtanding their Deſigns were ſo evident, the King's Condition was ſo low, that he durſt not commit them to Priſon, or expel them the Town, or ſo much as inhibit them the Freedom of his Court and Preſence; and ſo they continu'd in York for above a Month, in perfect Defiance of the King.

A Check to the Parliament Meſſengers.

4. The Parliament having daily gain'd Ground upon the King, they now conſider'd that the Militia was the Argument of the greateſt Weight with the People, wherefore they reſolv'd to drive that Nail to the Head, and on the fifth of May publiſh'd a Declaration of both Houſes, 'Signifying their Reſolution to put their Ordinance for the Militia in Execution, being warranted thereunto by the Fundamental Laws of the Land.' This being mix'd with ſeveral Reflections upon the King's Conduct, and not communicated to him, as their other Declarations and Meſſages were, He return'd a ſharp Anſwer to it, rather as a ſeditious Pamphlet, than a real Declaration of his Parliament, 'Of which he ſolemnly declar'd he had no Jealouſy, but of ſome turbulent and ambitious Natures, which might have an Influence even upon the Actions of both Houſes. He argu'd, If the Votes of both Houſes cou'd make a new Law, by the ſame Authority they might repeal the old; and then what wou'd become of Magna Charta, and the long eſtabliſh'd Rights and Liberties of the King and People? Therefore in Concluſion he diſcharg'd all his loving Subjects from the Obeying an Ordinance ſo contrary to Law and Reaſon.' Notwithſtanding theſe ſevere Declarations, the Leaders had ſtill the Power and Skill to perſuade Men, 'That all wou'd be well, that they were very confident the King wou'd yield to whatſoever they deſir'd; at leaſt that they ſhou'd obtain a good Part, if not all, and that there wou'd be no War;' tho' themſelves knew, the Fire was too much kindled not to break out into a Flame, and therefore prepar'd accordingly, both in the raiſing Men and Mony.

The Parliament declare for the Militia.

And that they might confirm the Puritanical Part of the Nation, who thought them not ſufficiently zealous in their intended Reformation, they a little before declar'd to the Publick, 'That they deſign'd a due and neceſſary Reformation in the Government and Liturgy of the Church, and to aboliſh Nothing in the One and the Other, but what ſhou'd be evil, or at leaſt needleſs and burthenſome; to which pious End they would have a ſpeedy Conſultation with learned and godly Divines, and uſe their utmoſt Endeavours to eſtabliſh learned and Preaching Miniſters, with a ſufficient Maintenance throughout the Kingdom.' This Declaration was not more deſign'd for the Encouragement of thoſe, who were grown impatient for a Reformation, than to lull the others aſleep, who began to apprehend a Confuſion from the Liberties they ſaw practis'd againſt the eſtabliſh'd Doctrine and Government of the Church; in which they met with their uſual Succeſs.

They promiſe a Reformation in the Church.

Having gain'd ſufficient Strength, both as to Civil and Spiritual Conteſts, they now thought it high Time to let the King and People ſee that they durſt put their Ordinance in Execution, and reſolv'd 'That on the tenth Day of May they wou'd have all the Train'd-Bands of London muſter'd in the Fields.' And accordingly on that Day, their own new Officer, Serjeant-Major-General Skippon, appear'd in Finſbury Fields, at the Head of the City Train'd-Bands, conſiſting of eight or ten Thouſand Men, diſpos'd into ſix Regiments, and under ſuch Colonels and Captains, as they had Cauſe to confide in. At this firſt Triumphant Muſter, the Members of both Houſes appear'd in groſs; a Tent being purpoſely erected for them, and an Entertainment at the Charge of the City to the Value of near a Thouſand Pounds; and till this Day they had no Inſtance of the Concurrence of the City in an Act expreſly Unlawful. After this Exploit they ſent Directions to the adjacent Counties, ſpeedily to execute the ſame Ordinance, and to all other Places to make Preparations of Arms, Ammunition, &c. and they likewiſe voted, ‘ That thoſe who had ſhewn ſo much Obedience to the Ordinance of Parliament concerning the Militia, had done it according to the Laws of the Land; and that they ſhou'd have the Aſſiſtance of both Houſes of Parliament againſt any that might moleſt or oppoſe them therein.’ So that beſides the repeated diſmal Accounts from Ireland, which rais'd a Horror in all pious tender Minds, the whole Nation began to reſound with the Rumours of War, Arms, and Deſolation.

The King raiſes a Guard for his Perſon.

5. The King well ſaw the impending Storm; and likewiſe found that he was ſo far from having Hull reſtor'd, that the Garriſon there encreas'd daily, ſo that Sir John Hotham was better able to take York, than He to recover Hull; and therefore he now thought it very ſeaſonable to follow their Example, and put himſelf into ſome Poſture of Defence. Accordingly upon the twelfth of May he ſummon'd the Gentry of Yorkſhire to appear before him, and thus addreſs'd himſelf to them: You ſee my own proper Goods, my Magazine, are going to be taken from me; the Militia Ordinance, contrary to Law, is going to be put in Execution; and laſtly, Sir John Hotham's Treaſon is countenanc'd. All this conſider'd, none can blame me, if I apprehend Danger: Therefore I thought fit to tell you, that according to the Example of the Parliament, I am reſolv'd to have a Guard, only to ſecure my Perſon; in which I deſire your Concurrence and Aſſiſtance, that I may be able to protect You, the Laws and Proteſtant Profeſſion, from any Injury that may be offer'd. Notwithſtanding the Oppoſition that was made by the Parliament Committee and ſome others, they generally and chearfully agreed, ‘ That a ſufficient Guard was requiſite for the Safety of his Majeſty's Perſon.’ Hereupon ſuch Gentlemen as were willing, liſted Themſelves by the King's Appointment into a Troop of Horſe, of whom the Prince of Wales was made Captain, to which was joyn'd one Regiment of the Train'd-Bands, conſiſting of about ſix Hundred Men, whom he caus'd to be paid every Saturday at his own Charge, when he had little more than wou'd defray the weekly Expence of his Table. This Troop and Regiment made up the whole of his Guards; to regulate which his Majeſty firſt declar'd, ‘ No Perſon ſhou'd be allow'd in either, who did not before his Admiſſion take the Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy;’ thereby to avoid the Scandal of Entertaining Papiſts for his Security.

The two Houſes declare againſt it, and publiſh a ſecond Remonſtrance.

But before the compleat knowledge of this Matter cou'd come to thoſe at Weſtminſter, having private Notice of what was intended, they publiſh'd a Declaration in the Name of both Houſes of Parliament, ſetting forth, ‘ That it was againſt the Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, for any Subjects to be commanded to attend his Majeſty at his Pleaſure, excepting ſuch as were bound by ſpecial Service: And if the Train'd-Bands, or any other Perſons, ſhou'd upon any Pretence be drawn together, in a Poſture of War, the Sheriff of ſuch a County ought to raiſe the Power thereof to ſuppreſs them.’ After which they particularly voted, ‘ That the Magazine of each reſpective Shire in England, and Dominion of Wales, ſhou'd be preſently put into the Power of ſuch Lord-Lieutenants of thoſe Counties, as the Parliament did confide in.’ Upon the ſame Day, the 19th of May, they publiſh'd a large Remonſtrance, ‘ In which they highly reflected upon his Majeſty's Meſſages, Anſwers and Declarations, and tax'd him with Breach of his Word and Promiſes, as alſo with continu'd Oppreſſions and Violation of the Laws, and with countenancing the Rebellion in Ireland; particularly by deferring his Proclamation againſt the Rebels from October to January, and then ordering but forty Copies to be printed; whereas his Proceedings againſt the Scots, and Proclaiming them Traytors, had been ſharp and ſpeedy.’ And to prove the Truth of the Army's Plot againſt the Parliament, they annex'd to this Remonſtrance the Examinations of Colonel Goring, the Lord Piercy's Letter, and other Papers which the People might look upon as ſufficient Evidences of that formidable Conſpiracy.

They vote, That the King intends to make War againſt the Parliament.

The very next Day, hearing the King actually had a Guard, notwithſtanding the healing Speech of the Earl of Briſtol, who nobly deplor'd the approaching Calamities, both Houſes agreed upon theſe three notable Votes and Reſolves, ‘ 1. That it appears, That the King, ſeduc'd by wicked Counſel, intends to make War againſt the Parliament. 2. Whenſoever the King maketh War upon the Parliament, it is a Breach of the Truſt repos'd in him by his People, contrary to his Oath, and tending to the Diſſolution of this Government. 3. That whoſoever ſhall ſerve, or aſſiſt him in ſuch Wars, are Traytors by the Fundamental Laws of the Kingdom; and have been ſo adjudg'd by two Acts of Parliament, 2 Rich. II. and 1 of Hen. IV.’ Theſe Votes they diſpers'd with all Diligence, and then ſent them to the King at York, together with a ſhort Petition to diſband all his new Guards. It may ſeem ſtrange, and even prodigious, that theſe People ſhou'd ever hope to obtrude ſuch a Vote upon the Nation, That the King deſign'd a War againſt them, when, as the Lord Clarendon tells us, they were ſo far from fearing he ſhou'd be able to raiſe an Army, that they were moſt aſſur'd he had neither Ship, Harbour, Arms, nor Mony, nor was able to get Bread to ſupport himſellf for three Months, without ſubmitting to their Conduct and Control. Yet, as the noble Hiſtorian adds, they well knew what infinite Advantage that Vote wou'd bring to them; and then finely lays open their deep Management, Subtlety and Penetration. At laſt he excellently reflects upon the Methods of the Divine Juſtice, That the ſame Principles, and the ſame Application of thoſe Principles, ſhou'd be us'd to the wreſting all Sovereign Power from the Crown, which the Crown had a little before made uſe of for its extending its Authority and Power beyond the Bounds, to the Prejudice of the juſt Rights of the Subject. A ſuppos'd Neceſſity was then thought Ground enough to create a Power, and a bare Averment of that Neceſſity to beget a Practice to impoſe what Tax they thought convenient upon the Subject, by Writs of Ship-Mony never before known; and a ſuppos'd Neceſſity now, and a bare Averment of that Neceſſity, is as confidently, and more fatally concluded a good Ground to exclude the Crown from the Uſe of any Power, by an Ordinance never before heard of; and the ſame Maxim of Salus Populi ſuprema Lex, which had been us'd to the Infringing the Liberty of the One, made uſe of for the Deſtroying the Rights of the Other.

They ſend to apprehend Delinquents at York.

Tho' they did not really believe that the King wou'd be able to raiſe any Force againſt them, yet they were inwardly inrag'd to find he liv'd more like himſelf than they deſired; and that from the Deſertion of his own Servants, he was now attended by the chief Gentlemen of all Counties, which imply'd a Diſlike, if not a Contempt of their Carriage towards him. Therefore to prevent this dangerous Obedience to him, they appointed their Serjeant to apprehend ſome Perſons who had reſorted to York, and bring them as Delinquents before the Houſes. Among theſe was one Beckwith, a Yorkſhire Gentleman, who, as Sir John Hotham had inform'd them, had been diſcourſing ſome Officers of Hull to deliver the Place to the King: This they declar'd to be an enormous Crime, and little leſs than High-Treaſon, and therefore as a Delinquent he was ſent for to attend them. It look'd ridiculous to By-Standers, that Sir John Hotham ſhou'd be juſtify'd for keeping the Town againſt the King, and another judg'd a Delinquent for endeavouring to reſtore it to its Allegiance; and that they who juſt before, when his Majeſty had requir'd Skippon to attend him at York, publiſh'd a Reſolution, ‘ That ſuch a Command was againſt Law, the Liberty of the Subject and Privilege of Parliament, and therefore that their Major-General of the Forces of London ſhou'd continue to attend their Service;’ ſhou'd now expect a Submiſſion to their Warrant from thoſe who were attending on the King; whoſe acknowledg'd Authority they had ſo peremptorily oppos'd, that on the ſame Day they had privileged their Officer Skippon, being inform'd that the King had ſent a Writ to adjourn Eaſter Term from Weſtminſter to York, they declar'd, ‘ That ſuch an Adjournment while the Parliament ſat was Illegal, and order'd the Lord-Keeper not to iſſue out any Writ, or ſeal any Proclamation to that Purpoſe; which out of Fear he obſerv'd, notwithſtanding the King's Command for the Adjournment. Their Officer, when he came to York to apprehend the Delinquents, found the Parliament as much neglected there, as the King was above; and was ſo ill receiv'd by his reputed Priſoners, that if the King had not ſtrenuouſly interpos'd, he wou'd ſcarce have return'd to report the Inſignificancy of his Warrants, and the Danger of his Employment. This new Diſappointment, as it was call'd, was no more than they expected; for their Dilemma was, If their Meſſenger return'd with his Priſoners, all the Reſort and Luſtre about the King wou'd ſoon be determin'd; if he was receiv'd with Neglect or Affront, as was expected he ſhou'd, they had a new Reproach for the King ‘ of protecting Delinquents againſt the Juſtice of Parliament, and a new Encroachment upon their Privileges.’ And of that Nature were the Votes they publiſh'd upon their Officer's Return; ſo that every Attempt, whether own'd ſucceſsful or not, gain'd them new Ground, and new Authority.

IX. 1. After the laſt Votes of the Parliament, all Men began to be fill'd with the Apprehenſions of War and Confuſion; and nothing was to be heard, in all Meetings and Diſcourſes, but ſad Preſages of Miſery to the Kingdom, if Heaven in a miraculous Manner did not prevent it. Many of both Houſes daily deſerted the Leaders, and repair'd to the King at York, to the particular Incouragement of his Majeſty's Friends. But that which moſt ſurpris'd them, and gave them no ſmall Trouble, was the Behaviour of the Lord-Keeper Littleton, who of late had comply'd with their Meaſures more than was conſiſtent with his Place and Truſt, even to the joyning in the Votes for the Militia Ordinance. This great Man, whom they thought to be wholly on their Side, finding their Exorbitancies, on the twenty-ſecond Day of May, privately deliver'd up the great Seal to one Mr. Elliot, a Meſſenger from the King, and the next Morning, being Sunday, by the Help of Serjeant Lee, he took ſuch Methods as to get ſafe to the King at York; all which was perform'd with much Difficulty and ſome Stratagems. This ſudden Deſertion being known on Monday, both Houſes were diſcompos'd, and confounded with Shame, having valu'd themſelves, and being valu'd by others, upon the Account of this Man's joining with them. Yet to ſhew their Indignation againſt him, they iſſu'd out ſuch a Warrant for the apprehending him, as if he had been a moſt notorious Felon or Murderer; and immediately caus'd it to be printed and diſperſed over the Kingdom. But their Trouble and Diſtraction at this Time was viſibly very great; inſomuch that the ſame Day the Earl of Northumberland himſelf mov'd, 'That a 'Committee might be appointed, to conſider of an Ac'commodation between the King and his People, for the 'Good, Happineſs and Safety of both King and Kingdom;' which Committee was accordingly appointed.

The Parliament's Third Remonſtrance.

But this Temper of Accommodation was ſoon ſtifled by the invincible Spirit of the Houſe of Commons; which, to ſhew how little they valu'd the Power of the King, tho' now ſupported by his Keeper and Great Seal, on the twenty-ſixth of May agreed to a new and third Remonſtrance to the People of England. As the laſt reflected upon his Perſon and Actions, ſo this as much depreſs'd his Regal Power and Authority, and advanc'd ſome Poſitions and Diſtinctions, as ſufficiently diſcover'd their Intentions of changing the whole Conſtitution. The Subſtance of which were, 'That they had an abſolute Power of declaring 'Law, as being the Supreme Court of the Kingdom; and 'whatſoever they declar'd to be ſo, ought not to be que'ſtion'd by the King or any Subiect: That the Parliament 'may diſpoſe of any Thing, wherein the King or Subject 'hath a Right, for the Publick Good; and that they are 'this Parliament without the King, and Judge of this Pub'lick Good, in which his Conſent is not neceſſary: That 'the Sovereign Power reſides in both Houſes, and the 'King ought to have no Negative Voice; which they infer'red from a Clauſe in the Coronation Oath in ancient 'Times: That the levying of Forces againſt the King's 'Perſonal Commands, tho' accompany'd with his Pre'ſence, is not levying War againſt the King; but the levy'ing of War againſt his Politick Perſon, viz. his Laws, '&c. tho' not accompany'd with his Perſon, is levying War 'againſt the King. That Treaſon cannot be committed a'gainſt his Perſon, otherwiſe than he is intruſted with the 'Kingdom, and diſcharging that Truſt; and that they have a 'Power to judge whether he has diſcharg'd that Truſt or no.' Beſides theſe intermix'd Poſitions, they us'd ſeveral heavy Complaints and Expoſtulations, and demanded, 'Were 'there ever ſuch Imputations and Scandals laid upon the 'Proceedings of a Parliament? Were there ever ſo many 'and great Breaches of Privilege of Parliament? Were 'there ever ſo many deſperate Deſigns of Force and Vio'lence againſt the Parliament? If they had done more than 'ever their Anceſtors had done, they ſaid they had ſuffer'd 'more than ever they had ſuffer'd: Yet in Point of Mo'deſty and Duty, they wou'd not yield to the beſt of for'mer Times; and they wou'd put that in Iſſue, Whether 'the higheſt, and moſt unwarrantable Precedents of any of 'the King's Predeceſſors, did not fall ſhort of what had been 'done to them this Parliament?

The Effects of it.

This Remonſtrance had a greater Influence upon the Minds of the Nation, than all they had done before. For till now many hop'd and believ'd, that what had paſs'd between the King and the Parliament, were ſuch Matters of Paſſion and Reſentment, as Coolneſs and Temper might bring to an Agreement. But when the Reformers began to remove their Mask, and by this Remonſtrance they ſaw Foundations laid, which might juſtify all that they had already done, and whatever they thought Convenient to do; and that not only the King, but the Regal Power was ſuppreſs'd, or elſe depoſited in other Hands; they were utterly diſpirited, and deſpair'd of an Accommodation, without Bloodſhed. Very many thought it as unſafe to be preſent at thoſe Conſultations, as to conſent to the Concluſions; and ſo now greater Numbers of the Members of both Houſes abſented themſelves; and many, eſpecially of the Houſe of Peers, reſorted to his Majeſty at York. So that in the Debates of the higheſt Conſequence, there was not uſually preſent in the Houſe of Commons the fifth Part of their juſt Numbers, and very often not above twelve or thirteen in the Houſe of Peers. All this was done by his Majeſty's Deſire and Approbation, and was thought very much to have ſtrengthen'd his Party and Intereſt; but yet in Time it prov'd of infinite Diſſervice to his Affairs, by giving the preſent Leaders Liberty of proceeding without any conſiderable Impediment. One of the laſt, that continu'd Sitting in the Houſe of Commons, was Mr. Sidney Godolphin, a young Gentleman of incomparable Parts, who for a Farewell declar'd to Them, in a Prophetick Strain, That by a War they wou'd expoſe themſelves to unknown Dangers: For when the Cards are once Shuffled, no Man knows who ſhall win the Game.

The King's Anſwer to the ſecond Remonſtrance.

2. In the mean Time the King had a full Court at York, where he receiv'd all with great Clemency and Condeſcenſion; and always call'd the Nobility to Counſel, and adviſ'd with them concerning the Declarations and Meſſages he thought fit to publiſh to the World; and particularly his two large Anſwers to the late mention'd Remonſtrances of the Parliament. In the Firſt, he gave a rational and particular Anſwer to all the Accuſations and Complaints they had made with Relation to his Actions; 'and as to the 'Militia, he wou'd appeal to all the World, whether they 'might not with as much Juſtice and Law, have ſeiz'd up'on the Eſtate of every Member of both Houſes, who 'diſſented from that pretended Ordinance, as they had in'vaded that Power of his over It, becauſe he had, upon 'unanſwer'd Reaſons, refus'd to conſent to that Propoſiti'on. And whereas their Remonſtrance had acknowledg'd 'they cou'd not make new Laws without his Majeſty; they 'needed no ſuch Power, if That cou'd ſuſpend the Sta'tutes of the Realm from being obey'd or executed: If they 'had Power to declare the Lord Digby's Viſit to ſome 'Officers at Kingſton, to be levying of War, and High- 'Treaſon; and Sir John Hotham's Defiance, and keeping 'his Fort and Goods againſt him, by Force of Arms, to 'be an Act of Affection and Loyalty; how did they need a 'Power of making new Laws?' In concluſion he ſaid, 'If 'he had been compell'd to ſharper Language, than he af'fected, it might be conſider'd how vile, how inſufferable 'his Provocations had been: And except to repel Force 'were to aſſault, and to give neceſſary Anſwers to rough 'and inſolent Demands, were to make Invectives, he was 'confident the World wou'd accuſe him of too much 'Mildneſs; and all his good Subjects wou'd think he was 'not well treated, and wou'd judge of Him, and their own 'Happineſs and Security in him, by his Actions; which he 'deſir'd might no longer proſper, or have a Bleſſing from 'God upon them, and himſelf, than they ſhou'd be directed 'to the Glory of God, in the Maintenance of the true Pro'teſtant Profeſſion; to the Preſervation of the Property and 'Liberty of the Subject, in the Obſervation of the Laws; 'and the Maintenance of the Rights and Freedom of Parlia'ments, in the Protection of all their juſt Privileges.

His Anſwer to the Third Remonſtrance.

In Anſwer to the laſt Remonſtrance, that ſo much depreſs'd the Regal Authority, 'He commended the Plain'Dealing and Ingenuity of the Framers of it, who wou'd 'no longer ſuffer him to be affronted by being told, They 'wou'd make him a great and glorious King, while they 'us'd all poſſible Skill to reduce him to extreme Want and 'Indigency; and that they wou'd make him to be lov'd at 'home and fear'd abroad, while they contriv'd all poſſible 'Ways to render him odious to his Subjects, and con'temptible to Foreign Princes; but like Round-Dealing 'Men, told him in plain Engliſh, That they had done him 'no Wrong, becauſe he was not capable of receiving any; 'and that they had taken Nothing from him, becauſe he had 'never any Thing of his own to loſe.' He anſwer'd to their bold Poſitions, and obſerv'd, 'That their Interpreta'tion of Treaſon had left the King of England abſolutely 'leſs provided for, in Point of Safety, than the meaneſt of 'his Subjects: But as they had aſſum'd a Power of declar'ing Law, did they think they had a Power of declaring 'Senſe and Reaſon, and impoſing Logick and Syllogiſms in 'the Schools, as well as Law upon the People?' As to their numerous Complaints, he told them, 'That the Con'dition of his Subjects, when at worſt under his Govern'ment, was by many Degrees more pleaſant and happy, 'than that to which their furious Pretence of Reformation 'had brought them. He doubted not but all his good Sub'jects did now plainly diſcern through the Mask and Vi'zard of their Hypocriſy; and wou'd no more look upon 'the Framers of that Remonſtrance, as upon both Houſes of 'Parliament, but as a Faction of malignant, ſchiſmatical 'and ambitious Perſons; whoſe Deſign was to alter the 'whole Frame of Government, both of Church and State, 'and to ſubject both King and People to their own lawleſs 'arbitrary Power and Government.' He appeal'd to the Body of the Parliament, and declar'd, 'That thoſe that diſ'ſented from them, wou'd be found in Honour, Fortune, 'Wiſdom, Reputation and Weight, if not in Number, 'much ſuperior to them. Therefore, in Concluſion, he 'doubted not, but the major Part of both Houſes of Par'liament, when they might come together with Honour 'and Safety, wou'd ſo far reſent the Indignity offer'd to ‘ his Perſon, the Diſhonour to Themſelves, and the Miſchief to the whole Kingdom, by that Remonſtrance; that they wou'd ſpeedily make the foul Contrivers of it Inſtances of their exemplary Juſtice, and brand Them and their Doctrine with the Marks of their perpetual Scorn and Indignation.

The King's Attendance at York.

To this the Parliament made no Reply till many Months after the War began; but contented themſelves with uſing all Methods to leſſen his Majeſty's Reputation, and to hinder the great Reſort to him at York; who at this Time liv'd in a much more Princely Manner, than he cou'd have done near London, ſo great a Train and Appearance was there of the Gentry and Nobility about him. And yet the good King made no other Uſe of their Preſence at this Time, and their Abſence from the Parliament, than to have ſo many the more, and the more credible Witneſſes of his Counſels and Proceedings; and to undeceive the People, by his plain Anſwers to all the Scandals and Reproaches thrown upon him, and by his clear Profeſſions of his Zeal to Religion and Juſtice; and likewiſe to convince them, how far the Number and Quality of thoſe, who thought, or appear'd to think otherwiſe, was from what they might conceive it to be. And it cannot be deny'd, but the People were every Day recovering from their ſuperſtitious Reverence to the two Houſes; and grew more ſenſible of their Duty to the King, and the Incroachments made upon the Regal Dignity.

The Parliament's Nineteen Propoſitions.

3. In the mean Time the Parliament having brought their Affairs to a ſort of a Criſis, to prevent the Effuſion of Blood, on the Second Day of June they compleated their Grand Petition and Propoſitions, which by way of Eminence are call'd THE NINETEEN PROPOSITIONS; which were immediately ſent to the King at York, and preſented with great Solemnity by their Committee reſident in that Place. The Subſtance of them ought not to be omitted, which is as following. ‘ I. That all the King's Privy-Council, great Officers and Miniſters of State, may be put out, except ſuch as the Parliament ſhall approve, who are to have an Oath aſſign'd them. II. That all Affairs of State be manag'd by the Parliament, except ſuch Matters as are transferr'd by them to the Privy-Council, and to be concluded by the major Part of them under their Hands; the full Number not to exceed twenty five, nor be under fifteen; and if any Place fall void in the Interval of Parliament, then the major Part of the Council to chuſe one to be confirm'd at the next Seſſion of Parliament. III. That every one of the great Officers of the Kingdom ſhall be choſen with the Approbation of the Parliament, &c. as before ſaid. IV. That the Government and Education of the King's Children be directed by Parliament, &c. as before ſaid. V. That their Marriages alſo be treated and concluded by Parliament, &c. VI. That the Laws againſt Papiſts, Prieſts, and others, be executed without Toleration or Diſpenſation, except by Parliament. VII. No Popiſh Lord to have Vote in Parliament, and their Children to be educated in the Proteſtant Faith. VIII. That ſuch a Reformation be made in Church Government, and the Liturgy, as the Parliament ſhall adviſe. IX. To ſettle the Militia, as the Parliament has order'd, and the King to recall all his Declarations againſt their Ordinances. X. All Members of Parliament put out of their Places, during this Seſſion, to be reſtor'd again. XI. All Privy-Counſellors and Judges to take an Oath for maintaining the Petition of Right, and other Statutes, which ſhall be made this Parliament. XII. All Officers plac'd by Parliament are to hold their Places Quam diu bene ſe geſſerint. XIII. That the Juſtice of the Parliament paſs upon all Delinquents, and they to appear, or abide their Cenſure. XIV. The General Pardon to paſs with ſuch Exceptions as the Parliament ſhall adviſe. XV. All Forts and Caſtles of the Kingdom to be diſpos'd of by Parliament, &c. XVI. The King to diſcharge all his Guards and Forces now in being, and not to raiſe any other, but in Caſe of actual Rebellion and Invaſion. XVII. The King to enter into a ſtrict Alliance with all Reformed States, to recover the Rights of his Royal Siſter, and her Princely Iſſue to thoſe Dignities and Dominions, which belong to them. XVIII. To clear the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members, ſo that future Parliaments may be ſecur'd from the Conſequence of that ill Precedent. XIX. That no Peer hereafter to be made ſhall ſit in Parliament without their Conſent.’ In their Petition annex'd to theſe Propoſitions, they promis'd, if they were granted, ‘ They wou'd ſettle his Majeſty's Revenue, as ſhou'd be ſufficient to ſupport his Royal Dignity, in Honour and Plenty, beyond the Proportion of any former Grants of the Subjects of this Kingdom to his Majeſty's Royal Predeceſſors.

The King's Anſwer to them.

This was receiv'd with great Indignation by the King, and all about him, eſpecially when he underſtood, that on the ſame Day they had promis'd to ſettle his Revenues, they had voted it highly criminal for any One to tranſmit or return any Monies to him, that were rais'd from the Jewels of the Crown. Within a few Days he publiſh'd an Anſwer to theſe unheard-of Propoſitions, in which he complain'd, ‘ That they had ſeiz'd upon thoſe ſmall Sums of Mony, which his Credit had provided to buy him Bread; and ſo in Effect, had block'd him up on every Side. As to the Propoſitions themſelves, he look'd upon them as a ſtrange Potion, not preſcrib'd to him only for once, for the Cure of a preſent, preſſing, deſperate Diſeaſe; but for a conſtant Diet for him and his Poſterity; which in Effect was a Depoſing of Both. He ſaid, many of their Expreſſions had a greater Latitude of Signification, than they ſeem'd to have; therefore it concern'd him the more that they ſhou'd ſpeak out; that both he and his People might know the Bottom of their Demands, or know them to be Bottomleſs. His Majeſty therefore had great Cauſe to believe that the Contrivers of thoſe Propoſitions had no Intention of ſettling a firm Accommodation, but to increaſe thoſe Jealouſies, and to widen thoſe Diviſions, now unhappily fallen between Him and his Parliament. In ſum, he wou'd always weigh the Advices both of his Great, and Privy-Council; yet he ſhou'd likewiſe look on their Advices, as Advices, not as Commands or Impoſitions; upon Them, as his Counſellors, not as his Tutors or Guardians; and upon Himſelf, as their King, not as their Pupil or Ward. Therefore to all thoſe unreaſonable Demands, his Anſwer was, Nolumus Leges Angliæ mutari.

The Proceedings againſt abſent Members.

Before the Publication of this Anſwer, the Parliament were uſing all poſſible Methods to increaſe their Power, and ſecure the Chief of the City of London to their Intereſt, ſo that they might become involv'd, and Sharers in their Proſperity or Ruin; all which they brought about by means of their former Debts, and their new Contracts. Nor did they remit any thing of their uſual Heat, but proceeded with great Severity againſt thoſe Members who were gone to the King, proclaiming ſome by Name ‘ To be Enemies to the Kingdom;’ at one Time adjudging nine Peers, the Earls of Northampton, Devonſhire, Monmouth and Dover, the Lords Rich, Andover, Grey of Ruthen, Coventry and Capel, ‘ To be incapable of ſitting again in Parliament, while this ſhou'd continue.’ And the Houſe of Commons impos'd upon every one of their own Members, who were gone to the King, or by their Abſence appear'd well affected to his Service, a Hundred Pound a Man. Yet leſt this Proceeding ſhou'd diſturb and embarraſs their Counſels, they took Care, that tho' they had paid their Fine, ‘ None of them ſhou'd ſit again, till after an Examination by a Committee, they had given the Houſe Satisfaction in the Cauſe of their Abſence.’ For they well knew, if the Members of both Houſes ſhou'd be obliged to a ſtrict and regular Attendance, they ſhou'd never be able to accompliſh their great and extraordinary Deſigns.

Propoſals for bringing in Mony, Plate, &c.

Then for their grand Buſineſs the Militia, they caus'd thoſe who refus'd to obey their Ordinance, or had publiſh'd the King's Proclamation againſt their Proceedings, to be ſent for as Delinquents. And that they might be as well able to pay an Army, as they found they were to raiſe one, on the tenth Day of June they publiſh'd their famous Propoſals for the bringing in Horſe, Men and Arms, for the maintaining of the Publick Peace; the Reaſons of which they declar'd to be, ‘ A Deſign in the King to War againſt the Parliament; that he had already levy'd Forces both of Horſe and Foot; that with a high and forcible Hand he had protected Delinquents, ſuffering the Parliament Meſſengers that came for them to be abus'd, beaten and impriſon'd, and ſo the Orders of the higheſt Court of Juſtice in the Realm were not obey'd.’ Therefore they declar'd, ‘ Whoever wou'd bring in any Proportion of Mony or Plate, or ſubſcribe to furniſh and maintain any Number of Horſe, Horſemen and Arms, for the Defence of the King and Parliament, it ſhou'd be held a good and acceptable Service to the Common-wealth; and ſuch Perſons ſhou'd be repaid their Mony with Intereſt of eight Pounds per Cent. for which the Publick Faith ſtood engag'd.’ And they particularly appointed Guild-Hall for the Place, where this Plate or Mony, &c. ſhou'd be brought in: And laſtly, to encourage others, the Members of both Houſes appointed a ſolemn Day to ſubſcribe themſelves; which they perform'd very liberally. Moſt of thoſe, who thought it unlawful to be preſent at ſuch unheard-of Conſultations, withdrew before the Day came, or then abſented themſelves. But many were couragious enough to be preſent, and reſolutely to refuſe what they thought they cou'd not conſent to with Honour. Particularly Sir Henry Killigrew being call'd upon to ſubſcribe, bravely told them, If there were Occaſion, he wou'd provide a good Horſe, and a good Sword, and made no Dobut but he ſhou'd find a good Cauſe. But within a few Days both He, and whoever were known to refuſe, found it ſafeſt for them to leave the Town; ſo high was the Animoſity againſt them, both within and without the Walls.

Upon this Occaſion the Lecturing Preachers, who repair'd to the City from all Parts of the Kingdom, were more than ordinary zealous and vehement in promoting this glorious Cauſe and Work of God; which they did publickly in their Pulpits, and privately by their inceſſant Exhortations. And ſome of them proceeded ſo far as to pronounce the Neglecters of this Cauſe, accurſed from God; and ſubtlely apply'd that Text of Curſe ye Meroz, to their preſent Purpoſe. The Succeſs was extraordinary, and it is hardly credible, what a vaſt Proportion of Plate was brought in within ten Days; there being hardly Men enough to receive it, or Room to lay it in; and the Throng of the Bringers was ſo great, that many could not be diſcharg'd in two Days Attendance. The Citizens did not only bring in their beſt Plate, but their Wives deliver'd up their Caudle-Cups and Rings, and even their Thimbles and Bodkins, to maintain the good old Cauſe, as it was now call'd. In a Book call'd Martin's Eccho, we are told, that the Mony, Plate, Rings, &c. rais'd in London, Middleſex and Eſſex, amounted to above eleven Millions of Pounds; ſo much they endeavour'd to impoſe upon the People. Tho' the King, at his firſt Notice, wrote to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriffs of London, 'If they advanc'd any Mony, upon thoſe ſcandalous Votes that had declar'd his Intention to levy War againſt his Parliament, he wou'd look upon it, as the raiſing Force againſt himſelf;' yet it had no Effect towards the ſtopping theſe extraordinary Contributions. But they ſtill made all Preparations for War, and order'd, 'That all Horſes fit for Service, or great Saddles, that ſhould be carry'd towards the North, without the Direction of the two Houſes, ſhould be ſeiz'd and ſecured.

The great Succeſs.

4. It was at this Time a Matter of Wonder, and ſtill remains a Matter of Cenſure, that notwithſtanding all theſe Encroachments and warlike Preparations, the King had never yet put himſelf into a Poſture of Defence. He had by Degrees a glorious Appearance of the Nobility, and not only of thoſe, who by a regular Obſervance of the Laws, had render'd themſelves unblameable to King and People; but of others, who out of Paſſion, Reſentment, or ſomething worſe, had for a long Time concurr'd in all the violent Votes and Actions: yet ſtill they were rather an Ornament to his Court, and a Diſcredit to the ſmall Remainder at Weſtminſter, than any great Advantage to his Counſels; every Man thinking it a ſufficient Merit, to have abſented Himſelf from the Company and Place where the Malignity was bred; and that if he kept himſelf negatively innocent, it was all he ow'd his King and Country. A long unactive Peace had taught the Nation to abhor the very Thoughts of a Civil War, and to imagine that a vigorous Preparation againſt it, wou'd prove an Invitation to it; and there were very few of thoſe great Lords that attended his Majeſty, who did not declare, That whatſoever Shews the Parliament made, in hopes to ſhake his Majeſty's Conſtancy, yet they durſt never venture upon a War; and if they ſhou'd, the People wou'd unanimouſly declare for the King, whoſe Safety conſiſted in his not providing for it: Whereas if he levy'd Forces, the Parliament wou'd perſuade the World, That it was to overthrow Religion, and the Laws and Liberties of the People. They who were of another Opinion, and cou'd have given better Reaſons, thought it not ſafe to unfold themſelves, but in the King's own Ear; there being in this noble Aſſembly, with whom the King daily adviſ'd, ſome who were not the ſtricteſt Keepers of Secrets, and others who were fear'd as Spies upon the reſt. But that which moſt deferr'd the Attempt of raiſing Forces was, that the King had no poſſible Convenience of Arms or Ammunition but from Holland, from whence he daily expected a Supply; and till that Time, let the Provocations be what they wou'd, he was forc'd to ſubmit and bear all with Patience.

The King's Backwardneſs as to War.

In the mean Time, for a Ground of further Proceedings upon Occaſion, the King deſir'd the Peers in Council to deliver in Writing, what Affronts and Violence had been offer'd them at London, which render'd their Preſence in the great Council of the Kingdom both unſafe and diſhonourable; to which they more readily conſented, becauſe the London Pamphlets had already ſtigmatiz'd them, as Deſerters of the Parliament, and Betrayers of the Liberty of their Country. Therefore in an Inſtrument drawn up and agreed among them all, they inſerted the ſeveral Particulars, 'As the Tumults, and Violence offer'd to many Perſons; The furious Threats of the Rabble, at the Doors of the Houſe, when they deſir'd to carry any exorbitant Matter; The Breach of the ſtanding Rules and Orders of the Houſe, while Matters were in Debate, and reſuming them again in a thin Houſe; the reverſing, waving, or contradicting Reſolutions made in a full Houſe; and Laſtly, Mr. Holles's unprecedented demanding at the Bar, the Names of thoſe Lords who refus'd to conſent to the Militia, while the Tumults without threatned all thoſe who diſſented from it.' All theſe they gave as Reaſons for their Abſence from Parliament, and deliver'd them in an Inſtrument, ſign'd under their Hands. And yet, ſo great a Want was there of a neceſſary Spirit and Reſolution, that the very next Day many of them beſought his Majeſty, That he wou'd by no Means publiſh that Paper, but keep it in his own Hands; ſome of them declaring, That if he publiſh'd it, they wou'd diſavow it. So that an important Evidence, which at that Time might have been of ſovereign Uſe to the King, was render'd ineffectual to his Service; his Majeſty finding it neceſſary to engage his Princely Word, Never to make it publick without their Conſent: So that it remain'd a grand Secret, when the Lord Clarendon wrote this particular Account.

The Irreſolution of the Lords.

To make ſome Attonement for this Want of Courage, and that the World might ſee good Men were united to aſſiſt his Majeſty in Vindication of the Laws, in Oppoſition to others, who were united againſt both; upon a Declaration of his Majeſty in Council, and in the Preſence of all his Peers, 'That as he wou'd exact no other Obedience from them, than what was warranted by the Laws of the Land, ſo he expected they ſhou'd yield no Obedience to any Commands that were not legal, or impos'd by any other: That he wou'd protect all thoſe who ſhou'd refuſe any ſuch Command, whether they proceeded from Votes and Orders of both Houſes, or any other Way: That he wou'd defend the true Proteſtant Religion, the legal Liberties of the Subject, and juſt Privileges of Parliament, which he wou'd make the Standard of their Obedience to Him: That he wou'd not engage them in any War againſt the Parliament, except it were for his neceſſary Defence and Safety, againſt ſuch as invaded himſelf or his Adherents:' All that were preſent, to the Number of Forty-ſix, enter'd into a ſolemn Engagement in theſe Words, 'We do engage our ſelves not to obey any Orders or Commands whatſoever, not warranted by the known Laws of the Land; and to defend your Majeſty's Perſon, Crown and Dignity, together with your Majeſty's juſt and legal Prerogative, againſt all Perſons and Power whatever: We will defend the true Proteſtant Religion eſtabliſh'd by the Law of the Land, the lawful Liberties of the Subjects of England, and juſt Privileges of your Majeſty, and both your Houſes of Parliament: And laſtly, We engage our ſelves, not to obey any Rule, Order, or Ordinance whatſoever, concerning any Militia, that hath not the Royal Aſſent.' This was ſubſcrib'd by the Lord-Keeper Littleton, the Duke of Richmond, the Marqueſs of Hertford, the Earls of Lindſey, Cumberland, Huntington, Bath, Southampton, Dorſet, Saliſbury, Northampton, Devonſhire, Cambridge, Briſtol, Weſtmorland, Barkſhire, Monmouth, Rivers, Newcaſtle, Dover, Carnarvon, and Newport; the Lords Mowbrey, and Matravers, Willoughby of Eresby, Rich, Howard of Charleton, Newark, Paget, Chandois, Faulconbridge, Paulet, Lovelace, Savile, Coventry, Mohun, Dunſmore, Seymour, Grey of Ruthen, and Capell; the Secretaries Falkland and Nicolas, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Lord-Chief-Juſtice Banks. This was done on the thirteenth Day of June, printed and diſpers'd by the Conſent of all the Subſcribers.

The King's Declaration in Council.

The Lords Engagement.

Two Days after, they conſented and agreed to ſubſcribe another Paper upon this Occaſion: His Majeſty, conceiving the falſe Rumours ſpread abroad might induce many to believe, he intended to raiſe a War againſt his Parliament, profeſs'd to them all, 'Before God and all the World, that he ever had an Abhorrence to ſuch Deſigns, and deſir'd all preſent in Council to declare, If they had not frequently heard his Reſolutions to the contrary: Whether they were not fully convinc'd that he had no ſuch Intentions; but that all his Endeavours aim'd at a ſure Settlement of the Proteſtant Religion, the juſt Privileges of Parliament, the Liberties of the Subject, the Law, Peace and Proſperity of the Kingdom.' Whereupon they unanimouſly agreed to ſign a Paper in theſe Words: 'We, whoſe Names are underwritten, in Obedience to his Majeſty's Deſire, and out of the Duty we owe to his Majeſty's Honour, and to Truth, being here upon the Place, and Witneſſes of his Majeſty's frequent and earneſt Declarations, and Profeſſions of his Abhorring all Deſigns of making War upon the Parliament, do profeſs before God, and teſtify to all the World, That we are fully perſuaded that his Majeſty hath no ſuch Intention: But that all his Endeavours tend to the firm and conſtant Settlement of the true Proteſtant Religion, the juſt Privileges of Parliament, the Liberty of the Subject, the Law, Peace and Proſperity of this Kingdom.' This was immediately printed with the fore-mention'd Names, and publiſh'd with a particular Declaration annex'd, in which his Majeſty profeſs'd 'his firm and unſhaken Reſolutions for Peace, and again aſſur'd the World, in the ‘Preſence of Almighty God, his Maker and Redeemer, That he had no more Thought of making War againſt his Parliament, than againſt his own Children. But for the ſuppreſſing the Trayterous Attempts of wicked and malignant Perſons, he offer'd to ſuch as wou'd advance any Mony, Plate, or any other Aſſiſtance, the Security of ſuch his Lands, Foreſts, Parks and Houſes, as ſhou'd be ſufficient to anſwer the ſame; which he eſteem'd a more real Security, than that now call'd The Publick Faith.' Of the Lords who had ſubſcrib'd, Sir Philip Warwick tells us, that the Earl of Saliſbury within a few Days ſtole away to London.

The King's Commiſſions of Array.

The Houſes declare againſt them.

5. About this Time, the King taking into Conſideration the Military Proceedings of the Parliament, and that they had ſet up Lieutenants and Deputy-Lieutenants in all Counties, declaring his own Commiſſions of Lieutenancy Illegal; upon mature Deliberation and Advice with Lawyers of the greateſt Eminency, he iſſu'd out Commiſſions of Array, according to ancient Statutes: And thereupon on the 20th Day of June, he ſet forth a Proclamation, ‘Informing all his loving Subject, of the Lawfulneſs and Uſe of thoſe Commiſſions, and forbidding any Obedience to be paid to the Parliament's Ordinance for the Militia, under the Penalty of High-Treaſon.' Which Commiſſions the Earl of Derby in Lancaſhire, the Earl of Huntington, and Mr. Henry Haſtings his Son, in Leiceſterſhire, did firſt put in Execution. This caus'd new Paper Combates in Declarations, &c. either Party inſiſting, ‘That the Law was on their Side,' and the People giving Obedience to either, according to their Conveniencies. The People had never heard of a Commiſſion of Array, which made them more liable to Suſpicions; and what had a ſingular Influence upon many, was, that the great Mr. Selden had declar'd his Opinion in Parliament, againſt the Legality of ſuch Commiſſions. However the two Houſes immediately publiſh'd a large Declaration, repreſenting thoſe Commiſſions of Array ‘to be contrary to the Laws of the Land, deſtructive to the Liberty and Property of the Subject; and ſo full of Danger and Inconveniency, that it wou'd bring a heavier Yoke of Bondage upon them, than any that had been taken away that Parliament.' Their Emiſſaries, employ'd in many Parts of the Kingdom, perſuaded the People, That thoſe Commiſſions were to reduce the Eſtates of all the Yeomanry of England to ten Pounds a Year, and to enſlave them beyond Expreſſion. And leſt thoſe, who were thus ſeduc'd by their ſubtle Inſinuations, ſhou'd receive any Satisfaction from his Majeſty's Declarations, they ſent out Orders ſtrictly to prohibit the publiſhing of them; promiſing Protection from the Parliament to thoſe who ſhou'd refuſe ſo to do.

The King's Weakneſs.

The Arrival of one Ship with Arms, &c.

Theſe Paper-Conteſts made neither Side more inclinable to the other, but drew both on nearer to Action. Yet when the World ſaw what Levies of Soldiers were ſo vigorouſly haſtned by the Parliament, under the Earl of Eſſex, they wonder'd the King made no other Preparations towards an Army, than a ſingle Troop of Guards, conſiſting of Gentlemen Volunteers, who wou'd be ſure to quit that Troop when an Army was once form'd. But indeed the King had not at this Time any Proviſion neceſſary for an Army, nor was he ſecure of any Port, to which ſuch Proviſion might ſafely be aſſign'd; nor had he Mony ſufficient for the Support of his own Table for one Month. He impatiently expected the Arrival of all thoſe Neceſſaries by the Care and Application of the Queen, who was directed to ſend them to Newcaſtle, which the Earl of that Name had juſt then by his Diligence ſecur'd to him. Her Majeſty was compell'd to encounter many Difficulties in Holland; for tho' the Prince of Orange was heartily diſpos'd to the King's Service, and did all he cou'd to induce the States to intereſt themſelves in the King's Conteſt, yet his Authority was much impaired with the Vigour of his Body and Mind; and the States were ſo far from relieving the King in this Extremity, that they did him all the Damage they cou'd. And the Parliament had ſo many Spies upon her Majeſty, that it was not eaſie for her to provide Arms and Ammunition, without their Notice of it, and of the very Ways that were projected to tranſport them to the King. So that when ſhe had ſecur'd a Frigate of about thirty Guns, call'd The Providence, and put in two Hundred Barrels of Powder, two or three thouſand Arms, and ſeven or eight Field-Pieces; the Captain of it found it extreamly difficult to eſcape ſome Veſſels that laid wait for him, by running into a narrow Creek in the Humber: By which Means the Arms, Ammunition and Artillery were ſoon brought to York.

This was the firſt Supply the King receiv'd towards the War, which began to appear unavoidable; and his Majeſty was well pleas'd to have the World believe, that this ſmall Ship had brought a greater Proportion of Proviſion than in reality it had. And therefore tho' it had brought no Mony, as he expected, he forthwith granted Commiſſions to ſuch Perſons of Quality and Intereſt, as were thought moſt proper, to raiſe Regiments of Horſe and Foot. He promoted the Earl of Lindſey, Lord-High Chamberlain of England, to be General of his Army; a Perſon of great Honour and Courage, and highly belov'd, having had many Years Experience in Holland and Germany, and in ſeveral Expeditions at Sea, where he had been more than once Admiral. Sir Jacob Aſhley, a brave Norfolk Gentleman, was declar'd Major-General of the Foot, a Perſon worthy of that Command, which he had exercis'd before, and perform'd afterwards with great Honour and Reputation. The Generalſhip of the Horſe was preſerv'd for his Majeſty's Nephew Prince Rupert, who arriv'd ſhortly after. All theſe Levies were haſtned with as much Expedition as was conſiſtent with ſuch an extraordinary Scarcity and Want of Mony. To remedy which, all the Lords and the Council about the King, with ſeveral other Perſons of Quality, made a voluntary Subſcription for the Payment of ſo many Horſe for three Months; in which Time, according to a Notion now prevailing, they believ'd that the War wou'd certainly be at an End.

The King appoints ſome Officers

The King's Deſign to ſecure the Fleet.

This being done, the King privately reſolv'd to take the Admiralty into his own Hands, revoke the Earl of Northumberland's Commiſſion, and ſend Sir John Penington, who was then at York, to take Charge of the Fleet, now lying in the Downs: And Letters were prepar'd and ſign'd by the King, to all the Captains, requiring them to follow Sir John Pennington's Orders. All which was carry'd with all poſſible Secrecy, that only a very few ſuſpected any ſuch Alteration. But upon the King's Intimation of the Project, Sir John Pennington, finding the Matter ſo full of Difficulty, alledg'd, That he ſtood upon ill Terms with the Parliament, that therefore his Motion towards the Downs wou'd be immediately obſerv'd; and therefore he propos'd Sir Robert Manſel, a famous Sea Commander at Greenwich, as a fitter Man in this Juncture. His Majeſty imparting this Counſel to thoſe he had made privy to his Deſigns, enter'd upon new Conſiderations, and concluded, That tho' Sir Robert Manſel's Courage and Fidelity were unqueſtionable, yet his Age, and the Accidents depending upon it, wou'd render the Expedient very hazardous; and therefore the whole Diſpatch was prepar'd in this manner. Firſt a Revocation to be made of the Earl of Northumberland's Commiſſion, under the Great Seal; of which there was a Duplicate, one for his Lordſhip, and the other for the Eari of Warwick. Then a particular Letter to be ſent to every Captain of the Fleet, ‘Informing them of the Revocation of the Admiral's Patent, and conſequently of the Determination of the Earl of Warwick's Commiſſion; and commanding them no longer to follow the Orders of Either, but repair with the Fleet to Burlington Bay, where they ſhou'd receive his Majeſty's further Pleaſure.

Sir John Pennington undertakes it.

All Things being thus prepar'd, one of the King's Pages was intruſted with what immediately concern'd the Earl of Northumberland, and Mr. Edward Villiers with the whole Diſpatch relating to the Fleet; the Former being order'd not to make ſuch Haſte, but that the other might reach the Downs at leaſt as ſoon as he ſhou'd be at London; and Mr. Villiers was directed to viſit the Earl of Warwick in the laſt Place, that his Activity might not divert the Seamen from their Obedience to his Majeſty. In all Probability, if this Reſolution had been executed, the King had ſecur'd a great many of his Ships: But as ſoon as the Page was juſt ſet out for London, and Mr. Villiers not gone, Sir John Pennington, upon Re-conſideration, offer'd to go Himſelf and take the Charge of the Fleet; which chang'd the Form of the Letters to the ſeveral Captains, which now requir'd them only ‘to follow ſuch Orders as they ſhou'd receive from Sir John Pennington, as their Commander.' Sir John did not think it proper to go with Mr. Villiers, but by him ſent a Letter to Sir Henry Palmer, an Officer of the Navy living by the Downs, together with an Order from his Majeſty, ‘Requiring him immediately to go on Board the Admiral;' and informing him, ‘That Himſelf wou'd be with him with all Speed, and wou'd ſet out when Mr. Villiers did, but wou'd take a farther and more private Way.' Mr. Villiers, leſt the Page ſhou'd arrive too ſoon at London, ſlept not till he got to Sir Henry Palmer; who being an infirm, tho' loyal Man, and ſurpris'd at the Command, cou'd not make that Expedition on Board, as was neceſſary for this Service. However Mr. Villiers deliver'd his ſeveral Letters to the Captains, who gave all Demonſtrations of Joy and Submiſſion; and doubtleſs had Sir John Pennington been preſent, the greateſt Part of the Fleet had been preſerv'd to his Majeſty; the Earl of Warwick being at that Time taking his Pleaſure with ſome Officers on Shore.

But the Captains at this Juncture, expecting Orders from Sir John Pennington, and he at the ſame Time waiting for ſuch an Account from Sir Henry Palmer, as might encourage rage him to venture on Ship-board; the whole Buſineſs was diſappointed by this unfortunate Delay: For the other Gentleman, the Page, having deliver'd the King's Letter, and Diſcharge to the Earl of Northumberland; and that Lord, with all Expreſſions of Duty and Submiſſion, obeying his Majeſty's Commands, tho' earneſtly preſs'd by both Houſes to continue in his Office; they agreed to paſs an Ordinance, ‘To appoint the Earl of Warwick to be Admiral of the Fleet, with as full Authority as he had receiv'd from the Earl of Northumberland.’ Which Ordinance they diſpatch'd away by a Member of their own, who arriv'd the next Morning, after Mr. Villiers had deliver'd the King's Letters; Sir John Pennington in the mean Time neither appearing Himſelf, nor ſending any further Advice. The Earl of Warwick, who upon his Diſcharge, without any Declaration of diſobeying the King, had only apply'd Himſelf to the confirming of thoſe he thought true to his Party, and to the careful Obſervance of the reſt; but being thus arm'd, as he expected he ſhou'd be, he ſummon'd all the Captains to a Council on Board his Ship; which Summons all obey'd, except Captain Slingsby and Captain Wake, who were therefore ſeiz'd by their own Men, and carry'd to the Earl, who ſent them Priſoners to the Parliament. Then the Earl communicated the Ordinance and Votes of the Parliament, to the reſt of the Officers; who thereupon ſubmitted, except Sir John Mennes and Captain Burly, who were diſcharg'd and ſet on Shore. So that the Storm was now over, and the Parliament intirely poſſeſs'd of the whole Royal Navy, and Militia by Sea; and thus his Majeſty was without one Ship at his Devotion, in his three Kingdoms. This may be ſaid to have been one of King Charles's Fatal Moments; which in ſome Particulars ſeem'd more the Hand of Providence, than the Work of Men. And now his Majeſty began to be ſenſible of his former great Conceſſions: and an ingenious Author obſerves, ‘That this was a Leſſon hard for him to improve upon, ſuch as taught him, That there is a Mean even in Virtue, and that it is dangerous for a King to be too Good.

Mr. Whitlock's Speech againſt a War.

6. This hapned in the Beginning of July, when the Seaſon was almoſt as hot as the Debates in Parliament; where this great Succeſs haſtned all Things to a full Criſis. Having by their Ordinance rais'd many voluntary Companies of Foot, and by their Subſcriptions a large Stock of Mony, and a great Number of Horſe, War and an Army was the warm Subject of their Conſultations. This occaſion'd ſeveral Speeches, particularly from two celebrated Men, Mr. Bulſtrode Whitlock, and Sir Benjamin Rudyard. The Former, tho' he was not for a tame Reſignation, nor thought it inconſiſtent with their great Wiſdom to prepare for a neceſſary Defence, yet could not but prophetically deplore the fatal Miſeries of a Civil War, and the Wantonneſs and Luxury, the Concomitants of a long Peace, that had brought the Divine Vengeance ſo near them. ‘We muſt, ſaid he, ſurrender up our Laws, Liberties, Properties and Lives, into the Hands of inſolent Mercenaries, whoſe Rage and Violence will command Us, and all we have; and Reaſon, and Honour, and Juſtice will leave our Land, the Ignoble will rule the Noble, and Baſeneſs ſhall be preferr'd before Virtue, Profaneneſs before Piety. Of a potent People we ſhall make our ſelves weak, and be the Inſtruments of our own Ruin; we ſhall burn our own Houſes, waſte our own Fields, pillage our own Goods, open our own Veins, and eat our own Bowels. You will hear other Sounds beſides thoſe of Drums and Trumpets, the Clattering of Armour, the Roaring of Guns, the Groans of wounded and dying Men, the Shrieks of deflower'd Women, the Cries of Widows and Orphans, and all on your Account.------It has been ſaid, He that draws his Sword againſt his Prince, muſt throw away his Scabbard: Thoſe Differences are ſcarce to be reconcil'd: Theſe Commotions are like the deep Seas, which being once ſtirr'd, are not ſoon appeas'd. I wiſh the Duke of Rohan's Obſervation may prove a Caution, not a Prophecy, That England is a great Creature, which cannot be deſtroy'd but by its own Hand.’ Upon all this Account, he mov'd that they might try more and new Expedients to bring about an Accommodation.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech was ſtill more Home, and againſt the Unreaſonableneſs, as well as the Miſeries of a Civil War; in which he us'd theſe Words: ‘If any Man three Years ſince cou'd have credibly told us, that the Queen ſhall be gone out of England, for any Cauſe whatſoever; the King ſhall remove from his Parliament from London to York, declaring himſelf not ſafe here; that there ſhall be a total Rebellion in Ireland, ſuch Diſcords and Diſtempers both in Church and State here, as we now find, certainly we ſhou'd have trembled at the Thought of it; wherefore it is fit we ſhou'd be ſenſible now we are in it. On the other Side; If any Man then cou'd have credibly told us, that within three Years we ſhall have a Parliament, it wou'd have been good News; that Ship-Mony ſhall be taken away by Act of Parliament, the Reaſons and Grounds of it ſo rooted out, as that neither It, nor any thing like it, can ever grow up again; that Monopolies, the High-Commiſſion Court, the Star-Chamber, the Biſhops Votes ſhall be taken away, the Council-Table regulated and reſtrain'd, the Foreſts bounded and limited; that we ſhou'd have Triennial Parliaments; and more than that, a Perpetual Parliament, which none can diſſolve but our ſelves, we ſhou'd have thought this a Dream of Happineſs: Yet now we are in real Poſſeſſion of it, we do not enjoy it; tho' his Majeſty has promis'd and publiſh'd he will make all this good to us. We ſtand chiefly upon further Security; let us not think we have Nothing, becauſe we have not all we deſire; and tho' we had, yet we cannot make a Mathematical Security: All Human Caution is ſuſceptible of Corruption and Failing: God's Providence will not be bound, Succeſs muſt be His.’ Therefore he mov'd, as the only Expedient, to make the Way fair for the King to return to his Parliament. This is the laſt Speech we find made by this Great Man, who dy'd ſoon after the firſt Blood was drawn; and his Words upon his Death-Bed are remarkable, That Mr. Pym and Mr. Hampden both told him, That they thought the King ſo ill belov'd by his Subjects, that he cou'd never be able to raiſe an Army to oppoſe them. A fatal Miſtake of Theirs, and Others of their Party, which coſt the Lives, and deſtroy'd the Fortunes, of many Thouſands in the Kingdom.

The two Houſes vote an Army under the Earl of Eſſex.

No Speeches or Arguments cou'd prevail upon Men who had projected ſo much, and proceeded ſo far. Therefore, without any further Regard to Conſequences, they confirm'd all their former Actions by a final Reſolution, which at length prov'd the Overthrow of Themſelves and all their great Friends: Which was, ‘That an Army ſhou'd be forthwith rais'd for the Safety of the King's Perſon, Defence of both Houſes of Parliament, and of thoſe who had obey'd their Orders and Commands, and preſerving of the true Religion, the Laws, Liberty and Peace of the Kingdom: That the Earl of Eſſex ſhall be their General; and that they wou'd live and die with him.’ And that the People might believe, the voting of an Army and General was only to draw the King to the more reaſonable Conceſſions, the ſame Day they agreed, ‘That a Petition be fram'd to move the King to a good Accord with his Parliament, to prevent a Civil War.’ All which was compleated upon the 12th Day of July, one Year and two Months after the Parliament had acquir'd ſuch a Power by the unlimited Act of Continuance.

The King under great Straits.

X. 1. Thus the fatal War was threaten'd and determin'd, when the King was far inferior in Force and Riches, and utterly unable to keep Pace with the Parliament Levies. Yet with his ſmall Power, before the laſt Votes were made, he ventur'd to form a Deſign for the Reduction of Hull; which many, who were unwilling to come to Arms, look'd upon as no Act of Hoſtility againſt the Parliament. The Difficulties he had to encounter withal were very many and diſcouraging: He was ſo far from having Mony to levy or pay Soldiers, that he had not ſufficient to ſupport the Tables kept by the Officers of State; ſo that out of mere Want, the Prince and Duke eat with his Majeſty, which was the only Table that was kept up; which preſent Want was aggravated with the Probability of no Supply in a reaſonable Time. But the Want of Arms was more inconvenient than that of Mony: So that the Levies wou'd now be of little Uſe, when they ſhou'd continue unarm'd. But that which perplex'd the King more than all the reſt, was the Temper and Conſtitution of his own Party, which chiefly conſiſted of Men drawn to him by Principles of Loyalty, and Abhorrence of the Parliament Proceedings; otherwiſe unexperienc'd in Action, and Strangers to the Myſteries and neceſſary Policy of Government; ſtrict Obſervers of the Law, and as nice in that Matter, as the other pretended to be. Theſe Men ſtill inſiſted upon the Execution of the Law, which if his Majeſty obſerv'd, ‘He wou'd in the End ſuppreſs whatever Extravagancies the Parliament practis'd:’ And believing the raiſing a War to be ſo deteſtable in it ſelf, ‘That they thought it impoſſible the Parliament ſhou'd ever deſign it,’ even when they knew they were beginning it. However they concluded, ‘He who firſt prepar'd an Army, wou'd firſt be odious to the People, by whoſe Affections he wou'd eaſily be ſuppreſs'd.’ This Notion was generally embrac'd; and tho' others, equally affected to the Publick Peace, plainly ſaw the Fatality of theſe Concluſions, and how irrecoverable the King's Condition muſt be, if he look'd not more vigorouſly to his Defence; yet they durſt not declare themſelves in any publick Debate, but thought it ſufficient to ſpeak what was neceſſary to the King in private; by which means he wanted thoſe ſolid Foundations of Counſel and Foreſight his Condition requir'd; nor cou'd he with Safety diſcover the Motives and Bottom of his Deſigns. And ſo he ſtill ſeem'd to aim at no Hoſtility, but what tended to the Reduction of Hull; which he hop'd wou'd ſerve to draw the Train'd-Bands together, till he cou'd draw other Forces of greater Moment thither, which might be of Service to that or any other Enterprize.

His Deſign upon Hull, and the Occaſion of it.

This Deſign in all Appearance being undertaken with much Weakneſs, carry'd on with a Waſte of Time, and attended with no Succeſs, became the Subject of no little Cenſure; but the true Reaſon of it was extraordinary, and a great Secret in thoſe Times, founded upon the uncommon Succeſs of a Romantick Adventure, diſcover'd by no other Author but the Lord Clarendon. The Story is material and entertaining, of which this is the Subſtance: The volatile Lord Digby, who had been driven into Holland, with ſome Commands of the Queen, came over with great Privacy, and ſtaid ſome Days in a Diſguiſe at York, conferring ſo ſecretly with the King at Night, that no Notice was taken of him; and finding by the King's Affairs, it was not yet proper for him to appear, he reſolv'd to return back to the Queen, and haſten the Proviſion of Arms and Ammunition, ſo neceſſary for his Maſter's Defence. Accordingly in the ſame Bark which brought him over, he ſail'd again for Holland, with his Friends Wilmot, Aſhburnham, Pollard and Berkley, who upon the Parliament's Complaints againſt them, remov'd from Court till the King was ready for their Service. They were not long at Sea before they met the Providence Frigate, with the Ammunition formerly mention'd; upon which they agreed, that Wilmot, Pollard and Berkley ſhould return to the King, and Digby and Aſhburnham purſue their Voyage for Holland. But thoſe Parlies continu'd ſo long, that the Parliament's Ships came up to them; and tho' the Providence got clear, as we have already obſerv'd, yet the Bark was taken, and carry'd in great Triumph into Hull, where Colonel Aſhburnham was ſo well known to Sir John Hotham, that he could not pretend to conceal himſelf. But the Lord Digby had ſo compleatly diſguis'd himſelf, that his neareſt Friends could hardly have known him, pretending to be a Frenchman, whoſe Language he ſpoke to Perfection; and having made away with ſuch Papers as were not fit to be perus'd, he ſo well counterfeited Sickneſs when he got aſhore, that he eaſily procur'd himſelf to be diſpos'd in ſome obſcure Corner for his Repoſe: while Colonel Aſhburnham, the only Priſoner that ſeem'd worth regarding, was carry'd to the Governour, who receiv'd him with as much Civility as he could expect.

The Lord Digby's Tranſactions with Sir John Hotham.

The Lord Digby being alone, ſoon reflected on the Deſparateneſs of his Condition, That it was impoſſible to conceal himſelf long; that he was the moſt hated Man in the Kingdom to the Parliament, into whoſe Hands if he ſhould fall, his Life would at leaſt be in apparent Danger: And how to extricate himſelf out of the Labyrinth was extreamly difficult, ſince Sir John Hotham reckon'd him in the Number of his moſt inveterate Enemies. However, being endu'd with the nobleſt Preſence of Mind in any Extremity, he reſolv'd not to deſpair; but found means in broken Engliſh, which might have fitted the Mouth of any Frenchman, to make his Guard underſtand, That he deſir'd to ſpeak in private with the Governour, to whom he wou'd diſcover ſome Secrets, that wou'd be of ſingular Uſe to the Service of the Parliament. The Man ſoon inform'd the Governour, who being a Maſter in the French Tongue, immediately ſent for the ſuppos'd Frenchman; who, in the Preſence of much Company, without any Diſorder, gave ſuch an artful Account of Himſelf, as he perſuaded them to believe, 'He had ſeen much of the French Service, and 'had been recommended to the Engliſh King for ſome 'Command, it being conceiv'd Abroad, that he wou'd 'have Occaſion for Soldiers.' Then drawing the Governour to a great Window, whoſe Nicety wou'd not let him venture alone with him in another Room; and being at a convenient Diſtance from the Company, he ask'd him in Engliſh, If he knew him? The other in a Surpriſe anſwer'd, No. Then, ſaid he, I'll try whether I know Sir John Hotham, and if he really be that Man of Honour, I always took him to be: And thereupon diſcover'd himſelf, and ſaid, He hop'd he was too much a Gentleman to deliver him up to the Rage and Fury of his implacable Enemies. The Governour, aſtoniſh'd and fearful of the By-ſtanders, deſir'd him To ſay no more at preſent; aſſuring him, He ſhou'd find him the ſame Man he thought him; that with the firſt Conveniency he wou'd confer more with him: And ſo call'd the Guard immediately to carry him away, and look carefully to him; then turning to the Company he ſaid, This Frenchman was a ſhrewd Fellow, and underſtood much of the Queen's Counſels, and what the Parliament wou'd be glad to know; tho' as yet he had not ſo clear an Information as he preſum'd he ſhou'd have in two or three Days Time: And ſo retir'd to his Chamber.

His extraordinary Succeſs.

It is wonderful to believe, what an Influence this noble Perſon's Stars had upon all this Affair. Sir John by Education was a rough unpoliſh'd Man, very covetous, proud and ambitious, an utter Stranger to all good Nature and Generoſity; of Parts not quick, but of a Judgment ſo compos'd, as he was more likely to deceive than be deceiv'd: Yet after all, this inſinuating young Adventurer, known and hated by him for his inimitable Faculty of Diſſimulation, had won ſo much upon him, that he reſolv'd to practiſe that Virtue of Generoſity, with which the other had complimented him, and not ſuffer him to fall into his Enemies Hands. He ſent for him the next Day at a more ſeaſonable Hour, and told him, Since he had ſo frankly thrown himſelf into his Hands, he wou'd not betray his Truſt, and wiſh'd him to conſider what way he ſhou'd beſt ſet him at Liberty: He ſaid, He wou'd commit the Secret to no Man living, and leaſt of all to his Son, of whom he ſpoke with all poſſible Bitterneſs, as a Man violently addicted to the worſt Deſigns the Parliament had, and ſent thither as a Spy upon him. Then he diſcours'd of the Miſchiefs that were like to befal the Kingdom, and lamented his own Fate, That being of very different Principles from thoſe who puſh'd Things to Extremity, and of entire Affection to the King, he ſhou'd now be conſider'd as the chief Cauſe of the War that was breaking out: Of which he ſpoke at large, and own'd, That an Information ſent him of the King's Deſign preſently to hang him, was the real Cauſe of his refuſing him Entrance into the Town. There was not a Sentence in this Diſcourſe but this penetrating Lord knew how to cultivate it; and therefore joyn'd with him in his Senſe of the threatning Miſeries of the Nation; pathetically lamenting, 'That it ſhould be in the Power of a Handful of ill Men, 'to involve him, and others of his good Intentions, in 'their dark Deſigns, which muſt unavoidably determine in 'the Ruin of all the Undertakers: For he was aſſured 'the King wou'd ſpeedily reduce all his Enemies; that all 'the Princes in Chriſtendom were intereſted in the Conteſt; and that the Prince of Orange was reſolv'd to 'come over at the Head of his Army, and wou'd take Hull 'in three Days.' And after he had gradually terrify'd and wrought into his moſt predominant Paſſions, he enlarg'd upon the Honour and Glory that Man wou'd reap, who prevented the diſmal Confuſion that was in View, and told him, He was the Man, who in delivering up Hull to the King, cou'd at once extinguiſh the War, and eſtabliſh a Peace throughout the Kingdom. That he wou'd employ all his Intereſt with the King and the Queen for his Service; and he ſhou'd find him more zealous for his Greatneſs, and a full Reward of his Merit, than he was now ſollicitous for his own Safety.

Sir John Hotham complies with him.

All theſe Advices and Reflections were the Reſult of more than one Diſcourſe; for Sir John cou'd not bear the Variety and Burthen of them all together: But within two Days all Things were adjuſted, and he told his Lordſhip, It wou'd ill become him, after ſuch a Refuſal, to deliver the Town into the King's Hands; nor cou'd he poſſibly effect it, while ſo many in the Town and Garriſon were not to be truſted; but if the King wou'd bring but one Regiment before the Town, plant his Cannon, and make but one Shot, he ſhou'd think he had diſcharg'd his Truſt, and wou'd immediately ſurrender the Place. And with this Meſſage he was content that the Lord Digby ſhould go to the King; and having conducted him beyond Danger, he told ſome Officers, He had ſent the Frenchman to York, being well aſſur'd he wou'd return to him again. Having diſcover'd this important Matter to the King at York, it was reſolv'd he ſhould appear publickly without Diſguiſe, that the World might believe he came in the Ship that brought the Ammunition; which got ſafe to York about the Time that Mr. Villiers and Sir John Pennington had been ſent to the Fleet, and before the News came of their ill Succeſs. This was the Cauſe of the ſudden March towards Hull, before there was a Soldier levy'd to make an Aſſault, or to manage a Siege; which afterwards was ſo much admir'd and cenſur'd: For as ſoon as the King receiv'd the promiſing Account from the Lord Digby, he declar'd He would upon ſuch a Day go to Beverley, a Town within ſix Miles of Hull; and appointed three or four Regiments of the Militia, under the Command of faithful Gentlemen, to march thither as a Guard to his Perſon; and likewiſe ſent a ſmall Train of Artillery, which might be ready for the Summons of the Place. And at the ſame Time the King was ready for his March, the Lord Digby return'd in his old Diſguiſe to Hull, to take Care that all Meaſures there might correſpond with former Obligations.

The King at Beverley;

At Beverley his Majeſty iſſu'd out a Proclamation, ſetting forth 'Sir John Hotham's Rebellion; the Parliament 'denying him Juſtice; their ſeizing his Fleet; Sir John's 'Hoſtilities upon Hull, and the neighbouring Country; for 'which Reaſon he was reſolv'd to reduce the ſame by Force; forbidding all Commerce with the Town, while it perſiſted in Rebellion.' The Proclamation he ſent likewiſe to both Houſes, ſignifying further, 'That before he made uſe of Force, he once more requir'd the Delivery of it up to him, and then he wou'd willingly admit of ſuch Addreſſes, and return ſuch Propoſitions, as might beſt ſettle the Peace of the Kingdom, and heal the preſent Diſtractions: If this his gracious Invitation ſhou'd be rejected, God and all good Men muſt judge between them.' This done, the Earl of Lindſey firſt took Poſſeſſion of his Office, a little troubled and dejected to find himſelf a General without an Army, and engag'd in an Enterprize without Proſpect of Succeſs. However the King order'd him to ſend out ſome Officers to take a View of the Town, and of ſuch Ground as might be proper to raiſe a Battery; as if he deſign'd ſuddenly to attack the Place; which appear'd no unreaſonable Attempt, if there were a good Number of Friends in the Town. The King's Party having many Horſe, and there being very few in the Town, they found it no hard Matter to take a full View of the Place, by riding to the very Ports, and about the Walls; nor was there at firſt any Shew of Hoſtility from the Town upon their neareſt Approaches to it. But after they had made that Viſit two or three Days together, they found the Walls were better mann'd, and a conſtant Encreaſe of Labourers repairing the Works, and then they began to fire, when any came within diſtance of their Works. So that now every thing appear'd with a leſs promiſing Aſpect.

Where he receives a Petition from the Parliament.

2. His Majeſty had been but a few Days in theſe Parts, when, after a ſhort Turn to Newark and Lincoln, he receiv'd the double News of the Parliament's Reſolution for War, and their Petition for Peace; both which had been determin'd in one Day, the twelfth of July, as before mention'd. The Petition boldly charg'd the King 'with raiſing Forces to over-rule the Judgment of his great Council, and to determine what related to the Government and Liberty of the Kingdom: Therefore they proſtrated themſelves at his Feet, beſeeching him to forbear all Actions of War, and come nearer to his Parliament, &c. And in Concluſion, if his Majeſty wou'd concur, they wou'd quickly make it appear to the World, That his Perſonal Safety, his Royal Honour and Greatneſs, were much dearer to them than their own Lives and Fortunes; which they wou'd dedicate to its Support and Maintenance.' Tho' the King's Meſſage came to them before their own was diſpatch'd, yet without regarding that, leaſt the Contents of this Petition ſhou'd be known before the Arrival of their own Meſſengers, the Earl of Holland, Sir John Holland, and Sir Philip Stapleton, the Perſons appointed to carry it, made a ſpeedy Journey for Beverley; reporting to all they met, That they had brought ſuch an abſolute Submiſſion from the Parliament to the King, that there cou'd be no Doubt of a happy Peace. The Earl of Holland, upon preſenting the Petition, made a ſhort Speech to the King, telling him, 'That the glorious Motto of his bleſſed Father was Beati Pacifici, which he hop'd his Majeſty wou'd continue; that they preſented him with the humble Duty of his Parliament, who deſir'd nothing but his Acceptance of Peace, and aim'd at nothing but his Honour and Happineſs:' And read the Petition aloud. The King being provok'd both with the Meſſage and Meſſenger, told them, That the Reproaches caſt upon him by it, were not anſwerable to the Profeſſions his Lordſhip had made; and that he was ſorry they thought the readieſt Way to preſerve the Peace of the Kingdom, was to expoſe him and his Honour with ſo much Scandal: That they ſhou'd ſoon receive his Anſwer, by which the World ſhould diſcern who deſir'd Peace moſt.

The King's Anſwer, with ſome Propoſitions.

Accordingly, on the ſecond Day the King deliver'd them a long Anſwer in Publick, in which 'he enumerated the many Hardſhips and Injuries he had receiv'd from the two Houſes, before he had granted any Commiſſion for the levying a ſingle Man; and therefore appeal'd to all the World to judge who began this War, and upon whoſe Account the approaching Miſeries are to be caſt. And therefore he cou'd not but look upon that Charge as the boldeſt and moſt ſcandalous that ever was laid upon him, That the neceſſary Proviſion made for his own Safety, was to over-rule the Judgment of his great Council, and determine what related to the Government and Liberty of the Kingdom.' After other Complaints and Expoſtulations, he proceeded to ſome Propoſitions, namely, 'That the Town and Magazine of Hull be deliver'd up to him; that the Navy be reſtor'd according to his Directions; That all Levies made by the Parliament be laid down, and their Militia Ordinance diſavow'd; and that the Parliament be adjourn'd to a ſafe and ſecure Place: All which being done, he moſt ſolemnly aſſur'd them, he wou'd diſcharge all his intended Levies, and repair to them; that there might be a general Face of Peace and Happineſs throughout the Nation. If theſe be rejected, he doubted not the Protection of Almighty God, and the Aſſiſtance of his good Subjects; who can hope for no certain Enjoyment of their own, if their King may be oppreſs'd and ſpoil'd without Remedy. Therefore if the Preſervation of the Proteſtant Religion, the Defence of the Liberties and Laws of the Kingdom, the Dignity and Freedom of Parliament, and the Relief of bleeding and miſerable Ireland, be equally precious to the Petitioners, as they are to his Majeſty, there will be a chearful Conſent to his Propoſitions: And of this he expected a full and poſitive Anſwer by the twenty ſeventh of this Inſtant July; till when he ſhould not make any forceable Attempt upon Hull; but expected in the mean Time no Supply of Men be put into it, nor any of his Goods taken from it.'

When the Parliament's Petition was read, the whole Court expreſs'd a mighty Indignation againſt it, and thought the King in his Anſwer had not ſufficiently reſented their high Indignities, or appear'd ſenſible enough of their Inſolence and Uſurpation; yet the Thought of a War, which they ſaw actually levy'd againſt the King, was ſo deeply abhorr'd, and Men were ſo fond of every Expedient that look'd towards Peace, that by the next Morning theſe officious Meſſengers for the Parliament made many believe, 'That the King's Anſwer was too ſharp, and wou'd provoke the Houſes, who were naturally paſſionate, to proceed in their violent Ways; whereas they were confident if he wou'd abate ſomething of that Severity in his Language, His Majeſty ſhou'd have all the Satisfaction he propos'd:' And this the Earl of Holland privately offer'd to undertake. And this ſo far prevail'd upon ſome, that they heartily urg'd the King 'To return by the Meſſengers only the Matter of his Propoſitions in a ſoft and gentle Language, without the Preamble, or any mention of the Provocations the Parliament had given him, and that he wou'd take from them the Anſwer he had deliver'd them the Night before.' But the King gave many Reaſons why he cou'd not give way, after ſuch a peremptory Juſtification of themſelves, and inſolent threatning of him; and complain'd that he cou'd not reaſonably depend upon the Earl of Holland, who had ſo groſly deceiv'd him in other Matters, which were entirely in his own Power to have perform'd. Then he declar'd, He never had conſented to any one Thing, ſince the beginning of the Parliament, which had been prejudicial to him, at the doing of which he had not been ſolemnly promis'd, by thoſe of greater Intereſt than the Earl of Holland, that he ſhou'd receive no Damage from it, and yet he always found himſelf miſtaken: Therefore he reſolv'd to rely upon God Almighty; and poſitively refus'd to make the leaſt Alteration in his Anſwer. And thus the Meſſengers departed, leaving the Court and Country leſs affected than they found it, branding thoſe who wou'd not believe their Profeſſions and Promiſes, as the Authors of a Civil War. And the Earl of Holland, who envy'd the encreaſing Popularity of the Earl of Eſſex, now finding no Hopes of being reſtor'd to former Favours, return'd with a Rancour equal to the moſt furious, and heartily join'd in the ſuppreſſing that Power, from the Adminiſtration of which he was totally excluded.

His firm Reſolution.

The Parliament's Reply to the King.

3. His Majeſty having about ten Days Leiſure from his Deſign upon Hull, where the Lord Digby remain'd in Diſguiſe, reſolv'd to make a ſhort Progreſs into the Neighbouring Counties, 'till he cou'd have an Anſwer to his Propoſitions, and accordingly went to Doncaſter the ſame Day the Meſſengers departed; the next to Nottingham, and ſo to Leiceſter, where he was receiv'd by the Train'd-Bands, and the full Acclamations of the People. After he had caus'd the Earl of Stamford to retire from the Town, and ſeiz'd upon a ſmall Magazine, according to Appointment he return'd towards Hull, in Expectation of an Anſwer from the Parliament; which came two Days later than was appointed, with no other Ceremony than inclos'd to one of the Secretaries to be preſented to the King: In which they declar'd, 'They cou'd not yield to his Majeſty's Demands: 'The Reaſon why they took Poſſeſſion of the Town of Hull, the Magazine and the Navy, paſs'd the Militia Ordinance, and made Preparations of Arms, was for the Security of Religion, the Safety of his Majeſty's Perſon, of the Kingdom, and Parliament; all which they ſaw in imminent Danger. From which, when they ſhou'd be ſecured, they wou'd draw their Forces out of Hull, deliver the Magazine and Navy, and make an honourable Settlement of the Militia by Bill. For the Adjourning of the Parliament, they ſaw no Reaſon why his Majeſty ſhou'd require it, ſince the Loyalty and Fidelity of the City of London, and the Honeſt Care of the Parliament, was ſo conſiderable,

‘that the uſual Place wou'd be as ſafe for his Royal Perſon, as any. As for the laying down of Arms, when the Cauſes which made them provide for the Defence of his Majeſty's Perſon, the Kingdom and Parliament, ſhou'd be remov'd, they wou'd willingly decline any further Preparations, and lay down their Forces already rais'd.' This their Replication they order'd to be printed and read in all the Churches throughout the Kingdom: And thus they denounc'd the War in expreſs Words, which they had done long before in their Actions; and both Parties, laying aſide all Thoughts of Treaty, prepar'd to ſtrengthen their Cauſe by the Addition of all the Forces they cou'd draw together.

Their high and ſevere Proceedings.

In London they regarded nothing but the forming their Army, and ſuch other Acts of Power, as were ſubſervient to that End. And finding the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage to be expired, and having ſent a new one of ſix Months to the King for his Conſent, his Majeſty, finding the Mony employ'd againſt him, refus'd his Royal Aſſent: Upon which, notwithſtanding it had been enacted this Parliament, ‘That whoever paid or receiv'd that Duty, after the Expiration of the Act, till a new one was enacted, ſhould incur a Præmunire;' they appointed by an Ordinance of their own, ‘That the ſame Duty ſhou'd be continu'd, and they wou'd ſave all Perſons concern'd from any Puniſhment whatever:' By which Means they now became poſſeſs'd of the Cuſtoms, in their own Right. And whoever oppos'd or diſcountenanc'd what they undertook, were ſure to be treated with the extreameſt Severity. Particularly Sir Richard Gurney, the brave Lord-Mayor of London, whom the Lords, upon a Complaint of the Commons, had committed to the Tower, for cauſing the King's Proclamation againſt the Ordinance, according to the known Duty of his Office, to be publickly proclaim'd: And ſhortly after, that they might put the Government of the City into more confiding Hands, notwithſtanding he prov'd he had done no more than the Laws of the Land, the Cuſtoms of the City, and his own particular Oath had obliged him to, he was adjudg'd by the Peers, in the Preſence of the Commons, ‘To be put out of his Office of Lord-Mayor, to be utterly incapable of any Office in City or Kingdom, and of all Honour or Dignity, and to be impriſon'd during the Pleaſure of the two Houſes.' Upon this Sentence, Alderman Pennington, againſt the Rules of Election, was made Mayor by the Noiſe and Clamour of the Multitude, and the real and worthy Mayor ſent to the Tower, where he continu'd almoſt to his Death, with exemplary Courage and Conſtancy. Judge Mallet was another Object of their Severity, who for refuſing to read the Parliament's Orders and Ordinance at the Aſſizes, was diſgracefully taken off the Bench at Kingſton, and ſent Priſoner to the Tower; where he continu'd for two Years, without any particular Charge againſt him.

Their Army.

Theſe exalted Acts of Power and Terror taught the World how unſafe that Perſon muſt be, who durſt oppoſe them; and having Men, Arms, a General, and Mony enough at their Diſpoſal, they ſoon form'd an Army, ſecuring ſuch Forces as had been rais'd for the Iriſh Service, and a hundred thouſand Pounds of that Mony at one time, towards conſtituting an Army which was to be led againſt the King: And yet they publiſh'd to the People, ‘That the Army was only for the Defence of the King's Perſon, the Parliament, the Religion, Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom; That the King, ſeduc'd by wicked Counſellors, had rais'd a great Army of Papiſts to deſtroy the Parliament, and bring in Popery and Tyranny, of which they cou'd give full and ample Evidence;' and they conjur'd all Men to aſſiſt their General the Earl of Eſſex. And for the more ſecret Tranſaction of all ſuch Counſels as were neceſſary, they form'd a Committee to attend the great Buſineſs of the Kingdom, relating to the Army, who were impower'd to do many things, which the two Houſes, in full Parliament, had not the leaſt regular or juſtifiable Authority to do. In forming the Army, beſides the Earl of Eſſex, the Earl of Bedford was made General of the Horſe, the Lord Kimbolton Lieutenant-General, and Sir John Merrick, Major-General: The Lord Roberts, the Lord Saint John, the Lord Rochford, the Lord Grey of Grooby; Mr. Denzil Hollis, Mr. Fiennes, Mr. Hampden, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Waller, Sir Samuel Luke, Sir Henry Cholmley, and Mr. Grantham, all Members of Parliament, had Commiſſions for Regiments. The Earl of Holland ſtood for General of the Horſe againſt the Earl of Bedford, but to his great Mortification he was diſappointed; the Parliament not thinking it Policy to truſt two Brothers with Land and Sea Service together. The Name and Quality of moſt of theſe Officers made Amends for their Want of Experience, which was ſupply'd by many good Officers Scotch and Engliſh; the late Troubles having brought many of that Profeſſion to London, and the Reputation of the Earl of Eſſex drawn others out of the Low-Countries, into this Service. In the Choice of which Men, while they accus'd the King of a Deſign to bring in a Foreign Force, and receiving Papiſts, they neither conſider'd Nation nor Religion; but entertain'd all Strangers and Foreigners, of what Religion ſoever, who deſir'd to run the Fortune of War, as the Lord Clarendon aſſures us.

Their Officers.

4. All this Time the King lay at Beverly, ſtill hoping for the Succeſs of the Lord Digby's ſecret Negociation with Sir John Hotham, tho' he met with daily Marks of Diſcouragement. Sir John, according to his Promiſe, had been ſounding ſome of the Officers, and found them of a Temper not to be rely'd on, in ſo important a Deſign; and his Son was grown apprehenſive of ſome new Project, which occaſion'd the Parliament to order new Officers to throw themſelves into the Town, to aſſiſt in the Defence of it upon Occaſion. So that the Lord Digby, when he return'd thither in his former Diſguiſe, found the Governor in a great Damp, and perplex'd that he had proceeded ſo far. Of which his Lordſhip acquainted the King by the beſt Means he cou'd; yet ſtill the Letters contain'd ſomething of Hope, That he ſhou'd be able to reſtore him to his former Courage, and confirm his Reſolution. But at length, after Loſs both of Time and Reputation, the King was compell'd to give over the Deſign, all Hopes being at an End from the Governor, whether from his Want of Courage, or Power to execute his Intentions, remains uncertain. When Sir John found Cauſe to deſiſt, he diſmiſs'd both the Lord Digby and Colonel Aſhburnham, with many Profeſſions of Duty to the King; and as the Concealment of theſe two Perſons, and their Releaſement afterwards, immediately increas'd the Jealouſie of the Parliament againſt him, ſo it was the principal Cauſe afterwards of the Loſs of his Head. Thus ended an Expedition, which if ſucceſsful had been of infinite Service to the King; but the Diſappointment, and Concealment of the Motives of it, prov'd a Matter of Damage and Diſreputation to his Cauſe.

The Deſign upon Hull at an End.

The King returns to York.

About the Beginning of Auguſt the King diſmiſs'd the Train'd-Bands, and return'd with his Court to York, exceedingly troubled at the late Attempt he had made; but ſtill found it highly reaſonable to conceal the Cauſes of it. When all his Friends began to expreſs a great Impatience to be in Action, an Accident fell out that made it abſolutely neceſſary for his Majeſty to declare the War, and to enter upon it, before it was any ways ripe for Execution; which was, that Colonel Goring, who had been intruſted by the Parliament in Portſmouth, had declar'd for the King, after he had moſt artificially impos'd upon the Credulity of the Houſe of Commons. The King's Affairs receiv'd great Life and Advantage, in that ſo important a Place as Portſmouth had declar'd for him, and ſo good an Officer as Goring was return'd to his Duty; tho' the Place was immediately beſieg'd by Sir William Waller. Whereupon, on the 12th Day of Auguſt, his Majeſty publiſh'd a large Declaration, that had long been ready, which he addreſs'd to all his Loving Subjects, and recapitulated all the inſolent and rebellious Actions the two Houſes had committed againſt him till that Time; as may be ſeen at full Length in Husbands Collections, but not in Ruſhworth: And, at the ſame Time publiſh'd his Proclamation, by which, ‘He requir'd all Men, who cou'd bear Arms, to repair to him at Nottingham, by the 22d of this Month of Auguſt, on which Day he wou'd ſet up his ROYAL STANDARD, which all good Subjects were oblig'd to attend.' At the ſame Time he ſent the Marqueſs of Hertford to raiſe Forces, and do him all other Services in the Weſt; and with him went the Lord Seymour his Brother, the Lord Pawlet, Hopton, Stawel, Coventry, Berkley, Windham, and ſome other Gentlemen of the greateſt Quality and Intereſt in thoſe Parts. And from this Party, invigorated by the Power and Reputation of the Marqueſs, his Majeſty hop'd that Portſmouth wou'd ſhortly be reliev'd, and made the Head Quarter to a good Army. After which he did all that was poſſible to be done without Mony, to haſten his Levies of Horſe and Foot, and to prepare a light Train of Artillery; that he might appear at Nottingham, when the Standard was to be erected, with ſuch a Number, as might at leaſt be a competent Guard to his Perſon.

He reſolves to erect his Standard.

Many were of Opinion, that it had been more for his Majeſty's Service if he had ſet up his Standard at York, as having moſt of the Northern Counties at his Devotion; but the Inclinations he had to be near London, and his Hopes of great Effects from Portſmouth and the Weſt, made him prefer Nottingham. But that which determin'd the Point, was the utter Averſion the Yorkſhire Gentlemen had to the King's remaining in York; ‘which, they ſaid, the People fear'd wou'd unavoidably make that Country the Seat of the War;' unſkilfully imagining, That the War wou'd be no where but with the King's Army. But after ſome Recollection, when the Time of the King's Departure drew near, they conſider'd, 'That the Garriſon 'of Hull wou'd be a Thorn in their Sides; that there were 'ſeveral Perſons of Quality and Intereſt in the Country, 'diſſafected to his Majeſty's Service, and ſome Places 'and whole Corporations, who only wanted Leaders to 'carry them to open Arms:' Therefore they deſir'd his Majeſty to conſtitute the Earl of Cumberland ſupream Commander of the Country in all Military Affairs; and appoint Sir Thomas Glemham to ſtay with them, and command thoſe Forces the Earl ſhou'd think neceſſary to raiſe for their Defence; in both which his Majeſty readily gratify'd them. But one nice Point here put the King to a Stand: It ſeems the Lord Fairfax and his Son were almoſt the only Perſons of any conſiderable Quality in that large County who were not well diſpos'd to his Majeſty, and who were influenc'd by two or three of inferior Rank. The King once had reſolv'd to take them all Priſoners, by which he had probably prevented the Miſchiefs which ſhortly after broke out; but was diſſuaded from it by the Gentlemen of the County, who alledg'd, 'That ſuch an 'unpopular Act wou'd prove their Ruin, expoſing them 'to the Fury of the diſaffected Party, who wou'd rather 'increaſe than be weakned by it.' And ſo his Majeſty only took two or three of leſs Note with him, who were moſt active in blowing up the Sedition; and even thoſe in a few Days were upon ſome ſpecious Pretences ſet at Liberty: So tender and careful were Men to perſuade his Majeſty from any thing that carry'd not the full Face of the Law with it, unreaſonably believing the mildeſt Phyſick wou'd be moſt proper for ſuch violent outragious Diſtempers.

The King comes to Nottingham:

5. With theſe melancholy Preſages, and a very mean and unequal Force, his Majeſty departed from York; and taking Lincoln in his Way, and having drawn ſome Arms of the Train'd-Bands of that Country with him, he arriv'd at Nottingham two or three Days before the appointed Time for erecting his Standard. The next Day he took a View of his main Strength his Horſe, of which were ſeveral well furniſh'd Troops, and under good Officers, to the Number of ſeven or eight hundred Men; and being inform'd that by the Earl of Eſſex's Orders there were ſome Regiments of Foot marching towards Coventry, he haſtned with this Force, not doubting but he ſhou'd be able to get Poſſeſſion of that City before their Arrival. He got thither the Day before they came; but not only found the Gates ſhut againſt him, as at Hull, but ſome of his Servants ſhot and wounded from the Walls: Nor cou'd any Meſſages or Summons prevail with the Mayor and Magiſtrates, tho' then without a Garriſon, to ſuffer the King to enter into the City. The King was much ſurpris'd, but knew not how to revenge the Affront; therefore he retir'd that Night to the Houſe of Sir Thomas Lee at Stonely, where he was well receiv'd. The next Day his Body of Horſe, having five or ſix Miles clear View of the Enemies Foot, conſiſting of not above twelve Hundred Men with one Troop of Horſe, which march'd towards Coventry over an open Plain, they retir'd before them, without giving them a ſingle Charge; which was imputed to the ill Conduct of their Commander Wilmot, who had a colder Courage than many under him, who were of Opinion that they might have eaſily defeated that Body of Foot. This wou'd have been a ſeaſonable Victory, which unqueſtionably wou'd have put Coventry into the King's Hands, and prov'd very auſpicious towards the ſetting up his Standard. Whereas that diſhonourable Retreat, which look'd like a Defeat, and the unexpected Behaviour of Coventry, render'd his Majeſty's Return to Nottingham very ominous and melancholy.

Where he ſets up his Royal Standard.

With theſe diſcouraging Circumſtances was the Royal Standard erected, according to the Proclamation, upon the 22d, not 25th Day of Auguſt, about ſix a Clock in the Evening of a very violent tempeſtuous Day. The King in Perſon rode with a ſmall Train to the Top of the Caſtle-Hill, the Standard being born by Sir Edward Varney the Knight Marſhal, who ſet it up in the appointed Place, with little other Solemnity than the Sound of Drums and Trumpets; while many began to obſerve ill Preſages at that Time. There was not one Regiment of Foot yet brought thither, ſo that the Train'd-Bands, which Sir John Digby the active Sheriff had drawn together, were all the Strength the King had for his Perſon, and the Guard of his Royal Standard. There appear'd no numerous Reſort of Men in Obedience to the Proclamation; the Arms and Ammunition were not yet come from York, and a general Damp of Sorrow cover'd the whole Town. The Parliament Army, who were now proclaim'd Rebels, was as near as Northampton, and moving forwards; So that Sir Jacob Aſhley told the King, That he cou'd give no Aſſurance againſt his being taken out of his Bed, if the Rebels ſhou'd make a briſk Attempt upon him. Likewiſe the Standard it ſelf was blown down the ſame Night it was erected, by a ſtrange unruly Wind, and cou'd not be fix'd again in a Day or two, till the Tempeſt was abated. This was the diſconſolate State of the King's Affairs, when the Standard was erected.

1642. Car. 18.

Thus was the famous Civil War in England brought to a compleat Rupture, which was more than Beginning for Half a Year before; and nothing more contributed to this Height, than a Belief of one Party's not being able to reſiſt the other, and the receiv'd Opinion of both Parties, That the War wou'd quickly be at an End. Who were the greateſt Aggreſſors in this War, will readily appear by the foregoing Hiſtory; but if the Reader be ſtill unſatisfy'd, we muſt refer him to a peculiar Author, no ways prejudic'd in Favour of the King, Mr. Roger Coke, who in the Third Edition of his Detection, beginning at Page 280, has ſpent ſixteen Pages to prove againſt Mr. May and others, that the Parliament really began the War upon the King. At this Period of Time the noble Lord Clarendon concludes the Firſt Volume of his celebrated Hiſtory; which for the moſt Part was wrote many Years before he began his Second, before King Charles's Death, and probably before the Concluſion of the firſt War: Which Hint may ſerve as a Guide to his Reader as to ſeveral Paſſages in that Volume, which otherwiſe may not be ſo eaſily accounted for.

CHAP. III.

The CIVIL WARS of England:

From the Setting up the King's Royal Standard, to the Arrival of the Scots in England to the Aſſiſtance of the Parliament.

Containing the Space of one Year, and almoſt 5 Months.

Forerunners of the War.

I. 1. WE are now entering upon a dark Scene of Miſery, a State of Civil War, which ſoon ſpread it ſelf like an univerſal Torrent, and overwhelm'd the whole Nation. This calamitous Seaſon, we are aſſur'd, was uſher'd in by Prodigies and ſtrange portentous Sights ſeen in the Air in many Parts of England, as Muſqueteers, Harneſs'd-Men and Horſe-Men, moving in Battel Array, and attacking each other in ſeveral furious Poſtures; viſibly fore-ſhewing that Storm that was ready to be diſcharg'd upon this guilty Nation. But how incredible ſoever were the Fore-runners of this War, the Conſequences were certainly diſmal and tragical to the higheſt Degree: For beſides the enſuing Deluge of Blood, the Deſtruction of the nobleſt Families, the Deſolation of the beſt Eſtates, and the numberleſs Cries of the Oppreſſed; Treachery and Hypocriſy, Licentiouſneſs and Profaneneſs, Enthuſiaſm and Atheiſm, together with a Violation of all the Laws of Nature and Humanity, were but ſome of the Ingredients of the Calamities that overſpread the whole Kingdom.

The Intereſt of the King in the ſeveral Parts of the Nation.

In order to a more regular Account of this Civil War, we ſhall firſt take Notice of the Intereſt and Power of both Parties, as they were moſt predominant at this Time, and for ſome Time after, in all Parts of the Nation, in reſpect of the North, Eaſt, Weſt and South. As to the North, ſomething has already been ſaid of the King's Intereſt there, and his ſecuring the Town of Newcaſtle. The Eaſt being a ſort of an Angle of the Kingdom, and no great Paſſage into other Parts, and all as it were impaled and ſhut up by the City of London, the Loyal Affections there were ſtifled; yet like a ſmother'd Fire, ſometimes breaking and blazing out, but ſoon extinguiſh'd. So that Middleſex, Kent, Surrey, Suſſex, Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeſhire, were full of good Inclinations for the King, but were carefully kept as freſh Paſtures for the Parliament; for they were properly and ſingly in their Quarters. And tho' the King cou'd no way receive the Benefit of their good Affections, yet he had ſeveral of the chief Gentry along with him; and of this the two Houſes were ſo ſuſpicious, that, tho' they ſhou'd have eas'd them in their Taxes, as moſt properly belonging to themſelves, yet knowing how little they were voluntarily oblig'd by them, they laid that Load upon them, that to this Day they feel the Inequality of it. And being thus kept and ſecur'd, they became a Magazine of Men, Proviſions and Mony throughout the whole War. As to the Weſt, the Sea-Coaſts, the great Trading Towns of Briſtol, Lime, Falmouth, Plimouth and Exeter, ſince the King's Navy was in the Poſſeſſion of the two Houſes, their Intereſt, as well as their Inclinations, made them Parliamentarians: Only the Corniſh Men, as ancient Britains, were eminently Loyal, tho' they had ſtrong Temptations to the contrary. The Inland Towns and Cities in the Weſt were moſt for the King; the chief Noblemen and Gentry through the Country were ſtrictly faithful to their Prince; and the Intereſt of thoſe eminent Members of the Parliament, as Greenvill, Slanning, Hopton, Stowel, Strangeways, Rogers, Windham, &c. and others joyning themſelves to the Marqueſs of Hertford, found ſuch a Diſpoſition in the Generality of the Commons, that when they appear'd as Heads for them to reſort to, thoſe Counties, excepting the great Towns, ſeem'd much more the King's, than the two Houſes Part. As to the South, that border'd ſo much upon London, that like the Eaſt, they were not much at their own Liberty; but it is highly probable, that if the Awe upon them cou'd have been remov'd, and Freedom given them of three Months ranging themſelves under a Commander for the King, his Majeſty wou'd have ſoon appear'd the Governor of the Land.

The Intereſt of the Parliament.

On the other Side, the Authority of the two Houſes, the Riches of the City of London, and the Trading Ports, the vaſt Number of Arms, and Magazines of Powder, Ammunition, and all other Habiliments of War, which they had ſeiz'd on, the mighty Zeal of the Puritan and Parliamentarian Party, ſupported with the King's, Queen's and Prince's Revenue, and generally the Revenue of the Church in their Quarters, and of the confiſcated Eſtates of the Nobility and Gentry gone over to the King, and the heavy Taxes laid upon the Subject, made their Beginnings far ſuperior, and vaſtly to out-ballance the King's Condition. All theſe and many more oppreſſive Ways, lay as ſo many Impediments to hinder Men in theſe Parts from ſerving the King, when their Inclinations were intirely that way: And indeed at this Time the two Houſes had made themſelves abſolute Sovereigns of the Realm, having ſeiz'd on the Militia, and made their Ordinances, as they call'd them, ſufficient Authority to charge the Subject with what Mony and Contributions they pleas'd: And therefore having thus aſſum'd the Sword and the Purſe, the Navy and the Exchequer, as well as all the Fortreſſes and Sea-Towns of the Trading Land; it is no Wonder, that at laſt their Arms prevail'd againſt all Oppoſition. It is a greater Wonder, that the King, ſtruggling with ſo many extraordinary Difficulties, ſhou'd ſometimes arrive at thoſe fair Probabilities of defeating and overthrowing them.

The King's low Condition at firſt.

2. The King's Condition at Nottingham was at firſt very low and melancholy; with ſo ſmall a Force, that he might have been eaſily driven from thence, and indeed out of his Kingdom. And what added to the Trouble, was the News that Portſmouth was ſo ſtraitned, that without Relief, it wou'd be reduc'd in a very few Days; and likewiſe that the Marqueſs of Hertford, and all his Forces in the Weſt, from whom only the Relief of Portſmouth was expected, was driven out of Somerſetſhire, where his Power was greateſt, into Dorſetſhire, and there beſieg'd in Sherborne Caſtle. In this great Anxiety, ſome advis'd his Majeſty to return back to York; but that was look'd upon as too much like a Flight; but moſt deſir'd him to ſend a Meſſage to the Parliament, with ſome Overture to bring them to a Treaty. This was ſo offenſive to the King, that he declar'd, He wou'd never yield to it, and broke up the Council, that it might be no more urg'd. But the next Day the ſame Advice was renew'd with greater Earneſtneſs; and the Earl of Southampton, a Perſon of ſingular Prudence and Reputation, urg'd it as a Thing that might have good, but no bad Effects: And becauſe the King inſiſted upon the Inſolence it wou'd raiſe, and the Diſhonour it wou'd reflect upon Himſelf, they repreſented, 'That their Inſolence wou'd be for his Advantage; and when they ſhou'd reject the Offer of Peace, they wou'd render themſelves the more odious to the People in general.' Other Arguments were us'd, ariſing from the Neceſſity of the King's Affairs, and the Probability of protracting Time; but what chiefly prevail'd at laſt, was the general Expectation, 'That the Pride of the Parliament, and their Contempt of the King's Weakneſs, wou'd cauſe them to refuſe to Treat; which wou'd be a Thing ſo unpopular, and ſo unjuſtifiable to the World, as wou'd at length turn to his Majeſty's Advantage.' This, with the almoſt concurrent Importunity of the Council, caus'd the King to ſend the Earls of Southampton and Dorſet, Sir John Colepepper and Sir William Udal, with a Meſſage to the two Houſes, in which after he had lamented the Diſtractions of the Kingdom, he propos'd, 'That ſome might be by Them enabled to treat with the like Number to be authoriz'd by Himſelf, in ſuch a Manner, and ſuch Freedom of Debate as might tend to the happy Concluſion of the Peace of the Kingdom: And as to the Place, he propos'd That where he was at preſent, or any other they ſhou'd chuſe. If this Propoſition was rejected, he had done his Duty ſo amply, that God wou'd abſolve him from the Guilt of any of that Blood which muſt be ſpilt; and aſſur'd them, That nothing but his Chriſtian and pious Care to prevent the Effuſion of Blood, had begot that Motion.

His Meſſage to the Parliament.

How receiv'd.

This Meſſage, according to Expectation, was receiv'd with unheard-of Inſolence and Contempt; and the Meſſengers were receiv'd in no Degree with that Reſpect that their Worth and Quality, and the Nature of their Buſineſs did deſerve: For the Earl of Southampton going into the Houſe of Peers, where he had never given any juſt Offence, was ſcarce ſat down in his Place, when he was furiouſly call'd upon to withdraw, tho' he modeſtly inform'd them He had a Meſſage from the King. Being compell'd to withdraw, the Gentleman-Uſher of the Houſe was ſent to him to require his Meſſage; but his Lordſhip alledg'd, he was by the King's Command to deliver it himſelf, and refus'd to ſend it, unleſs the Lords made an Order That he ſhould not deliver it himſelf; which they accordingly did. They had no ſooner receiv'd it, but they ſent him word, That at his Peril he ſhou'd immediately depart the Town; and that they wou'd take care their Anſwer to the Meſſage ſhou'd be ſent him. Sir John Colepepper's Treatment from the Commons was much after the ſame manner; yet theſe Meſſengers found Opportunity to get private Conferences with ſome of the Leaders, from whom they receiv'd no other Advice, but 'if the King car'd for Himſelf, or his Poſterity, he muſt immediately come to London, throw Himſelf upon his Parliament, and comply with whatever they propos'd.' Within two Days they receiv'd an Anſwer to the King's Meſſage, in which the Parliament directly told his Majeſty, 'That in ſetting up his Standard againſt them, he had put the two Houſes of Parliament, and in Them his whole Kingdom, out of his Protection: Therefore until he ſhou'd recall thoſe Proclamations, whereby the Earl of Eſſex, both Houſes of Parliament, and all their Adherents, are declar'd Traitors, or otherwiſe Delinquents; and until the Standard be taken down; he had put them into ſuch a Condition, that by the Fundamental Privileges of Parliament, the publick Truſt repos'd in them, or with the general Good and Safety of this Kingdom, they cou'd not give him any other Anſwer to his Meſſage.

The Parliament's Anſwer.

Upon this Anſwer, and a Conſideration of the King's weak and low Condition, ſeveral of his Friends about him privately advis'd him 'To give all other Thoughts over, make all Speed to London, and appear in the Parliament Houſe, before they expected him; and they thought it more likely to prevail this Way, than by any Forces he was to raiſe.' This was a Criſis indeed, and the noble Hiſtorian obſerves, That it muſt be ſolely imputed to the King's own Reſolution, that he took not that Courſe. However he was deſirous to make ſo much further Uſe of their Inſolence, as to give them Occaſion, by another Meſſage, to publiſh more of it to the People; therefore ſhortly after, he ſent his principal Secretary, the Lord Falkland, with a Reply to their Anſwer; in which he aſſerted, 'That he never did, or intended to declare both Houſes of Parliament Traitors, or ſet up his Standard againſt Them; and much leſs to put Them and his Kingdom out of his Protection: He utterly profeſs'd againſt it before God and the World; and farther to remove all poſſible Scruples, that may hinder a Treaty ſo much deſir'd by him, he promis'd, if a Day was appointed by them for the Revoking of their Declarations againſt all Perſons as Traitors, or otherwiſe, for aſſiſting Him; he wou'd chearfully upon the ſame Day recal his Proclamations and Declarations, and take down his Standard. Then he conjur'd them to conſider the bleeding Condition of Ireland, and the dangerous one of England, in as high a Degree, as by theſe Offers he had declar'd himſelf to do.'

The King's Reply.

Their ſecond Anſwer,

To this Meſſage they return'd an Anſwer, the Subſtance of which was, 'That if the King wou'd take down his Standard, recall his Proclamations, &c. leave his Forces, and return to his Parliament, and receive their Faithful Advice, he ſhou'd find ſuch Expreſſions of their Fidelities and Duties as might aſſure him, That his Safety, Honour and Greatneſs, was only to be found in their Affections.' And leſt the King's Overture of a Treaty might diſhearten their Party in their Preparations and Contributions to the War, the ſame Day they ſent this Anſwer, they publiſh'd a Declaration to the Kingdom, ſetting forth, 'That the Arms they had taken up, ſhou'd not be laid down, till the King had withdrawn his Protection from ſuch as both Houſes had, or hereafter ſhall vote to be Delinquents, and ſhall leave them to the Juſtice of the Parliament: That both this and ſucceeding Generations may take Warning, with what Danger they incur ſuch heinous Crimes; and alſo that thoſe great Charges with which the Common-wealth has been burthen'd, ſince the King's Departure, may be born by the ſaid Delinquents; and that all thoſe who, by Loans or otherwiſe, have aſſiſted the Common-

And Declaration.

‘ wealth, or ſhall hereafter aſſiſt it, may be repaid all Sums ‘ lent for that Purpoſe, and be ſatisfy'd out of the Eſtates ‘ of the Delinquents, and other malignant and diſaffected ‘ Perſons.’ This Declaration was ſo far from wounding the King, that it very much advanc'd his Affairs; for all Perſons of Honour and Quality plainly diſcern'd, they had now no Safety but in the Support of the Regal Power, ſince their Eſtates were already diſpos'd of by ſuch as cou'd declare whom they wou'd Delinquents, which wou'd be the Fate of all thoſe who had not concurr'd with them. The Advantage the King receiv'd by his Overtures, and the Pride and Perverſeneſs of the two Houſes, is ſcarce credible; the new Levies, and all other Preparations, being wonderfully advanc'd from the Time of his firſt Meſſage. Yorkſhire, Lincolnſhire and Staffordſhire ſent very good Recruits of Foot, ſo that within twenty Days from his Arrival at Nottingham, his Numbers began to have the Appearance of an Army; and there was another Air in all Mens Faces.

The Practices of the Scots.

A little before Things were brought to this Height, the Scots began to diſcover their Inclinations and Intentions. For tho' by a Petition exhibited to the Lords of his Majeſty's Privy-Council of that Realm, upon the laſt Day of May, they had intimated, ‘ A Deſire to ſhun any juſt Oc‘caſion, that might give Offence to their gracious Sove‘reign, or a Jealouſy to their Brethren of England;’ yet when they heard that their Friends in England had put themſelves in Arms, and were every way ſo powerful, and his Majeſty ſo very weak; they then not only ſhew'd themſelves more open, but likewiſe ſent a Form of their Kirk-Government to the Parliament at Weſtminſter, as a Pattern for Reformation; which they declar'd to be Jure Divino and Perpetual. This they ſent with a Deſire of the Aſſembly of that Kirk, that the ſame might be eſtabliſh'd in England; and a Declaration of their Affection to the Reformation in Kirk and State, wherein they ſignify'd ‘ Their ‘ Expectations, that England wou'd now beſtir themſelves, ‘ and extirpate the Prelatical Hierarchy, that the Remain‘der of the Work might be more eaſy; offering their Aſ‘ſiſtance for the furthering thereof;’ Of which more hereafter.

The Pride and Severity of the two Houſes.

3. The two Houſes by their laſt Declaration had made a falſe Step, and given unexpected Advantages to the King; which cou'd be attributed to nothing ſo much as their Pride, and Contempt of his Majeſty's inferior Power at that Time. The ſame Pride caus'd them to treat the greateſt Men with the higheſt Indignity; and where-ever their Forces found any Perſon of Quality inſecure to their Intereſt, they ſeiz'd upon his Perſon, and ſent him in great Triumph to the Parliament, who impriſon'd him with all Circumſtances of Cruelty and Inhumanity. Thus they took the old Lord Mountague of Boughton, at his Houſe in Northamptonſhire, a venerable Perſon of above Fourſcore Years of Age, and of Reputation unblemiſh'd, for declaring himſelf unſatisfy'd with their high Proceedings; and notwithſtanding he had a Brother and a Nephew in the Houſe of Peers, the Earl of Mancheſter and the Lord Kimbolton, and a Son in the Houſe of Commons, who cou'd have aſſiſted him, his Lordſhip was detain'd a Priſoner to his Death. In Oxfordſhire they took the Earl of Berkſhire, and three or four principal Gentlemen of that County, and committed them to the Tower, tho' they never once appeared in the King's Service. And thus they took the Earl of Bath in Devonſhire, who neither did, nor wou'd do the King any Service, and carry'd him, with many other Gentlemen of thoſe Parts, with a ſtrong Guard to London; where, after they had been expos'd to the Reproaches of the Vulgar, who call'd them Traitors and Rebels, and treated them like the moſt infamous Malefactors, they were without Examination committed to ſeveral Priſons. So that not only all the Priſons about London were ſoon filled with Perſons of Honour, and the beſt Reputation in their Counties, but other Priſons were made for their Reception: And by a new and barbarous Invention, a great many of good Quality, both of the Clergy and Laity, were impriſon'd on Board the Ships in the Thames; where they were kept under Decks, and no Friend ſuffer'd to ſee them; by which means many dy'd after a miſerable Manner.

That the Loſs of Liberty might not be their only Puniſhment, it was the uſual Method, which few eſcap'd, that after a Man was thus committed, his Eſtate and Goods were ſeiz'd, either by Order of the Commons, or ſome Committee, or the Soldiers, who in their March plunder'd all Papiſts and Malignants; or by the Fury of the common People, who ſoon grew ſo barbarous to the Nobility and Gentry, under the Name of Cavaliers, that they cou'd not live ſafe in their Houſes, unleſs they were known Friends to the Parliament. Thus the common People in Eſſex ſuddenly beſet the Houſe of Sir John Lucas, an eminent Royaliſt, and one of the chief Gentlemen of that County; and upon Pretence he was going to the King, ſeiz'd all his Arms and Horſes, and then his Perſon, and us'd him with the utmoſt Indignities, not without Threats upon his Life. After he was ſecur'd at Colcheſter, the Houſe of Commons remov'd him to another Priſon, and ſent all his Horſes into the Service of their own Army. The ſame Rabble likewiſe enter'd the Houſe of the Counteſs of Rivers, near Colcheſter, as being a profeſſed Papiſt, and in a few Hours disfurniſh'd it of all the Goods, which had been gathering many Years with great Curioſity, to the Value of forty Thouſand Pounds. Dr. Ryves tells us that her Loſſes in her ſeveral Houſes and Parks amounted to a hundred Thouſand Pounds at leaſt. She her ſelf hardly eſcap'd, after great Inſolence had been us'd to her Perſon; and ſhe cou'd never receive any Reparation from the Parliament. All which Wild-Fire among the People, was not ſo effectually kindled by the Breath of the Parliament, as by the Mouths of their Clergy, who both adminiſter'd Fuel, and blow'd the Coals in the Houſes. Theſe Men, who before had driven out the moſt Learned from the Pulpits, and infus'd the moſt ſeditious Inclinations, now cou'd contain themſelves in no Bounds; but as freely inveigh'd againſt the Perſon of the King, as before againſt the worſt Malignant; ſhamefully applying whatever had been declar'd by God, or his Prophets, againſt the moſt impious Kings, to excite the People againſt their preſent Sovereign. Which occaſion'd the noble Hiſtorian to exclaim againſt theſe Pulpit Incendiaries, and to intimate, that the Preaching Rebellion out of the Pulpits, was ſo much worſe than Proclaiming it in the Market, as the Poyſoning a Man at the Communion wou'd be worſe than Murthering him at a Tavern.

The Inſolence of their Preachers.

Theſe unpopular Proceedings ſoon ſhew'd, that the Houſes Empire and Sovereignty depended more on the Fear, than the Love of the People. And that no Religious Methods might be wanting to ſtrengthen it, they fram'd a particular Oath, to be taken by all their Members, ‘ To live and die with the Earl of Eſſex;’ which they found Occaſion to drop in two Years Time. This was particularly refus'd by that brave Gentleman, Sir Sidney Mountague, Maſter of Requeſt, and Brother to the Lord Mountague lately mention'd; who declar'd, He would not ſwear to live with him, becauſe he was an old Man, and might die before him; nor wou'd he ſwear to die with him, ſince he was going with an Army againſt the King, which he cou'd not clear from Treaſon; and ſo did not know what End that great Man might come to. But for this Reflection, he was immediately expell'd the Houſe of Commons, and another choſen in his Room, to ſerve as Knight for Huntingtonſhire. The raiſing of Mony was now their chief End, and whereas before they had invited Perſons to advance it, they now chang'd their Methods, and voted, ‘ That thoſe that wou'd not contribute to the Charge of the ‘ Commonwealth, ſhou'd be ſecur'd and diſarm'd.’ Mr. Fountain, an eminent Lawyer, being ask'd to contribute, reply'd, That by the Petition of Right he was not to anſwer Yea or No; for which Anſwer, as well as Refuſal, he was treated as a Malignant, and committed to Priſon. They further appointed a particular Committee for the Sequeſtration of the Lands of Biſhops, and of Deans and Chapters, and of all the King's Revenues they cou'd reach, to be employ'd for the Defence of the Commonwealth.

Further Severities.

The Earl of Eſſex leaves London.

4. Such were the Proceedings of the Parliament at, or near the Time when their General, the Earl of Eſſex, ſet forwards for his Expedition; which he did on the 9th Day of September, in a triumphant Manner, attended by moſt of the Parliament, ſeveral gallant Officers, and many thouſands of the People, who ſurrounded him with joyful Acclamations and Huzzas: Tho' ſome with Murmurs ventur'd to ſay, So was done and ſaid to his Father, in his Expedition towards Ireland, who return'd back a Traitor, and loſt his Head. The General's Colours was a deep Yellow, ſo that the wearing any other became a Mark of one diſaffected to the Cauſe; ſo ſmall a Thing was obſerv'd in the Jealouſies of War. About Barnett the Earl met the venerable Lord Mountague before-mention'd, then Priſoner to the Parliament, and ſtopt his Coach with a Deſign to ſalute him; but the old Lord immediately commanded his Coach-man to drive away, ſaying, This was not a Time for Compliments! which gave a ſenſible Check to the General's Career. The general Rendezvous was at Northampton, where at this Time was an Army of fifteen thouſand effective Men, beſides ſeveral Bodies in other Parts.

While the Earl of Eſſex was at Northampton, the King, having receiv'd his two valiant Nephews, Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, left the Town of Nottingham on the thirteenth of September. But before his Departure, as a Farewell to his Hopes of a Treaty, to make a deeper Impreſſion on the Hearts of the People, he ſent another Meſſage to the two Houſes, in which he ſhew'd them ‘ What ‘ Endeavours he had us'd by his many Offers, but cou'd ‘ not obtain any Treaty; and therefore now declar'd,

The King's Meſſage to the Houſes.

‘ That

1642. Car. 18.

‘ That being thus left to his neceſſary Defence; relying ‘ only on the Providence of God, the Juſtneſs of his Cauſe, ‘ and the Affections of his good People; he ſhou'd yet pi‑ ‘ ouſly remember the Blood that was to be ſpilt in his Quar‑ ‘ rel, and chearfully embrace a Treaty, whenever they ‘ ſhou'd deſire it.’ To this they return'd a ſcornful and inſulting Anſwer, in which they tax'd him ‘ with com‑ ‘ mitting Oppreſſions, Rapines and Murthers upon his good ‘ Subjects; declaring that they had offer'd him all Securi‑ ‘ ty, Honour, Service, Obedience, Support, &c. and ‘ ſought nothing, but that their Religion, Liberty, Peace ‘ of the Kingdom, and Safety of the Parliament might be ‘ ſecur'd from the open Violence, and cunning Practices ‘ of a wicked Party, who had long plotted their Deſtructi‑ ‘ on: Upbraiding him, That Iriſh Traitors and Rebels ‘ were admitted to his Preſence, Grace and Favour; and ‘ telling him, if he wou'd return to his Parliament with‑ ‘ out his Forces, they wou'd ſecure his Royal Perſon, ‘ Crown and Dignity.

Their Anſwer.

The King having left Nottingham, he march'd to Derby, from whence with a daily Encreaſe of his Forces he bent his Courſe towards Shrewsbury, a Place very promiſing, and of great Moment; from whence he hop'd to ſecure both Worceſter and Cheſter, and a great Part of Wales. Having drawn all his Men to a Rendezvous by Wellington, a Day's March ſhort of Shrewsbury, he the firſt Time cauſed his Military Orders to be read; and putting himſelf in the middle, where he might beſt be heard, in a ſet Speech he told them, ‘ after an Inforcement of theſe Orders, that ‘ he cou'd not ſuſpect their Courage and Reſolution, their ‘ Conſcience and Loyalty had brought them thither, to ‘ fight for their Religion, their King, and the Laws of the ‘ Land. They ſhou'd meet with no Enemies but Trai‑ ‘ tors, moſt of them Browniſts, Anabaptiſts and Atheiſts; ‘ ſuch who deſire to deſtroy both Church and State, and ‘ who had already condemn'd Them to Ruin, for being ‘ Loyal to Him.’ Then after he had promis'd them to live and die with them, he made a ſolemn Proteſtation to them in theſe Words: I do promiſe in the Preſence of Almighty God, and as I hope for his Bleſſing and Protection, that I will, to the utmoſt of my Power, defend and maintain the true Reform'd Proteſtant Religion, eſtabliſhed in the Church of England; and, by the Grace of God, in the ſame live and die. I do deſire to govern by the known Laws of the Land, and that the Liberty and Property of the Subject may be by them preſerv'd with the ſame Care as my own juſt Rights. And if it pleaſe God, by his Bleſſing upon this Army, rais'd for my neceſſary Defence, to preſerve me from this Rebellion, I do ſolemnly and faithfully promiſe, in the Sight of God, to maintain the juſt Privileges and Freedom of Parliament, and to govern by the known Laws of the Land to my utmoſt Power, and particularly to obſerve inviolably the Laws conſented to by me this Parliament. In the mean while, if this Time of War, and the great Neceſſity and Straits I am now driven to, beget any Violation of Thoſe, I hope it ſhall be imputed by God and Men to the Authors of the War, and not to Me, who have ſo earneſtly labour'd for the Preſervation of the Peace of the Kingdom. When I willingly fail in theſe Particulars, I will expect no Aid or Relief from any Man, or Protection from Heaven: But in this Reſolution I hope for the chearful Aſſiſtance of all good Men, and am confident of God's Bleſſing.

The King's Speech and Proteſtation to his Army.

This Proteſtation, with the ſolemn Manner of making it, gave great Life and Encouragement to the little Army, and no leſs Comfort and Satisfaction to the Gentry and Inhabitants of thoſe Parts; who by the Parliament had been taught to believe, That if the King prevail'd, he wou'd by his Power aboliſh all thoſe good Laws which had been made this Parliament: So that they eſteem'd this Proteſtation, as a more ample Security for thoſe Acts, than the Royal Aſſent he had before given. And a more zealous and paſſionate Expreſſion of Affections cannot be imagin'd, than he receiv'd from the People of Derby, Stafford and Shropſhire, as he paſs'd along; or a better Reception than he found at Shrewsbury it ſelf, where he enter'd on the 20th Day of September. The Town was very commodious in all Reſpects, ſtrong in its Situation; and in reſpect to the Neighbourhood of North-Wales, and the Uſe of the Severn, yielded excellent Proviſions of all Kinds; ſo that both Court and Army were for a while very well accommodated. Here the King found a great Conflux of the Gentry there, and the neighbouring Counties, which were generally well affected, and made great Profeſſions of Duty to their Sovereign; and ſome of them undertook to make Levies of Horſe and Foot, and perform'd it at their own Charge. Before his Majeſty's Arrival, as I have been aſſur'd by a good Hand, no Parts had been more poyſon'd than theſe by the Parliament Emiſſaries, who made the inferior People to believe that the King was no better than a Monſter of a Man; but when he came to ſhew Himſelf in all Places with that obliging Behaviour, Candour and Condeſcenſion, and other amiable Qualities, he ſoon diſpell'd thoſe dark Miſts, and manifeſted Himſelf both a King, and a Father of his Country.

He arrives at Shrewſbury.

1642. Car. 18.

5. It was much admir'd, that the Earl of Eſſex ſhou'd neither diſturb the King at Nottingham, nor in his March to Shrewsbury; which if he had done, he might have taken him Priſoner, or intirely diſpers'd his ſmall Army. But this is attributed to the General's Want of Inſtructions, but more to the Pride and Contempt of the two Houſes, who preſum'd it wou'd be impoſſible for his Majeſty long to maintain any Forces, and that when his Followers were grown weary and unable to bear the Burthen of their own Charges, he muſt be forc'd to throw himſelf upon Them for Protection and Subſiſtance; and ſuch a Victory without Blood had crown'd all their Deſigns. But they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken, by means of a ſharp Rencounter that hapned near Worceſter, upon this Occaſion. The King hearing that the Earl of Eſſex was bending his March towards Worceſter, ſent Prince Rupert with the greateſt Part of the Horſe, on the other ſide the Severn, towards that City; particularly to ſecure the Retreat of thoſe Gentlemen, who were raiſing Forces for him; but eſpecially to joyn with Sir John Byron, whom he had ſent to Oxford to convey ſome Mony, which had ſecretly been brought thither from London. And he, after ſome ſmall Diſaſters in his March, came ſafe with his Charge to Worceſter; where he had but juſt arriv'd, when a ſtrong Party of Horſe and Dragoons, under the Command of Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, was ſent to ſurpriſe the Town, which cou'd have made no tolerable Reſiſtance of it ſelf. About the ſame Time, Prince Rupert, after a long March, with his Brother Prince Maurice, the Lord Digby, and other Commanders, got near a Place call'd Powick-Bridge, within a Mile and a Half from Worceſter, where reſting themſelves upon the Ground, they eſpied a fair Body of five Hundred Horſe marching in good Order up a Lane within Muſquet Shot of them. In this Confuſion, they had ſcarce Time to get upon their Horſes, much leſs to conſult; but this intrepid Prince declar'd he wou'd charge, and his Brother and all thoſe Officers whoſe Troops were not ready, bravely put themſelves next the Prince, before they cou'd get on their Armour; the other wearied Troops coming in Order after them. In this Manner the Prince charg'd them, as ſoon as they came out of the Lane; and being ſeconded by this Handful of valiant Men, tho' the other Party being gallantly led by Colonel Sandys, and compleatly arm'd both for Offence and Defence, ſtood well, yet in a ſhort Time many of their beſt Men being kill'd, and Sandys himſelf falling with his Wounds, the whole Body was totally routed, and for above a Mile purſu'd by the Conquerors, who cou'd not kill above fifty of them, by reaſon of the Goodneſs of their Armour, and the freſhneſs of their Horſes. Colonel Sandys and Major Douglaſs were ſlain; Captain Wingate, a Member of the Houſe of Commons, and two or three Scotch Officers were taken Priſoners, beſides ſix or ſeven Cornets, many good Horſes, and ſome Arms.

The firſt Rencounter at Powick-Bridge.

The Advantage on the King's Side.

This was the firſt Engagement that hapned between the Forces of the King and Parliament, (tho' ſome little Blood had been drawn before,) which is call'd a Rencounter or Skirmiſh, and by ſome, The Fight at Powick-Bridge, which fell upon the 23d Day of September. This prov'd of ſingular Advantage to the King, for it being the firſt Tryal of his Horſe, againſt a Party of ſelect Men, it gave his Troops great Courage, and render'd the Name of Prince Rupert very formidable, and much confounded the Enemy; ſo that for a long Time after they had no Confidence in their Horſe, and their Numbers were much leſſen'd by it. For that whole Party being routed, and the beſt Officers either kill'd or taken, tho' the Number loſt was inconſiderable, there were many more who never return'd to the Service; and to extenuate their own Cowardiſe, made loud Reports of the incredible and irreſiſtable Courage of Prince Rupert, and the King's Horſe. The two Houſes were not a little diſcourag'd, yet leſt the Truth of this Action ſhou'd diſhearten their Friends in London, or other remote Parts, they not only caus'd ſeveral printed Papers to be diſpers'd, extolling it as a great Victory; but that it might gain the more Credit, ordain'd a publick Thankſgiving in London for it, on the 27th of the ſame Month, as we are told by Sir William Dugdale. At the ſame Time they ſent Inſtructions to their General, the Earl of Eſſex, to march and fight the King's Forces, and reſcue his Perſon, with the Prince, and Duke of York, from thoſe about him; and to deliver a Petition, importing, ‘ That if his Majeſty pleas'd to with‑ ‘ draw himſelf from his Forces, and reſort to his Parlia‑ ‘ ment, the Earl ſhou'd cauſe thoſe Forces to diſband, and ‘ ſhou'd ſerve and defend the King with ſufficient Strength ‘ in his Return.’ They likewiſe offer'd Pardon to all Perſons that ſhou'd come over to them in ten Days, ‘ Except ‘ Delinquents already voted, or to be voted guilty of High‑ ‘ Treaſon, or who have been eminent or active againſt

‘ the Parliament; and except the Duke of Richmond, the Earls of Briſtol, Cumberland, Newcaſtle, Rivers, and Carnarvon, the Viſcounts Newark and Falkland, Secretary Nicolas, Mr. Endymion Porter, and Mr. Edward Hyde.’

The Parliament's Dealings with the States of Holland.

No Time was loſt, but the Houſes proceeded with the utmoſt Vigour, both in relation to Foreign and Domeſtick Aſſiſtances: To the States of Holland they ſent a ſpecial Declaration, ‘ Complaining of the Prince of Orange, for countenancing the Lord Digby, in his Warlike Preparations there for the King's Uſe; and in Favour of that Lord, and other wicked Counſellors, to have licenc'd experienc'd Officers and Soldiers to reſort into this Kingdom, in aid of the King againſt the Parliament. Declaring, that the King's Councils were corrupted by a Jeſuitical Faction, and that he had drawn his Sword for the Deſtruction of his People: Deſiring therefore that he might have no manner of Supplies from thence; and inſinuating withal, how near a Relation there was between that Model into which they aim'd to caſt this Government, and the State of thoſe Provinces; and therefore they expected Aſſiſtance from them.’ Nor did they reſt here, as appears from thoſe Inſtructions which they afterwards ſent into Holland; by which they repreſented to the States, ‘ That the Parliament of England did only ſtrive for Reformation of that Religion and State they live in; and therefore deſir'd thoſe States, that they wou'd now Afford them their Brotherly Aſſiſtance, as they had formerly aſſiſted Them: As alſo they wou'd enlarge their Union to other Princes, and lend them ſome Mony upon the Publick Faith of both Kingdoms; and the rather, becauſe they made the Reformed Churches the Pattern of their Endeavours.’

Their Declarations and Orders.

Neither cou'd they be ſilent at home; but the more to excite the People, by a Declaration they inculcated to them, ‘ That the King had rais'd an Army, by the Help of Papiſts, the corrupt Part of the Clergy, the Delinquent Nobility and Gentry, and ſome notable Traytors beyond Sea: That they had Liberty to rob and ſpoil all Sorts of People; as alſo to exact Mony and Plate from Corporations, by threatning Fire and Sword to the Refuſers: That he had hired a Scotchman to murther Sir John Hotham; that by violent Oppreſſions he had exhauſted the Parts about Shrewsbury; and that the Cavaliers were hungry for the Wealth of London, and the fruitful Parts adjacent: That if he prevail'd, they cou'd expect nothing but to be expos'd to the Malice of his ravenous Soldiers, and to have the Throats cut of all honeſt and religious Men. Therefore the Means of curing and preventing theſe Dangers, muſt be by a Loan and Contribution to the Earl of Eſſex's Army.’ And tho' they exclaim'd againſt Papiſts, as if the King's Army conſiſted chiefly of them; yet without Scruple they made this Publick Order, ‘ That if any Papiſt wou'd bring in conſiderable Sums to them, upon the Propoſitions, it ſhou'd be accepted of.’ To ſum up all, they iſſu'd forth another Declaration, in which, in the Preſence of Almighty God, they proteſt and declare, to this Kingdom, and the whole World, ‘ That no private Paſſion, or evil Intention to his Majeſty's Perſon; no Deſign to the Prejudice of his juſt Honour and Authority, had engag'd them to raiſe Forces, &c. That they had profeſs'd their Loyalty by ſeveral Remonſtrances; that they had paſs'd by ignominious Slanders, &c. that for the avoiding of Blood, they had directed the Earl of Eſſex to cauſe a Petition to be preſented to the King, and ſafe Conduct was refus'd for the Delivery of it; that he was engaged to the Popiſh Party for Suppreſſion and Extirpation of the true Religion, and expoſing the Wealth of this Kingdom to be plunder'd by Cavaliers, &c. contrary to his ſolemn Oaths, Proteſtations and Execrations; and therefore they reſolve to enter into a Solemn Oath and Covenant, to defend this Cauſe with the Hazard of their Lives againſt the King's Army: And they expected Help here from their Brethren of Scotland.’ This was on the 22d Day of October; which was the firſt Mention of the Scotch Covenant in England.

The King's Speeches and Behaviour in ſeveral Places.

6. All this Time the King was daily gathering Strength and Intereſt, and increaſing his Army with uncommon Succeſs. Tho' his Head Quarters were at Shrewsbury, yet he repair'd to Cheſter, and other adjacent Parts, to countenance his Levies, and to advance his Cauſe. His Cuſtom was in all Counties, through which he paſs'd, to cauſe the High-Sheriff to draw all the Gentlemen and moſt ſubſtantial Inhabitants of thoſe Parts together; when ſeverally applying himſelf to the Principal, with great Familiarity and Obligingneſs, he always ſpoke ſomething publickly; ‘ In which he laid open all the Artifices that had been us'd, and all the Injuries that had been done by the prevailing Faction in the two Houſes, with the neceſſary Tendency in their Deſigns to ruin both the Church and the State. He told them, That it was a Benefit to him from the Inſolencies and Misfortunes which had driven him about, that they had brought him to ſo good a Part of his Kingdom, and to ſo faithful a Part of his People. He declar'd Himſelf ſo robb'd and ſpoil'd of all his own, and ſuch Terror us'd to fright all Men from ſupplying him, that he muſt only live upon the Aid and Relief of his People. Yet he had ſent for a Mint, and wou'd melt down all his own Plate, and expoſe all his Land to Sale or Mortgage, that he might bring the leſs Preſſure upon them. However he invited them to give him all neceſſary Aſſiſtance, and not let ſo good a Cauſe be loſt for want of Supplies. Then he promis'd them, If God bleſs'd him with Succeſs, he wou'd remember the Service of every particular Perſon with Advantage.’ He likewiſe took Notice of any particular Reports, which might have made Impreſſions upon the People, and gave clear Anſwers to them. With theſe and the like Speeches, together with his gracious and Princely Demeanour, it is hardly credible how much it won upon the People; ſome had their Hearts melted into Pity, others their Minds rous'd with Indignation, and all ſhew'd their Reſolutions to help his Majeſty in this Extremity. Some liſted themſelves as Voluntiers, and others brought in Mony and Plate; and when they ſaw the King's own Plate deliver'd to the Mint at Shrewsbury, they thought theirs was leſs worth the preſerving.

After nine or ten Days Progreſs, in which the King ſecur'd Cheſter, the Key to Ireland, and ſome parts of Wales, his Majeſty return'd to Shrewsbury; where he met with Prince Rupert, who after the late Action at Powick-Bridge, finding the City of Worceſter in no Degree tenable, left it to the Power of the Earl of Eſſex, who us'd great Severity to the Royaliſts, and ſent the Principal of them Priſoners to London. At Shrewsbury the King met with a greater Conflux of the Gentry than before, and all Things appear'd with a more promiſing Aſpect. Yet ſtill he labour'd under two great Difficulties, the want of Mony, and the want of Arms; without a Supply of both, he cou'd make no March, nor undertake any Action of Importance.

His Ways of procuring Mony.

The firſt Supply the King receiv'd, was from the Generoſity of the two Univerſities, who with great Secrecy and Readineſs preſented him with almoſt all their Plate, which was then very conſiderable, and a large Sum of Mony. This prov'd a moſt ſeaſonable Preſent, it being made when the King and his Friends were moſt dejected, and in the loweſt Condition at Nottingham; and was ſoon diſpos'd of, part to Officers for Levies, and part into the Mint at Shrewsbury. Two new Expedients were propos'd to the King; a Loan from the chief Papiſts in thoſe Parts, and the Sale of ſome Honours: But his Majeſty was very unwilling to hearken to either, having already felt too many Inconveniencies from both. But as to the Papiſts, it was at length agreed, That the chief of them ſhou'd immediately advance two or three Years of ſuch Rent as they were annually oblig'd to pay to him, upon the Compoſition they had made for their Eſtates, as Recuſants; which in a few Days produc'd four or five thouſand Pounds to his Coffers. As to the other Expedient, the King graciouſly condeſcended to conſider ſo eminent and worthy a Perſon as Sir Richard Newport, who liv'd near Shrewsbury, and advanc'd him to a Baron of England, by the Title of Lord Newport of High-Ercall: For which the Loyal Gentleman preſented his Majeſty with the Sum of ſix thouſand Pounds.

The other Want, of Arms, was ſtill greater than that of Mony, in which the King was extreamly diſappointed; a Veſſel or two from Holland having been taken by his own Ships, under the Earl of Warwick; ſo that, except thoſe few before-mention'd, which came over in the Providence Frigate, he had none at his own Diſpoſal. Inſomuch that he was compell'd to begin at Nottingham, and ſo in other Places, to borrow the Arms from the Train'd-Bands; which was effected with ſo much Caution, that it appear'd rather with their Conſent, than by any Conſtraint, and always with the Approbation of their Commanders. This Tenderneſs prov'd too nice, and gave Opportunity to have many Arms imploy'd againſt him; as in ſeveral Places where the Gentlemen, with miſtaken Notions, tho' with good Intentions, deſir'd that they might be ſtill left in the Country-Men's Hands. But by Degrees the Nobility and Gentry ſupply'd the King out of their own mean Armories, ſo far, that all the Foot, except three or four hundred who march'd with no Weapon but a Cudgel, were arm'd with Muskets and Pikes; but there was not a Pike-Man who had a Corſlet, and very few Muſqueteers who had Swords. Among the Horſe, the Officers thought themſelves well accouter'd, if they could procure old Backs and Breaſts, with Piſtols or Carbines for their two or three firſt Ranks, and Swords for the reſt; having themſelves, with ſome few others, gotten a ſhort Pole-Ax beſides. The King's Forces were now encreas'd beyond

The Strength of the King's Army at Shrewſbury.

beyond Expectation, and the Difference between his Majeſty's Condition at Nottingham and now at Shrewsbury was ſcarce credible; tho' ſtill his Strength was much inferior to the Enemy. His Foot conſiſted of about ſix thouſand, his Horſe of two thouſand, and his Dragoons of near one thouſand; and his Train in very good Order, commanded by Sir John Heydon. The Foot was divided into three Brigades; the firſt commanded by Sir Nicolas Byron, the ſecond by Colonel Henry Wentworth, the third by Colonel Richard Fielding, Sir Jacob Aſhley being Major-General, and commanding the Foot immediately under the General himſelf. Old General Ruthen, a brave Scotch Commander, was made Field-Marſhal, but kept wholly with the Horſe to aſſiſt Prince Rupert; and Sir Arthur Aſton, a Perſon of great Fame, was made Colonel-General of the Dragoons. Moſt of the Perſons of Quality, except thoſe about his Majeſty's Perſon, put themſelves into the King's Troop of Guards, commanded by the Lord Bernard Stewart; and compos'd ſo gallant a Body, that upon a modeſt Computation, it was judg'd that the Eſtates belonging to that ſingle Troop, were equal to all theirs, who then paſs'd for the Lords and Commons of England in Parliament, who made and maintain'd that War. The Prince of Wales, now twelve Years of Age, had the honorary Command of this Troop, and the King was Generaliſſimo of the whole, who declar'd, They ſhou'd not hazard themſelves more in Defence of their own Laws and Liberties, than himſelf, nor endanger themſelves for his Perſon more than his own dear Child.

The King marches from Shrewſbury towards London.

7. With theſe Preparations the King march'd from Shrewsbury, on the twelfth of October to Bridgenorth, having in his whole Army not one Field-Officer ſuppos'd to be a Papiſt, except Sir Arthur Aſton, and very few common Soldiers of that Religion. There was ſome Difference of Opinion which way he ſhou'd take; many thought he ſhou'd march towards Worceſter, where the Earl of Eſſex ſtill remain'd; and many Reaſons were alledg'd for that Deſign. But at length it was judg'd more adviſable to march directly towards the Center of all Misfortunes, the City of London; not queſtioning but that the Earl of Eſſex wou'd put himſelf in the Way. The King had great Confidence in his Nephew Prince Rupert, and his Horſe under him, which were highly exalted with their Succeſs at Worceſter; and if he march'd that way, he wou'd have been hamper'd in the Encloſure, where the Horſe wou'd have been leſs uſeful; whereas there were many open Fields the other Way, much fitter for an Ingagement. At Bridgenorth, ten Miles from Shrewsbury, there was a Rendezvous of the whole Army; which march'd from thence to Wolverhampton, Bromicham and Killingworth, where the King reſted one Day at a noble Seat of his own; here the Lord Chief Juſtice Heath began to ſit upon a Commiſſion of Oyer and Terminer, to attaint the Earl of Eſſex, and many other Perſons, of Rebellion and Treaſon.

The City provide for themſelves.

The March and Encreaſe of the King's Forces, began very much to allarm the City of London, who were long made to believe That it was impoſſible for the King to raiſe an Army; agreeable to what the Lord Say but lately declar'd to the Gentry of Oxfordſhire, at a publick Aſſembly, Upon his Honour, the King had neither Mony, Power, nor Credit. But the Danger being now more apparent, the Parliament order'd the Train'd-Bands to be in Readineſs, and all the Paſſages about the City to be fortify'd with Poſts, Chains, and Courts of Guard; and it was ſurprizing to ſee how the Women and Children, and vaſt Numbers of People came to Work, about digging and carrying of Earth, to make their new Fortifications; till a regular Line and Circumvallation, of twelve Miles in Compaſs, was quite finiſhed. Windſor Caſtle was at this time garriſon'd by the Parliament, Colonel Ven being ſent down as Governor, with twelve Companies of Foot. Several Citizens ſuſpected for their Loyalty and Affection to the King, were alſo at this time ſecured; and the Aſſociation of ſeveral neighbouring Counties firſt projected and begun. Indeed the King's chief Aim was for London, which at the Approach of ſuch an Army, wou'd put his Friends in a Capacity to appear for him, and bring the War to a ſhort Period, which the King paſſionately deſir'd. But conſidering how dangerous it was to be inclos'd between the Parliament Army and the City, he reſolv'd to face about, and fight the Earl of Eſſex firſt, who having garriſon'd ſeveral Places, and leſſen'd his numerous Army, was advancing after him.

The Strength of Eſſex's Army.

For within two Days after the King march'd from Shrewſbury, the Earl of Eſſex mov'd from Worceſter to attend him, with an Army ſtill much ſuperior in Number; the Horſe and Foot were compleatly arm'd, the Men well exercis'd, and the whole Equipage ſuitable to an Army ſet forth at the Charge of a Kingdom. The Earl of Bedford had the Title of General of the Horſe, tho' that Command principally depended upon Sir William Balfour. Beſides many Gentlemen of Quality, there were in this Army the Lords Kimbolton, Saint John, Wharton and Roberts; as likewiſe the Lords Rochford and Fielding, whoſe Fathers, the Earls of Dover and Denbigh, charg'd as Volunteers in the King's Troop of Guards. The General's Train was ſo great, that he cou'd make but very ſlow Marches; ſo that the two Armies, tho' they were but twenty Miles aſunder when they ſet forth from Worceſter and Bridgenorth, and both aim'd towards the ſame Center, gave no Diſturbance to each other for near ten Days together; and in reality neither Army knew exactly where the other was.

Faction began in the King's Army.

Such was the Forwardneſs of both Parties, before they came to any great Action; in which the King was not only inferior, but had a peculiar Misfortune, as ſoon as he began to march; which was an unhappy Jealouſie and Diviſion among the principal Officers, which ſoon grew into a perfect Faction between the Foot and the Horſe. The worthy Earl of Lindſey was General of the whole Army by his Commiſſion; but when Prince Rupert was made General of the Horſe, there was a Clauſe inſerted in his Commiſſion, exempting him from receiving Orders from any Perſon but the King himſelf, which in Effect made him independent upon the General. So that when the King, being in his Bed at Midnight, had receiv'd Intelligence of the Enemy's Motion, and commanded the Lord Falkland to direct the Prince what he ſhou'd do; his Highneſs took it very ill, and inſiſted upon the Words of his Commiſſion; upon which that punctual Lord told him, It was his Office to ſignify what the King bid him, which he ſhou'd always do; and that his Highneſs in neglecting it, neglected the King. But the King too much comply'd with his rough Nature, and was ſo indulgent to him, tho' then but twenty three Years of Age, that he took his Advice in all Things relating to the Army; rejecting the Opinion of the General, who preferr'd the Order of Battel he had learnt under Prince Maurice and Prince Henry in the Low-Countries, with whom he had ſerv'd at the ſame Time, when the Earl of Eſſex and he had both of them Regiments. This Prince's natural Reſervedneſs, and the ſmall Acquaintance he had with Courts, made him unapt for any Intimacy with the Lords, who were diſcourag'd from applying themſelves to him; while ſome of the Horſe Officers were pleas'd to find this Diſtance, and fomented it, hoping their Credit wou'd be greater with the Prince, and that no other Perſon ſhou'd have any with the King. So that the War was ſcarce began, when ſuch Faction and Deſigns appeared in the Army, as wiſe Men accounted ominous; the Conſequences of which gave his Majeſty great Trouble in a ſhort time.

BATTEL I. At Edge-Hill or Keynton.

II. 1. The Storm had been gathering, and hovering about the Engliſh Nation for a conſiderable Time; and now at length it diſcharg'd it ſelf in a Shower of Blood, near the Center of the Kingdom, on a Sunday the twenty-third of October, the ſame Day that the dreadful Commotion in Ireland broke out the Year before. The Place was a ſpacious Valley between Keynton in Warwickſhire and Edge-Hill, call'd The Vale of Red Horſe, prophetically ſo nam'd, conſidering the Streams of Blood which were ſpilt there that Day. The King was in Oxfordſhire, ſummoning Banbury to ſurrender, when he receiv'd Advice that the Earl of Eſſex, with his Army, was advanc'd to Keynton within ten Miles of him; upon which his Majeſty gave immediate Order for his whole Army to march with all Expedition to Edge-Hill, two or three Miles from Keynton; from the top of which there was both a delightful and a dreadful Proſpect at this time. Here they had a Sight of the Enemy, who were buſie in ordering their Army in the Valley below; where the King viewing of them thro' a Glaſs, and being ask'd what he deſign'd to do; he briskly anſwer'd, I never ſaw the Rebels before in a Body; I am reſolv'd to fight them; God, and all good Men aſſiſt my Righteous Cauſe. The Battel was order'd by the Lord Ruthen, afterwards Earl of Forth; Prince Rupert commanded the Right Wing; Commiſſary General Wilmot the Left, aſſiſted by Sir Arthur Aſton with moſt of the Dragoons; and the Reſerve was committed to Sir John Byron, and conſiſted only of his own Regiment. The Earl of Lindſey, General of the Field, led the main Battel on Foot, with a Pike in his Hand; having under him his Major-General, the brave Sir Jacob Aſhley. The King, and the two young Princes his Sons were in the midſt of Danger; and ſo much the more, becauſe his valiant Troop of Guards had begg'd Leave to abſent themſelves from his Majeſty's Perſon, and charge in the Front among the Horſe; which tho' perform'd with admirable Courage, was reckon'd among the Overſights of this Day. The Earl of Lindſey was highly diſſatisfy'd with Prince Rupert's independent Authority, and therefore declar'd to ſome particular Friends, That he did not look upon himſelf as General, but was reſolv'd in the Battel to be at the Head of his Regiment as a private Colonel, where he wou'd die. His Words prov'd prophetical, as did thoſe others of his, when going to the Fight he caſt his Eyes upon the young Prince of Wales, and ſaid, There is a Child, born to end that War we now begin. Sir Jacob Aſhley going to engage, lift up his Eyes and Hands to Heaven, and utter'd this ſhort Soldiers Prayer, O Lord! thou knoweſt how buſie I muſt be this Day; if I forget Thee, do not thou forget Me: And then riſing up, couragiouſly cry'd out, March on, Boys! On the other ſide, the Earl of Eſſex prepar'd and perform'd every thing that cou'd be expected from a wiſe General; he choſe an advantagious Ground, being a fair Field between the Hill and Keynton, only near the Town it was narrower, and on the Right Hand had ſome Hedges and Incloſures. There he poſted his Muſqueteers, and not above two Regiments of Horſe, where the Ground was narroweſt; but on the Left he plac'd a Body of a thouſand Horſe under Colonel Ramſey a Scot, the Reſerve was commanded by the Earl of Bedford and Sir William Balfour, and the General himſelf commanded the main Battel on Foot.

The Manner of the whole Battel.

Approaching in this Order, the Canons began to play on both Sides, with great Noiſe, but no conſiderable Execution, and about three a Clock they came to a cloſe Battel. As the right Wing of the King's Horſe advanc'd to charge the Enemy's Left, Sir Faithful Forteſcue, as was privately determin'd, with his whole Troop ſeparated from the Groſs of the Parliament's Cavalry, and diſcharging all the Piſtols on the Ground within little more than Carabine Shot of his own Body, preſented Himſelf and all his Troop to Prince Rupert, and immediately charg'd with him againſt the Side he had but juſt deſerted. This ſudden Accident, with the Terror of Prince Rupert and the King's Horſe, had ſuch an Influence, that the whole Wing, having unſkilfully diſcharg'd their Piſtols and Carabines, wheel'd about; ſo that the King's Horſe effectually charg'd them both in the Flank and the Reer; and having thus intirely routed them, furiouſly purſu'd, and had the Execution of them for above two Miles, to the Town of Keynton, where they plunder'd the Baggage, and took the Earl of Eſſex's own Coach. The left Wing under Commiſſary Wilmot had alſo good Succeſs, and Sir Arthur Aſton with his Dragoons bravely beat off the Muſqueteers that lin'd the Hedges on that Side; and then the Enemies right Wing was as eaſily routed and diſpers'd as their Left, and as fiercely purſu'd. But the King's Horſe, eſpecially thoſe under Prince Rupert, follow'd the Chaſe too far, as likewiſe their Reſerves under the Earl of Carnarvan, and hurry'd with the ſame Violence, ſuffer'd the Victory to ſlip out of their Hands, by their too great Eagerneſs of Conqueſt. The Earl of Eſſex ſoon took the Advantage, and Balfour with his Reſerve, mov'd up and down the Field in good Order; and marching towards the King's Foot, pretended to be Friends, till obſerving no Horſe in Readineſs to charge them, they broke in upon the Foot, and made a terrible Slaughter. Here the General Lindſey, on Foot at the Head of his Regiment, fell with his Wounds, and was encompaſs'd with the Enemy; and his Son, the Lord Willoughby, piouſly endeavouring his Reſcue, was taken Priſoner with him. Here Sir Edmund Verney was kill'd, and the Royal Standard taken by the Enemy. The King Himſelf was in no ſmall Danger, together with the two young Princes, who were on Horſe-Back on each ſide of him. His Majeſty ſeeing his Troops give way, mov'd to ſuſtain them, and the two Princes with him, when he was adviſ'd to leave the Field, and no longer expoſe his Perſon. He thought the Advice good, as far as it reſpected his Children, but look'd upon it as Unprincely to forſake them who had forſaken all to ſerve him. He propos'd it therefore to the Duke of Richmond to conduct them up the Hill, but that Loyal Lord excus'd himſelf, begging leave not to abandon his Majeſty; who next apply'd Himſelf to the Earl of Dorſet, for the ſame purpoſe, but was anſwer'd in his accuſtom'd jocoſe manner, That all the Kings in the World ſhou'd not make him retire, when he was to fight. At laſt the two Princes retir'd by the Aſſiſtance of one of the Gentlemen Penſioners, not without iminent Danger of being taken in an Ambuſh by the Way. In the mean while the King led on his Party with Sword in Hand, and his Preſence giving his Troops freſh Vigour, the Royal Standard was retaken by the valiant Captain John Smith, who for that great Action was made a Knight Banneret in the Field, and honour'd with bearing that Standard he had ſo bravely recover'd.

Both Parties keep the Field.

The Night approaching, both Sides being weary, declin'd fighting as if by Conſent, and rally'd their ſhatter'd Forces in the beſt manner they cou'd. At which Time Prince Rupert return'd from his long Chace, and found a great Alteration, and the Hopes of a glorious Day vaniſh'd; nor cou'd his Troops be perſuaded by the King to charge either the Enemies Reſerve of Horſe, which alone kept the Field, or the Body of their Foot, which only kept their Ground; upon either of which they might have made a powerful Impreſſion. The King with his Forces, fatigu'd with Duty and Want of Victuals, ſpent all the long and froſty Night in the open Field, with ſuch Fires as cou'd be made of the little Wood and Buſhes which grew in that Place, unreſolv'd what to do the next Morning, many reporting that the Enemy was gone: But the Day diſcover'd the contrary; for the Earl of Eſſex wiſely kept his Station, knowing if he drew off, his Numbers wou'd ſoon leſſen by Deſertion, and therefore he caus'd all manner of Proviſions to be brought to his Men for their Refreſhment, which was intirely wanting in the King's Army: Beſides, that Night he receiv'd a Reinforcement of two thouſand Foot under the Colonels Hampden and Grantham, with five hundred Horſe. The King on his Part found his Troops very thin the next Day; however, being willing to make a Tryal of the Diſpoſition of the other Army, he ſent Sir William le Neve, Clarencieux King at Arms, with a Proclamation of Pardon to ſuch as wou'd lay down their Arms: But when he offer'd to read the Proclamation aloud in the Preſence of the Earl of Eſſex, and to deliver the Effect of it, ſo as to be heard by thoſe there preſent, the Earl roughly rebuk'd him, and charg'd him, as he lov'd his Life, not to preſume to ſpeak a Word to the Soldiers. So that all that he cou'd diſcover was, a Diſorder in the Faces of the General and the chief Officers, and a great Dejection in the common Soldiers; and that the King's General, the Earl of Lindſey, was dead of his Wounds.

The Number of the Slain.

Thus was fought the memorable Battle of Edge-Hill or Keynton; of which two different Relations were ſhortly after publiſh'd, one by the King's Command at Oxford, and the other by the Order of the Commons at London; both Sides aſſuming the Honour of a Victory, when it cou'd not properly be ſo call'd on either Side: Yet the King was better intituled to the Credit of it, by killing the greater Numbers, and taking the greater Spoil, and ſeeing the Enemy break up and retire, while he immediately took a Garriſon, which he had attempted before the Battel. The Number of the Slain are by moſt Writers computed at about five thouſand; tho' ſome believe them to be much leſs, and the Continuator of Camden informs us, that by a Survey taken by Mr. Fiſher, Miniſter of Keynton, the Liſt amounted to leſs than fourteen hundred Men. It is very remarkable what is ſaid by Robert de Salmonet, a Popiſh Prieſt, who wrote a Hiſtory of our Wars in French, 'That that which moſt ſurpriz'd every One, was, that 'they found among the Dead in the Parliament Army ſe'veral Popiſh Prieſts.' Another Thing remarkable is, what Sir William Dugdale and Roger Manley tell us of Oliver Cromwell, then a Captain of a Troop of Horſe in the Earl of Eſſex's Regiment; namely that he abſented Himſelf from the Battel, and obſerving from the Top of a neighbouring Steeple the Diſorder the Right-Wing ſuſtain'd from Prince Rupert, he was ſo terrify'd, that ſlipping down in haſte by a Bell-Rope, he took Horſe, and run away with his Troop; for which Cowardiſe he had been Caſhier'd, had it not been for the powerful Mediation of his Friends. This he mention'd to ſhew how the Temperature of Mens Bodies and Minds, by Uſe and Ambition, may be intirely alter'd. The latter Author, as well as ſome others, tells us, That among the Enemies Baggage were taken the Letters of one Blake in the King's Army, who duely gave Intelligence of what paſs'd to the other Party, and particularly in what Part of the Army the King fought, that they might the better direct their Bullets at ſo illuſtrious a Mark; for which Treachery he was hang'd on the next Tree.

The Character and Death of the Earl of Lindſey.

The principal Perſons who dy'd on the King's Side were the General the Earl of Lindſey, the Lord Aubigney, Brother to the Duke of Richmond, Sir Edmund Verney the Standard-Bearer, and ſome others of leſs Name, tho' of great Virtue and good Quality. Robert Bertie, Earl of Lindſey, was Son to the famous Peregrine Lord Willoughby of Ereſby, who made ſo illuſtrious a Figure in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth; and who by his Mother, the Dutcheſs of Suffolk, ſpung from a long Race of Heroes. The Earl was a Perſon of great Honour, and ſpent his Youth and Vigour of his Age in great Hardſhips, Military Actions and Commands abroad, and had many Times ſignaliz'd his Valour both by Sea and Land; and tho' he indulg'd himſelf in great Liberties, and did no ways improve his great Eſtate, yet he ſtill preſerv'd a very good Reputation with all Men, and a very great Intereſt in his Country; ſo that the ſeveral Companies in his own Regiment were commanded by the chief Knights and Gentlemen of Lincolnſhire, who principally ingaged themſelves out of their Perſonal Affection to Him. He was of a very generous, hoſpitable and charitable Diſpoſition; punctual in what he undertook, and in exacting what was due to his Merit; which made him ſo heavily bear that Reſtriction put upon him by the fore-mention'd Commiſſion granted to Prince Rupert, and by the King's preferring that Prince's Opinion before His. He was carry'd out of the Field to the next Village, and it is believ'd the timely coming of Surgeons might have prevented his Wounds from being mortal. About Midnight, the Earl of Eſſex ſent Sir William Balfour, and ſome other Officers to viſit him, and offer him Civilities and Conveniencies, deſigning to go to him Himſelf. They found him upon a little Straw in a poor Houſe or Barn, where they had laid him in his Blood, which flow'd from him in great Abundance, yet ſtill he had great Vivacity in his Looks. He freely told them, He was ſorry to ſee ſo many Gentlemen, ſome of whom were his old Friends, engag'd in ſo foul a Rebellion. And for Sir William Balfour in particular, he put him in mind of the great Obligations he had to the King, who had diſoblig'd the whole Engliſh Nation by giving him the Cuſtody of the Tower; and that it was the moſt odious Ingratitude in Him to make him that Return. He wiſh'd them all to tell my Lord Eſſex, That he ought to caſt himſelf at the King's Feet to beg his Pardon; which if he did not ſpeedily do, his Memory wou'd be odious to the Nation: And continu'd this kind of Diſcourſe with ſo much Zeal, that the Officers gradually withdrew themſelves, and prevented the Viſit deſign'd by the Earl of Eſſex, who only ſent him the beſt Surgeons; but in the opening his Wounds he dy'd before the Morning, only with the Loſs of Blood, being then about ſeventy Years of Age. He had very many Friends, and very few Enemies, and dy'd generally lamented; leaving a noble and numerous Iſſue behind him, of eight Sons, and five Daughters.

The King writes to his Son.

The King himſelf was very ſenſibly affected with the Loſs of this great Man, and the Impriſonment of his eldeſt Son, who had ſo piouſly endeavour'd the Reſcue of his Father. So that within a few Days, with all the Tenderneſs of a Parent he wrote the following Letter with his own Hand, directed For the Earl of Lindſey, Lord High Chamberlain of England, and ſign'd with his Sign Manual. This Letter, ſo much to the Honour of the Family, was never yet publiſh'd; but was ſent me for that Purpoſe by the Honourable Charles Bertie of Uffington, lately deceas'd, and is as following.

> LINDSEY,
> YOU cannot be more Senſible (as I believe) of your Father's Loſs, than my Self, his Death confirming the Eſtimation I ever had of him: As for your Self, the double Sufferings you have had for my Sake, both in your Father's Perſon, and your own, puts upon me the ſtricter Obligation, not only to reſtore you to your Liberty (now unjuſtly detain'd from you) but alſo to ſhew the World by my Actions how really I am

The Death of ſeveral Perſons.

Among the reſt that were loſt on the King's Side, the Lord Aubigney and Sir Edmund Verney were the moſt noted. The former, by Name George Stuart, Brother to the Duke of Richmond, was a Gentleman of great Hopes, of an ingaging Diſpoſition, and unqueſtionable Courage: He was kill'd at a Time when there was ſo little Reſiſtance, that it was ſuſpected, that his own Lieutenant, a Dutchman, had done it out of a private Reſentment; and his Body was brought off, and bury'd at Chriſt-Church in Oxford. Sir Edmund Verney, who has been before-mention'd, was a Perſon of great Honour and Courage, who loſt his Life and the Royal Standard together; but his Body cou'd never be found. The Chief that dy'd on the Parliament Side were, the Lord Saint John, and Colonel Charles Eſſex; the firſt of which was eldeſt Son to the Earl of Bullingbrooke, a Man who, tho' of a licentious Life and ordinary Parts, by the Reputation of his Courteſie and Civility to all Men, got ſo much Credit, by engaging the principal Gentlemen of Bedford and Hertfordſhire to be bound for him, as to contract a Debt of fifty or threeſcore thouſand Pounds; for the Payment of which the Fortune of the Family was not engaged, ſo that his Sureties were compell'd to make it good, to the utter Ruin of many Families. Yet after this, his Majeſty, upon an Aſſurance of the Payment of his Debts, and of his faithful Service to him, was perſuaded to call him into the Houſe of Peers, during his Father's Life. But notwithſtanding this Favour, no Man was more ready to take up Arms againſt the King; in which he behav'd himſelf ſo ill, that he receiv'd ſome Wounds in running away, and being taken Priſoner, ſoon after dy'd, without any Signs of Remorſe, beſides theſe peculiar Words, That he did not intend to be againſt the King, but wiſh'd him all Happineſs. As for Colonel Eſſex, he had been formerly Page to the Earl of Eſſex, who afterwards preferr'd him to a Command in Holland, where he liv'd with very good Reputation, and preſerv'd the Credit of his decay'd Family. He was eſteem'd the beſt and moſt expert Officer in the Parliament's Army; but Gratitude to his old Maſter the General, prevail'd with him more than any thing elſe to liſt himſelf there; yet one thing highly aggravated his Caſe, which was his ſwearing to the Queen of Bohemia, when by her Means he got Leave to come into England, That he wou'd never ſerve againſt the King.

Some ſtrange Eſcapes.

The Priſoners taken in this Battle by the Parliament, beſides the Lord Willoughby before-mention'd, were Sir Thomas Lunsford, and Sir Edward Stradling, both Colonels, and Sir William Vavaſour, who commanded the King's Regiment of Guards, and ſome other inferior Officers. There were on the other Side a good Number of Parliament Officers taken Priſoners, but of mean Quality, except Sir William Eſſex, the Father of the fore-mention'd Colonel, and the Lord St. John Himſelf. Many were wounded, and ſeveral eſcap'd beyond all Expectation; particularly Sir Jervais Scroop, a brave old Gentleman of Lincolnſhire, who by his own Intereſt had rais'd a Foot Company among his Tenants, in Reſpect to the Earl of Lindſey, as well as Duty to the King: He had fallen with ſixteen Wounds in his Body and Head, and had lain ſtripped among the Dead from Sunday in the Afternoon till Tueſday in the Evening; when he was found by young Mr. Scroop his Son, who with great Piety carry'd him to a warm Lodging, where, and at Oxford he was wonderfully recover'd by the Skill of the immortal Dr. Harvey. The next Morning, being Wedneſday, Mr. Bellingham, another conſiderable Gentleman, and an only Son, was found among the Dead, and brought off by his Friends with twenty Wounds; who after ten Days dy'd at Oxford, by the Neglect of a leſſer Wound, when thoſe thought Mortal were paſt Danger. It was believ'd by the Surgeons that both theſe Gentlemen ow'd their Lives to the Inhumanity of thoſe who left them naked, and the Coldneſs of the Nights, which had beyond all Art ſtopp'd their Blood; and that if they had been brought off ſoon after the Battel, they had undoubtedly periſh'd.

The City of London in a Conſternation.

2. It was now above a hundred and fifty Years ſince there were any Civil Wars in England; ſo that the Noiſe of a Battel was no leſs terrible to the Nation, than it was new, all Counties being ſtrangely allarm'd and affrighted with the hideous Relations that were made of it. Eſpecially the City of London was thrown into a dreadful Conſternation; all the Shops were ſhut up, and Terror and Amazement were ſeen in every Perſon's Face. For thoſe who fled from Prince Rupert in the Beginning of the Battle, partly out of Ignorance, and partly by way of Excuſe, reported, That all was loſt, and the King's Army ſo formidable, as not to be encounter'd! Some of them, the better to juſtify their Flight, reported the Progreſs of the Battle, and repreſented all the Tragical Circumſtances by which every Part of the Army was defeated, which their terrify'd Fancies had ſuggeſted to them while they fled; and ſome had ſeen the Earl of Eſſex ſlain, and heard his dying Words, That every One ſhou'd ſhift for himſelf, for all Reſiſtance was in vain. So that all Monday the City was fill'd with the Sound of the Defeat; and tho' there came an Expreſs to the contrary from the Earl of Eſſex himſelf, the Citizens had not Courage enough to believe it, and every Hour produc'd ſomething to contradict the Reports of the laſt. The two Houſes were no leſs mortify'd and confounded; ſo that Mr. Lenthall, the Speaker of the Commons, thus addreſs'd himſelf to ſeveral Members, Gentlemen, you wou'd do well to ſend to his Majeſty betimes to ask Conditions, leſt by Delays you come too late to effect your Security. The firſt Relief they had was from the Earl of Holland, who in the Afternoon produc'd a Letter in the Houſe of Peers, written by the Earl of Eſſex, inſerting the Particulars of the Battle, 'As the Impreſſion which in the 'Beginning had been made upon his Horſe, but that the 'Concluſion was proſperous.' While this was reading, and every Man catching at the good News, the Lord Haſtings, a Horſe-Officer, enter'd the Houſe with all the Signs of Horror, and poſitively declar'd, all was loſt againſt all Belief and Flattery. And tho' it was known he had fled in the Beginning of the Fight, and only loſt his Way thither, moſt Men look'd upon him as the laſt Meſſenger, and ſhut their Ears againſt all Comfort; ſo that queſtionleſs a great many, under the Terrors of leſs than two Days, underwent a full Penance for the Hopes and Inſolence of many Months before.

Recover'd out of it.

At length, on Wedneſday Morning, the Lord Wharton and Mr. Strode arriv'd from the Army with a full Relation of the Battel, 'Of the 'great Numbers ſlain of the King's Side, without any con'ſiderable Loſs on theirs, of the miſerable and weak Con'dition of the King's Army, and the Earl of Eſſex's Reſo'lution to purſue them; ſo that now they were not content to be Savers, but they voted, 'That their Army had 'the Victory, and appointed a Day of ſolemn Thankſ-

‘ giving for the ſame:’ And that the Joy might not be confin’d within their Walls, they appointed their two faithful Meſſengers to communicate the whole Relation and Circumſtances to the City, which was purpoſely conven’d together at Guild-Hall to receive this grateful News.

The Armies part.

In the mean Time the two Armies, for a whole Day after the Battle, only look’d one upon another; and tho’ the Earl of Eſſex had receiv’d a conſiderable Reinforcement, he thought it not convenient to venture a ſecond Engagement, but drew off his Carriages. Which being perceiv’d by the King, he directed all his Army to retire to their old Quarters, conceiving that many of thoſe who were wanting wou’d be found there, which prov’d according to Expectation. And ſo himſelf with the two Princes his Sons went to Edgecot, where he lay the Night before the Battle, reſolving to reſt the next Day, both for the Refreſhment of his wearied and tired Men, and to get Information of the Motion and Condition of the Enemy, upon whom he order’d ſome Troops of Horſe to attend. The Earl of Eſſex retir’d with his Forces eight Miles to Warwick Caſtle, whither he had ſent the new Earl of Lindſey and all his Priſoners; ſo that on Tueſday Morning the King was inform’d, that the Enemy was gone, and that ſome of his Horſe had come up with the Rear almoſt to Warwick, and that they had left many of their Carriages, and very many of their wounded Soldiers at the next Village to the Field of Battle: By all which it appear’d that their Removal was in Haſte, and not without Apprehenſion of Danger.

The King’s Declaration.

The King ſuppoſing himſelf victorious, or at leaſt to have the Advantage, immediately publiſh’d a Declaration to all his Loving Subjects, after his Victory againſt the Rebels, as he there ſtiles it; ‘ In which he attributed the Preſervation of Himſelf and his Children to the Mercy and Goodneſs of Almighty God, that ſecur’d them in the late bloody Battle; and particularly complain’d of having two grand Aſperſions caſt upon him by his Enemies; the Firſt, concerning his favouring of Popery, and employing Papiſts in his Army; the Second, of raiſing his Army to ſubdue and root out Parliaments: Both which he wiped off, with Recrimination againſt the two Houſes. For the Firſt, after a ſolemn Proteſtation of the Truth of his Religion, and his paſt, preſent and future Care for the better Eſtabliſhment of it in his Dominions, with the Extirpation of Popery; tho’ he was ſenſible that ſome few of eminent Worth in that Religion had mov’d him in this great Neceſſity to employ them in his Service, yet he was confident That a far greater Number of Papiſts, Commanders and others, were in their Army, than in His. For the Second, that he rais’d his Army againſt the Parliament; he thought the Scandal ſo ſenſeleſs, that none of his good Subjects wou’d believe it; unleſs they cou’d believe That a dozen or twenty factious and ſeditious Perſons are the High Court of Parliament, which conſiſts of King, Lords and Commons. For Privileges of Parliament, he averr’d, That whoſoever will not believe the raiſing of an Army to kill their King, to alter the Laws and Government by extravagant Votes, to force the Members to ſubmit to their Faction, and to take all Freedom of Conſultation from them, to be Privilege of Parliament, muſt confeſs, That the Army now rais’d by Himſelf, is no leſs for the Vindication of Parliaments, than for his own neceſſary Defence. He likewiſe charged them with endeavouring to raiſe an implacable Hatred between the Gentry and Commonalty of the Kingdom, by rendering all Perſons of Honour odious to the common People, under the Stile of Cavaliers, and to perſuade the People, That there was an Intention by the Commiſſion of Array, to take away a Part of their Eſtates from them:’ All which he deny’d, and concluded with ſolemn Proteſtations to the contrary.

3. Three Days after the Battle, the King drew his Army to a Rendezvous, where he found his Numbers greater than he expected; for on the firſt Night, a great many of the Soldiers, oppreſs’d with Cold and Hunger, had repaired to their old Quarters. So that it was juſtly concluded upon this View, when all Men had recover’d a mighty Chearfulneſs, that not above three Hundred Men were miſſing. Here the King declar’d General Ruthen to be General of his Army in the Place of the late Earl of Lindſey; and then march’d to Ayno, a little Village two Miles from Banbury, of which the King that Day took a View, reſolving to attempt it the next Day following. From this Place his Majeſty ſent a Proclamation ‘ of Pardon to the Cities of London and Weſtminſter, excepting ſome few Perſons; in which he likewiſe clear’d himſelf from ſome Aſperſions, particularly his deſigning to give the Plunder of thoſe Cities to his Army, and his favouring the Papiſts; charging the Tumults and latter Practices againſt him, upon the Prevalency of a Faction, and the Power of the Mob, and not upon the Inclinations of the beſt and ſubſtantial Citizens and Inhabitants.’ This was dated the 27th of October, the ſame Day he wrote the obliging Letter to the new Earl of Lindſey, as was beforemention’d.

His Proclamation.

Banbury-Caſtle yielded to the King

At that Time there was in Banbury Caſtle a Regiment of eight Hundred Foot, and a Troop of Horſe, which with anſwerable Courage might eaſily have kept ſo ſtrong a Place from an Army better prepar’d to attack it, than the King’s at preſent, and at a more proper Seaſon for a Siege. And therefore many were of Opinion, that the King ought to march by it, without any Regard to it, and that an Engagement before it might prove very prejudicial to him. That which prevail’d with him to make a Stand there, beſides the recover’d Bravery of his Forces, was the Uncertainty of any new Undertaking; For till he was inform’d of the Earl of Eſſex’s Motions, he knew not how to direct his March; and if the Enemy advanc’d upon him, he cou’d not fight in a more advantagious Place. And therefore having firſt taken the Lord Say’s Houſe at Broughton, where there was a Troop of Horſe, ſome good Arms, and ſome Shew of Reſiſtance, he ſent a Trumpet to ſummon the Caſtle, and planted the Cannon againſt it; but upon the firſt Shot, the Caſtle ſent to treat, and upon Leave to depart without their Arms, they readily deliver’d up the Place: And half the common Soldiers at leaſt freely took Conditions, and liſted themſelves in the King’s Army; and the reſt of the Arms prov’d a ſeaſonable Supply to many Soldiers of every Regiment, who either never had any before, or had loſt them in the late Battle. This laſt Succeſs ſhew’d where the Victory was at Edge-Hill; for tho’ the Routing of their Horſe, the Number of their Slain, and the forty Colours won from them, without the Loſs of above three or four, and the taking of four Pieces of their Cannon next Morning, were ſo many Proofs that the Victory inclin’d to the King; yet on the other Side, the Loſs of the King’s General, and ſo many Men of Note kill’d or taken Priſoners, and their keeping the Field laſt, were ſufficient Teſtimonies that they were not overcome. But now the taking of Banbury, which had been projected, and in ſome Meaſure attempted, before the Battle was fought, was ſo undeniable an Argument that the Earl of Eſſex was more broken and diſpers’d than at firſt he appear’d to be, that the King’s Army was look’d upon as Victorious.

The King marches to Oxford, which he makes his Head Quarters.

The King put a Garriſon into Banbury, and gave the Command of it to the worthy Earl of Northampton, and from thence he march’d to his own Houſe at Woodſtock; and the next Day with his whole Army to the City of Oxford, which he determin’d to make his Head Quarters, being the only City in England which he cou’d ſay was entirely at his Devotion. Here he was receiv’d by the Univerſity with the greateſt Acclamations of Joy, to whom is to be imputed the Integrity and Fidelity of that Place. And ſuch were the Effects of the memorable Battle of Edge-Hill, which Providence did not think fit to make deciſive. For if in this unripe Juncture, the Victory had been finally determin’d on either Side, it might have prov’d fatal to the future and laſting Eſtabliſhment of the Engliſh Government, either the Engliſh Monarchy or the Engliſh Liberty, the beſt Supporters of each other. But by the long Continuance and Increaſe of the publick Miſeries and Confuſions, which were but the juſt Puniſhments of a wicked Nation, the People at length were driven to have recourſe to the ſole proper Remedy, the bringing all things into the old Channel, which perhaps at this time was too little deſigned by the great Men of either Party.

The Temper of the two Houſes, and the City.

III. 1. The Condition and Power of the two Houſes was now very much alter’d from what it was a few Weeks before, when all Things gave way to it, and ſeem’d to ſubmit to its over-ruling Sway. For tho’ they were well recover’d of the Fright given them by the News of the laſt Battel, and receiv’d a glorious Account from the Earl of Eſſex, yet ſtill they fell very much ſhort in their Expectations; having promis’d themſelves ſuch a compleat Victory from their General, as the bringing the Perſon of the King alive or dead to them. But now his Majeſty having been able to diſpute the Victory with them, and after that to take Banbury and march to Oxford, while the Earl of Eſſex lay ſtill at Warwick, the Eyes of great Numbers began to be open’d, and neither they, nor their Friends in London, were ſo much exalted as was agreeable to the Relations they publiſh’d. And what render’d their alledg’d Victory ſuſpicious, was the Commitment of ſeveral Perſons for reporting that the King had the better in the Field; which diſcerning Men thought wou’d not have been, if the Succeſs had been contrary; and therefore nothing was ſo generally diſcours’d of and deſired as Peace. Indeed the major Part of both Houſes, finding things ſo contrary to their former Hopes, became earneſt to make any Overtures for Accommodation. Only they who had been at the Bottom of theſe Miſchiefs, and had projected a full Change in the Government, knowing that all their Arts wou’d be diſcover’d and their Perſons become odious, violently oppos’d all Motions of this kind. Theſe Managers preſs'd earneſtly to ſend an Expreſs to their Brethren of Scotland, to invite and conjure them to their Aſſiſtance. But this being a very unpopular Overture, and likewiſe implying a Diffidence in their own Strength, they ſubtilly ſeem'd to concur with thoſe who deſir'd Peace; and having by that render'd themſelves gracious, they order'd them 'ſo to endeavour Peace, that they might not be diſappointed of it, and to conſider that the King's Party was high upon ſome ſeeming Succeſſes; therefore if they ſo endeavour'd for Peace, as imply'd the giving over the Thoughts of War, they muſt expect to be at the Mercy of thoſe they had provoked. But if they were ſteady and reſolute in making their Strength formidable, they might expect moderate and ſafe Conditions. For that Reaſon the Propoſition of ſending into Scotland was very ſeaſonable; not that it was deſir'd that they ſhou'd bring an Army into England, for which there was not like to be Occaſion; but that that Kingdom might ſhew ſuch a Readineſs to aſſiſt the Parliament, that the King might look upon them with more Conſideration, if he ſhou'd inſiſt upon too high Conditions.

Their Preparations.

By means of this artificial Management, while they who urg'd a Treaty concluded, that a Conſent to that wou'd inevitably produce a Peace, the ſame Day that a Committee was appointed 'to prepare Heads of an Addreſs to his Majeſty, for compoſing the preſent Diſtractions, and ſetling the Peace of the Kingdom,' they made no Scruple to declare, 'That the Preparations of Forces, and all other neceſſary Means for Defence, ſhou'd be proſecuted with all Vigour, and thereupon requir'd all thoſe Officers and Soldiers who had left their General, upon Pain of Death to return to him.' And for his better Recruit they ſolemnly declar'd, 'That in ſuch Times of Common Danger and Neceſſity, the Intereſt of private Perſons ought to give Way to the Publick; therefore they ordained, That ſuch Apprentices, as wou'd be liſted for the Defence of the Kingdom, the Parliament and City, their Sureties and Bondſmen ſhou'd be ſecur'd againſt their Maſters; and that their Maſters ſhou'd receive them again at the End of their Service, without imputing any Loſs of Time to them.' And by this Means many Children were engag'd for the Parliament, not only againſt the Conſent, but againſt the Perſons of their Fathers, and the Earl of Eſſex receiv'd a very great Supply by it. Beſides this they publiſh'd a large Declaration, which had lain long by them, in Reply to that ſet forth by the King formerly, in Anſwer to theirs of the twenty-ſixth of May, as has been already mention'd, in which there were not many things new, but only they us'd both his Perſon and his Power with more Irreverence than they had ever done before; as may be ſeen in Husband's Collections.

Their Declaration and Invitation to the Scots.

Then in Return for their Conſent that a formal Meſſage might be ſent to his Majeſty, by which it was thought a Treaty wou'd begin, they procur'd at the ſame Time a full Declaration of both Houſes to the Subjects of Scotland, which they caus'd immediately to be ſent to that Kingdom. 'It began with a Recital of the great Services they had done to their Scotch Brethren, and the Act made about a Year before, and how willingly and affectionately they had embrac'd the late Invitation they had made to them of a nearer and higher Degree of Union in Matters concerning Religion, and Church-Government; for all which they cou'd not doubt but that they wou'd anſwer the Obligations, and aſſiſt them in ſettling Peace in this Kingdom, and preſerving it in their own, according to the Tenor of the foreſaid Act. Then it declar'd that the King had given Commiſſion to divers eminent Papiſts to compoſe an Army in the North and other Parts, which was to join with divers Foreign Forces, to be tranſported from beyond Sea, for the Deſtruction of the Parliament, Religion and Liberty of the Kingdom; and that the chief of the Clergy and their Adherents had likewiſe invited the King to raiſe another Army, which in Perſon he leads againſt the Parliament and City of London, plundering and robbing ſeveral well-affected Towns, even where his Majeſty had given his Royal Word and Protection; an Incentive of which Malice proceeded from a Reſolution to hinder The Reformation of Eccleſiaſtical Government in this Kingdom, ſo much long'd for by all the true Lovers of the Proteſtant Religion. And hereupon they deſir'd their particular Aſſiſtance againſt Papiſts, Foreigners, &c. And tho' they ſought nothing that might diminiſh his Majeſty's juſt Authority and Honour, yet now they found ſo ſmall Succeſs from all their humble Petitions, that they were neceſſitated to ſtand upon their own juſt Defence, and to ſeek this ſpeedy and powerful Aſſiſtance of their Brethren of Scotland, according to the foreſaid Act, the common Duty of Chriſtianity, and the particular Intereſts of their own Kingdom.

The King's Progreſs allarms the City.

2. In the mean time the two Houſes and the City were allarm'd with the farther Progreſs of the King and his Forces, who advancing towards Reading in Berkſhire, where Harry Martin was Governor for the Parliament, he was ſeiz'd with ſuch Terror, that he and the Garriſon immediately fled to London; ſo that the King came and took an eaſie Poſſeſſion of that conſiderable Poſt. The News of this, and the Noiſe of Prince Rupert's Incurſions, produced a new Conſternation in the City: They now disbeliev'd all the glorious Reports concerning their own Army; they found that the other Army, which was ſaid to be beaten and diſpers'd, was now advanc'd within thirty Miles of London; and the Earl of Eſſex, who was ſaid to have the Victory, and watching to prevent the King's Eſcape, was ſtill at Warwick, or at an unreaſonable Diſtance from the City. Under theſe Apprehenſions, the two Houſes, without further Conſultation, diſpatcht a Meſſenger to the King at Reading, only to deſire a ſafe Conduct for a Committee of Lords and Commons, to attend him with a humble Petition from his Parliament. The King expreſs'd his Readineſs to receive any Petition from them, declaring 'That their Committee ſhou'd be welcome, provided it conſiſted of Perſons who had not been before declar'd Traitors by Name.' The Cauſe of this Limitation was, as well to keep up a former Rule he had made at Shrewsbury, as to prevent the particular Appearance of the Lord Say, from whom he cou'd expect no fair upright Treatment. Upon which a ſafe Conduct was deſir'd for the Earls of Northumberland and Pembroke of the Lords; and Mr. Pierpoint, the Lord Weenman, Sir John Evelyn, and Sir John Hippſley, of the Commons: Which ſafe Conduct was immediately ſign'd by the King, excepting only for Sir John Evelyn, who was by Name excepted in his Proclamation of Pardon for the County of Wilts. But Intimation was given to them, 'That if they wou'd ſend any other unexceptionable Perſon in his Place, he ſhou'd be receiv'd as if his Name was in the ſafe Conduct.

The Lord Brook's Speech at Guild-Hall.

This Anſwer caus'd a new Trouble and Diſpute in the two Houſes, who thereupon reſolv'd not to accept of this ſafe Conduct, declaring, 'That the Exception in the ſafe Conduct was a Denial and Refuſal of a Treaty.' Of which they order'd a Committee to acquaint the City, and thereby to quicken them to a Reſolution of defending their Liberties and Religion, and accordingly to frame a Declaration to all the World of the King's Refuſal of the Parliament's Petition, and of his receiving Petitions and Addreſſes from the Rebels of Ireland. On this Meſſage they ſent the Lord Brook, and Sir Henry Vane Junior, two ſure Friends, to Guild-Hall, where they both made encouraging Speeches to the Mayor and Aldermen. That of the Lord Brook having ſomething peculiar in it, we ſhall recite ſome Part of it, as it is to be found in Sanderſon's Hiſtory and other Prints.-----The Meſſage was this, it was a Meſſage from his Excellency, it is to let you know how near the Danger is at Hand, that ſo you may gird up the Loins of your Reſolution, and do like Men of Courage. The Enemy's Foot we underſtand are very near Stanes, the Horſe they are about Kingſton, we cannot tell you that all are there, but that there are both Horſe and Foot too, and it is certain our Foot are going to it, ſo that the Queſtion is now, what is to be done? Certainly, this is a certain Truth among all Soldiers, that you muſt keep Evil as far off you as you can; you muſt not let it come near your Doors, you muſt not think to fight in the Sighs, and Tears, and Eyes, and Diſtractions of your Wives and Children, but to go out, and meet it valiantly as you have done. God hath ſhew'd himſelf a God of Love and Mercy, and truely we muſt give him all the Honour of that Day; certainly it is the greateſt Victory that ever was gotten: Near two thouſand (I love to ſpeak with the leaſt) on their Side ſlain; and I am confident not a hundred on our Side, unleſs you will take in Women and Children, Car-men and Dogs, (for they ſlew the very Dogs and all) If you take in Women, Children, Car-men and Dogs, then they ſlew about two hundred. But that an hundred ſhould be ſlain on one Side, and two thouſand on the other Side, is a very miraculous Thing; He that dealt ſo wonderfully heretofore, it were to diſtruſt him, if we did not think he wou'd do ſo again: Truely we are a dear People, exceedingly belov'd of God----.

The Earl of Eſſex's Return, and Honours from the Parliament.

But that which gave moſt Incouragement to the City and two Houſes, was the advancing of their General the Earl of Eſſex, who was now on his March towards London, a great Fame flying before him of the Strength and Courage of his Army; tho' in reality not anſwerable to the Report. Ludlow owns that the Army return'd to London, not like Men that had obtain'd a Victory, but as if they had been beaten. However the Appearance of ſo many Forces, ſerved to encourage and inflame thoſe whoſe Fear only inclin'd them to Peace, and to awe the reſt; and on the ſeventh of November the two Houſes receiv'd their General with all the Marks of Honour, and preſented him with a Gratuity of five Thouſand Pounds, and ſoon after with a glorious Declaration of his 'Care, Valour and Dexterity, as well by the extreameſt Hazards of his Life, in a bloody Battel near Keynton in Warwickſhire, as by all the Actions of a ‘moſt excellent and expert Commander in the whole Courſe of this Imployment. Therefore they declare and publiſh, to the laſting Honour of the ſaid Earl, the great and acceptable Service he hath done to the Commonwealth, and ſhall be ready upon all Occaſions, to expreſs the due Senſe which they have of his Merit, by aſſiſting and protecting him, and all other imploy'd under his Command, with their Lives and Fortunes, to the uttermoſt of their Power. THIS TO REMAIN UPON RECORD IN BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT, FOR A MARK OF HONOUR TO HIS PERSON, NAME AND FAMILY, AND FOR A MONUMENT OF SINGULAR VERTUE TO POSTERITY.

The Parliament's Petition to the King.

The King's Anſwer.

3. The King, finding the two Houſes very backwards in ſending their Committee, reſolv'd to quicken them; and advanc'd with his whole Army to Colebrook, within fifteen Miles of London. This rais'd a new Inclination to Peace, and the Clamour of the People was ſo importunate, that on the eleventh of November, the two Lords and three Commoners, nam'd in the ſafe Conduct, leaving Sir John Evelyn behind them, repair'd to his Majeſty at Colebrook, with the Parliament's Petition, which ran in a humbler Strain than their former Meſſages, and in Subſtance repreſented, ‘That being affected with a deep and piercing Senſe of the Miſeries of this Kingdom, the Danger of his Majeſty's Perſon, and the great Effuſion of Blood in the late Battel; and weighing the Addition of Loſs and Miſeries, if both Armies ſhou'd again joyn in another Fight, as without God's Bleſſing and his Majeſty's Concurrence cou'd not be avoided; they believ'd his Majeſty had a ſuitable Impreſſion of Compaſſion to accept of this their Petition, and to appoint ſome convenient Place not far from London, where his Majeſty wou'd be pleas'd to reſide, till Committees of Parliament might attend with ſome Propoſitions to his Majeſty, for the Removal of theſe Diſtempers, &c.' His Majeſty approv'd of this Petition, and the ſame Day ſent away the Meſſengers with a gracious Anſwer to it; in which ‘he teſtify'd the deep ſenſe he had of the Nation's Miſeries by this War, declaring that he was not the firſt that took up Arms, and that he wou'd reſide at his own Caſtle at Windſor, if the Forces were remov'd, till ſuch Time as Committees might be ſent to him, either thither, or to any other Place, if that ſhou'd not be lik'd of: Concluding with theſe Words, Do you your Duty, we will not be wanting in ours; and God of his Mercy give a Bleſſing.

It was expected, and indeed the King had reſolv'd to draw back to Reading, and there rely upon a Treaty; but Prince Rupert, unhappily elevated with the Terror his Name gave to the Enemy, and too much truſting to the common Reports of unqueſtionable Succeſs if he drew near to London, without any Directions from the King, the very next Morning after the Return of the Committee, advanc'd with the Horſe and Dragoons to Hounſlow, and there ſent to the King to deſire him that the Army might march after; which now prov'd to be of abſolute Neceſſity: For the Earl of Eſſex had part of his Army at Brentford, and the reſt at Acton and Kingſton; ſo that if the King had not advanc'd with his Body, thoſe before might eaſily have been ſurrounded, and their Retreat made very hazardous. So the King march'd with his whole Army to Brentford, within ſeven Miles of London, which was the neareſt he ever after got to that City, but when he came to his Execution. Here his Forces attack'd the new Works, and firſt fell furiouſly upon the Regiment of Colonel Hollis, who made a very brave Reſiſtance, but in all Probability had been cut in Pieces, had not thoſe of Brook and Hampden come in to their Relief: They continu'd to defend Themſelves till towards Night, when the King's Men made themſelves Maſters of the Town, and plunder'd it: Beſides the Priſoners they took here, amounting to about five Hundred, eleven Colours, fifteen Cannon, and a good Store of Ammunition fell to their Share. But this Victory prov'd not at all fortunate to his Majeſty; for the two Houſes had been ſo well ſatisfy'd with his Anſwer to their Petition, that they ſent Orders to their Forces, not to exerciſe any Acts of Hoſtility, and at the ſame Time diſpatcht a Meſſenger to deſire that there might be the like Forbearance on the King's Part. This Meſſenger found both Parties ingag'd at Brentford, and ſo return'd without ſeeing the King, who had no Thoughts of their intended Ceſſation, ſince their Forces arriv'd at Brentford, Acton and Kingſton, after their Committee was ſent to Colebrook. However they look'd upon this Attempt as a Surprize contrary to Faith, and the Betraying the Parliament Forces to a Maſſacre, under the ſpecious Pretence of a Treaty for Peace. This unlucky Ingagement, which may be reckon'd more than a Skirmiſh, is commonly call'd Brentford Fight, which hapned on the twelfth Day of November.

Brentford Fight.

The City Train'd-Bands drawn out againſt the King.

The Guns were fully heard at the City of London, whither the Allarm came with the ſame Terror, as if the Army were enter'd their Gates; and the King was accus'd ‘of Treachery, Perfidy and Blood, and that he had given the Spoil and Wealth of the City as Pillage to his Army, which advanc'd with no other Purpoſe.' They who disbeliev'd theſe Calumnies, were nevertheleſs unwilling the King ſhou'd enter the City with an Army, which was not like to be govern'd in ſuch rich Quarters; and therefore with the utmoſt Expedition, the Earl of Eſſex's Army was not only drawn together, but all the Train'd-Bands of London led out in their brighteſt Equipage to Turnham-Green, about a Mile from Brentford, where they compos'd a full Army of twenty four thouſand Men. The City Bands march'd chearfully under their popular Commander Skippon, who encourag'd them with ſuch Speeches as theſe, Come, my Boys! my brave Boys! I will run the ſame Hazards with you: Remember the Cauſe is for God, and the Defence of your Selves, your Wives and Children: Come, my honeſt brave Boys! let us pray heartily, and fight heartily, and God will bleſs us. The whole Army being drawn up in Battalia, made a glorious Figure; the Order and Marſhalling of which was chiefly by the Earl of Holland, who took great Pains, and ſhew'd good Skill in Military Affairs: With him was the Earl of Northumberland, and moſt of the Lords who continu'd with the Parliament, and ſeveral Members of the Commons, all well arm'd. The General Eſſex likewiſe took great Pains in the Field, and, attended by his Maſters the Lords and Commons, rod from one Regiment to another, with encouraging Speeches; where the Soldiers, with repeated Shouts and Acclamations cry'd, Hey for old Robin! Upon a Conſultation with the Lords and others, a Party of two Regiments of Horſe and four of Foot was order'd to march from the Green by Acton, and ſo get beyond the King's Army, and to ingage upon a Signal; but after they had march'd about a Mile, a Meſſage was ſent them, That the General had chang'd his Reſolution of dividing his Forces, and commanded them to retreat to the reſt of the Army at Turnham-Green. Here the whole Army ſtood many Hours in Battalia, as the King's Army did, both facing each other, without Bloodſhed. Whenever either of them advanc'd, or that the Soldiers ſhouted, ſome Hundreds of Horſe, who came from London as Spectators, uſually gallop'd away with all the Marks of Fear and Fright, to the great Diſcouragement of the Parliament Army; and ſeveral of the Soldiers at the ſame Time ſtole from their Colours, and fled to the City. So that many are of Opinion, that if the King had briskly charg'd that unwieldy Army, it had preſently given ground, and that he had ſo great a Party in every Regiment, that they wou'd have made no Reſiſtance.

The King draws off.

However when Evening drew near, and it appear'd that great Body ſtood only for the Defence of the City, the King appointed his Army to draw off to Kingſton, which the Enemy had kindly quitted, and went himſelf to his own Palace at Hampton-Court, where he reſted a while to refreſh his weary'd Army, and to expect ſome Propoſitions from the Houſes. For upon his Advance to Brentford, he ſent Mr. White, a Servant of his, with a Meſſage to them, containing the Reaſons of that Motion, and deſiring that the Propoſitions might be diſpatcht to him with all Speed. But his Meſſenger, being carry'd to the Earl of Eſſex, was roughly treated, and by the Houſes committed to the Gate-Houſe, it being mov'd by ſome, that he might be executed as a Spy. The Houſes were very much diſpleas'd, and complain'd of Breach of Faith, by the King's March to Brentford, and the City was ſtrangely inflam'd with an Opinion, that he deſign'd to have ſurpris'd them, and to have plunder'd the Place. The King being inform'd of all this, and that their Apprehenſions wou'd at leaſt keep off all Propoſitions for Peace, while the Army lay ſo near London, he gave Directions for all his Forces to retire to Reading; firſt kindly diſcharging all the Common Soldiers who had been taken Priſoners at Brentford, upon their Oaths that they wou'd no more bear Arms againſt Him. He likewiſe ſent a Meſſage to the Houſes, in which he ‘took notice of thoſe unjuſt Imputations rais'd on him; again gave them the Reaſons of his Motion towards Brentford; of the Earl of Eſſex's Advancing towards him, poſſeſſing Places about him, and almoſt hemming him in, after their Commiſſioners were ſent to him with the Petition; that he had never heard of any Ceſſation, but ſaw the contrary from them by that Advance; that he had not the leaſt Thought of maſtering the City by Force, or carrying his Army thither. He wonder'd to hear his Soldiers charg'd with Thirſting after Blood, when they took above five Hundred Priſoners in the Heat of the Fight. However he intended to march to ſuch a Diſtance from his City of London, as might remove all Pretence of Apprehenſion from his Army, that might hinder them from preparing their Propoſitions, where he wou'd be ready to receive them: Or if that Expedient pleas'd them not, he was

His Meſſage to the Houſes.

'ready to end the Preſſures and Miſeries that his Subjects ſuffer'd through the War, by a preſent Battel.

The Houſes Ways of raiſing Mony.

4. The Parliament ſeem'd now to have no Thoughts of a Treaty, but us'd all Methods to raiſe Mony, the true Sinews of War; and accordingly fram'd an Ordinance, 'That all ſuch as ſhou'd furniſh Men, Mony, Horſe or Arms for their Service, ſhou'd have the ſame fully repaid again, with Intereſt for the Forbearance thereof, from the Time disburs'd; and for the true Payment thereof, they did thereby engage to every Perſon, The publick Faith of the Kingdom.' This, by means of the Activity of the Lord-Mayor and Sheriffs of London, brought in many Subſcriptions; and from this unconſider'd Paſſage, inſenſibly grew the Monthly Tax of Six Thouſand Pounds to be ſet upon the City for the Payment of the Army. Then for Peace, as the near Approach of the King's Army was an Argument againſt a preſent Treaty, ſo its Remove to Reading was a greater Reaſon with many to decline it ſtill. The Danger which they thought ſo near their Gates, was now to be contemn'd at thirty Miles Diſtance, and this Retreat imputed more to Weakneſs, than any Inclinations to Peace. And therefore they, who while the Majority deſir'd a good Peace, and were preparing Overtures to that End, had the Skill to intermingle Acts more deſtructive, than any Propoſals cou'd be ſubſervient to it, now only inſiſted upon the Surpriſe of Brentford; and by the Authority of both Houſes publiſh'd a Narrative of the barbarous aud cruel Paſſages of the King's Army, with the moſt odious Circumſtances, fram'd upon the Diſcourſes of the Country People. Therefore they concluded 'That there cou'd not reaſonably be expected any good Conditions of a tolerable Peace from the King, while he was in ſuch Company; but all particular Propoſitions were to be reſolv'd into that One, of inviting the King to come to them;' and obtain a particular Vote, 'That no other Meaſure for Accommodation ſhou'd be thought on.' Upon which they ſent a ſhort Petition to the King at Reading, 'To deſire his Majeſty to return to his Parliament, with his Royal, not his Martial Attendance; that Religion, Laws, and Liberties might be ſettled by their Advice; finding by a ſad and late Accident, he was environ'd by ſuch Counſels, as rather perſuaded a deſperate Diviſion, than joyn'd in a good Agreement with his Parliament and People: And they wou'd give him Aſſurances of ſuch Security, as might be for his Honour, and the Safety of his Royal Perſon.

Their Petition to the King.

The King's Anſwer.

His Majeſty ſharply reply'd, 'He hop'd all his good Subjects wou'd look upon that Meſſage with Indignation, being intended by the Contrivers as a Scorn to him, and thereby deſign'd by that Malignant Party, of whom he had ſo often complain'd, for a Wall of Separation between him and his People. He ſaid he had often told them the Reaſons why he departed from London; how he was chac'd thence, and by whom; and as often complain'd that the greateſt Part of the Peers and the Houſe of Commons cou'd not with Safety and Honour continue and vote freely among them; but by Violence and cunning Practices were debarr'd of thoſe Privileges which their Birth-Rights and Country's Truſt gave them: That the whole Kingdom knew that an Army was rais'd, under Pretence of Orders of both Houſes, which had purſu'd him in his own Kingdom, and given him Battel near Keynton; and now thoſe Rebels being recruited, and poſſeſs'd of the City of London, he was courteouſly invited to return to his Parliament there, that is to the Power of the Army. So that ſince the traiterous Endeavours of thoſe deſperate Men cou'd not ſnatch the Crown from his Head, he ſhou'd now tamely come up, and give it them; and put Himſelf, his Life, and the Lives, Liberties and Fortunes of all his good Subjects into their merciful Hands. He ſaid he thought fit to give no other Anſwer to that Part of their Petition: But as he imputed not that Affront to both Houſes, nor the Majority of thoſe there preſent, but to that dangerous Party He and his Kingdom muſt ſtill cry out upon; ſo he wou'd not take Advantage of it: But if they wou'd really purſue the Courſe they ſeem'd at Colebrook to be inclin'd to, he ſhou'd make good all that he had then promis'd. For the late ſad Accident they mention'd, if they meant that of Brentford, he deſir'd them once again to deal ingenuouſly with the People, and let them ſee his laſt Meſſage to them, and his Declaration, both which they had ſuppreſs'd; and then he doubted not, but they wou'd be ſoon undeceiv'd, and find out thoſe Counſels, which rather perſuaded a deſperate Diviſion, than a good Agreement between Himſelf, his Houſes, and People.'

This Anſwer being deliver'd, without any further Conſideration into the Merits of it, they declar'd, 'The King had no Mind to a Peace;' and thereupon laid aſide all further Debates to that Purpoſe; and order'd their General to march to Windſor with the Army, to be ſo much nearer the King's Forces: For the better recruiting of which, two of their moſt eminent Chaplains, Dr. Downing and Mr. Marſhal, publickly avow'd, That the Soldiers taken Priſoners at Brentford, and diſcharg'd by the King upon their Oaths they wou'd never more bear Arms againſt him, were not oblig'd by that Oath; but boldly abſolv'd them by their own Power, and ſo involv'd theſe Wretches in a double Guilt. His Majeſty perceiving that the Enemies to Peace had the Aſcendency, and had no further Thoughts of preparing their Propoſitions, having drawn a Line about Reading to make it a Garriſon, he left Sir Arthur Aſton to be Governor of the Place, with a Garriſon of above two Thouſand Foot, and a good Regiment of Horſe. He himſelf with the reſt of his Army march'd to Oxford, where he reſolv'd to reſt that Winter; at the ſame Time placing a good Garriſon at Wallingford, a Place of great Importance within eight Miles of that Univerſity; another at the Brill upon the Edge of Buckinghamſhire, having a third before at Banbury; Abington being the Head Quarters for his Horſe. By this Means he had all Oxfordſhire entirely, all Berkſhire but that inconſiderable Diviſion about Windſor; and from the Brill and Banbury, a good Influence both upon Buckinghamſhire and Northamptonſhire.

The King returns to Oxford, and ſettles there.

5. After the King was ſettled in his Winter Quarters, in the beginning of December, he reſolv'd to apply ſome Remedy to the ſpreading Infection in Scotland, by means of the Parliament's Declaration before mention'd; which had been ſhewn him by ſeveral Hands, and particularly preſented to him by the Scotch Earl of Lindſey, one of the Commiſſioners now at London. And beſides, there was every Day ſome Motion in the Houſe of Commons, to urge the Scots to invade the Kingdom for their Aſſiſtance, upon the Growth of the Earl of Newcaſtle's Power in the North. And therefore upon mature Deliberation, the King wrote to his Privy-Council of Scotland, and took Notice of the ſaid Declaration, which had earneſtly invited, and in a manner challeng'd an Aſſiſtance of Men and Arms from that his Native Kingdom, for making a War againſt him, and claim'd that Aſſiſtance by Vertue of the late Act of Pacification. 'He recounted to them the ſeveral Outrages and Hardſhips he had ſuſtain'd; of which he doubted not but his Scottiſh Subjects wou'd have ſo juſt a Reſentment, that they wou'd expreſs to the World the Senſe they had of his Sufferings: And he hop'd that they cou'd not believe that theſe Miſeries were brought upon him by his two Houſes of Parliament; for the Members of both Houſes had been ſo driven from thence, that of above five Hundred Members of the Houſe of Commons, there were not then there above Fourſcore; and of above one Hundred of the Houſe of Peers, not above fifteen or ſixteen; all which were ſo awed by a Multitude of Anabaptiſts, Browniſts, and other Perſons deſperate and decay'd in their Fortunes, that their Conſultations had not the Freedom and Privilege which belong to Parliaments. Then he clear'd himſelf of ſeveral Aſperſions, particularly his Intention of bringing in Foreign Forces; of which there cou'd be no clearer Argument to his Subjects of Scotland, than that he had hitherto forborn to require the Aſſiſtance of that his Native Kingdom. He aſſur'd them he was forc'd to take up Arms for the Defence and Safety of his Life, the Maintenance of the true Proteſtant Religion, the Preſervation of the Laws, Liberties and Conſtitution of his Kingdom; and that he look'd no longer for a Bleſſing from Heaven, than he endeavour'd the Defence and Advancement of all theſe.'

The King ſends a Meſſage to the Privy-Council of Scotland.

His Letter to the Marqueſs of Hamilton.

About the ſame Time, his Majeſty ſent down the Earl of Lanerick, Brother to the Marqueſs of Hamilton, as a Perſon who underſtood his Thoughts beſt, and moſt able to ſecond his Brother in advancing his Service: By him he ſent a Letter to the Marqueſs, in which, after ſome clear Expreſſions of Kindneſs and Gratitude, he has theſe remarkable Words: I have ſet up my Reſt upon the Juſtice of my Cauſe, being reſolv'd that no Extremity or Misfortune ſhall make me yield; for I will be either a GLORIOUS KING, or a PATIENT MARTYR; and as yet not being the Firſt, nor at this preſent apprehending the Other, I think it now no unfit Time to expreſs this my Reſolution to you. One Thing more (which but for the Meſſenger, were too much to truſt to Paper) the Failing to one Friend [the Earl of Strafford] hath indeed gone very near Me; wherefore I am reſolv'd, That no Conſideration whatſoever ſhall ever make me do the like: Upon this Ground I am certain, that God hath either ſo totally forgiven me, that he will ſtill bleſs this good Cauſe in my Hands; or that all my Puniſhment ſhall be in this World, which without performing what I have reſolv'd, I cannot flatter my ſelf will end here. This memorable Letter both ſhew'd what pious Reſentments his Majeſty carry'd along with him in the greateſt Perplexities of his Affairs, and that he ſtill thought that the Marqueſs had neither neglected nor abus'd his Truſt; which he had more Reaſon to believe afterwards.

The King's next Care was the procuring Mony for the Payment of his Army; for the Soldiers already grew high, and were ready to diſobey all Orders but of their own making; and Prince Rupert only conſider'd the Subſiſtence of the Horſe as his Province, therefore wou'd not ſuffer the great Contributions allow'd by the Counties within his Command, to be apply'd to any other Uſe, or to be receiv'd by any other Officers but his own. So that the Charge of the Garriſons, the whole Body of the Foot, and the King's Houſhold Expence, was to be born out of ſuch Monies as cou'd be borrow'd. The King having no Part of his own Revenue at Command, by Letters, and other gentle Methods, invited thoſe that were able, to conſider how their own Security depended upon his Rights; and offer'd to ſell any of his Lands, or to give any Perſonal Security for Mony to be lent upon Intereſt: For he had prepar'd a Grant of ſeveral Parks and Foreſts, and other Crown Lands, to many Perſons of Honour and Riches, who were ready to be bound for whatſoever Sums ſhou'd be borrow'd. The Affection of the Univerſity of Oxford was at this Time very ſignal; for as they had almoſt exhauſted their Stocks and Purſes, by ſending the King above ten thouſand Pounds, ſoon after his Standard was erected; ſo they now again made him a new Preſent. By theſe Means, and the Loan of particular Perſons, eſpecially from London, where the Loyalty of many broke thro' all Difficulties, his Majeſty beyond his Hopes was able to pay off his Foot, at the Weekly Expence of above three thouſand Pounds; ſo that during the whole Winter, there was not the leaſt Diſorder for want of Pay. And then he us'd all poſſible Care to promote new Levies of Horſe and Foot, for the recruiting his Army againſt the next Spring.

The King's Ways of raiſing Mony.

The Proceedings of the two Houſes.

6. The other Army being now about London, the Officers of it who were Members of Parliament diligently attended the Houſes; and tho' they ſtill ſeem'd very deſirous of Peace, they ſeverely proſecuted all ſuch as really endeavour'd it. It was obſerv'd, that their Partiality and Injuſtice was ſo notorious, that there was no Rule or Meaſure of Right in any Matter depending before them, but according to the Affections and Opinions of the contending Perſons, of which Inſtances are innumerable. Yet ſtill they found the old Arguments of Popery, the Militia, and Delinquents, were daily leſs regarded by the People; and that as the King's own Religion was now above Scandal, ſo the Regal Power ſeem'd ſo aſſerted by Law, and ſuch Statutes as the King had often cited, that as long as they confeſs'd his Sovereign Power, they knew all legal Miniſters had ſuch Dependence on him, that their Authority wou'd gradually fall into Contempt. And they were reminded of this Diſadvantage by the Seaſon of the Year; when now, according to Cuſtom, the King prick'd Sheriffs, and made ſuch a Choice in all Counties, that they found the People wou'd not be ſo implicitely at their Diſpoſal. Therefore, as they had before ſubtlely inſinuated in ſome Particulars, they now boldly avow'd, ‘That the ‘Sovereign Power was wholly and entirely in Them; and ‘that the King, ſevered from them, had no Regal Power ‘in him.’ Their Clergy had hitherto been their Champions, and wreſted the Scriptures to their Purpoſe; now their Lawyers were to vindicate their Title, and proſtiſtuted their Profeſſion with as little Modeſty as the other had done their Religion. Particularly the more than once nam'd Mr. Prynne, who now getting to be a Member of Parliament, became one of the moſt indefatigable and implacable Men in the Houſe; and began to compile thoſe tedious Pieces of his, ſtil'd The Sovereign Power of Parliaments, &c. which he ſoon after publiſh'd with great Applauſe. Being ſupply'd with the Learning of this and other Gentlemen, the Houſes declar'd, ‘That the Sheriffs ‘then conſtituted by the King were not legal Sheriffs, ‘nor ought to be ſubmitted to in that Office, and order'd ‘all ſuch to be ſent for as Delinquents.’ And whereas the King had order'd ſome of the Priſoners taken at Edge-Hill, particularly the invincible John Lilburn, to be indicted of High-Treaſon before the Lord-Chief-Juſtice and other Judges; they declar'd, ‘All Indictments and Proceedings ‘thereupon to be unjuſt and illegal,’ and inhibited the Judges to proceed any further therein, declaring, ‘That if ‘any Man were executed, or ſuffer'd Hurt for any Thing ‘done by their Order, the like Puniſhment ſhou'd be in‘flicted, by Death, or otherwiſe, upon ſuch Priſoners as ‘were or ſhou'd be taken by their Forces.

Prynne writes in their Vindication.

Their Succeſs in Foreign Countries.

Indeed by this Time there ſeem'd to be two Sovereigns in the Kingdom; for the Lords and Commons, that now compos'd the two Houſes, in all Formality ſent Letters of Credence, Inſtructions and Agents into Foreign Kingdoms and States; and their Agents ſeem'd more induſtrious, or had better Succeſs in their Negotiations, than the King's Miniſters. One Strickland, an obſcure Gentleman in Holland, found Means by Intelligence, and other Ways, to divert moſt of the Supplies the Prince of Orange either ſent, or deſign'd to ſend for the Service of the King. With the ſame Succeſs they ſent another Agent to Bruſſels, who prevail'd with the Governour of Flanders, always to diſcountenance, and ſometimes to prevent the Preparations there making by the King's Miniſters. And in France they had another Agent, Anlgier by Name, a Man long before in the conſtant Pay of the Crown, who tho' he was not publickly avow'd by that Crown, did them more Service than either of the other; by how much more that People had an Influence upon the Diſtempers of three Kingdoms. None of theſe three Potentates were for aſſiſting the King, but either out of political Reaſons, or particular Reſentments, prov'd directly againſt his Intereſt, or at leaſt were willing to encourage, or pleas'd to ſee theſe inteſtine Diviſions. The States of Holland were inclinable to the Cauſe the Parliament eſpous'd in England; the French had been the principal Incendiaries as to the Troubles in Scotland, and the Spaniard had very much blown up the Flame in Ireland.

New Ways of raiſing Mony by the Houſes.

In the mean Time all Diſcourſes and Motions for Peace ceaſing, and ſtill the Houſes finding themſelves preſs'd for the Want of Mony, for all their vaſt Sums and voluntary Loans ſeem'd to be at an End; they Magiſterially order'd, ‘That Committees ſhou'd be nam'd in all Counties, to ‘take Care for Proviſions for the Army, and alſo for tak‘ing up Horſes for Service in the Field, and for borrow‘ing Mony and Plate for Supplies; and from Certificates ‘from thoſe Committees, who might ſet their own Va‘lues upon theſe Proviſions, the ſame ſhou'd be enter'd ‘with their Treaſurer, who ſhou'd hereafter pay the ſame.’ But becauſe this was more like to draw Supply from their Friends, than others, they order'd, ‘That in caſe the ‘Owners refus'd to bring in Mony, &c. for the Uſe of ‘the Army; for the better preventing the Spoil and Im‘bezlement of ſuch Proviſions, &c. by the Diſorder of the ‘Soldiers, or by the Hands of the Enemies, the Commit‘tees, or any two of them, ſhou'd be enabled to ſend for ‘the ſaid Proviſions, take them into their Cuſtody, and ‘ſet indifferent Rates upon them; which Value they ‘ſhou'd certify to the Treaſurers, that the Proportions ‘might be paid in ſuch Time and Manner, as ſhou'd be ‘order'd by the two Houſes.’ They very much aggravated the Contributions made for the King's Army, which muſt neceſſarily ruin all, unleſs they rais'd Mony by extraordinary Means; and complain'd, ‘That divers in Lon‘don and Weſtminſter had not contributed at all towards ‘their Army, or not anſwerable to their Eſtates, and yet ‘had receiv'd the Benefit and Protection of it:’ Upon which Grounds it was ordain'd, ‘That the Lord-Mayor ‘Pennington, and ſome other Aldermen and Citizens, or ‘any four of them, ſhou'd have Power to appoint within ‘every Ward, ſix Perſons who ſhould have Power to en‘quire who had not contributed Mony, Plate, &c. or not ‘anſwerable to their Eſtates; and thoſe, or any four of ‘them, ſhou'd be empower'd within their ſeveral Wards ‘to aſſeſs all the aforeſaid Perſons, to the Value not ex‘ceeding the twentieth Part of their Eſtates, and nominate ‘fit Perſons for the Receipt therefore. They were to di‘ſtrain upon all Perſons that refus'd Payment, and to ‘command the Train'd-Bands againſt ſuch as made Re‘ſiſtance.’ By a ſecond Ordinance, they appointed ‘That if ‘no Diſtreſs cou'd be made, the Collectors ſhou'd enquire ‘what Sums of Mony were due to thoſe Perſons; and have ‘Power to receive all ſuch Debts, till the full Sums and ‘Charges ſhou'd be ſatisfy'd: And leſt the Diſcovery of thoſe ‘Debts ſhou'd be difficult, the ſame Collectors had Power to ‘make Compoſitions, and give full Diſcharges upon ſuch ‘Compoſitions.’ And laſtly, if the Mony aſſeſs'd cou'd not be got any of theſe Ways, ‘Then the Perſons aſſeſs'd ‘ſhou'd be impriſon'd in ſuch Places, and for ſuch a ‘Time as the Houſe of Commons Committee ſhou'd ap‘point; and the Families of ſuch Perſons ſo impriſon'd ‘ſhou'd no longer remain within the Cities of London and ‘Weſtminſter, the Suburbs, or the Counties adjacent.’ Such were the Weights that were more eſpecially laid upon London and Weſtminſter, beſides what they had born from the very Beginning of this Parliament; ſo that theſe Cities, who by their Mobs were the firſt Promoters, or Inſtruments, were the firſt Sufferers in the Burthen of this unnatural War.

The King's Declaration upon that Occaſion.

The Houſes having in this Manner aſſum'd as great an Authority to Themſelves as ever King, Lords and Commons had together, and his Majeſty ſuppoſing the Peoples Eyes wou'd hereupon be open'd in Favour of his Cauſe, was not ſorry to ſee this ſtrange Ordinance: Yet he thought fit to awaken his Subjects to a due Reſentment of it, by publiſhing a new Declaration to expoſe the Exorbitancy and Tyranny of it, in which he charges them with the higheſt Breaches of the Conſtitution of the Kingdom, and in the moſt notorious Inſtances; having among other Matters theſe pathetical Exclamations: ‘How many Perſons of Honour, Quality and Reputation, of the ſeveral Counties of England, are now impriſon'd, without any Objections againſt them, but Suſpicion of their Loyalty? How many of the greateſt and moſt ſubſtantial Citizens of London, who had preſerv'd the Government and Diſcipline of that City, are diſgrac'd, robb'd and impriſon'd, without any Proceſs of Law, or Colour of Accuſation, but of Obedience to the Law, and Government of the Kingdom? While Anabaptiſts and Browniſts, with the Aſſiſtance of vicious and debauch'd Perſons of deſperate Fortunes, take upon them to break up and rifle Houſes, as publick and avow'd Miniſters of a new invented Authority. How many godly, pious and painful Divines, whoſe Lives and Learning have made them of Reverend Eſtimation, are now ſlander'd with Inclination to Popery, diſcountenanc'd and impriſon'd for diſcharging their Conſciences, inſtructing the People in the Chriſtian Duties of Religion and Obedience? While ſchiſmatical, illiterate and ſcandalous Preachers, fill the Pulpits and Churches with Blaſphemy, Irreverence and Treaſon, and incite their Auditory to nothing but Murder and Rebellion?’ But whatſoever the King cou'd ſay or publiſh againſt that Ordinance, it did not hinder the bringing in a great Supply of Mony, and it gave them Credit to borrow more; ſo that the Army was drawn out, tho' but to Winter Quarters, twenty Miles from London, and the Earl of Eſſex fix'd his Head Quarters at Windſor, the better to ſtraiten the King's new Garriſon at Reading.

Eſſex's head Quarters at Windſor.

The Earl of New-caſtle*'s Succeſs in the* North.

7. In the mean Time the King's Affairs in the North had a promiſing Aſpect under the Command of the Earl of Newcaſtle: For that noble Lord, having gather'd a conſiderable Force in Northumberland, Cumberland, and thoſe Parts, began his March over the River Tees, at a Paſs call'd Piercebrig, where his Paſſage was diſputed by Captain Hotham, who being ſoon overpower'd retreated; and the very Fear of the Earl's Arrival caus'd Sir Edward Loftus with the Richmondſhire Forces, and Sir Henry Anderſon with thoſe of Cleveland, to disband and return home to their Houſes: So that the whole Yorkſhire Forces, under Command of the Lord Ferdinando Fairfax for the Parliament, amounted to no more than twenty one Companies of Foot, ſeven Troops of Horſe, and one Company of Dragoons; whereas the Earl's Forces for the King, being joyn'd with thoſe of the Earl of Cumberland, made up a compleat Army of eight thouſand Men, of which two thouſand were Horſe and Dragoons. The Earl having his Commiſſion enlarg'd, publiſh'd a Declaration, and march'd to the City of York, where he was well receiv'd by Sir Thomas Glemham, the Governor, and many of the Gentry of that County. From York the Earl march'd towards the Enemy's Head Quarters, and forc'd the Lord Fairfax and his Lieutenant-General Captain Hotham out of Tadcaſter, and took Bradford by Storm, tho' with greater Loſs to his own Party than to the other. Sir Thomas Fairfax, Son to the Lord Fairfax, who was ſent to Leeds with a ſmall Party to poſſeſs himſelf of that Place, was likewiſe forc'd back with a conſiderable Loſs, tho' not long after he bravely got Poſſeſſion of it. The Earl ſtill grew more and more potent, not only by reaſon of the Greatneſs of his Army at firſt, which was ſtill augmented by the Country's coming in as to a prevailing Party, but likewiſe by a Supply of Arms, Mony, Ordnance and Ammunition, together with the Queen's Standard brought over by Colonel Goring, who by her Majeſty was order'd to joyn with the Earl's Forces.

Several Counties aſſociated by the Parliament.

The two Houſes being apprehenſive leaſt the Greatneſs of Newcaſtle's Army ſhou'd not only over-power the North, but likewiſe ſpread its Influence to the more neighbouring Counties, fell very earneſtly to an Aſſociation of divers Counties, where they had the greateſt Intereſt. They accordingly conſtituted Commanders in chief of new Forces to be levy'd within the Aſſociations, beginning with the Shires of Buckingham, Bedford, Rutland, Northampton, Leiceſter, Derby, Nottingham and Huntingdon; appointing the Lord Grey of Groby, Son to the Earl of Stamford, Serjeant-Major-General there, and planting Garriſons in every Caſtle and great Town throughout all thoſe Parts. They ordain'd the like Aſſociation for the Counties of Cambridge, Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, Part of the Iſle of Ely, and the City of Norwich; William Lord Grey of Warke being made Commander in chief throughout all thoſe Counties. And to put the People in hope that this Charge and Trouble wou'd not laſt long, they made Reports, That the King's Forces were utterly broken and diſpers'd, and particularly read Letters in the Houſes from their General, ‘That he wou'd purſue the King with all Vigour and Vehemency.

Some ſmaller Actions.

In this Month of December there hapned ſeveral Actions, which tho' of inferior Moment, were ſo many Additions to the Miſeries of the Kingdom. On the firſt Day of the Month Sir William Waller with a Party of Horſe took Farnham Caſtle in Surry, from the Poſſeſſion of Mr. Denham High-Sheriff, and other Commiſſioners of Array for the King. On the fifth, the Lords Digby and Grandiſon with ſome Troops of Horſe took Marlborough in Wiltſhire, with vaſt Damage to the Place, after it had been fortify'd and defended by the Parliament Forces; in which they took a thouſand Priſoners, and a very great Booty. On the thirteenth, Sir William Waller recover'd Wincheſter for the Parliament, out of the Hands of the Lord Grandiſon and others, who after they had been taken Priſoners, made their Eſcapes. On the eighteenth, Colonel Ruthen Commander of the Garriſon of Plymouth for the Parliament, ſurpris'd the High-Sheriff of Devonſhire, and other Commiſſioners of Array, and ſent them Priſoners to London. On the twenty ninth, Chicheſter was ſurrender'd, with ſeveral Priſoners, to Sir William Waller, which was judg'd ſo advantageous, that the Parliament order'd publick Thanks to be given for it. And in moſt Parts of England, Skirmiſhes, Aſſaults and Salleys were ſo frequent and ſo fierce, that all People now dreaded and felt the deplorable Effects of a Civil War.

Thus ſtood Affairs at the End of the old Year 1642, for a Concluſion of which, we ſhall, as in other Years, deſcend a little to Biography, and take Notice of the Memories of ſome Perſons deceaſed. Beſides the Earl of Lindſey, and others who periſh'd in Battel, there dy'd ſeveral conſiderable Men, tho' moſt of inferior Quality; as firſt four Divines, namely, Dr. John Barcham, Rector and Dean of Bockyng in Eſſex, a Perſon, who beſides his Skill and Knowledge in Theology, was very expert in Languages, a curious Critick, a noted Antiquary, eſpecially in what related to Coins, and an exact Hiſtorian; and particularly to be remember'd for his Hiſtory of King John, and ſome other Paſſages intermixt with that noted Work, Speed's Chronicle. Next, Dr. Iſaac Bargrave, a Cantabrigian by Education, who was made Chaplain to the preſent King, both before and after he came to the Crown, and for his Worth and Learning preferr'd to the Deanery of Canterbury, which he held with full Reputation eighteen Years. Dr. Tobias Criſp was a Divine of another Stamp, who at Bringworth in Wiltſhire was extreamly follow'd and admir'd for his edifying Way of Preaching, and his ſignal Hoſpitality; but his Notions being profound and peculiar, and ſavouring both of Puritaniſm and Antinomianiſm, his Works have been the Occaſion of many notable Diſputes and Controverſies. Dr. Gilbert Primeroſe was a Scotch Divine and a noted Traveller, and one of the French Preachers of the Proteſtant Church of Bourdeaux in France; a Perſon who for his Learning and Worth was recommended by the King himſelf to the Univerſity of Oxford, and then preferr'd by him to a Canonry of Windſor. There alſo died this Year two celebrated School-Maſters, Dr. Thomas Godwin, and Dr. Alexander Gill; the former was chief Maſter of Abingdon School in Berkſhire, where by his great Endeavours many were educated that were afterwards eminent in Church and State; a reverend and graceful Perſon, deeply learned in Latine, Greek and Hebrew Antiquity, and admirably well vers'd in all thoſe Matters requiſite to his Profeſſion. The latter, Dr. Gill, was Son to the famous School-Maſter of St. Paul's, mention'd in the Year 1635, who after many various Changes ſucceeded his Father in the Head Maſterſhip of the ſame School, where he became eminent in his Employment, and accounted one of the beſt Latine Poets in the Nation. We are likewiſe to take Notice of two other great Men, Sir Randolph Crew, and Sir John Suckling; the former was a renown'd Lawyer, who by his great Merits was advanc'd to be Lord-Chief-Juſtice in the King's-Bench, where he ſerv'd with great Integrity; but diſallowing of the Proceedings in the Loan 1626, he was diſcharg'd from his Office, as has been formerly mention'd; and for ſixteen Years after he led a private Life at his Houſe in Weſtminſter, where he gain'd no ſmall Eſteem and Reputation by his honourable and hoſpitable Way of Living. The latter, Sir John Suckling, was one of the fineſt Gentlemen in England, call'd The Delight of the Court, and the Darling of the Muſes; a Man of admirable Wit and Parts, and a moſt pregnant Genius in Poetry and polite Learning. He was Comptroller to the King, to whom he was ſo loyal, as to be at the Expence of twelve thouſand Pounds in a Troop of Horſe againſt the Scots; and now being ſeiz'd with a Fever, he was ſuddenly ſnatch'd away in the twenty ninth Year of his Age, to the great Grief of many Lords and Ladies. Laſt of all dy'd that old Stateſman Henry Montague Earl of Mancheſter, near eighty Years of Age, whoſe Character has been given in another Place: He liv'd to ſee the Beginnings of our Civil Wars, and his eldeſt Son Kimbolton deeply involv'd in thoſe Calamities, who upon his Death in November became Earl of Mancheſter.

And Cardinal Richlieu.

Beſides theſe Engliſhmen, we may very juſtly mention a Foreigner, as having ſo mighty an Influence upon the Engliſh Affairs, John du Pleſſis, Cardinal of Richlieu, who dy'd in the Month of December, in the fifty-eighth Year of his Age, after he had worn himſelf out in Affairs of the vaſteſt Extent and Difficulty, that ever were compaſs'd by any Subject. He was eſteem'd the Prodigy of the Age, of the moſt wonderful Abilities, the moſt boundleſs Ambition, and the moſt invincible Induſtry; who had the Faculty of ſowing Diſcords, and compoſing them with that admirable Dexterity, that as Art never fail'd him, ſo Fortune ſeldom forſook him. His true Character was, never to be remiſs in Proſperity, and never fearful in Adverſity; and having by his profound Management united the Power of France, ſuccour'd Italy, confounded the Empire, divided and embroil'd England, and weakned the Monarchy of Spain, he was the Inſtrument, appointed by the Divine Providence, for the Scourge and Puniſhment of Europe. This mighty Miniſter of State is ſaid to have dy'd worth ſix Millions of our Mony; leaving the Succeſſion of his Employments to his Diſciple Cardinal Mazarine, who for near twenty Years ſucceſsfully trod in his Maſter's Steps.

IV. I. We are now entring upon a Year, in which England, tho' formerly us'd to ſee the Bloodſhed of its Natives, now beheld the moſt hideous Spectacles that had ever been acted on its Stage. For an Introduction to which, we ſhall take Notice of ſome of the principal Actors, of both Sides, in this diſmal Tragedy, whether belonging to the Camp or Council. The King was now at Oxford, and had many great Men about him; of whom, it will be proper to give an Account of Prince Rupert, and the chief of the Privy-Counſellors, ſuch as the Duke of Richmond, Marqueſs of Hertford, Earl of Southampton, Earl of Leiceſter, Earl of Briſtol, and Earl of Newcaſtle, with ſome other Lords and Miniſters of State. Prince Rupert was ſecond Brother to Charles Prince Palatine of the Rhine, Nephew to the King, and now about twenty three Years of Age. Allowing for his Youth, he was a Perſon of no ſmall Skill and Experience, having been educated in Arms from his Childhood: He had a brave and enterpriſing Spirit, and was of that intrepid Courage and Activity, that (contrary to the Scotch Wars, when the King had great Armies and no forward Commanders,) he quickly rang'd and diſciplin'd this ſmall Body of Men, that they ſoon ſtruck a Terror into their Oppoſers; and indeed he at firſt infus'd ſuch a Spirit into the King's Army, that all Men ſeem'd reſolv'd to do their Duties. Had he been as cautious, as he was a vigorous Fighter, and a knowing Perſon in all Parts of War, he had moſt probably been a very Fortunate Commander. He ſhew'd a great and exemplary Temperance, which fitted him to undergo the Fatigues of War, ſo that he deſerv'd the real Character of a Soldier; for he was never apt by Indulgences to loſe any of his Advantages. Yet his preſſing Eagerneſs to fight, and that againſt a well-diſciplin'd Army, more than once turn'd to Prejudice: Then a Roughneſs of Temper, and Unſociableneſs in Converſation or Council, and a Readineſs to piſh at and deſpiſe the Advice he did not approve, render'd him leſs grateful than his Friends deſir'd; and this Humour ſower'd him towards the Counſellors of Civil Affairs, who were neceſſary to intermix with him in Military Conſultations. And theſe great Men often diſtruſted ſuch downright Soldiers as the Prince was, tho' of the Royal Blood, leſt he ſhou'd be too ready to prolong the War, and to obtain that by pure Victory, which they deſir'd might be gain'd by a dutiful Submiſſion upon modeſt and peaceable Terms, or by Addreſſes of the two Houſes to his Majeſty. In reality, had the Prince ſtudy'd more to have remov'd this Jealouſy, or the King more vigorouſly interpos'd therein, ſo as to make Himſelf Maſter of both Parties, his Arms had probably been much more proſperous: But neither of them paying full Reſpect to Him, or due Regard to each other, it prov'd a great Diminution to his Power and Dignity. As to the other Commanders, as Wilmot, Goring, Hopton, Aſhley, &c. we ſhall take Notice of them in another Place.

Characters and Accounts of great Men.

Prince Rupert,

The Duke of Richmond.

James Stuart, Duke of Richmond, is next to be mention'd; who being neareſt ally'd to the King of any Man not deſcended from King James, was worthy of all thoſe Favours ſhewn him by his Majeſty; who had taken Care of his firſt Education, and ſent him into France, Italy and Spain, of which laſt Kingdom he was made a Grandee; and at his Return, tho' ſcarce one and twenty Years of Age, he made him a Privy-Counſellor; and ſoon after marry'd him to the ſole and beautiful Daughter of his dead Favourite, the Duke of Buckingham, who brought him a conſiderable Portion; with which, and his Majeſty's great Bounties, he became as eaſy in his Fortune, as he was eminent in his Title. He was a Man of very good Parts, and an excellent Underſtanding; yet, like the King his Maſter, ſo diffident of Himſelf, that he was ſometimes led by Men who judg'd much worſe. It was obſerv'd, that his good Nature was ſuch, that he cou'd never diſtruſt another, till it was dangerous to ſuſpect; but ſtill was of a great and high Spirit, and ſo punctual in Point of Honour, as not to deviate one Title. He was ſo unmoveable in his Loyalty, that he abhorr'd the uſual Arts of ſheltering Himſelf from the Power of the Greateſt, who fail'd in their Duty to his Majeſty; and therefore he was purſu'd with implacable Malice, as One who wou'd receive no Quarter upon the mean Terms of being only a By-ſtander, while his Maſter was injur'd. As he had receiv'd great Bounties from the King, ſo he ſacrific'd all he had to his Service, as ſoon as his Occaſions requir'd it, and rais'd what Mony he cou'd for him; and when the War began, he engag'd his three Brothers, George, John and Bernard, all gallant Gentlemen, in his Service; in which they all loſt their Lives. He himſelf liv'd with inviolable Fidelity ſome Years after the Murther of his Maſter, for whom he offer'd his own Life, and was ſuffer'd to put him into his Grave; but had not the Comfort of ſeeing the Reſtoration of his Son.

The Marqueſs of Hertford.

The next in Courſe was William Seymour, Marqueſs of Hertford, a Perſon of great Honour and Fortune, and Intereſt in the Affection of the People; and had always met with hard Meaſures from the Court, where he long receiv'd no Countenance, and liv'd without Deſign of receiving Advantage from it. For tho' he was a Man of very good Parts, skilful in Latin and Greek Authors, and of an experienc'd Courage; yet he was ſo entirely given up to a Country Life, which he led with Splendor and Hoſpitality, that he acquir'd an Averſion, and even an Unaptneſs for Buſineſs. Then, beſides his Intimacy with the Earl of Eſſex, whoſe Siſter he had marry'd, his neareſt Acquaintance and Society had been with thoſe, who were thought moſt zealouſly affected to the Liberty of the Kingdom, and moſt oppoſite to the Humour of the Court; many of whom were Leaders, who engag'd themſelves moſt furiouſly and factiouſly againſt the King. But as ſoon as he diſcern'd their violent Purpoſes againſt the eſtabliſh'd Government, before he ſuſpected their darker Deſigns, he deſerted them upon Principle; and from the Beginning of the Parliament, never concurr'd in any diſhonourable Vote to the King or the Earl of Strafford. He accepted of the Government of the Prince of Wales, to oblige the King in a critical Juncture; tho' for the Performance of that Office, he never thought himſelf fit, nor indeed medled with it. He endeavour'd to ſerve the King more effectually, when he went to raiſe an Army for him in the Weſt, as is remember'd; but he found thoſe Parts ſo prepoſſeſs'd, and a contrary Army ſo ſoon poured down upon him, that at preſent nothing was to be done worthy of his Preſence; ſo that he ſent his ſmall Party further Weſt to Cornwall, where gradually they became able to raiſe an Army.

The Earl of Southampton.

Thomas Wriotheſly, Earl of Southampton, was a Perſon highly valuable in all Reſpects, and reflected great Reputation on the Royal Cauſe; and the more, becauſe he never had any Converſation in the Court, nor Obligation to it, but had receiv'd ſome Hardſhips from it. He was much inclin'd to Study and Retirement, had a noble Spirit, and was happy in the general Opinion of his Integrity and unblemiſh'd Character. He had great Diſlike of the high Courſes, which had been taken in the Government, and a particular Prejudice to the Earl of Strafford, for ſome violent Proceedings; therefore in the Beginning of the Parliament, no Man was more courted by the chief Managers than this great Lord; who, perceiving ſuch a Declenſion of Reverence and Duty to the King, and ſuch an unjuſtifiable Proſecution of the Earl, oppos'd them vigorouſly in all their Meaſures. He was a learned Man, of great Acuteneſs of Judgment, Quickneſs of Apprehenſion, and that Readineſs of Expreſſion upon any ſudden Debate, that no Man deliver'd Himſelf with greater Weight and Advantage to his Auditors; and no Man gave them more Trouble by his Oppoſition, or drew over ſo many to him in Opinion. Having all along purſu'd the Publick Intereſt, he was with Difficulty perſuaded to be a Counſellor, and with greater to be of the Bed-Chamber; but the ſooner accepted of theſe Honours, to ſhew how much he contemn'd the high Votes of the Parliament, which ſuffer'd no Man to hold any Preferment in Church or State, who refus'd to take their Proteſtation. He attended the King to the End of the War, and took all Opportunities to promote a Peace; and as no Man was more exact in performing his own Duty, ſo none had more melancholy Apprehenſions of the Iſſue of the War.

The Earl of Leiceſter.

Robert Sidney, Earl of Leiceſter, was a Man of great Parts, very converſant in Books, and much addicted to the Mathematicks; and tho' he had been a Commander in the Ser-

Service of the States of Holland, and afterwards an Ambaſſador in Denmark and France, yet in reality was more a ſpeculative than a practical Man; and expected a greater Certitude in the Adjuſting of Buſineſs, than can generally be had in the Affairs of this World; which Temper in all Emergencies prov'd very inconvenient to him. His greateſt Misfortunes proceeded from the Staggering and Irreſolution in his Nature, which threw him under many undeſerv'd Reproaches and Jealouſies; for he was a Man of Honour and Fidelity to the King, and ſo much in the Eſteem of both their Majeſties, that upon the Death of the Earl of Strafford he was made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, as is remember'd: But at the King's Arrival at Oxford, being ready to embark at Cheſter, for the Execution of his Office, he was requir'd to attend his Majeſty for further Inſtructions at Oxford, where he remain'd, and tho' he was of the Council, and ſometimes preſent, he deſir'd not to have any Part in the main Buſineſs.

The Earl of Briſtol.

John Digby, Earl of Briſtol, was a Man of a venerable Preſence, of great Parts and improv'd Education, and of long Experience in Affairs of the higheſt Importance. He was raiſ'd by King James, and employ'd in many Embaſſies, particularly for the Negotiating the Match between the Prince his Son, and the Infanta of Spain; and was loaded with many Favours, till he was cruſh'd by the Power of the Duke of Buckingham, and the Prejudice contracted by the Prince while he was in Spain; for which he was afterwards impriſon'd, and treated hardly both by the Duke and the Court, as is formerly mention'd. After the Duke's Death, the King retain'd ſuch a Memory of that Favourite's Diſpleaſures, that this Earl cou'd never recover any Admiſſion to Court, but liv'd in the Country, in Eaſe and Plenty, and in ſingular Reputation with all who had little Reverence for the Court; and at the Beginning of the Parliament, appear'd at the Head of all the diſcontented Party. But ſtill his Loyalty was ſuch, that he ſoon left them, when they enter'd upon their unwarrantable Violences, and became ſo much in their Disfavour, that upon ſome Expreſſions in a Debate, they ſent him to the Tower; from whence being ſoon releaſ'd, he repair'd to the King at York, who reſtor'd him to his former Place in the Council and Bed-Chamber. He faithfully adher'd to the King, and at length was driven into France, where he dy'd; the prevailing Party being ſo implacable againſt him, that they wou'd not ſuffer him to ſtay in England, or compound for his Eſtate. Tho' he was a wiſe Man, and of great Abilities, yet he had been generally ſingle in Buſineſs, and liv'd little in Conſort; ſo that in Council he was paſſionate and ſupercilious, uneaſy at Contradiction, and redundant in Diſcourſe; ſo that he was not conſider'd there with much Reſpect; to the Leſſening of which no Man contributed more than his own Son, the Lord Digby, who did not ſhew that Reverence which his Father's Wiſdom and Experience deſerv'd, tho' he fail'd not in his ordinary Duty to him.

The Earl of Newcaſtle.

William Cavendiſh, Earl of Newcaſtle, was a very fine Gentleman, of great Generoſity, Loyalty and Courage, and fully accompliſh'd in thoſe Qualities of Horſemanſhip, Dancing and Fencing, which accompany good Breeding; in which he much delighted. He was highly amorous in Poetry and Muſick, to which he indulg'd the greateſt Part of his Time; for which Reaſon he choſe Sir William Davenant, a moſt eminent Poet, and loyal Gentleman, to be Lieutenat-General of his Ordnance. His Courage was invincible, but his Edge had too much of the Razor in it, having the Tincture of a Romantick Spirit, as Sir Philip Warwick obſerves: And nothing cou'd have inchanted him out of thoſe Paths of Pleaſure, which he enjoy'd in a full and ample Fortune, but the Height of Honour and Ambition to ſerve the King when he ſaw him in Diſtreſs, and abandon'd by ſuch as had the neareſt Obligations to him. This rouſ'd him into many and great Services for his Majeſty in the North, where he now continu'd with the Grandeur of a Monarch; as well as the Power of a General. He lov'd Monarchy as it was the Foundation and Support of his own Greatneſs; the Church, as it maintain'd the Splendor and Security of the Crown; and Religion, as it enforc'd the Order and Obedience due to both; without any Zeal for the growing Opinions and Parties in it, than as he abhorr'd whatever was like to diſturb the publick Peace. He ſtrictly kept up the Pomp, State and Dignity of a General, and upon all Occaſions manifeſted the Bravery and Fearleſsneſs of a Common Soldier; but cou'd not ſubmit to the Application and Fatigue of a Commander, leaving that Province to Officers under him, eſpecially to his Lieutenant-General King, an excellent Soldier, but under ſome Diſadvantages in being a Scotch-Man. After the Labour of Action, he uſually retir'd to his delightful Company, Muſick, or his ſofter Pleaſures, to all which he was ſo indulgent, that he wou'd not be interrupted upon any Occaſion whatſoever. Inſomuch that he ſometimes deny'd Admittance to his chiefeſt Officers for two Days together; which brought many Inconveniencies to him and his Employment.

The Lord Savil.

Thomas Lord Savil was likewiſe receiv'd into the Council, a Man of an ambitious and reſtleſs Diſpoſition, of Wit and Parts ſufficient; but in his Nature and Inclination ſo falſe, that he was never to be believ'd or truſted. He had ſhewn a particular Malice to the Earl of Strafford, and was the principal Inſtrument of ingaging the Scots to march into England with an Army, by means of a notorious Piece of Forgery formerly related. After he had brought about all this Miſchief, and ſtill found his Credit in the Parliament inferior to others, he found means to be introduc'd to the King and Queen, to whom he confeſs'd and diſcover'd all the Villanies and Secrets he knew, with a thouſand Proteſtations to repair all by future Loyalty and Service, for which he obtain'd Sir Henry Vane's White Staff, tho' this Diſcovery was of no other uſe, than that the King knew many had been falſe, that he cou'd not puniſh, and ſome that he cou'd not ſuſpect. When the King came to York, where this Lord's Fortune and Intereſt lay, his Reputation was ſo low, that the loyal Gentlemen there wou'd not converſe with him; and after the King's Deparparture, the Earl of Newcaſtle had ſuch a Suſpicion of his Honeſty, that he thought it neceſſary to impriſon him, and then ſend him to Oxford; where he ſo well purg'd himſelf, that he was reſtor'd to his Office, and afterwards made Earl of Suſſex. But in the End he carry'd himſelf ſo ill, that the King again turn'd him out of his Place, and ſent him to Priſon, and never after admitted him to his Preſence; nor wou'd any Man of Quality ever after keep any Correſpondence with him.

The Lord Littleton, and Secretary Nicholas.

Beſides all theſe, there were ſome Officers of State, as the Lord-Keeper Littleton, the two Secretaries, Falkland and Nicholas, Sir John Colepeper Maſter of the Rolls, and Mr. Hyde now Chancellor of the Exchequer, beſides the Lord Digby and one or two more; moſt of whom have been already Characteriz'd. The Lord-Keeper was a Perſon of high Reputation in the Profeſſion of the Law, for Learning and other Perfections that belong to the moſt eminent Men. He was a great Friend to Mr. Selden, by whoſe Aſſiſtance he gain'd the Name of the beſt Antiquary of his Profeſſion, who gave himſelf up to Practice; and by the Strength of his own Abilities he raiſ'd himſelf to be made Recorder of London, Solicitor-General, and then Lord-Chief-Juſtice of the Common-Pleas; in which laſt Sphere he mov'd moſt gracefully, and with ſignal Honour and Reputation. But when he came to be made a Lord, and Keeper of the great Seal, he ſeem'd quite out of his Element: His Fears and Irreſolution brought him into ſtrange Compliances with the prevailing Party: ſo that he prov'd of little Service to the King while he continu'd in the upper Houſe, nor of any great Uſe to him ſince, by reaſon of the general Diſeſteem he had unhappily drawn upon Himſelf. We have already taken notice of the reſt, except Secretary Nicholas, who was a very honeſt and induſtrious Man, and well experienc'd in Buſineſs, having been ſucceſſively Secretary to the Cinque-Ports, and to the Admiralty, before he arriv'd at this laſt Poſt; which he obtain'd without any other Recommendation, than the King's own Obſervation of his Virtue, Integrity and Fidelity.

Obſervation upon the King's Friends.

It is obſervable, that the moſt of theſe Perſons, and indeed the greateſt Part of the King's Friends, tho' both Supporters and Actors in this tempeſtuous Seaſon, were no real Promoters of the War, and leſs deſirous that the King ſhou'd totally ſubdue the Parliament; hoping all Differences might be ſettled by a Treaty in a ſhort Time. This Notion was a mighty Diſadvantage to the King; for tho' it did not leſſen their Endeavours to gain a Battel for him, when it cou'd not well be avoided, yet it weaken'd their Endeavours to make him Conqueror in the Courſe of the War. As nothing more brought on the War than a fond Belief that it would ſoon have an End, ſo nothing more prolong'd it than a continual Endeavouring after Treaties; thoſe being rarely the Concluſion of a Civil War, which generally ends with the total Ruin of one Party, or at leaſt with a bloody Sacrifice of the chief Heads of it.

Characters of the King's Oppoſers.

2. After giving ſome Account of the Chief of the King's Party, we ſhall proceed to thoſe of the other Side, of the Heads of which ſufficient has been ſaid formerly; particularly of the three Leaders in the Houſe of Peers, the Earl of Eſſex, the Lord Say, and the Lord Kimbolton, now Earl of Mancheſter, beſides the Earls of Holland and Pembroke; as alſo of thoſe ſix great Men in the Houſe of Commons, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Saint-John, Mr. Fiennes, and Sir Henry Vane Junior. Therefore thoſe to be characteriz'd at preſent are the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Warwick, and Sir Henry Vane Senior; all Privy-Counſellors, as well as the other five Lords, who had deſerted his Majeſty and his Service.

The Earl of Northumberland.

ancient and illuſtrious Family, tho' labouring under frequent Blemiſhes of Diſloyalty to the Crown; and particularly his Father was impriſon'd, under ſome Suſpicion of being privy to the Gun-Powder Plot, and never reſtor'd to his full Liberty, dying about ſeven Years before the Meeting of this Parliament. But this being a Gentleman of the moſt promiſing Expectations, before he was thirty Years of Age, the King took him into his immediate Care, and pour'd out his Favours upon him with an unreſtrain'd Hand: He made him a Privy-Counſellor, and a Knight of the Garter; then ſent him Admiral of a Royal Navy into the narrow Seas; and after a Summer ſpent there, made him Lord High Admiral of England, as is remember'd; and after this, as the King himſelf ſaid, He courted him as his Miſtreſs, and convers'd with him as his Friend, without the leaſt Interruption or Intermiſſion of any poſſible Favour or Kindneſs. He was a graceful Perſon, and in all his Deportment a very great Man; and that which look'd like Formality, was an Exactneſs in preſerving his Dignity from the Invaſion of daring Men, from which no Man of this Age ſo well ſecur'd himſelf. Tho' his Notions were not profound or extenſive, yet his cautious Temper, and Reſervedneſs in Converſation and Speaking, gain'd him the Reputation of an able and wiſe Man; which more appear'd by his pertinent Expreſſing himſelf in all Debates of Importance. He ſhew'd his Skill in the excellent Government of his Family, where no Man was more abſolutely obey'd; and if he had thought the King as much above him, as he thought himſelf above other conſiderable Men, he wou'd have been a good Subject: But his extream Undervaluing of Thoſe, and his too little Valuing the King, expos'd him to the Impreſſions made upon him by thoſe, who cunningly approach'd with thoſe Reverential Addreſſes, as uſually inſinuate into ſuch Natures. So that after he was firſt perſuaded, not to do that which he was oblig'd to in Honour and Gratitude, he was the more eaſily led to join in that which in Duty and Fidelity he ought not to have done, and which at firſt he never deſign'd to have done. And thus he concurr'd in all the Counſels which produc'd the Miſeries of the Nation, and continu'd to ſupport all the Leaders. So that this may be ſaid both of him and the Earl of Holland, that conſidering the Favours they graſp'd at, and the Bounties they receiv'd from the Crown, they were either the moſt renowned Patriots to their Country, or the moſt ungrateful Rebels to their King.

The Earl of Saliſbury.

The next was William Cecil, Earl of Saliſbury, whoſe Birth and Education had been in Court, and his Deſcent from a Father and Grand-father, who were the celebrated Stateſmen in Europe; whoſe Titles only, without their Wiſdom and Virtues, were inherited by their Children. He was made Privy-Counſellor to King James, when he became ſo obſequious to the Court, that he always over-acted what was requir'd of him; and no Act of Power was propos'd, which he did not promote with the utmoſt Rigour. And the noble Hiſtorian ſays, no Man was ſo great a Tyrant in his Country, or was leſs ſway'd by any Motives of Juſtice and Honour. He was a Man of no Words, except in Hunting and Hawking; and in Matters of State, he continually joyn'd in what was propos'd for the King; and as ſoon as any Propoſitions were made againſt him, he aton'd for his former Tranſgreſſions, by joying as much on that Side. Yet he attended upon his Majeſty at York, and at that Diſtance ſeem'd to have receiv'd ſome Courage, and join'd with the reſt of the Lords in ſigning the ſolemn Ingagement in June, formerly mention'd. But of a ſudden, he took Horſe and fled back to London with all the Marks of Concern and Fear, and never after refus'd to do what was requir'd of him; and when at length the Houſe of Peers was put down, he procur'd himſelf to be elected a Member of the Houſe of Commons, where he ſat as a Commoner, and was accordingly eſteem'd.

The Earl of Warwick.

Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick, and eldeſt Brother to the Earl of Holland, had never been ſerviceable to the King; nor did he think himſelf oblig'd by that Honour he knew was conferr'd upon him in the Crowd of thoſe whom he did not value, or deſign to truſt; ſo his Buſineſs was to joyn with thoſe that help'd him to his Preferment. He was a Perſon of a pleaſant and ſociable Wit and Converſation, of an univerſal Jollity, and ſuch Liberty in his Words and Actions, that a Man of leſs Virtue cou'd ſcarcely be found; ſo that it might have been reaſonably believ'd, that a Man ſo qualify'd cou'd not have done much towards the Overthrow of a Kingdom. But with all theſe Faults, he had great Power and Credit with the People, who in the Beginning of the Commotions were the Inſtruments of all the Miſchief; and by making his Houſe the Receptacle of all the Silenc'd Miniſters, at the Time when there was Authority to ſilence them, liberally ſpending a good Part of his Eſtate upon them, being preſent at their Devotions, and taking ſuch jocoſe Liberties with them as they cou'd diſpenſe withall, he gain'd the Stile of a Godly Man. He prov'd true to the Parliament, and afterwards to Cromwell himſelf; and as his Brother, the Earl of Holland, before the Beginning of the Troubles, obtain'd the Name of the Spiritual and Inviſible Head, ſo he was call'd the Viſible and Temporal Head of the Puritan Party.

Sir Henry Vane Senior.

The laſt was Sir Henry Vane the Elder, a Perſon of very ordinary Parts by Nature, and not cultivated by Art or Learning; but being of a ſtirring and boiſterous Diſpoſition, very induſtrious, and very bold, he ſtill wrought himſelf into ſome Employment. He had been acquainted with the Changes of the Court, and had met with ſome ſevere Mortification from the Diſfavour of the Duke of Buckingham; but upon his Death he was again brought into the Court, and made a Privy-Counſellor and Comptroller of the Houſhold, which Place he became well, without any Unfitneſs; and if he had never taken any new Preferment, he might have probably continu'd a good Subject. For he had no Inclination to change, and he lik'd the Government both of Church and State; and only deſired to raiſe his Fortune, which was not great, and which he had many Ways to improve. He us'd to ſay, He never deſir'd other Preferment, and believ'd that the Marqueſs of Hamilton, when he firſt propos'd to him to be Secretary of State, did it to affront him; well knowing his Want of Ability for the Diſcharge of that Office. What he did as to the Diſſolution of the laſt Parliament, and againſt the Earl of Strafford in this, were Actions inexcuſable, and Miſchiefs irreparable; which ſoon ſerv'd to hurry on his own Fate. For being juſtly chaſtis'd by the King, and turn'd out of his Service, he was left to his own Deſpair; and tho' he joyn'd in all the malicious Deſigns againſt the King and Church, he grew into the Hatred and Contempt of thoſe that employ'd him; and dy'd in univerſal Reproach, not more contemn'd by his Enemies than by his own Son, who had been his chief Conductor towards his Deſtruction.

The Earl of Eſſex.

As to the General himſelf, the Earl of Eſſex, we have formerly mention'd his high and ſtout Temper, and ſhall only now take Notice, That his Vanity diſpos'd him to be His Excellency, and his Weakneſs, to believe he ſhou'd be General in the Houſes, as well as the Field; and ſhou'd be able to govern their Counſels, as well as fight their Battels; and ſo become the Preſerver, and not the Deſtroyer of the King and Kingdom. With this ill-grounded Aſſurance, he launch'd out into a tempeſtuous Sea, where he met with nothing but Rocks and Shelves, and in which he cou'd never diſcover any ſafe Port for a Harbour.

The City's Inclination for a Peace.

3. Such was the Diſpoſition of the Leaders, and the State of Affairs about the Beginning of this great Year of Miſeries, when moſt Perſons began to act with unnatural Fury and Bitterneſs againſt each other. Yet ſtill there were many conſiderate and well meaning Perſons, who had earneſt Inclinations to bring on all Things to a peaceable Period; more particularly divers of the moſt wealthy and ſubſtantial Citizens of London, who, obſerving a general Liberty taken to Petition the Houſes, and the Multitude of the Petitioners to carry great Authority with them, from whence a Brand had been fix'd upon the City, Of being an Enemy to Peace, met together and prepar'd a modeſt Petition to the two Houſes, deſiring, 'Such Propoſitions and 'Addreſſes might be made by Them to his Majeſty, as 'might be accepted with his Honour, and might produce 'a happy Peace:' Which being ſign'd by the Hands of many Thouſands, and ready to be preſented, was diſallow'd by the Houſe of Commons, for no other Reaſon publickly given, but That it was prepar'd by a Multitude; and Objections were fram'd againſt the principal Promoters of it, upon Pretences of Delinquency, ſo that they were compell'd to forſake the Town. At the ſame Time the Inhabitants of Weſtminſter, St. Martins and Covent-Garden, who were generally thought well affected to the King, prepared the like Petition, and met with the ſame Repulſe from the Houſes of Parliament. This unequal Proceeding added nothing to their Reputation, and finding theſe obſtructed Humours like to break out more violently, they again reſum'd their Pretenſions for a Peace, and appointed a Committee to prepare Propoſitions; and becauſe that wou'd be a Work of Time, and that many Arts were to be us'd to wipe out the Imagination That the City deſir'd Peace upon any other Terms than they Themſelves did, and alſo to ſtay the Appetite of thoſe who were moſt eager for it, having by their Management procur'd ſuch a Common-Council choſen by the City, as wou'd comply with their Deſigns, they privately directed their own Mayor to engage that Body in ſuch a Petition to the King, as carrying the Senſe and Reputation of the whole City, might yet prove no Prejudice to the two Houſes. In Subſtance they profeſs'd to his Majeſty, 'That they are deeply pierc'd 'with the deadly Wounds of his Majeſty's Miſapprehenſion of their Loyalty, and his Fears of hazarding his Perſon, in returning home to his City: That they abhorr'd all Thoughts of Diſloyalty; that they wou'd make good their late ſolemn Proteſtation and ſacred Oath, with the laſt Drop of their deareſt Blood, to defend and maintain the true Reform'd Proteſtant Religion, his Majeſty's Royal Perſon, Honour and Eſtate; and that they did thereby engage Themſelves, their Eſtates, and all they had, to defend his Majeſty with as much Love, Loyalty and Duty, as ever Subjects expreſs'd towards their Sovereign: Therefore upon their bending Knees they beſeech his Majeſty to return to his Parliament, with his Royal, not Martial Attendance, for the Settlement of Religion, Liberties, &c.

The King's Anſwer.

Tho' this Petition was in effect no leſs than to deſire the King to disband his Army, and throw himſelf upon the Parliament, yet the People were ſo infatuated upon this very Petition, that they were perſuaded to ſubmit to another Subſcription for Mony and Plate, for the neceſſary Proviſions of Arms, Ammunition and Pay for their Army, till their Disbanding and Return home to their ſeveral Counties; 'That ſo they might not be occaſion'd, through want of Pay, to plunder, rob or pillage by the Way homewards, after their Diſcharge and Diſmiſſion.' In the mean Time the Petition, about the tenth of January, being preſented to the King at Oxford by ſome Aldermen, and others of the Common-Council, who were for the moſt part of moderate Inclinations, his Majeſty with great Seriouſneſs conſider'd what Anſwer to return to a Petition, that had been fram'd by the Enemies to Peace, and fill'd with the moſt popular Profeſſions of Zeal to his Service. However he was not ſorry to have the Opportunity of ſaying Something, and communicating himſelf freely to the City; being perſuaded that if he enlarg'd himſelf in his Anſwer, and expos'd thoſe moſt notoriouſly oppoſite to the Government of the Church and State, to the Knowledge of the People, that it wou'd at leaſt leſſen their Power and Ability to do Hurt: Therefore he return'd a more full Anſwer, in which, 'He diſtinguiſh'd the good Subjects in the City from the bad, and believ'd that much the greater Part was full of Love, Duty and Loyalty; and look'd on his good Subjects there as Perſons groaning under the ſame Burthen that oppreſs'd Himſelf, aw'd by the ſame Perſons who begot the firſt Tumults, and the ſame Army which gave Battle to his Perſon. Therefore he deſir'd them to conſider what Confidence he cou'd have there, where the Laws of the Land were notoriouſly deſpis'd, the Government of the City ſubmitted to a few deſperate Perſons of no Reputation, ſuch as Pennington their pretended Mayor, the Principal of thoſe Calamities, that threaten Ruin to that famous City, Ven, Foulke and Manwaring, all notoriouſly guilty of Schiſm and High-Treaſon, in oppreſſing, robbing and impriſoning his good Subjects, becauſe they will not rebel againſt him, or aſſiſt thoſe that do. Yet he condemns not all for ſome that are guilty, but offers his gracious Pardon to all, except the four mention'd Perſons, if they will return to their Duty; if not, he ſums up the Miſeries that muſt neceſſarily fall upon all that continu'd to be acting and aſſiſting in this Rebellion; and conjures them to conſider the perpetual Infamy that muſt attend them and their Children, if infinitely the meaner Part in Quality, and much the leſſer Part in Number, ſhall be able to alter the Government ſo admirably eſtabliſh'd, deſtroy the Trade ſo excellently ſettled, and waſte the Wealth ſo induſtriouſly gotten, of that flouriſhing City.

The Effect of it in London.

The King ſent this Anſwer by a Servant of his own, ſuppoſing that if he ſent it by thoſe who brought the Petition, it might either be ſuppreſs'd, or defectively communicated; and the Meſſengers themſelves, after it had been read to them, were willing it ſhou'd be deliver'd by other Hands than theirs. However they promis'd his Majeſty to procure a Common-Hall as ſoon as they return'd, where his own Meſſenger might deliver it; and having been generouſly treated by the King and Court, they return'd from Oxford, together with the Gentleman ſent by his Majeſty. Upon their Return to London, the Contents of the Anſwer were ſoon known, tho' not deliver'd; therefore to prevent the Operation it might have, the two Houſes order'd, 'That the Lord-Mayor ſhou'd not call a Common-Hall, till he had receiv'd further Directions from Them.' After ſome Preparations, the Houſes appointed a Committee to be preſent at the Meeting, where the two Great Men, the new Earl of Mancheſter and Mr. Pym were to exert Themſelves upon this Occaſion. The former inſiſted upon 'The high Eſteem the Parliament had of the City, and exclaim'd againſt thoſe woundiug Aſſertions, which in that Anſwer were caſt upon Perſons of ſuch eminent Affection, in their City, and upon others of great Fidelity and Truſt among Them: That they own'd Themſelves equally intereſted in all Things, and wou'd ſtand by them with their Lives and Fortunes, for the Preſervation of the City in general, and all Thoſe who had deſerv'd well of the Parliament and Kingdom; and wou'd uſe the utmoſt Methods for the Preſervation of that City, and for the procuring of Safety, Happineſs and Peace, to the whole Kingdom.' After great Applauſes, Mr. Pym, with his uſual Arts of Aggravation and Retaliation, in a larger Speech made particular Replies to the ſeveral Parts of the King's Anſwer, and at laſt inſiſted upon 'The Neceſſity of farther Contributions, whereby their Army might be maintain'd for all their Safeties.' All Things were ſo prepar'd, and Mr. Pym ſo highly admir'd, that at the End of every Period, the Acclamations were ſo loud, that he was often ſilenc'd. In concluſion, applying himſelf to the Multitude, he ſaid, Worthy Citizens, you ſee what the Parliament will do for your Lord-Mayor and you.---Upon which they cry'd out, We will live and dye with them! we will live and dye with them! The Parliament Narrative concludes with theſe Words, All which we may ſum up in that Triumph of the Man of God: In the Thing wherein they dealt proudly, God was above them.

So that now all Thoughts of further Addreſs or Compliance with the King from the City, were ſo intirely laid aſide, that the Liberty of ſeditious and treaſonable Diſcourſes daily encreas'd; inſomuch that Complaint being made to the preſent Lord-Mayor, that a certain deſperate Perſon had ſaid, That he hop'd ſhortly to waſh his Hands in the King's Blood, that Miniſter of Juſtice refus'd to ſend any Warrant, or direct any Officer to apprehend him. Of which, and ſome other Matters, the King ſoon after made Complaint in a Letter directed to the Sheriffs of London, and order'd to be read in the Halls of the ſeveral Companies; but upon Notice given to the Parliament, the Reading of it was forbidden, and the chief Promoters of it taken into Cuſtody.

The Policy of the Leaders in Parliament.

4. After ſome little Reſpite, the Houſes began to talk Themſelves of ſending Propoſitions of Peace to the King. The Leaders, who knew no Peace cou'd be ſafe for them that was not unſafe for the King, were ſenſible that they cou'd not now carry on the War to the Height, but by the Aſſiſtance of an Army from Scotland; which they had no Hopes to procure without a previous Alteration of the Government of the Church. But to gain that Point was very difficult, ſince far the Majority of thoſe very Members that continu'd with them, were either well affected to the preſent Eſtabliſhment, or not inclinable to any other. Therefore to thoſe who were ſo far engag'd as to expect to compel the King to a Compliance, they repreſented 'The Conſequence of procuring the Scots to declare for them, which wou'd be a greater Reſtraint to the King, and overawe the Northern Parts more than any Forces they ſhou'd be able to raiſe: That it was impoſſible to draw ſuch a Declaration from them, without firſt declaring themſelves That they wou'd alter the Government by Biſhops; which that People pretended to believe the only juſtifiable Ground of taking up Arms.' To Others, which was indeed their avow'd and current Argument in publick Debates, they alledg'd, 'That they cou'd not expect any Peace cou'd be produc'd by the King's Concurrence to any of their Meſſages; but it muſt ariſe from a Treaty between them, upon ſuch Propoſitions as they cou'd make upon their own Intereſt: That it cou'd not be expected that ſuch Propoſitions wou'd be made on either Side, as wou'd be unalterably inſiſted on; it being the Method, in ſuch Caſes, to ask more than wou'd probably be comply'd with; and it concern'd them as much to make ſome high Demands, from which they deſign'd to recede, as others upon which they muſt inſiſt: That all Men knew the Affection the King had for the Church, ſo that if he ſaw it in Danger, he wou'd redeem it at any Price, and probably their departing from their Propoſition concerning the Church, might be the ſtrongeſt Inducement for the King to gratify them with the Militia.' By theſe Artifices, and eſpecially by pertinaciouſly concluding, 'That no Propoſitions ſhou'd be ſent to the King for Peace, till the Bill for Extirpation of Biſhops, &c. was paſs'd the Houſe of Lords,' they gain'd their Point, which otherwiſe wou'd never have been ſubmitted to by the Peers, at which Time there were not above five Lords preſent.

They paſs the Bill againſt the Biſhops.

This being obtain'd, about the End of January they ſent the Earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Saliſbury and Holland, and eight of the Commons, the Lords Weenman and Dungarnon, Sir John Holland, Sir William Litton, Mr. Pierrepoint, Mr. Whitelock, Mr. Waller and Mr. Winwood, with their Petition and Propoſitions to the King at Oxford. Their firſt Admittance to his Majeſty was in Chriſt-Church Garden, attended with the Prince and ſeveral Lords; where all kiſs'd his Hand, and Mr. Waller laſt, to whom the King ſaid, Tho' you are the laſt, you are not the worſt, nor the leaſt in my Favour. The Earl of Northumberland read the Petition, and the Propoſitions, which were fourteen in Num-

Number, and not much unlike the nineteenth Propoſitions formerly mention'd. 'They propos'd to his Majeſty to diſband his Army, and return home to his Parliament: To leave Delinquents to Tryal: To cauſe Papiſts to be diſarm'd: To paſs the Bill for the aboliſhing of the Church Governours and Government; and ſuch other Bills as ſhou'd be fram'd for a new Reformation: For Recuſants to abjure Papacy: To remove malignant Counſellors: To ſettle the Militia, as they ſhall appoint: To prefer to the great Offices and Places of Judicature ſuch of the Parliament as they nam'd, and to take in all ſuch as have been turn'd out of their Commiſſions: To paſs a Bill in Vindication of the Lord Kimbolton, now Earl of Mancheſter, and the five accus'd Members: To enter into Alliance with his Proteſtant Neighbours for Recovery of the Palatinate: To grant a general Pardon, with Exception of the Earl of Newcaſtle, the Lord Digby, and others: To reſtore ſuch of the Parliament's Members to their Offices and Places, and to ſatisfy for their Loſſes, &c.' The Petition it ſelf was very high in the Beginning, and charg'd the King with Rapines and Cruelties, by which much innocent Blood had been ſpilt, and with arming great Numbers of Papiſts; but in the End, if the Propoſitions were obſerv'd, it promis'd to ſupport the Royalty and Greatneſs of his Throne, the publick Honour and Happineſs of his Perſon, &c.

They who brought theſe Propoſitions, freely ſpoke to their Friends at Oxford of the Perſons that ſent them, and inveigh'd againſt their Tyranny and Unreaſonableneſs, and eſpecially againſt the Propoſitions themſelves; but poſitively declar'd, If the King wou'd vouchſafe ſo gracious an Anſwer, as might engage the Houſes in a Treaty, it wou'd not be in the Power of the violent Party to deny whatſoever he ſhou'd reaſonably deſire. They own'd they cou'd not reaſonably expect ſuch an Anſwer, nor cou'd the King rely upon the Promiſes of private Men, who had not Power enough to make them good, having been often led into Miſtakes by hearkning to ſuch kind of Aſſurances. Therefore, having two Days generouſly treated the Commiſſioners, in his Anſwer he ſolemnly told the two Houſes,

The King's Anſwer, with other Propoſitions.

'That if he had not given up all the Faculties of his Soul to an earneſt Endeavour of a Peace, and Reconciliation; or if he wou'd ſuffer Himſelf by any Provocation to be drawn to a Sharpneſs of Language at a Time of Overture and Accommodation, he cou'd not but reſent their heavy Charges upon him in the Preamble, and not ſuffer the Reproaches which they had caſt upon Him. But his Majeſty wou'd forbear Expreſſions of Bitterneſs, or a Senſe of his own Sufferings, that if poſſible the Memory of them might be loſt to the World, and how Unparliamentary it is by Arms to require new Laws. Yet he is pleas'd that a ſpeedy Time might be agreed upon for a Meeting to debate thoſe Propoſitions of theirs, together with ſome Others of his own following: That his own Revenues, Magazines, Towns, Ships and Forts be reſtored: That what has been done contrary to Law, and his Majeſty's Right, may be renounc'd and recall'd: That all Illegal Power claim'd or acted by Orders of Parliament, be diſclaim'd: That as he is willing to conſent to the Execution of all Laws, made or to be made, concerning Popery or Reformation; ſo he deſires a Bill for Preſerving the Book of Common-Prayer, and againſt Sectaries: That all Perſons to be excepted againſt in the Treaty may be try'd per Pares: That in the mean Time there be a Ceſſation of Arms, and a free Trade. Upon theſe Grounds he hopes for a bleſſed Peace; which if rejected, or made impoſſible by inſiſting upon unreaſonable Circumſtances, the Guilt of the Blood that muſt be Shed, and the Deſolation that muſt follow, will lye upon the Heads of the Refuſers.

The Houſes publiſh an Exhortation to Repentance.

This Anſwer was for a while poſtponed, and the Houſes proceeded to other Matters, and particularly to an Ordinance exhorting to the Duty of Repentance, as the only Remedy for their preſent Calamities. This was pen'd in ſuch a Stile, that it will be proper to repeat ſome Part of it, to ſhew the Humour and Spirit of the Governors, or rather thoſe that were to be governed. It began in theſe Words; 'That flouriſhing Kingdoms have been ruin'd by impenitent going on in a Courſe of Sinning, the Sacred Story doth plainly tell us: And how near to ſuch a Ruin our ſinful Nation now is, the preſent lamentable Face of it doth too apparently ſhew. And tho' we ſhou'd feel the heavy Strokes of God yet ſeven times more, it is our Duty to accept the Puniſhment of our Iniquity, and to ſay, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and juſt are thy Judgments. Yet becauſe the Lord who is juſt, is alſo merciful, and in his infinite Mercy hath left the excellent and ſucceſsful Remedy of Repentance, to Nations brought near to the Gates of Deſtruction and Deſpair; O let not England be negligent in the Application of it! Humble Addreſſes of a penitent People to a merciful God have prevail'd with him: They prevail'd for Nineveh, when the Sentence ſeem'd to be gone out againſt Her, and may alſo prevail for England. It is therefore thought moſt neceſſary by the Lords and Commons in Parliament, that all his Majeſty's Subjects in this Kingdom of England be excited and ſtirred up ſpeedily to lay hold upon this only and unfailing Remedy of Repentance; freely acknowledging, and heartily bewailing, even with deepeſt Humiliation, godly Sorrow, and Deteſtation, &c.' Then they proceeded to a Confeſſion of National Sins; and that their Devotion might be a Libel upon the King and the Church, they choſe Idolatry and Bloodſhed for their Themes; 'That of Idolatry, as it was the Sin of our Anceſtors, ſo it is the ſpreading Sin of the latter Times, while by a general Connivance, and almoſt Toleration, it hath been ſeveral Ways fomented and encourag'd, the grievous Effects whereof this Kingdom of England now begins to feel, &c. And for the other crying and cruel Sin of Bloodſhed, that calls aloud for Vengeance, did it not go hand in hand with that abominable Idol of the Maſs in the Days of Queen Mary, and ſome of her Predeceſſors, when many Hundreds of the dear Martyrs and Saints of God loſt their precious Lives in Flames and Priſons, &c.' This was publiſh'd on the 15th of February, and ordered to be read in all the Pariſh Churches in England and Wales.

The Progreſs of Sir Ralph Hopton in the Weſt.

V. I. While Overtures and Diſcourſes were made of Peace, the Kingdom in all Parts felt the miſerable Effects of War; neither the King nor Parliament being backwards in purſuing their Cauſe by the Sword; and the great Men in moſt Counties more vigorouſly declaring themſelves than before. In Cornwall Sir Ralph Hopton by his Induſtry and Activity, and with the Aſſiſtance of other brave Men, as Sir Bevil Greenvil, Sir Nicolas Slanning, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, &c. in a few Weeks ſecured that large County for the King, againſt all the Power and Intereſt of Sir Alexander Carew, Sir Richard Buller, Sir George Chudleigh, and others. Their Progreſs and Succeſs rais'd no little Apprehenſion in the Parliament, and therefore they order'd their whole Forces of Dorſet and Somerſet, to joyn with thoſe of Devonſhire, to make an entire Conqueſt of Cornwall. At the Head of theſe, Ruthen the Scotch Governor of Plymouth advanc'd into Cornwall, by a Bridge over the Tamar, ſix Miles above Salt-aſh; the Earl of Stamford follow'd him two or three Days March behind with a new Supply of Horſe and Foot, tho' thoſe under Ruthen were much ſuperior to the King's Party under Sir Ralph Hopton, who retir'd to Bodmin. They had juſt recruited and refreſh'd themſelves, when Ruthen with his whole Force advanc'd to Leskard, within eight Miles of them; from whence they mov'd towards the Enemy with all Chearfulneſs, knowing how neceſſary it was to fight before the Earl of Stamford cou'd come up; but Ruthen, as eager to reap the Honour of the Action without a Rival, drew out his Forces upon the Eaſt Side of Bradock-Down, near Leskard, and ſtood in Battalia to expect the Enemy. Sir Ralph Hopton having likewiſe put his Men in Order, caus'd publick Prayers to be ſaid at the Head of every Battalion, which the other obſerving, told their Fellows, They were at Maſs to raiſe their Courages in the Cauſe of Religion; and ſo advanc'd within Musket-ſhot of the Enemy, who ſtood without any Motion. Then perceiving that their Cannon was not yet come up, he caus'd two Minion Drakes, all the Artillery he had, to be drawn under the Covert of little Parties of Horſe; and after two Shots, which undiſcern'd did Execution, and ſtruck great Terror, he advanc'd with his Body upon them, and bravely beat them off their Ground, to their Reſerve among the Hedges, where they thought to make good their Retreat to the Town: But the Corniſh Men ſo vigorouſly preſs'd them on every Side, being excellent at that kind of Fight, that they ſoon won that Ground too, and put their whole Army into a Rout, and had the full Execution of them as far as they cou'd purſue. In this Fight, without the Loſs of an Officer of Name, and very few common Soldiers, they took twelve Hundred and fifty Priſoners, moſt of their Colours, all their Cannon, conſiſting of four Braſs Guns, and one Iron Saker, all their Ammunition, and moſt of their Arms. Such was the Fight of Bradock-Down, or Leskard, which was fought upon the 19th Day of January.

The Fight at Bradock-Down, Sir Ralph Hopton the Victor,

Ruthen Himſelf, and thoſe who cou'd keep Pace with him, fled to Salt-aſh, which he deſign'd to fortify, and make a Curb to a good Part of Cornwall. The Earl of Stamford receiving quick Advice of this Defeat, in great Diſorder retir'd to Taviſtock to preſerve the further Parts of Devonſhire from Incurſions. Upon which, after a ſolemn Thankſgiving, the King's Forces divided themſelves; Sir John Berkley, and Colonel Aſhburnham, with Sir Bevil Greenvil, Sir Nicolas Slanning's and Colonel Travanion's voluntary Regiments, and a conſiderable Party of Horſe and Dragoons, advanc'd to Taviſtock to viſit the Earl of Stamford; the Lord Mohun, and Sir Ralph Hopton, with the Lord Mohun's and Colonel Godolphin's voluntary Regiments, and ſome of the Train'd-Bands, march'd towards Salt-aſh to diſlodge Ruthen; who within three Days had caſt up ſuch Works, and planted ſuch Store of Cannon upon the narrow Avenues, that he thought himſelf able, with the Help of a Veſſel of ſixteen Guns brought up to the Town Side, to defend the Place againſt all their Power. But he ſoon found his Miſtake, for as ſoon as the Corniſh Men came up, they fell valiantly upon his Works, and quickly beat him out of them, with a great Execution both by Sword and Water; Ruthen himſelf hardly eſcaping in a Boat to Plymouth, leaving all his Ordnance behind him, which together with the Ship, a hundred and forty Priſoners, and all the Colours they had ſav'd at Leskard, were taken by the Conquerors, who were now again entire Maſters of Cornwall.

ho ſoon fter takes alt-aſh.

The Earl of Stamford had not the ſame Patience to abide the other Party at Taviſtock, but before their Approach quitted the Town; ſome of his Forces haſtning into Plymouth, and the reſt retiring to Exeter. After which Sir John Berkley, with a good flying Party of Horſe and Dragoons, viſited all Places in Devonſhire where the People were gather'd together, diſpers'd them, and took many Priſoners of Name, and ſo kept Sir George Chudleigh from raiſing a Body there, as he induſtriouſly endeavour'd. In theſe brisk Motions and Expeditions, at a little Town called Chagford, the King loſt that admirable young Gentleman, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, formerly mention'd for his Advice at his leaving the Houſe of Commons; a Perſon of incomparable Parts, and Wiſdom and Abilities beyond his Age; whoſe Death has given a Name to a Town, which otherwiſe deſerv'd not a Place in Hiſtory.

The Death of Mr. Godolphin.

But now the Royaliſts finding they cou'd make no Impreſſion upon the other ſtrong Holds of the Enemy, retir'd with their while Forces to Taviſtock, where they took a long Refreſhment, being willing to eaſe their ſure Friends of Cornwall as much as poſſible from the Trouble and Charge of their little Army. They alſo labour'd under the Want of Ammunition, which at length they were ſupply'd with from France, by the Intereſt and good Management of Captain Carteret. But while they continu'd in this Want, ſome Corniſh Gentlemen of the Parliament Side, who were forced from their Country, made ſome Overtures, 'That a 'Treaty might be concluded, by which the Peace of the 'two Counties of Cornwall and Devon might be ſettled, 'and the War remov'd into other Parts.' This Propoſition was ſo ſpecious and popular, that there was no rejecting it; and therefore they agreed to a formal Meeting of the chief Men, and entering into a ſolemn Proteſtation, they agreed upon a Truce and a Ceſſation for thoſe two Counties; which, tho' of no long Continuance, had ſuch Effect as to cauſe the King's Forces to retire all into Cornwall.

A Treaty between Devon and Cornwall.

Beſides the Encreaſe of the King's Power in theſe Parts, at the ſame Time he met with a conſiderable Advantage nearer to his Head Quarters at Oxford, at Cirenceſter a ſtrong Parliament Garriſon in Glouceſterſhire, within thirty Miles of him; which lying upon the Edge of Wiltſhire, Berkſhire and Oxfordſhire, did very much ſtreighten the Royal Quarters. To reduce this Place, the Marqueſs of Hertford brought near two Thouſand Foot, and a Regiment of Horſe out of Wales, which were to be joyn'd by Prince Rupert with ſome Regiments from Oxford: But by the great Fall of Rain, and Badneſs of the Way, and ſome Miſtakes about Orders, the Deſign was diſappointed; and the Allarm gave the Enemy ſo much the more Courage and Time to provide for an Attack. However, in the Beginning of February, Prince Rupert undertook the ſame Deſign with better Succeſs; and at the ſame Time ſtorming the Town at ſeveral Places, their Works being not yet finiſh'd, tho' bravely defended, enter'd their Line with ſome Loſs of Men, and the Hurt of more, but with a far greater of the Enemy; for there were not ſo few as two Hundred kill'd upon the Spot; and near twelve Hundred taken Priſoners, among which was Carr the Scotch Governor, and ſome others of Note. The Place yielded much Plunder, from which the undiſtinguiſhing Soldiers could not be kept, but were equally injurious to Friend and Foe; ſo that many Royaliſts, who were impriſon'd by the Parliamentarians, found themſelves at Liberty and undone at the ſame Time. The Priſoners were all brought to Oxford in Triumph, being pinion'd two and two after an ignominious Manner, and ſo inſulted, that it was juſtly made uſe of to improve the Scandal of Pride and Cruelty on the King's Side. The Prince left a ſtrong Garriſon there, that brought moſt of that Country under Contributions, and was a great Enlargement of the King's Quarters, which now clearly extended from Oxford to Worceſter, which with Hereford and thoſe Counties, had not long ſince been quitted by the Parliament Forces.

Cirenceſter taken by Prince Rupert.

2. The King's Affairs in the North had at this Time a good Aſpect; and tho' the Lord Fairfax kept Poſſeſſion of Selby and Cawood, both within a ſmall Diſtance from York, yet the Earl of Newcaſtle was abſolute Maſter of the Field; ſo that thoſe Parts yielded ſecure Footing to the King's Friends, and the Queen her ſelf thought of returning into England. Her Majeſty, from her firſt going into Holland, had dexterouſly endeavour'd to advance her Royal Huſband's Intereſt, and ſent very great Quantities of Arms and Ammunition to Newcaſtle, tho' much of them had been intercepted, with ſome conſiderable Sums of Mony, and good Store of Officers, who by the Connivance of the Prince of Orange came over to ſerve the King. And from this her extraordinary Care, and her known Favour to the Perſon of the Earl of Newcaſtle, that Army was by the Parliament ſtil'd The Queen's Army, and The Catholick Army; and the People were told 'That it conſiſted of none 'but profeſs'd Papiſts, who deſign'd nothing but the Extirpation of the Proteſtants, and Eſtabliſhing their own 'Profeſſion.' On the ſixteenth of February, the Queen took Shipping for England with a Convoy, but was by Extremity of Weather driven back; and at length, having paſs'd with Danger and Hazard, on the nineteenth arriv'd at Burlington-Bay on the Coaſts of Yorkſhire; and on the twenty-ſecond landed at the Key, accompanied with ſeveral Commanders of Note, and bringing with her good ſtore of Mony, Arms, and Ammunition. But being on Shore, ſhe endured a worſe Storm there than ſhe had done at Sea: For the Night after her Landing, four of the Parliament Ships unſeen, enter'd the Road, and very ſoon in the Morning began to play their Cannon with all poſſible Fury upon the Village; and one of them flank'd the Houſe where the Queen lay, inſomuch that two Cannon Bullets fell from the Top to the Bottom of the Houſe where ſhe was, which forc'd her to quit it, and retire to the Shelter of a Ditch behind the Town, while in her Way the Bullets flew very thick; ſo that a Serjeant was kill'd within a few Paces of her. Yet the Parliament Ships wou'd not have deſiſted, had not the Ebbing of the Tide, and ſome Threats from the Dutch Admiral, who brought over the Queen, oblig'd them.

The Queen lands at Burlington from Holland.

The Queen was welcom'd by a complimental Letter from the Lord Fairfax, who offer'd his Service to guard and conduct her Majeſty with his Forces. She refus'd the Offer, but accepted the Service of the brave Earl of Montroſs, who came poſt from Scotland with a hundred and twenty Horſe, and together with ſome of Newcaſtle's Forces, convoy'd her Majeſty ſafe to York. At which Time the King's Affairs had ſtill a more promiſing Aſpect, and proſper'd to that Degree, that as the Earl of Newcaſtle had before fix'd a Garriſon at Newark in Nottinghamſhire, which kept the Lincolnſhire Forces from an entire Conjunction with the Lord Fairfax, and had couragiouſly beaten off a form'd Body that attempted it; ſo he now ſent the Lord Charles Cavendiſh, the younger Brother of the Earl of Devonſhire, with a flying Party of Horſe and Dragoons, into Lincolnſhire, who bravely aſſaulted and took the new Parliament Garriſon at Grantham, with above three Hundred Priſoners, all their Officers, Arms and Ammunition. About the ſame Time Sir Hugh Cholmeley, who had done great Service for the Parliament againſt the Earl of Newcaſtle, very frankly revolted to his Allegiance; and waiting on her Majeſty for her Aſſurance of his Pardon, deliver'd up the important Caſtle of Scarborough to the King; the Command and Government of which was again committed by the Earl to him. By this Means and theſe Succeſſes, the Lord Fairfax quitted Selby, Cawood and Tadcaſter, and retir'd to Pomfret and Hallifax; by which the Earl was in Effect poſſeſs'd of that whole large County, and ſo able to aſſiſt his Neighbours.

Arrives at York.

Earl of Newcaſtle's Progreſs.

While her Majeſty continu'd at York, or rather before her Arrival from Burlington, the Earl of Montroſs repreſented to her the Probability and Danger of a new Storm from Scotland; and declar'd, That tho' the King's Enemies in Scotland did not yet profeſs ſo much, yet they certainly intended to bring an Army into England, and joyn with his Enemies here: For a Remedy of which he offer'd, That if the King wou'd grant a Commiſſion, Himſelf, and many more, wou'd take the Field and prevent it; which he begg'd her Majeſty wou'd impart to the King at their Meeting. The Cauſe of the Earl's Journey being ſuſpected in Scotland, by the oppoſite Party, who conceiv'd he wou'd give the Queen a ſevere Information againſt them, the Marqueſs of Argyle ſo dealt with his ſeeming Antagoniſt, the Marqueſs of Hamilton, that he immediately rode to the Queen at York; and being inform'd by the Queen of Montroſs's Account and Propoſal, he offer'd to refute all; Undertaking, without raiſing Arms for the King, to make that Party lye quiet, and not liſt an Army for England; of which he deſir'd her Majeſty in his Name to give the King a full Aſſurance. The Queen confiding moſt in the Marqueſs of Hamilton, diſmiſs'd Montroſs unſatisfy'd, and excited the Marqueſs to perform his Promiſe, aſſuring him, That for an Earneſt of the great Rewards he might afterwards expect,

The Earl of Montroſs offers his Service to the Queen.

But without Effect.

he ſhou'd preſently be preferr'd to the Title of a Duke; and with this Encouragement the Marqueſs return'd back to Scotland. Hamilton's Memoirs relate this Matter with more Advantage to the Marqueſs; but our Account comes from Biſhop Guthry, who ſeems to have had a fuller Information as to this Affair.

The ſame Author further informs us, That Hamilton having acquainted Argyle and his Adherents how Montroſs's Motions were cruſh'd, being free from Oppoſition, they began to diſcover their Intention more publickly than before; ſo that it came to be publickly diſcours'd amongſt them, 'That it was neceſſary they ſhou'd raiſe an Army, and lead it into England, but not joyn againſt the King, only to mediate between Him and his Parliament.' Montroſs and other Royaliſts did often meet and conſult in ſmall Numbers; hoping that when the Noiſe had reach'd his Majeſty's Ears, the Overture to the Queen wou'd then be accepted. Thoſe which this Earl moſt frequently converſed with, were Sir Robert Spotſwood, formerly Preſident, the Earl of Callendar, the Lords Ereskin, Ogilby, Napier, and ſometimes Montgomery, who then profeſs'd to be of their Side. Theſe ſent Advices to the King, 'That there were both Hearts and Hands enough in Scotland to act for him, and wanted Nothing but a Commiſſion; which if his Majeſty wou'd grant, his Adverſaries here might be kept under; but if he were wanting to Himſelf, till they had an Army on foot, it wou'd then be paſt Time to oppoſe them.' But ſtill the Marqueſs of Hamilton's Power at Court was ſo ſtrangely prevalent, that the King was made wholly to rely upon his Promiſe at York, and ſo utterly rejected the Offer made to him by the Montroſians, to the infinite Damage of his Affairs in Scotland, as appear'd afterwerds.

His Deſigns hinder'd by the Marqueſs of Hamilton.

3. At this Time various Struggles and Efforts were made in many Counties, for and againſt the King, eſpecially in the midland Parts of the Nation, and particularly in Staffordſhire; where ſome Gentlemen of that County, better affected than experienc'd, ſeiz'd on the Cloſe in Lichfield for the King; a Place naturally ſtrong, and defended with a Mote, and a very high and thick Wall, which in the Infancy of the War was thought a good Fortification. To ſuppreſs this encreaſing Power, the zealous Lord Brook, who was the Head of an Aſſociation of this and ſome other Counties, advanc'd with a form'd Body of Horſe, Foot and Cannon, drawn from the Earl of Eſſex's Army, and the Garriſons of Coventry and Warwick; and without any Reſiſtance enter'd the City of Lichfield, which was open to all Comers. At his coming out of Coventry upon this Expedition, he order'd his Chaplain to preach upon this Text in Eſther, If I periſh, I periſh; and within half a Mile of Lichfield, drawing up his Army, in a long Prayer of his own compoſing he earneſtly begg'd, That God wou'd by ſome ſpecial Token manifeſt to them his Approbation of that their Deſign, that if the Cauſe was not right and juſt, he might be preſently cut off. Upon which he advanc'd, and planted his great Guns againſt the South Eaſt Gate of the Cloſe, ſtanding Himſelf in the Window of a little Houſe juſt by, to direct the Gunners in their intended Battery: But it hapned, that upon a ſudden Accident which caus'd the Soldiers to give a Shout, this Lord coming to the Door, tho' compleatly arm'd Cap-a-pe with Plate, was ſhot from the Cathedral into one of his Eyes, by one Diot, a Clergy-man's Son who cou'd neither hear nor ſpeak; but the Strength of the Bullet was ſo much abated by its Glance on a Piece of Timber, that it only lodg'd in his Brains, upon which he ſuddenly fell down dead, without ſpeaking a Word.

The Lord Brook's Expedition againſt Lichfield Cathedral.

His ſtrange Death.

Upon this memorable Accident, which hapned on the ſecond Day of March, many Remarks have been made: particularly Archbiſhop Laud in his Hiſtory obſerves three Things: 'Firſt, That this great and known Enemy to Cathedral Churches died thus fearfully in the Aſſault of a Cathedral: Secondly, that this happen'd upon St. Chad's Day, of which Saint the Cathedral bears the Name: Thirdly, this Lord being two Years before upon the Thames, upon ſome Diſcourſe about St. Paul's Church, then in their Eye, he told ſome young Lords, He hop'd to live to ſee that one Stone of that Building ſhou'd not be left upon another: But that Church ſtands yet, and that Eye is put out that hop'd to ſee the Ruins of it.' As to his Character, he was in his own Nature a very civil well-humour'd Man; and rather ſeduc'd and corrupted in his Underſtanding, than really perverſe and malicious. Whether he was ſway'd by the Heat of his Paſſions, or Zeal of his Conſcience, he was undoubtedly one of thoſe who cou'd have been moſt hardly reconcil'd to the Government of Church or State: And therefore his Death was look'd upon as a good Step towards Peace, and was highly lamented by his Party, who had not a more intire Confidence in any Man than in Him. However it did not bring that Relief to the Beſieg'd in the Cloſe as was expected; for the ſame Forces, under Sir John Gell, proceeded ſo vigorouſly, and they within ſo faintly and unſkilfully, that the Place was ſoon yielded without any other Conditions than of Quarter; by which Means many Perſons of Note and Quality became Priſoners, particularly the Earl of Cheſterfield, and his Son, and others not named.

His Character.

Lichfield Cloſe taken by Sir John Gell.

By this Advantage the Spirits of that Party were much exalted, and the Royaliſts in thoſe Parts as much dejected. Yet ſome Gentlemen betook themſelves to the Town of Stafford, and having, when they thought Lichfield ſecure, too freely declar'd themſelves for the King, to hope to live untouch'd in their Houſes, reſolv'd to defend that Place; againſt which Sir John Gell drew his late conquering Forces. But the brave Earl of Northampton, who too late was coming to the Relief of Lichfield, with a ſtrong Party of Horſe and Dragoons from the Garriſon of Banbury, arriv'd ſeaſonably for their Succour, and put himſelf into the Town; and the very ſame Night beat up a Quarter of the Enemies, in which he kill'd and took a hundred of their Horſe. Sir John Gell retir'd ſo far as to meet with another Commander, Sir William Brereton, who from Nantwich was upon the March to joyn with him for the reducing of Stafford, and for the clearing other Counties. Being joyn'd, to the Number of near three thouſand Foot and Horſe, with a good Train of Artillery, they mov'd back towards Stafford, imagining that the Earl of Northampton wou'd meet without the Walls of the Town: Which prov'd true; for the Earl no ſooner heard that they were advancing towards the Town, but he drew out his Party to ingage them; conceiving it cou'd be only Sir John Gell, whoſe Numbers he underſtood, and whoſe Courage he little regarded.

Hopton-Heath Fight.

The Engagement hapned on Sunday the nineteenth of March, upon a Place call'd Hopton-Heath, about two Miles from Stafford. Tho' the Number was more than double to the Earl's, yet the Heath ſeeming very fair, the Breadth of it being more than Muſquet-ſhot from Encloſures on each Side, and the Number of his Horſe being at leaſt equal to the other, he reſolv'd to charge them: And accordingly did, with that intrepid Succeſs, that he totally routed that Part of the Horſe: And rallying again his Men, he as bravely charg'd the other Part of their Horſe; which ſtood more in ſhelter of their Foot: and ſo totally defeated and diſpers'd them, that they had ſcarce a Horſe left upon the Field. In this ſecond Charge the valiant Earl being warmly engag'd, very near or among the Foot, had his Horſe kill'd under him; and his own Cavalry, according to their unhappy Practice, having too furiouſly purſu'd the Chace, he was left ſurrounded by his Enemies. His Behaviour, and their Carriage afterwards, is only known from their own Teſtimony; who confeſs'd, that after he was on his Feet, he with his own Hand kill'd the Colonel of the Foot who haſtned to him; and that after his Head-Piece was ſtricken off with the But-end of a Muſquet, they offer'd him Quarter; which he wholly refus'd, crying out, He ſcorn'd to take Quarter from ſuch baſe Rogues and Rebels as they were. After which he was ſlain by a Blow with a Halbert on the hinder Part of his Head, at the ſame Time receiving a deep Wound in his Face. All this Time the Parliament's Foot ſtood, 'till Sir Thomas Byron, who commanded the Prince of Wales's Regiment, charg'd them with good Execution; but the Night coming on, and the Field which they thought ſo fair, being found full of Coal-Pits, and dangerous Holes for their Horſe, they thought fit to forbear any further Action.

The Earl of Northampton ſlain.

In this ſharp and ſhort Fight, on the Parliament Side there were kill'd and taken Priſoners above two Hundred, and more than that Number wounded; eight Pieces of their Cannon, and moſt of their Ammunition was likewiſe taken. Of the Earl's Party were ſlain but twenty five, of which two were Captains, ſome inferior Officers, and the reſt common Soldiers; but there were as many wounded, and particularly the Earl's eldeſt Son, and Sir Thomas Byron, two Perſons of great Bravery. They who had all the Enſigns of Victory but their General, thought Themſelves ruin'd; while the other Side, who had eſcap'd in the Night, and with great Difficulty carry'd off his dead Body, hardly believ'd they were Loſes. The Truth is, as the noble Hiſtorian has it, a greater Victory wou'd have been an unequal Recompence for ſuch a Loſs; and the King himſelf ſaid afterwards, He was the greateſt Loſs but one, he had ſince the Beginning of the Civil Wars. This Earl, by Name Spencer Compton, was a Perſon of great Courage, Honour and Fidelity, but not ſignally known till his Evening; having in the general Eaſe and Luxury of that too happy Time, indulg'd himſelf in that Liberty then thought neceſſary to great Fortunes: But from the Beginning of theſe Troubles, as if he had been awaken'd out of a Lethargy, he rous'd Himſelf, and proceeded with the Vigour and Vigilance of a full ſeaſon'd Commander. He did the King great Services from the Beginning, and was one of the firſt that, upon his own Charge and Reputation, rais'd a Troop of Horſe, and a Regiment of Foot; and at the ſame Time entirely dedicated all his Children to the Cauſe; having four Sons Officers under him, of whom three charg'd that Day in the Field, tho' the Eldeſt was leſs than twenty Years of Age. From the Time he took upon him the Profeſſion of a Soldier, no Man was more punctual upon Command, no Man more diligent in Duty; and bore all Diſtreſſes and Hardſhips like a common Man, as if he had never known Eaſe or Plenty; moſt prodigal of his Perſon in Danger, and often heard to ſay, That if he outliv'd theſe Wars, he was ſure never to meet with ſo noble a Death. So that it is not to be admir'd if upon ſuch a Stroke, the Body that felt it, thought it had loſt more than a Limb. He dy'd in the 37th Year of his Age, leaving ſix eminent Sons behind him, all educated to Arms, and noted for Courage; only the youngeſt was remov'd from the Military Liſt into the Church, in which he was for many Years Biſhop of London. After the Fight, Gell and Brereton were ſo unkind or uncivil to the young Earl of Northampton, that they wou'd not part with his Father's Body to him, or ſuffer his Surgeons to embalm it, without ſuch unreaſonable Conditions as were contrary to the Law of Arms.

His Character.

The Lord Herbert ſits down before Glouceſter.

In the mean Time, the Lord Herbert, Son to the Marqueſs of Worceſter, having all South-Wales committed to his Care, at his own Charge and other Catholick Friends, ſuddenly rais'd a little Army of fifteen hundred Foot, and near five hundred Horſe, all out of Wales; which in ſhort Time advanc'd and ſat down before Glouceſter, blocking it up on one Side, while Prince Maurice was to diſtreſs it on the other. But Sir William Waller with a light Party of near two thouſand Horſe and Dragoons, by a ſudden Night March, in which he was very dextrous, poſted to the Rivern Severn, ſix Miles from Glouceſter, from whence he had appointed many flat Boats to meet him; and finding the Guard of the River either treacherouſly or fooliſhly neglected by the Lord Herbert's Forces, in them tranſported his whole Body, which upon the Advantage of that Paſs might have been reſiſted by a very few Men. Hereupon the Conſternation was ſo great among the new Welſh Soldiers, that tho' their Works were too good to be enter'd by Horſe-Men, and the Avenues almoſt inacceſſible, without giving or receiving a Blow, immediately they ſent to treat, and as civilly deliver'd up Themſelves and their Arms upon the ſingle Allowance of Quarter by the Parliamentarians, who put near thirteen hundred Foot, and three Troops of Horſe into Glouceſter, the Lord Herbert Himſelf being then at Oxford, and his Brother the Lord Somerſet with three or four Troops at a ſafe Diſtance from the reſt. The Parliament Writers ſay 500 were ſlain: However this was the End of a Muſhroom Army, which grew up and periſh'd ſo ſoon, that the Loſs was ſcarce apprehended, and which coſt the Marqueſs of Worceſter and his Friends above threeſcore thouſand Pounds; which Mony, if employ'd to the King's beſt Advantage, might poſſibly have put an End to the War the next Summer.

His Forces routed by Sir William Waller.

The firſt Steps towards a Treaty.

VI. 1. During theſe Military Tranſactions, with ſome others of leſs Moment, the King, finding the two Houſes backwards and uninclinable to the Treaty formerly propos'd, to quicken them and force ſome Reply, he ſent a new Meſſage to them, reminding them of the Propoſition he had made for a Ceſſation of Arms; and deſir'd, 'If they approv'd of a Ceſſation, that the Day when it ſhould commence might be propos'd by them; ſince he ſuppos'd, by the preſent Preparations, till that ſhou'd be determin'd, they thought themſelves not oblig'd to any Ceſſation; nor, till then, did he conceive himſelf oblig'd to it: However he wiſh'd it might be clearly underſtood between them, that no ſuch Imputations as formerly might be laid upon him, upon Occaſion of any Thing that might intervene.' Which Meſſage put a Neceſſity upon them of re-entering upon the Argument, and gave the Lovers of Peace an Opportunity of urging a Debate, which had been ſubtlely laid aſide for the Diſpatch of other Affairs. And even at this Time, the Majority of both Houſes deſir'd the ſame Peace the King did; for beſides thoſe who had been Diſſenters from the Beginning, yet for their Conveniency had ſtay'd with them, very many were now convinc'd that they had been miſ-led, and diſcern'd in what a bottomleſs Gulph the Kingdom wou'd be plung'd without an immediate Compoſure; and ſome of Thoſe, whoſe furious Breath had help'd to kindle the Fire, either out of Conſcience of their Error, or Fear of the King's prevailing Power, or Anger to ſee others more valu'd, were moſt ſollicitous for a Treaty. So that in a ſhort Time both Houſes agreed, 'That there ſhou'd be a Treaty, in which ſo much of the King's Propoſitions as concern'd the Magazines, Forts and Ships, and the Parliament's Propoſition for the disbanding the Armies, ſhou'd be firſt treated on and concluded, before they proceeded to treat upon any of the other Propoſitions; and that the Treaty ſhou'd begin the fourth of March, and that from the Beginning, the Time ſhou'd not exceed twenty Days.

Commiſſioners appointed by the Parliament.

The Perſons choſen for this Treaty, were the Earl of Northumberland, the Lord Say, Mr. William Pierrepoint, Sir William Armyn, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Bulſtrode Whitelock, for whoſe ſafe Conduct they diſpatch'd a Meſſenger to the King. His Majeſty return'd a ſafe Conduct for the Earl of Northumberland and the four Commoners, but refus'd to admit the Lord Say to his Preſence, for the ſame Reaſon he had refus'd Sir John Evelyn at Colebrook; but ſignify'd, 'That if they wou'd employ any other Perſon not within the ſame Rule, he ſhould as freely come as if he were in the ſafe Conduct.' Many were of Opinion that in Policy the King ſhou'd have admitted the Lord Say; as being a Man of great Depth, and at this Time inclinable to retrieve former Breaches. Others believ'd Him to be ſo little inclin'd to ſerve the King, or advance the Treaty, that he was deſign'd as a Spy upon the reſt. But the King, who knew that Lord as well as any, believ'd that it was not in his Power to do Good, or at leaſt not in his Will; therefore wou'd not break a former Rule, but kept to the forenam'd Reply. Together with this Deſire of a ſafe Conduct, they ſent theſe following Articles of Ceſſation. 1. 'That all manner of Arms, &c. paſſing without ſuch a Conduct as might warrant their Paſſage, may be ſtopp'd and ſeiz'd on. 2. That all manner of Perſons, paſſing without ſuch a Conduct, ſhall be apprehended and detain'd. 3. That the King's Forces in Oxfordſhire ſhou'd advance no nearer to Windſor than Wheatly, in Buckinghamſhire no nearer to Aleſbury than Brill, and in Berkſhire neither Side come nearer than at preſent. And that the Parliament Forces in Oxfordſhire ſhall advance no nearer than Henley, and thoſe in Buckinghamſhire no nearer than Aleſbury, &c. 4. That no Siege ſhall be begun or continu'd againſt Glouceſter, but the Forces in thoſe Parts return to their Quarters. 5. That upon Pretence of a Breach, the complaining Party is to acquaint the Lord-General on the other Side; and five Days Notice be given before any Act of Hoſtility. 6. That all other Forces ſhall remain in the ſame Quarters; and this Ceſſation not to reſtrain any Ships for the Defence of the King's Dominions.

Their Articles of Ceſſation.

They occaſion great Debates.

Theſe Propoſitions were deliver'd to the King on the firſt of March, near a Month after the Ceſſation had been propos'd by him, which occaſion'd a Doubt that the Overture was not ſincere; ſince it was hardly poſſible, that the Ceſſation cou'd begin ſo ſoon as the fourth of that Month, as they had deſir'd in the Propoſals. But the Articles Themſelves were ſuch as occaſion'd much Debate, and Difference in Opinion, among thoſe who deſir'd the ſame Thing. They were ſtrictly canvaſs'd by the Privy-Council, and other of the King's Friends, who had different Notions of the Reaſonableneſs and Equality of them. But what ſway'd moſt was the Conſideration, That hitherto the Parliament had rais'd their immenſe Sums of Mony chiefly from the City of London, and from their Friends, not daring ſo rigidly to execute their Ordinances in diſtant Parts, but contented themſelves with ſome ſevere Judgments upon particular Men, whom they branded as Malignants; except what they glean'd among their own Zealots upon voluntary Collections, and plunder'd by their Forces, which brought nothing to their common Stock: And of what they had laid upon their own Garriſons, they had receiv'd very little; not venturing yet, by any general Tax upon the People, to inflame them, and openly ſhew them their Deſigns upon their Liberty and Property, with the Fears of which they had blown them up to all thoſe ſeditious Humours againſt the King; and apprehending, if they ſhou'd attempt That, any Hopes of Relief from the King's Forces wou'd raiſe the whole Kingdom againſt them. But now, after they had agreed to a Treaty, and fram'd Articles of Ceſſation, they paſs'd an Ordinance for a Weekly Aſſeſment throughout the Kingdom; by which the City of London was to pay ten thouſand Pounds, and the whole Kingdom no leſs than thirty three thouſand five hundred and eighteen Pounds a Week; in all amounting to one Million and above ſeven hundred thouſand Pounds a Year: A Tax altogether unprecedented, and unknown to the Nation at this Time. To this they added other Ordinances for exacting the twentieth Part, and for ſequeſtering and ſeizing of the Eſtates of all who adhered to the King. Upon all this it was urg'd, 'That now if a Ceſſation was allow'd by the King, on the Articles propos'd, and thereby his Forces lock'd up within the narrow Bounds there mention'd, theſe Ordinances might be executed throughout all their Quarters, and vaſt Sums be rais'd: Their great Aſſociation of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntington, Bedford and Eſſex, who were kept from exorbitant Preſſures by the Apprehenſion of the Earl of Newcaſtle's Advance upon them, wou'd by this Means yield them a great Supply of Men and Mony. In Somerſet and De-

'vonſhire, while Sir Ralph Hopton might hereby be kept from Motion, they might raiſe what they pleas'd from the Stocks and Perſonal Eſtates of thoſe whom they thought fit to declare Malignant; and ſo this Ceſſation, beſides the Prejudice to the Loyal Party, wou'd probably encreaſe both the Mony and the Forces of the other Side.

They are agreed to with Alterations.

Theſe Conſiderations had a powerful Influence upon thoſe, who believ'd the Treaty wou'd not produce a Peace; the Number of whom was encreas'd by a late Reſolution of making additional Fortifications to the City of London, all thrown up with ſingular Expedition; which many believ'd wou'd not have been ſo induſtriouſly undertaken, if the Place was ſoon to have return'd to the King's Obedience. And many eminent Perſons about the King, and highly ſerviceable to his Cauſe, were ſo ſtartled with this Apprehenſion, that they unanimouſly begg'd of his Majeſty, 'That by an unequal Ceſſation, they might not be made Loſers of that which they had ſecur'd during the Licence of Hoſtility; and that their Enemies might not be enabled to deſtroy them by thoſe Means, which they durſt not attempt any other Way.' Upon this the King, after ſolemn Debates in Council, reſolv'd to make ſuch Alterations in the Articles, as might make the Terms more equal, or leſs injurious. He agreed to the firſt Article, and to the ſecond as far as it concern'd all Officers and Soldiers; but he propos'd, 'That his other Subjects might have a free Paſſage during the Ceſſation, and an open uninterrupted Trade carry'd on in all Parts.' To the reſt of the Articles he likewiſe conſented, with two Proviſions, 'Firſt, that the Ships to be ſet forth, ſhou'd be commanded by Perſons approv'd of by his Majeſty: Secondly, during the Ceſſation, none of his Subjects ſhou'd be impriſon'd otherwiſe than according to the known Laws of the Land, and that there ſhou'd be no Plundering, or Violence offer'd to any of them. If after this any Scruples ſhou'd be made, he was willing that the Commiſſioners might immediately repair to him, and ſo all Matters concerning the Ceſſation might be there ſettled.'

The Petition of the General Aſſembly of the Kirk of Scotland.

2. Many Days paſs'd without a Return to this Anſwer; for in the mean Time another Addreſs was made to the King, upon which the Leaders at London had ſet their Hearts more than upon the Treaty, and for which indeed they deferr'd their Treaty. They had ſtill a mighty Dependence upon their Brethren of Scotland, who yet mov'd but ſlowly; and what was more diſcouraging, by reaſon of ſome late Quarrels between the Engliſh and Scotch Officers at London, and ſome Blood drawn, many of the latter quitted the Service; ſo that it was hop'd it wou'd have broke any farther National Combination. But the ſtrong Inclination to be intermeddling overpower'd thoſe private Diſobligations; and to preſs the King's Conſent to the grand Point, the Extirpation of Epiſcopacy, which with ſo much Difficulty had got through the two Houſes, about the end of February there arriv'd at Oxford the Earl of Lowdon Lord-Chancellor of Scotland, and the famous Mr. Henderſon: The former came as Commiſſioner from the Lords of the Secret Council, or, as they then call'd themſelves, The Conſervators of the Peace between the two Kingdoms; who deſir'd to paſs as Mediators or Umpires between the King and the two Houſes of Parliament. Mr. Henderſon had a ſpecial Employment from the Aſſembly of the Kirk of Scotland, to preſent a Petition from that Body to his Majeſty, which was to effect the great Work of Reformation. The Petition with unuſual Zeal repreſents the Calamities and Sufferings of their Brethren from the Increaſe of Popery, and the Number of Papiſts in Power, particularly in the Earl of Newcaſtle's Army; 'ſo that their Silence at this Time wou'd be Impiety againſt God, Diſloyalty againſt the King, and Cruelty againſt their Brethren; and if their Tongues and Pens ſhou'd ceaſe, the Conſciences within them wou'd cry out, and the Stones in the Streets wou'd anſwer them. Therefore they vehemently preſs'd for Unity of Religion, and Uniformity of Kirk Government, in all the King's Dominions; in which they were the more inſtant, becauſe it concern'd the Lord Jeſus Chriſt ſo much in his Glory, his Majeſty in his Honour, the Kirk of England in her Happineſs, and the Kirk of Scotland in her Purity and Peace; well knowing that without the Reformation of the Kirk of England, there was no Poſſibility of the Continuance of it among them. They ſaid they were not ignorant, that the Work was great, the Difficulties and Impediments many, and that there were both Mountains and Lions in the Way; the ſtrongeſt Let, was the Mountain of Prelacy. Therefore they begg'd for a Meeting of ſome Divines of both Kingdoms, to prepare Matters, &c. that his Majeſty wou'd no more tolerate the Maſs, or any Part of Romiſh Superſtition or Tyranny, but command that all good Means be us'd for the Converſion of his Princely Conſort the Queen's Majeſty; which was the humble Deſire of the whole Kirk and Kingdom.'

The King's Anſwer to it.

This Petition was not more unuſual, than the Circumſtances attending it; for it was no ſooner preſented, than it was ſent to London, printed and communicated with all Induſtry to the People, to let them ſee how zealous the Scotch Nation was for the Overthrow of the Church of England; and Mr. Henderſon himſelf confeſs'd to the King, that he had three or four Letters to the moſt ſeditious Preachers about London, from Men of the ſame Spirit in Scotland. Upon this Provocation, the King might have reaſonably proceeded againſt Mr. Henderſon, who was neither included in his Safe Conduct, as the Lord Lowdon and the reſt were, and had very little Pretence of Authority to tranſact ſuch an Inſtrument: But well knowing the Intereſt and Influence of the Clergy in that Kingdom, he reſolv'd to treat his Perſon very graciouſly, and to protect him from the Affronts he might naturally expect in an Univerſity, where he carry'd Himſelf with Inſolence and Superciliouſneſs to the moſt learned Doctors. Therefore before he enter'd upon the other Addreſs made by the Lord Lowdon, he return'd a mild and candid Anſwer to the Petition, 'In which he commended the Zeal of the Petitioners for the Advancement of the true Reform'd Religion, againſt Hereſy, Popery, Sects, Innovations, &c. For the Unity in Kirk Government, his Majeſty knows, That the eſtabliſh'd Government by the Laws hath ſo near a Relation and Intermixture with the Civil State, (which may be unknown to the Petitioners) that till a compoſed digeſted Form be preſented to him, upon a free Debate in Parliament, whereby the Conſent of the whole Kingdom may be had, and He and all his Subjects may diſcern what is to be left out, or brought in, as well as what taken away, He knows not how to conſent to an Alteration, otherwiſe than to ſuch an Act for the Eaſe of Tender Conſciences, in the Matter of Ceremonies, as his Majeſty hath often offer'd. But he is ſtill willing, That the Debates of Religion may be enter'd into by a Synod of Learned and Godly Divines, regularly choſen according to the Laws and Cuſtoms of this Kingdom; to which end he is alſo willing, That ſome Learned Divines of the Kirk of Scotland may be likewiſe ſent to be preſent, to offer their Reaſons and Opinions. As to the Aſperſions of Popery, he clearly wiped them off, and charg'd the Parliament Army with having more Papiſts and Foreigners than his own; therefore he conceiv'd he had not left it poſſible, for any Man to believe him guilty of tolerating any Part of Romiſh Tyranny and Superſtition; or to ſuſpect that the Converſion of his deareſt Conſort was not ſo much his Deſire, That the Acceſſion of as many Crowns as God had already beſtow'd on Him, wou'd not be more welcome to him than that Day.'

A further Anſwer.

Then further to clear himſelf from the Aſperſions of encouraging Papiſts, in a particular Declaration ſent into Scotland, about a Month after, he us'd theſe Words, which ought not to be forgotten; 'Great Numbers of that Religion have been with great Alacrity entertain'd in that Rebellious Army againſt Us; and others have been ſeduc'd, to whom We had formerly deny'd Employments, as appears by the Examination of many Priſoners, of whom we have taken Twenty, and Thirty at a time of one Troop or Company, of that Religion.'

The Tranſactions of the Scotch Commiſſioners with the King.

The Lord Lowdon, and the other Commiſſioners who were guided by him, gave the Precedence to this Petition, as being a Matter of Religion, and urg'd nothing of their own Commiſſion, till the King had publiſh'd his Anſwer to the other, and then that Lord us'd all private Arguments with the King to induce him to conſent to the Alteration of the Church Government; aſſuring him, It wou'd be a Means, not only of hindering the Scots from joyning with the Parliament, but wou'd oblige them to aſſiſt him in the Vindication of all his Rights. But he ſoon found his Majeſty too firmly fix'd, to be mov'd by a Convenience in a Matter of Conſcience; Therefore he betook himſelf with his Companions, to their own avow'd Errand, which conſiſted of two Parts; the One, 'To offer the Mediation of the Conſervators of the Peace, for the Compoſure of the Differences between the King and the two Houſes;' the Other, 'To deſire his Majeſty, that he wou'd ſend out his Precepts, to ſummon a Parliament in Scotland.' To the firſt of which they pretended a Right, by Vertue of a Clauſe in the Act of Pacification made at the beginning of this Parliament. But the King ſhew'd them, 'That the Differences between Him and the two Houſes had no Relation to the Act of Pacification, and the Peace between the two Kingdoms; but concern'd the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, of which the Conſervators of the Peace of Scotland cou'd have no poſſible Cogniſance: Therefore it wou'd give great Umbrage to his Subjects of England, and inſtead of continuing the Peace, ‘ breed Jealouſies between the Nations, if he ſhou'd admit of any ſuch Mediation as they propos'd.’ As to his Summoning a Parliament, which by a particular Act was appointed to meet in June 1644, he anſwer'd, ‘ That he found no Occaſion to trouble his Subjects ſooner than the Time prefix'd for that Meeting; and therefore declin'd the iſſuing out any Writs for this Purpoſe.’ This he did upon good Grounds; for it was expreſly ſaid in the Act of Pacification, ‘ That England ſhou'd not make War againſt Scotland, without Conſent of the Parliament of England; nor Scotland make War againſt England, without Conſent of the Parliament of Scotland: And if any of the Subjects on either Side ſhou'd break this Rule, they ſhou'd be us'd as Traitors.’ So that whoever believ'd that the Scots cou'd be ſecur'd by any Obligations, Divine or Human, thought it impoſſible, by theſe clear Words, that any Forces cou'd be rais'd there to invade England, and diſturb the King, before June 1644.

When the Commiſſioners found they cou'd gain nothing further from the King, they deſir'd his Majeſty's Leave and Paſs to go to London: The King was ſenſible of the Inconvenience of this Allowance, therefore plainly told the Lord Lowdon what Grounds he had to believe they deſign'd to raiſe an Army for the Parliament's Quarrel, and that ſome of his Fellow-Commiſſioners wou'd prove Incendiaries rather than Mediators. Lowdon ſaid much to aſſure the King, there was no Deſign in Scotland to own the Quarrel of the two Houſes againſt him, and pretended, He wou'd rather die, than concur in ſuch Courſes, as Mr. Burnet tells us: And he once reſolv'd to make a Proteſtation, ‘ That the King, by not ſuffering them to go to London, had violated the ſafe Conduct.’ In ſhort the King told them, Since he had deny'd what cou'd be the only Ground of their going to London, they ſhou'd firſt return to thoſe that ſent them; if otherwiſe, they muſt run the Hazard of Perſons, whom he would not countenance with his Protection. They were alſo told by others, That the King's Counſellors and Officers were ſo averſe to their Journey, that they wou'd be ready to deſert his Majeſty, if he ſhou'd conſent to it. But what prevail'd with them moſt, was their being aſſur'd, That if the King ſhou'd conſent to their Journey, ſeveral Perſons were privately reſolv'd to cut them off by the Way; That as the King knew nothing of it, ſo it wou'd not be in his Power to prevent it. So after a conſiderable Stay, they all return'd home ſafely to their Friends in Scotland.

Their Returns.

The Parliament Commiſſioners come to treat with the King.

3. Before their Departure, the Commiſſioners for the Treaty, the Earl of Northumberland, Mr. William Pierrepoint, Sir William Armyn, Sir John Holland and Mr. Bulſtrode Whitelock, arriv'd at Oxford; who ſoon took Notice of the Requeſts of their Scotch Brethren, and alſo deſir'd, ‘ That they might have his Majeſty's Leave to go to London:’ But being quickly anſwer'd, ‘ That that Requeſt wou'd not fall within any of the Propoſitions to be treated of,’ they modeſtly deſiſted. Theſe Commiſſioners made a noble Figure in the City of Oxford, and the great Earl carry'd with him his own Plate and Houſhold Goods, and Accommodations even to Wine and Proviſions, which were brought from London to them at Oxford, where they liv'd in as much Height and Splendor, as was uſual to the Earl of Northumberland, which was ſcarce exceeded by any Subject in England. The King treated them with ſingular Favour and Civility; and his chief Commander Ruthen, with ſeveral of his Lords and Officers, came frequently to their Table, where they held a very amicable Converſation together: And the King himſelf ſometimes did them the Honour to accept of Part of their Wine and Proviſions, which the Earl ſent to him, when they had any Thing extraordinary. His Majeſty alſo gave them leave to viſit ſome Parliament Officers that had been taken Priſoners, now in the Caſtle, as Captain Wingate, Captain Auſten and others; and order'd Smith the Marſhall to conduct them to the Priſon. But the Appearing with the Marſhall, as Whitelock has it in his Manuſcript Additions, caus'd ſome Diſturbance, and a Report about the Town, That the Treaty with the Parliament was broken off, and the Commiſſioners had ſo offended the King, that he had ſent two of them, Sir John Holland, and Mr. Whitelock, Priſoners to the Caſtle.

Their Temper and Diſpoſition.

Theſe Commiſſioners were of great Knowledge and Capacities, both able and proper for ſuch a Negotiation; and at this Time they abhorr'd the high Proceedings of the Parliament, or at leaſt the Power and Superiority of the Earl of Eſſex, and ſeem'd exceedingly earneſt for ſuch an Accommodation as all good Men deſir'd. And the aſpiring Earl of Northumberland, to private Friends, did now make as full Profeſſions of future Service, and as ample Acknowledgments of former Errors, as cou'd well be expected from a wary Nature, before he knew what Reception they were like to have. They were ſenſible that the Parliament expected ſome unreaſonable Conceſſions, to which if the King wou'd yield for a while, they hop'd the Inundations might be in Time reduc'd, and brought into their proper Channels. Their Inſtructions were exceeding ſtrict, and ty'd them up to treat with none but the King Himſelf; whom they often attended at his Lodgings in Chriſt-Church, and had a clear Acceſs to him as often as they deſir'd, and were allow'd by his Majeſty a full Freedom of Debate with him. He was commonly attended by his great Lords and chief Officers, who never debated any Matters with Them; but gave their Opinions to the King as they were ask'd, and wou'd ſometimes remind him of ſome particular Things; but otherwiſe they did not ſpeak at all.

They treat about a Ceſſation, but to no Effect.

At the firſt Meeting, the Commiſſioners declar'd, ‘ That they were firſt to treat of the Ceſſation, and till that was concluded, they were not to enter upon any of the other Propoſitions;’ with which the King was pleas'd, conceiving they had Power to give Conſent to the Articles propos'd by him, which he rather believ'd when they read the Preamble to the Articles, which expreſs'd a vehement Deſire of Peace from the Lords and Commons, ‘ who had conſider'd the Articles of Ceſſation with thoſe Alterations and Additions offer'd by his Majeſty; to which they were ready to agree in ſuch Manner as was expreſs'd in the enſuing Articles.’ After which were inſerted the very Articles which had been firſt ſent to the King, without allowing one ſingle Alteration or Addition made by him, nor had the Commiſſioners Power to conſent to any Alteration, but only to publiſh, That if the King conſented to them, then, and not before, to proceed to treat upon the other Propoſitions. This the King look'd upon as an ill Omen, and other Men as a Trick and Stratagem, limiting their Committee to fruſtrate both, and throw the Odium upon the King. Hereupon the King next Day ſent a Meſſage to the Houſes, which he likewiſe publiſh'd to undeceive the People; ‘ further preſſing the Weight and Conſequence of his former Exceptions, which he maniſeſted in ſeveral Particulars; and at laſt aſſuring them, That tho', next to Peace, he deſir'd a Ceſſation, yet rather than the Diſagreement to one ſhou'd delay or deſtroy the Hopes of the other, he was willing to treat, even without a Ceſſation, upon the Propoſitions Themſelves, in the Order agreed, and deſir'd their Committee might be enabled to that Effect.’ This occaſion'd new Reaſons from the Houſes, why they wou'd not conſent to the King's Alterations, made to the Articles; but however the Meſſage had this Effect, that it produc'd Liberty to the Committee to enter upon the Treaty it ſelf, upon the Propoſitions, tho' they cou'd not agree to the Ceſſation.

TREATY I.
At Oxford.

4. Thus the Treaty it ſelf began, upon the Foot of the Propoſitions made on both Sides: laſting twenty Days according to Agreement, from the twenty-ſeventh of March, to the fifteenth of April. Yet in all this Time, tho' there were many Conferences and Debates, only the firſt Propoſition on both Sides, was fully canvaſs'd and examin'd. They firſt enter'd upon that made by the King, which was, ‘ That his own Revenue, Magazines, Towns, Forts and Ships, which had been taken, or kept from him by Force, ſhou'd be forthwith reſtor'd to him.’ In debating of which, they ſeem'd to reſtore all theſe Things, ‘ but ſo as they ſhou'd fall into the Hand and Government of ſuch Perſons, as the Houſes ſhou'd confide in, or at leaſt ſhou'd be approv'd by them, after they were nominated by the King. On the other ſide the King offer'd to put the Forts, Caſtles and Navy into the Hands of ſuch againſt whom no juſt Exception cou'd be made; and if any ſhou'd be, he wou'd always leave them to their due Tryal and Examination.’ So that the plain Difference between them was, Whether the King wou'd reſerve the Diſpoſal of the great Offices and Places of Truſt to Himſelf, as all Engliſh Kings had enjoy'd, or whether he wou'd be content with ſuch a Nomination, as being to depend upon their Approbation, no Man ſhou'd be admitted to them, who was nam'd by Him. The King ſtill inſiſting upon the real Rights of himſelf and Royal Progenitors, they told him, ‘ There cou'd be no ſecure Peace hop'd for, if a Cure was not found out for their Fears and Jealouſies; and they knew none certain, but that which they had propos'd.’ The King reply'd, ‘ That that Argument might extend to a Deprivation, or at leaſt a Sharing of all his Royal Power; ſince Power, as well as Forces, might be the Object of Fears and Jealouſies; and there wou'd be always a Power left to hurt, while there was any to protect. He thought the Obſervance of that Rule, Neither of them to fear what the Law fear'd not, to be on both Sides a better Cure for that dangerous Diſeaſe, than for him to diveſt Himſelf of thoſe Truſts repos'd in him for the better Protection of the Subject and the Law, and to avoid thoſe Diſtractions which the Intereſts of all Sharers in the Sovereignty wou'd infallibly produce. Laſtly he told them, He thought it moſt unreaſonable, to be preſs'd to diminiſh his own juſt ‘ Rights

'Rights Himſelf, becauſe Others had violated and uſurp'd them.

The firſt Propoſition on the Parliament Side, was, 'That his Majeſty wou'd be pleas'd to diſband his Armies, as they likewiſe wou'd be ready to diſband their Forces they had rais'd; and that he wou'd be pleas'd to return to his Parliament. To this the King declar'd himſelf willing that all Armies ſhou'd be diſbanded, and thought the beſt Way to it a happy and ſpeedy Concluſion of the preſent Treaty; and as he deſir'd nothing more than to be with his two Houſes, ſo he wou'd repair thither as ſoon as he cou'd with his Honour and Safety.' The Commiſſioners ask'd him, 'If by a ſpeedy Concluſion, he meant one upon the two firſt Propoſitions, or a Concluſion in all the Propoſitions of both Parts.' The King knowing that ſome of the Propoſitions wou'd require much Time, anſwer'd, 'That he meant ſuch a Concluſion, as there might be a clear Evidence to all of a future Peace, and no Ground left for the Continuance of thoſe bloody Diſſenſions; which might be obtain'd, if both Houſes conſented to have the Treaty proceed without further Interruption, or Limitation of Days.' They ask'd him, 'What he intended ſhou'd be ſuch a clear Evidence to all.' He told them, 'If the Concluſion of the preſent Treaty, upon his and their firſt Propoſition, ſhou'd be ſo perfectly made, that the Laws might have a free and uninterrupted Courſe, for the Preſervation of all Mens Rights, there wou'd be thence a clear Evidence to all of a future Peace; never meaning that both the Armies ſhou'd remain undiſbanded, till the Propoſitions on both Sides were fully concluded.' To their other Clauſe concerning the King's Return to the Parliament, they ſaid, 'They had no Inſtructions to treat upon it;' at which the King was much ſurpris'd; and finding they had no Authority to debate what was to be done in order to diſbanding, but only to urge him to appoint a Day for the effecting it; and that he wou'd firſt diſband the Forces in the North, where he had a great Army and they none, he endeavour'd to draw them to ſome Propoſitions about his Return to the Parliament, which if they purſu'd heartily, ſuch Expedients wou'd naturally ariſe, as might bring about a general Peace.

Mr. Whitelock's Account of it.

This is the Sum of what paſs'd in this Treaty, only Mr. Whitelock, one of the Commiſſioners, has given us ſuch a further Account of it, as is moſt proper to be recited in his own Words. He ſays, In this Treaty the King manifeſted his great Parts and Abilities, Strength of Reaſon, and Quickneſs of Apprehenſion, with much Patience in hearing what was objected againſt him; wherein he allow'd all Freedom, and wou'd himſelf ſum up the Arguments, and give a moſt clear Judgment upon them. His Unhappineſs was, That he had a better Opinion of others Judgments than his own, tho' they were weaker than his; and of this the Commiſſioners had Experience to their great Trouble. They were often waiting on the King, and debating ſome Points of the Treaty with him, till Midnight, before they cou'd come to a Concluſion. Upon one of the moſt material Points they preſs'd his Majeſty with their Reaſons and beſt Arguments they cou'd uſe, to grant what they deſir'd: The King ſaid, He was fully ſatisfy'd, and promis'd to give them his Anſwer in Writing, according to their Deſire; but, becauſe it was then paſt Midnight, he wou'd have it drawn up the next Morning, and then he wou'd give them his Anſwer in Writing, as it was now agreed upon. They went to their Lodgings full of joyful Hopes to receive this Anſwer the next Morning, and which being given, wou'd have conduc'd to a happy Iſſue and Succeſs of this Treaty, and they had the King's Word for it, and they waited on him the next Morning at the Hour appointed. But inſtead of that Anſwer, which was expected and promis'd, the King gave them a Paper quite contrary to what was concluded the Night before, and very much tending to the Breach of the Treaty. They humbly expoſtulated this with his Majeſty, and preſs'd him upon his Royal Word, and the ill Conſequences they fear'd wou'd follow upon this his new Paper. But the King told them, He had alter'd his Mind, and that this Paper which he now gave them, was the Anſwer, which he was now reſolv'd to make upon their laſt Debate. And they cou'd obtain no other from him, which occaſion'd much Sadneſs and Trouble to them. Some of his own Friends, who were queſtion'd by the Commiſſioners, inform'd them, 'That after they were gone from the King, and his Council alſo departed, ſome of his Bed-Chamber, (and they went higher) hearing from him, what Anſwer he had promis'd, and doubting it wou'd tend to ſuch an Iſſue of the Treaty as they did not wiſh, being rather for the Continuance of the War; they never left preſſing, and perſuading of the King, till they prevail'd with him to change his former Reſolutions, and to give Order for his Anſwer to be drawn, as it was then deliver'd.' Thus far Mr. Whitelock, whoſe Account may probably diſpleaſe both the Friends and Enemies of this unhappy Prince; the Sum of which was, The King was an extraordinary Man, and inclinable to ſuch Conceſſions, as his Friends cou'd not allow of, as being contrary to his Honour, and their own Security.

1643. Car. 19.

The King ſends a Meſſage to the Houſes.

The Treaty on both Sides going ſlowly on, and the Commiſſioners Inſtructions being ſtrict, and ſuch as they cou'd not ſhew to the King when he deſir'd it, he thought fit on the 12th of April to ſend a Meſſage to the two Houſes, to this Effect, 'That as ſoon as he was ſatisfy'd, in his firſt Propoſition, and as ſoon as the Members of both Houſes ſhou'd be reſtored, and that his Majeſty and both Houſes may be ſecured from tumultuous Aſſemblies, which he conceiv'd cou'd not otherwiſe be done, but by adjourning the Parliament to ſome Place twenty Miles from London, ſuch as the Houſes ſhou'd agree upon: His Majeſty wou'd conſent to the diſbanding of the Armies, and wou'd return ſpeedily to his Parliament.' This being communicated to the Commiſſioners, they diſſwaded the ſending of it, 'as what they fear'd might break off the Treaty, as alſo the Improbability that the Houſes wou'd adjourn and leave the City of London, their beſt Friends and Strength, and put them into a general Diſcontent.' But the King finding their Powers ſo limited, that they cou'd neither enlarge the Time of the Treaty, nor debate ſome Particulars, reſolv'd to ſend the Meſſage: Upon which the two Houſes requir'd their Commiſſioners to return to Weſtminſter, without the leaſt Delay; which upon the 15th Day of April finiſh'd this unſucceſsful Treaty, contrary to the Expectations of great Numbers, who were made to believe that a ſpeedy Peace wou'd enſue. Mr. Whitelock gives us a ſhort Account of the five Commiſſioners, and ſays, The Earl of Northumberland demean'd himſelf with much Courage and Wiſdom, and was full of Civility to the other Commiſſioners; and the Port they liv'd in at Oxford, by the Management of his Officers, was full of State and Nobleneſs. Mr. Pierrepoint acted his Part with deep Foreſight and Prudence, and was exceeding courteous to his Fellow-Commiſſioners. Sir William Armyn was a Gentleman of good Underſtanding and Converſation, and wou'd give his Opinion upon good Reaſon. Sir John Holland, a Gentleman of excellent Parts, as well as Perſon, ſhew'd a very good Judgment and Teſtimony of his Abilities. As for Himſelf, he ſays modeſtly, Mr. Whitelock was put upon very much Labour, and had both from the Earl, and the reſt of the Commiſſioners, a great Share of Favour and Reſpect.

The Treaty broke up.

Opinions and Cenſures upon it.

Various were the Opinions concerning this Treaty: Many thought the King was too ſevere, and too much inſiſted upon what was his own by Right and Law; and believ'd that if he wou'd have liberally diſtributed Offices and Places to particular Men, he might have been repoſſeſs'd of his Power. Others conceiv'd, that if at this Juncture he had only nominated the Earl of Northumberland to be Lord High-Admiral, which Place he ſeem'd to have expected, it wou'd have made ſo wide a Diviſion in the Houſes, that the Treaty wou'd have been continu'd, and the King receiv'd Satisfaction in the other Propoſitions. And I have been further aſſur'd, from private Hands, that very large Promiſes were made both by the Commiſſioners and others, to his Majeſty, if he wou'd but at preſent comply with the unhappy Circumſtances of the Times; and that for ſome time he ſeem'd more than inclinable to oblige Them, till further Conſiderations gave him another View. But after all, if we conſider the Nature of the Propoſitions themſelves, as degrading as any ſent before, their ſequeſtering of the Biſhops Lands, their rifling of Somerſet-Houſe, which belong'd to the Queen, and other Acts both of Power and Reſentment, during the very Time of this Treaty; we can hardly think that any tolerable Compliances on the King's Side cou'd have produc'd a Peace. And as to the Promiſes of particular Men, tho' of great Sway in the Houſes, the King never found himſelf more deceiv'd than when he hearkned to ſuch; for as ſoon as they appear'd to deſign him any Service, they preſently ſunk from their former Power and Intereſt, and became unable to perform any Thing material. Even the preſent Commiſſioners, tho' at length they obtain'd the Thanks of the Houſes, yet at their Return, ſome of them were look'd upon with great Jealouſy; which ſo far prevail'd, that Mr. Harry Martin, expecting ſome Diſcovery, broke open a Letter from the Earl of Northumberland to his own Lady, and met with no publick Check for his Inſolence.

VII. 1. The Proſpect of Peace being now at an End, the War began to appear with a more formidable Aſpect than ever; and on the ſame Day that the Treaty expir'd at Oxford, the Earl of Eſſex march'd with all his great Forces from Windſor, and ſat down before Reading. This General had never before been at the Head of ſo gallant an Army, which conſiſted of about ſixteen thouſand

The Earl of Eſſex beſieges Reading.

Foot, and above three thouſand Horſe, all well equipp'd, and as well ſupply'd and prepar'd for a Siege, as cou'd be expected from ſuch who had the Command of the Tower of London, and the chief Stores of the Kingdom. In the Town were lodg'd above three thouſand Foot, and near three hundred Horſe; but the Fortifications were very mean, and unfit to endure a form'd Siege, being rais'd only to ſecure a Winter Quarter, and never deſign'd for a ſtanding Garriſon. Beſides it was reſolv'd at a Council of War at Oxford, ' That before the End of April, when the Enemy might probably take the Field, Sir Arthur Aſton ſhou'd ſlight thoſe Works, and draw off his Garriſon to the King;' and what made it ſtill leſs able to bear a Siege, was their Want of Ammunition, there not being above forty Barrels of Powder to encounter ſo powerful an Army. Notwithſtanding all theſe Difficulties, the Garriſon look'd upon the Enemy with ſufficient Courage and Contempt, and in reality both Officers and Soldiers were as good, as cou'd be expected in the Infancy of a War; and they had no Apprehesion of Want of Victuals, with which they were abundantly ſupply'd. The Soldiers without were, for the greateſt Part, newly levy'd, and few of their Officers acquainted with the Way and Order of attacking Towns; and indeed this was the firſt formal Siege that happen'd in England.

Extraordinary Aſſiſtances were afforded to the Beſiegers; and it is hardly credible what vaſt Quantities of excellent Victuals ready dreſs'd, were every Day ſent in Waggons and Carts from London to the Army, upon the voluntary Contributions of private Families; the inferior People being perſuaded, not only that the Town wou'd be ſoon taken, but that the gaining of it wou'd deſtroy all the King's Hopes of an Army. Upon the firſt ſitting down before the Place, after they had taken a View of the Ground, their General adviſ'd with a Council of War, how to carry on the Siege, whether by Aſſault or Approach; in which was great Diverſity of Opinions: But after many Arguments and Debates, the major Part, together with the General, agreed to the latter, as leſs hazardous than the former. The chief Care and Overſight of the Approaches was committed to Philip Skippon, a Perſon formerly mention'd, who had been an old Officer and of good Experience in the Netherlands, and was now made Serjeant-Major-General of the Army, by the abſolute Power of the two Houſes, and without the chearful Concurrence of the Earl of Eſſex; tho' Sir John Merrick, who had executed that Office by his Lordſhip's Choice from the Beginning, was preferr'd to be General of the Ordnance. The Approaches advanc'd with all reaſonable Expedition, and there were frequent Sallies from the Town with good Succeſs; in which many of the Beſiegers were kill'd, and more wounded, who were nightly ſent in Carts to London, and diſpos'd with great Secrecy to the Hoſpitals, that the Citizens might not take Notice of their Numbers. Within a Week's Time, Sir Arthur Aſton the Governor receiv'd a Hurt that diſabled him from preſent Service, ſo that the chief Command in Courſe devolv'd to Colonel Richard Fielding; which Accident was judg'd very unfortunate to the King, Sir Arthur being a Perſon of the higheſt Reputation, and moſt formidable to the Enemy. The next Night, a Party from Oxford, under the Command of Lieutenant-General Wilmot, without any notable Oppoſition, threw into the Town a Regiment of five Hundred Foot, with a Supply of Powder; and receiv'd Advice of the Governour's Hurt, and That they muſt ſurrender the Town, if they were not reliev'd within a Week.

The Governor diſabled.

The King's Forces were too much diſpers'd to be fit for ſuch an Expedition; Prince Maurice had been ſent with a ſtrong Party of Horſe and Dragoons to attend the active Sir William Waller, who in the midſt of various Rangings took the City of Hereford, and after that joyn'd the Earl of Eſſex. It had been alſo thought neceſſary for the clearing of many Obſtructions in the King's Affairs, not without Deſign of guarding the Queen to Oxford, if her Majeſty were ready for the Journey, at leaſt to ſecure a neceſſary Supply of Powder, That Prince Rupert ſhou'd march towards the North with a Party of twelve Hundred Horſe and Dragoons, and ſix or ſeven Hundred Foot. With which Force he advanc'd towards the City of Litchfield; which if once reduc'd and garriſon'd, wou'd prove moſt convenient for that Northern Communication. In his March thither, he met with unexpected Oppoſition from the Inhabitants of Bromicham, who having a Troop of Horſe belonging to Litchfield Garriſon, and Minds as ill affected as any Town whatſoever, were reſolv'd to give all Obſtructions to the Prince, who only deſir'd the Civility of one Day's Quarters. Accordingly from their little Works they fir'd with all Fury upon the King's Forces, but they were ſoon overpower'd by the Prince, who did not take that Vengeance upon them, as might have been expected from their Obſtinacy, or from their Riches. In this Action the loyal and valiant Earl of Denbigh, a brave Volunteer in the Prince's own Troop, receiv'd ſeveral Wounds, of which he dy'd within two or three Days, to the great Concern of the King and his Friends. From Bromicham the Prince immediately march'd and inveſted the Cloſe of Litchfield, which was now ſtrongly garriſon'd and fortify'd: At which Place, he receiv'd a ſolemn Letter from the King, who with all the Commiſeration and Tenderneſs of a common Parent, urg'd him ' to have a Care of ſhedding innocent Blood, to ſhew Mercy, and endeavour rather to take his Subjects Affections, than their Towns; that all his hoſtile Actions might appear to be neceſſitated, and not at all deſir'd. He adviſ'd him to imitate Him in carrying his Affections and Intentions to his Subjects, as to Friends that might be reconcil'd; ſince it ſhew'd a Prince more near to Heaven, to preſerve than deſtroy. As to the City of Litchfield, he deſir'd that all that wou'd, might have free Quarter, and march out with Bag and Baggage, provided they us'd no Outrages to the ſaid Place; declaring he deſir'd nothing but the Happineſs and peaceable Government of his Kingdom, and not the Effuſion of the Blood of his Subjects; Mercy being the higheſt Attribute of a King.'

During the Siege, Prince Rupert ſent towards the North.

The Earl of Denbigh ſlain.

The King's Letter to Prince Rupert.

The Wall that ſurrounded the Cloſe, which was further ſecur'd by a broad and deep Moat, was ſo thick and ſtrong, that the Beſiegers Batteries wou'd make no Impreſſion; Colonel Rouſwell, the Governour, was very reſolute, and the Garriſon numerous enough for the Ground they were to maintain, as well as the Proviſions ſufficient for a longer Time than the Prince cou'd loſe before it. So that it was judg'd, when his Highneſs had in vain attempted to gain it by Treaty, he wou'd have deſiſted; for in Effect his Strength conſiſted in Horſe, his Foot and Dragoons being unequal for ſuch an Enterprize. But, being a Place of Importance, he reſolv'd not to remove till he had try'd the utmoſt; and therefore he drew what additional Forces he cou'd out of the Country, to ſtrengthen his Foot, and perſuaded many Officers and Volunteers of the Horſe, to alight and bear their Parts in the Duty: ſo that in leſs than ten Days he had drawn the Mote dry, and prepar'd two Bridges for the Graff. The Garriſon within omitted nothing that cou'd be perform'd by brave and vigilant Men, kill'd and wounded many of the Beſiegers, and ruin'd one Mine they had prepar'd. At length, the Prince having got all Things in Readineſs for an Aſſault, he ſprung another Mine that made a Breach of twenty Foot in the Wall, in a Place leaſt ſuſpected by thoſe within: Yet they defended it with all poſſible Vigour and Reſolution, and beſides many kill'd, they wounded the Lord Digby, Colonel Gerrard, Colonel Wagſtaff, and Major Leg, and took the two laſt Priſoners; and when they had enter'd the Breach they continu'd the Diſpute ſo furiouſly within, that after they had kill'd Colonel Uſher, and other good Officers, and taken more Priſoners, they compell'd the Prince to conſent to very honourable Conditions. And ſo the Garriſon march'd out with all Reſpect, and the Prince's Acknowledgment of their couragious Defence; his Highneſs being pleas'd with the Conqueſt, tho' the Purchaſe had mightily ſhaken his Troops, and depriv'd him of many valuable Officers and Soldiers. He had ſcarcely finiſh'd his Work, when he receiv'd poſitive Orders from the King, To make all poſſible Haſte, and with all the Strength he cou'd make, to come to the Relief of Reading. Upon which, having appointed Colonel Bagot to be Governour, and order'd his Forces to follow him with all Speed, his Highneſs with a few Servants came to Oxford to attend the King, who was juſt before advanc'd towards Reading.

Prince Rupert takes Litchfield, and returns to the King.

The Importunity of that Garriſon had caus'd his Majeſty to draw what Force he cou'd, not ſo much to remove the Beſiegers, as to preſerve his Men in the Town, which was the utmoſt of his Expectations. When the King drew near the Town, the Day being paſs'd on which Relief was expected, he was engag'd by a Party of the Enemy, and after a ſharp Conflict, his Party, conſiſting of near a Thouſand Muſqueteers, were forc'd to retire to their Body; which they did the ſooner, becauſe thoſe in the Town made no Show of joining with them, on which they principally rely'd. The Reaſon was, the Garriſon had juſt before ſent for a Parly to the Enemy, a Truce agreed on, and Hoſtages exchang'd. Upon a View of the Enemies Strength, all agreed that the King's Forces were neither ſufficient to raiſe the Siege, nor to joyn with thoſe in the Town; in which melancholy Concluſion his Majeſty retir'd for the preſent, reſolving upon any other reaſonable Attempt the next Day. In the mean Time Colonel Fielding the Governor, with ſome others, found Means to eſcape out of the Town by Night, and told the King ' That they were in Treaty, and believ'd he might have good Conditions, and Liberty to march away with all their Arms and Baggage;' which was ſo welcome News to the King, that he order'd him in the Preſence of the Prince, ' To accept of ſuch Conditions, if he cou'd pro‘ cure them:’ For indeed the Men and the Arms were all his Majeſty deſir'd, the Loſs of either of which might prove fatal to him. So after twelve Days Siege, on the 27th of April, the Town was ſurrender'd upon honourable Terms, conſiſting of ſix Articles, in Subſtance, ‘ All the ‘ Forces were to march out in Warlike Manner, with ‘ fifty Carts for Carriage, to have free Paſſage to Oxford, ‘ the Town to be ſav'd from Plunder, and whoſoever ‘ wou'd, might have Liberty to leave it within ſix Weeks ‘ after, only ſuch Perſons excepted, as had run away from ‘ the Army under the Command of the Earl of Eſſex.’ But as the Garriſon march'd out through the Enemies Guards, the Soldiers were not only very much abus'd, but many of them diſarm'd, and moſt of the Waggons plunder'd, in the Preſence of the Earl of Eſſex and his chief Officers; who ſeem'd offended at it, and unable to curb the Unrulineſs of the common Soldiers. As this Breach of Articles was notorious and inexcuſable, ſo it laid a Foundation and Excuſe for barbarous Injuſtice of the ſame Kind throughout the greateſt Part of the War; ſo that the King's Soldiers afterwards, when it was their Turns to obſerve Agreements, mutinouſly remember'd the Violation at Reading; which meeting with Retaliations, ſtill added to the common Miſeries of the War.

Reading ſurrender'd upon Articles.

The King was highly pleas'd that he recover'd near four thouſand good Men, who were in great Danger of being loſt; but in a little Time he was diſturb'd by the Whiſpers and Complaints of ſeveral about him, againſt the Behaviour of Colonel Fielding, and his Surrender of the Town. And indeed his Majeſty was deeply concern'd at the Clauſe of Exception of ſuch Perſons as had run away from the Earl of Eſſex's Army, which he ſaid and found to be no leſs than giving up thoſe poor Men, who out of Conſcience had claim'd his Protection, to be murder'd by the Rebels they had deſerted. Wherefore he publiſh'd a Proclamation, ‘ In which he diſclaim'd that Exception, as made without ‘ his Conſent or Knowledge, declaring he wou'd run any ‘ Hazard or Danger, rather than withdraw his Protection ‘ to any, who ſhou'd betake themſelves to his Service.’ So that Colonel Fielding in a ſhort Time was brought to his Tryal before a Council of War; where after many Allegations and Anſwers, without any Proof of Treachery againſt him, he was condemn'd upon an Article of not obeying Orders, and ſentenc'd to loſe his Head; which Judgment, after long Interceſſion, was mercifully remitted by the King, but his Regiment diſpos'd to another, without ever being reſtor'd to that Command. This Accident prov'd very unfortunate to the King; for from this, the troubleſome Factions, in Court, Army and City began to take their Date and Original: Great Animoſities grew between the Officers of the Army; ſome being thought too violent in the Proſecution of the Colonel, and too much to countenance the Clamours of the common Soldiers againſt him; and others were as much condemn'd for a palpable avow'd Protection of him againſt all Powers: And his Cauſe being doubtful and intricate, moſt Perſons were ready to believe according to their Inclinations to his Perſon; ſo that his Tryal, his Condemnation, and his Pardon, were all Matters of Offence to many People. What added to the preſent Troubles was the low Condition of the King, who believ'd his Caſe to be ſo bad, that upon the News of the Earl of Eſſex's Advance towards Oxford, a few Days after the Loſs of Reading, by the Advice of his chief Officers, he once reſolv'd to march towards the North, and joyn with the Earl of Newcaſtle. And if the Earl of Eſſex had at that Time but made any Shew of moving with his whole Body that Way, it is verily believ'd, that Oxford itſelf, and all the neighbouring Garriſons had been quitted by them. Mr. Hampden, and all who deſir'd to ſtrike at the Root, were for the Siege of Oxford, then but meanly fortify'd; but it ſeems the Earl of Eſſex had other Proſpects; and a judicious Writer tells us, that after the Battel of Edge-Hill, it was not his Deſire that either Side ſhou'd be intire Conquerors; but that the Scales ſhou'd be kept even, that both Parties might be more willing to come to an Accommodation.

Colonel Fielding condemn'd, but pardon'd.

The King's low Condition.

It is gradually better'd.

2. Within a few Days Time the King's Affairs prov'd to be in a better State, and the Condition of the Parliament worſe than it was believ'd at the gaining of Reading, which was celebrated at London with great Feſtivity. For beſides the gradual Encreaſe, and frequent Succeſſes of the King's Party, the Earl of Eſſex's Army began ſenſibly to decline, by means of their late hard Service, wet and cold Seaſon, and their growing Diſtempers; and the repeated Importunities of that General for Supplies of all Kinds, together with his daily Complaints to his Maſters, occaſion'd new Diviſions and Animoſities, both in the Houſes and the City. The diſreſpectful and abrupt breaking off the Treaty at Oxford, began to be cenſur'd mith more Freedom; the Commiſſioners thought themſelves diſoblig'd, and complain'd of Jealouſies which had been entertain'd of their Integrity; and the Earl of Northumberland, being provok'd at Harry Martin's Inſolence formerly mention'd, cudgell'd him in the Painted-Chamber, at the End of a Conference between both Houſes; which occaſion'd many Swords to be drawn, to the great Scandal of that high Aſſembly. And after all thoſe Mountains of Promiſes, and Undertakings, the Parliament's Wants became greater, and the City was importun'd for more Mony; and inſtead of diſperſing the King's Army, and bringing him back to his Parliament, a new Direction was given to improve the Lines about London and Weſtminſter, leſt the King's Forces ſhou'd break in upon them; which made their Condition ſeem worſe than it really was. Yet ſo far were they from any Thoughts of Peace, that the Commons rag'd more furiouſly than ever; and daily engag'd themſelves in Concluſions more exorbitant, than they had yet attempted: And for a full Supply, they propos'd ſetling and impoſing an Exciſe, upon ſuch Commodities as might beſt bear it; which was a Burthen with which the People of England had reproach'd other Nations, as a Mark of Slavery, and never felt by themſelves: Then for the Exerciſe of the Sovereign Power, they reſolv'd to make a new Great Seal, to be always reſident with the Houſes; but the Lords at preſent refus'd to comply with that bold Step.

An Exciſe laid by the Parliament.

In the mean Time the King's Party ſhew'd themſelves ſucceſsful in ſeveral Places; particularly the brave young Earl of Northampton began to ſacrifice to the Memory of his Father, and valiantly encounter'd a Party of Horſe and Foot from Northampton, who thought themſelves ſtrong enough to attempt Banbury; and having routed their Horſe, kill'd above two hundred of their Foot, and took as many more Priſoners: This hapned on the ſixth Day of May. This was ſhortly after ſucceeded by a more important Action in another Part of the Kingdom, againſt the Earl of Stamford, who march'd into Cornwall with a Body of fourteen hundred Horſe and Dragoons, and five thouſand four hundred Foot, with a Train equal and Ammunition proportionable. However the King's Party in Cornwall, tho' not half ſo ſtrong in Number, reſolv'd to oppoſe them, and march'd againſt them under the Conduct of the valiant Sir Ralph Hopton, who had been ſo ſucceſsful at Bradock-Down near Leskard. And hearing that the greateſt Part of their Horſe were ſent another Way under the Command of Sir George Chudleigh, and the reſt ſtrongly encamp'd upon the Top of a high Hill, they reſolv'd to attack them, tho' they had every Way the Diſadvantage, as to Numbers, Ammunition and Situation. Being incourag'd by ſeveral brave Commanders, they attempted their Aſcent up the ſteep Hill four ſeveral Ways, and continu'd the Fight from five in the Morning till three in the Afternoon, with invincible Bravery, having been often driven back, and as often return'd. Major-General Chudleigh, who order'd the Battel under the Earl of Stamford, valiantly charg'd againſt a Stand of Pikes commanded by Sir Bevil Greenvil, to the diſordering his Party, and the overthrowing his Perſon; but Sir John Berkley came in ſeaſonably, and reſtor'd the Fortune of the Day, by taking the Major-General Priſoner. Towards the End of the Day, the ſeveral Parties, after infinite Fatigue, met on the Top of the Hill with mighty Shouts of Joy, and Praiſes to the Almighty; having routed the Enemy on all Sides. This Victory, which in Subſtance as well as Circumſtance was very ſignal, was purchas'd with the Loſs of only fourſcore Men, and the Wounding of more; but of the Enemy, they kill'd three hundred upon the Spot, took ſeventeen hundred Priſoners, with their Major-General, and above thirty Officers, all their Baggage, Cannon and Ammunition, being thirteen Pieces of Braſs Ordnance and a Mortar Piece, ſeventy Barrels of Powder, with a great Magazine of Biſket, and other excellent Proviſions. This Battel was fought on the ſixteenth Day of May, near Stratton in Cornwall by the Borders of Devonſhire, by which all that Point of the Weſt was ſoon reduc'd to the King's entire Obedience, except Plymouth; for which important Service, the King not long after honour'd the General, Sir Ralph Hopton, with the Title of Baron Hopton of Stratton, from the Place where he gain'd this noble Victory.

The Fight at Stratton. Sir Ralph Hopton Victor.

The Earl of Stamford fled to Exeter, and charg'd all the Misfortune upon the Treachery of Major-General Chudleigh, who certainly had done his utmoſt before he was taken Priſoner. He was a Man of excellent Parts and Courage, and of a generous and noble Diſpoſition; who now reflecting upon the Ingratitude as well as Unreaſonableneſs of that Party for whom he had often ventur'd his Life, and the Humanity and indeed Piety of thoſe Commanders who now had him in Poſſeſſion, he declar'd he was convinc'd in his Conſcience and Judgment, and ſo return'd intirely to the King. His Father alſo, Sir George Chudleigh, after he had with Difficulty and Loſs of many of his Horſe got into Plymouth, laid down his Commiſſion, ſion, and joyn'd with the King's Forces; but to ſatisfy his Friends with the Reaſons of this Change, he publiſh'd a ſhort Declaration to this Effect, and worthy of ſome Notice. 'That Petitions of Right are commendable, and 'Remonſtrances may be lawful, but Arms, tho' defenſive, 'are very doubtful. My Lot fell to be caſt on the Parliament's Side, by a ſtrong Opinion of the Goodneſs of their 'Cauſe, which to my Judgment then appear'd to be ſo: 'Religion and the Subjects Liberty ſeem'd to me to be in 'Danger, but the Deſtruction of Kingdoms cannot be the 'Way to ſave it, nor can the Loſs of Chriſtian Subjects, 'nor the Subjects Loſs of their Eſtates by Plunder or Aſ'ſeſsment, concur with Piety, nor yet with Property. 'As for Religion, which is the chief, his Majeſty has given 'us unqueſtionable Security. I have caſt my ſelf at my 'Sovereign's Feet, and implor'd his gracious Pardon, and 'I will contend no more in Word or Deed. And this 'my Reſolution, with the undiſputable Grounds thereof, 'I thought good to declare to my Friends and Country'Men, that they may underſtand my Change to proceed 'from no Compulſion, but the Neceſſity of ceaſing this 'deſtructive War, unleſs we wou'd become the wilful 'Authors of the Calamities we wou'd decline.

The King's Meſſage to the two Houſes of Parliament.

3. When the News of this Victory was freſh, and the King had receiv'd a ſtrong Party of Horſe, and a large Supply of Ammunition, from the Earl of Newcaſtle, his Majeſty reſolv'd once more to try the Inclinations of the two Houſes, and on the twentieth of May ſent this Meſſage to them by an expreſs Servant of his own. 'Since his Ma'jeſty's Meſſage of the twelfth of April, above a Month a'go, had procur'd no Anſwer from both Houſes, his Ma'jeſty might well believe himſelf abſolv'd, before God and 'Man, from the leaſt poſſible Neglect in uſing his utmoſt 'Endeavours for Peace: Yet when he conſiders, that the 'Scene of all this Calamity is within the Bowels of his 'Kingdom; that all the Blood which is ſpilt, is of his own 'Subjects; and that what Victory ſoever God ſhall pleaſe 'to give him, muſt be over thoſe who ought not to lift up 'their Hands againſt him: When he conſiders, that theſe 'deſperate Diſſentions may encourage a Foreign Enemy to 'make a Prey of the whole Nation; that Ireland is in pre'ſent Danger to be totally loſt; that the heavy Judgments 'of God, Plague, Peſtilence and Famine, will be the ine'vitable Attendants of this unnatural Contention; and that 'there will ſoon be ſo general a Habit of Uncharitableneſs 'and Cruelty, contracted through the Kingdom, that even 'Peace it ſelf will not reſtore his People to their old Tem'per and Security; his Majeſty cannot but again call for 'an Anſwer to that his gracious Meſſage, which gives ſo 'fair a Riſe to end theſe unnatural Diſtractions.' Then he informs them of the Strength of his Army, and the Plenty of his Ammunition, and lets them know, 'That No'thing but the Tenderneſs and Love to his People, &c. 'cou'd move him once more to hazard a Refuſal. And 'he requires them, as they will anſwer to God, Himſelf 'and the World, that they will no longer ſuffer their Fel'low-Subjects to welter in each other's Blood; that they 'wou'd remember by whoſe Authority, and to what End 'they met in that Council, and ſend ſuch an Anſwer to him 'as may open a Door to a firm Peace and Security to the 'whole Kingdom. If his Majeſty be again diſappointed, 'the Blood, Rapine and Deſtruction, which may follow in 'England and Ireland, will be caſt upon the Account of 'thoſe, who are deaf to the Motives of Peace and Accom'modation.

The Fury of the Houſe of Commons.

This Meſſage made a great Impreſſion, and was receiv'd by the Houſe of Lords with all the Marks of Reſpect and Duty, and the Meſſenger very civilly treated by them; but when they communicated it to the Commons, and deſir'd their Concurrence in preparing an Addreſs anſwerable to this gracious Invitation, that Houſe was ſo far from complying, that they gave immediate Order for the Apprehenſion and Commitment of the Gentleman who brought the Meſſage; and declar'd, 'That they wou'd proceed againſt 'him at a Council of War,' upon the Order they had made when the Treaty was at Oxford, 'That any Perſon coming 'from Oxford without a Paſs from their General, or one 'of the Houſes, ſhou'd be puniſh'd as a Spy:' To which Order, as the Peers had never conſented, ſo the King never had Notice of it, till this Commitment; they Themſelves having, after the making of it, ſent ſeveral Meſſengers to the King, without any ſuch Formality. This was extreamly ſhocking to the Lords, who us'd all Diligence, publickly and privately, to divert this Courſe, but without Effect. The Commons were diſturb'd at the Kindneſs of the Meſſage, and finding that the very Imagination of a Peace vaſtly retarded their carrying on the War, they reſolv'd to proceed with that Vigour and Reſolution, that no reaſonable Man ſhou'd believe it poſſible for the King to gain a Peace, but by a total ſubduing of them. To this Purpoſe, inſtead of returning any Anſwer to the King's Meſſage, within three Days after the receiving it, they made a new bold Step, and impeach'd the Queen of High-Treaſon, 'For aſſiſting the King her Husband with Arms and 'Ammunition, in the Proſecution of the War againſt 'Them;' and Mr. Pym himſelf carry'd up the Impeachment to the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, where he promis'd to bring particular Articles in due Time. This unprecedented Action was extreamly ſurpriſing to the World, but was reſented with leſs Indignation from the Queen, than might have been expected from her Temper; as appears from a Letter ſhe wrote ſoon after to the Marqueſs, now made Duke of Hamilton, in which ſhe has theſe Words, God forgive them for their Rebellion, as I aſſure you I forgive them from my Heart, for what they do againſt Me.

They Impeach the Queen of High-Treaſon.

At this Time their Clergy ſounded their Trumpets louder to War than ever, if it was poſſible; and they reſolv'd, That the Aſſembly of Divines, to which at the Treaty they had urg'd the King's Conſent, ſhou'd now meet by an Ordinance of their own, with an Addition of ſome Members of either Houſe. And there having been formerly a Deſign of Prince Rupert upon the City of Briſtol, by Correſpondence with ſome of the chief Inhabitants, but ſo unskilfully or unhappily carried on, that when the Prince was near the Town with a reaſonable Force, it was diſcover'd; and many principal Citizens apprehended by Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, then Governour of that City for the Parliament; at this Time they ſent ſpecial Directions and Orders thither, 'That he ſhou'd with all Severity and Expedition 'proceed againſt thoſe Conſpirators:' And thereupon, by a Sentence and Judgement of a Council of War, Alderman Yeomans, who had been High-Sheriff of the City, and of great Reputation in it, and George Bourchier another Citizen of principal Account, were both hang'd, notwithſtanding all the Interpoſition of the King and his Friends to the contrary; and all other imaginable Acts were done, to let the World ſee that there was no Way to Peace, but by the Ruins of the Sword.

Mr. Waller's Plot.

4. Notwithſtanding all theſe vigorous Proceedings, the Leaders and Promoters of the War met with many Difficulties and Impediments from Men of more Moderation and leſs Intereſt in the Proſecution of it; and the natural Bent of the People, which was daily diverted and ſupported by Art, tended much to their Diſcouragement. But in this Exigency, there hapned a moſt relieving Accident, the Diſcovery of a Plot, which gave them many Advantages, as to Union, Reputation and Authority. This intricate Conſpiracy is beſt known by the Name of Mr. Waller's Plot; a Gentleman of the Houſe of Commons, of near four Thouſand a Year, formerly mention'd, and of admirable Parts and Faculties of Poetry and Eloquence. He always kept his Meaſures with the Court, and ſo behav'd himſelf, that the Royaliſts believ'd him in their Intereſts, and went ſo far as to diſapprove the hot Counſels of thoſe, who for private Ends oppos'd the publick Tranquillity. When the War broke out, tho' for a while he abſented himſelf, he did not forſake the Houſe, but follow'd the Opinion of the Earl of Dorſet, and the Neuters; and yet he was ſo generous as to ſend the King a Thouſand Broad-Pieces, when he was in his loweſt Condition at Nottingham, as appears from a Manuſcript quoted in his Life. His generous Freedom in ſome of his Speeches, which was greater than others durſt imitate, won him a great Reputation with all who wiſh'd well to the King; and ſuch Lords and Commons as really deſir'd to prevent the Ruin of the Kingdom enter'd into great Familiarity with him, as a Man reſolute to their Deſigns, and beſt able to promote them; and all Men ſpoke their Minds freely to him, and thought themſelves ſecure in his great Fortune, and his natural Warineſs.

His Character.

His Deſign with Mr. Tomkins and others.

Mr. Waller had a Siſter marry'd to one Mr. Tomkins, Clerk of the Queen's Council, a Gentleman of a very good Character, and great Intereſt and Reputation in the City, among thoſe who were for the old Conſtitution, and diſaffected to the Parliament; from whence he learnt the Diſpoſition of the Citizens upon all Accidents, which he freely communicated to his Brother Waller, as the latter imparted to him what Obſervations he had made from thoſe of his Acquaintance. Mr. Waller inform'd him how many Lords and Commons were for a Peace; Mr. Tomkins made the ſame Relation with reſpect to the moſt ſubſtantial Men of London; which Mr. Waller reported to the well-affected Members of both Houſes, and Mr. Tomkins to the Citizens of the ſame Inclinations. From whence they came to a Concluſion, 'That if they heartily united 'in the mutual Aſſiſtance of each other, they ſhou'd be able 'to reſtrain the Power of thoſe Tumults, which gave 'Countenance to the Diſtractions, and the Houſe wou'd 'be induc'd to Terms of Moderation.' At the ſame Time the Lord Conway coming from Ireland, incens'd againſt the Scots abroad, and diſcontented with the Parliament at home, finding Mr. Waller eſteem'd by the Earl of Northumberland, and intimate with the Earl of Portland, enter'd into the ſame Society; and being more of a Soldier, in the Diſcourſes they held, inſinuated, ‘ That it was convenient to enquire into the Numbers of the well-affected in the City, that they might better foreſee whom they might truſt:’ Which being told by Mr. Waller to Mr. Tomkins, the latter imparted it to his Confidents there, and it was particularly agreed, ‘ That ſome truſty Perſon in every Pariſh and Ward about London ſhou'd make a Liſt of all the Inhabitants, and by gueſſing of their ſeveral Affections, compute the Strength of the Party which oppos'd an Accommodation, and of that which was really for it.’ The Lord Clarendon declares, he is perſuaded the main Deſign of this Project was, to form a Sort of an Aſſociation, to oppoſe the levying Taxes to carry on the War, and to petition for a Peace; but as to the letting the King's Army into London, raiſing an Army there, ſurpriſing the Parliament, or uſing any Violence in or againſt the City, all Subjects of the Parliament's Exclamations, he cou'd ſee no real Cauſe to believe it.

Another Diſcovery joyn'd with it.

But there unfortunately hapned another Accident and Diſcovery, which tho' intirely diſtinct from this, was moſt artfully blended with it, to the great Advantage of the leading Party, who had Skill ſufficient to make it paſs for the ſame Conſpiracy. This was occaſion'd by Sir Nicolas Criſp, a rich Citizen of a great Trade, and a very active Man, who had been ſeverely proſecuted by the Commons, and driven from London, for appearing too zealous in a City Petition for Peace. This Gentleman having induſtriouſly preſerv'd his Correſpondence in the City, after many Arguments, prevail'd upon the King at Oxford to grant a Commiſſion under the Great Seal to Him, and ſome other Perſons, in the Nature of a Commiſſion of Array; not doubting but in due Time to ſee the good Effects of it. The King was unwillingly perſuaded to grant this Commiſſion, and with that Secrecy, that it was not known to any Counſellor, or Miniſter of State about him at that Time. After it was Seal'd at Sir Nicolas's Requeſt, it was carefully deliver'd to the Lady Aubigney, who had leave from the Parliament to finiſh ſome Buſineſs at Oxford, and by her as carefully carry'd to London, and there deliver'd to a Perſon who was appointed to call for it, without ſo much as her Ladyſhip's knowing what it was. It does not appear by what means this Commiſſion was diſcover'd; only it was diſcover'd about the ſame time with Mr. Waller's Plot, and the Lady Aubigney, and ſome whoſe Names were in it, tho' without their Privity, taken into Cuſtody.

The Diſcovery of Mr. Waller's Plot is variouſly related: The foremention'd Manuſcript ſays, That after he had conferr'd with ſome Loyal Citizens and others, about recovering the City into the King's Intereſt, he was betray'd by his Siſter Price, and her Presbyterian Chaplain Mr. Good, who ſtole ſome of his Papers; and if he had not ſtrangely dream'd, the Night before he was ſeiz'd, that his Siſter betray'd him, and thereupon burnt the reſt of his Papers by a Fire left in his Chimney, he had certainly loſt his Life for it. But the Lord Clarendon tells us, That a Servant of Mr. Tomkins, who had curſorily overheard the Diſcourſes of Mr. Waller and his Maſter, plac'd himſelf behind the Hangings, and heard them ſay enough to put him upon Informing, in hopes of a Reward; and ſo went to Mr. Pym, and acquainted him with all he had heard, or probably imagin'd. However it was diſcover'd, the Circumſtances of the Publiſhing it were ſuch, as fill'd all Mens Minds with Apprehenſions. It was on Wedneſday the thirty firſt of May, their Solemn Faſt Day, when being all at their Sermon in St. Margaret's Church in Weſtminſter, a Letter was brought to Mr. Pym, who with ſome of the moſt active Members roſe from their Seats, and after a little whiſpering together went out of the Church, which ſtrangely affected thoſe that ſtay'd behind. Orders were immediately ſent to ſearch all their Priſoners, who were Malignants; and as ſoon as the Houſes cou'd meet, they were told, ‘ That Letters were intercepted going to the Court at Oxford, expreſſing ſome notable Conſpiracy in hand, to deliver up the Parliament and the City into the Hands of the Cavaliers, and the Time for the Execution drew near.’ Upon which a ſelect Committee was appointed to examine all Perſons they thought fit, and to apprehend ſome nominated at that time; accordingly Mr. Waller and Mr. Tomkins were ſecur'd the ſame Night, and others the next Day. Mr. Waller, who had led a Life of Gallantry, was now ſo confounded with Fear, that he confeſs'd whatever he had ſaid, heard, thought, or ſeen; all that he knew of himſelf, and all that he ſuſpected of others, without concealing any Perſon of what Degree or Quality ſoever, or any Diſcourſe he had occaſionally held with them. And particularly he accus'd the Earl of Portland and the Lord Conway of being concern'd in the Agitations in the City, and the Earl of Northumberland of being a Well-Wiſher to their Deſigns.

Mr. Waller's Deſign diſcover'd.

The Committee being thus furniſh'd, they took the Examinations of Mr. Tomkins, and ſuch others as they thought convenient, and having gotten the foremention'd Commiſſion into their Hands, they ſubtlely joyn'd Sir Nicolas Criſp's and Mr. Waller's Projects together, and curiouſly moulded them into one Plot and Conſpiracy, aggravated with all the Art and Eloquence of the ruling Mr. Pym: And acquainting the Houſes with ſo much as they thought yet ſeaſonable to publiſh, without naming any Perſons but thoſe in Cuſtody, and without communicating any of the Examinations, they declar'd, ‘ That the Original of this Conſpiracy was from the late London Petition for a Peace;’ and after ſome general Reflections, and likewiſe ſome particular Accuſations of thoſe they had impriſon'd, they declar'd, ‘ That the Particulars of the Deſign appear'd to be, 1. To ſeize into their Cuſtody the King's Children: 2. To ſeize ſeveral Members of both Houſes, the Lord Mayor, and Committee of the Militia, under Pretence of bringing them to a Legal Tryal: 3. To ſeize upon the Outworks, Forts, Tower of London, Magazines, Gates and other Places of Importance in the City: 4. To let in the King's Forces to ſurpriſe the City, and to deſtroy all thoſe who ſhou'd oppoſe them by Authority of the Parliament: 5. By Force of Arms to reſiſt all Payments impos'd by Authority of Parliament, rais'd for the Support of the Armies employ'd for their juſt Defence, &c. To ſuſpend, if not alter the whole Government of the City, and with the Aſſiſtance of the King's Forces, to Awe and Maſter the Parliament. All which was order'd to be read in all the Churches and Chappels in London and Weſtminſter.

The Parliament's Declaration upon both.

5. Plots are the dark Parts of Hiſtory, Plants of quick Growth, with ſmall Roots and large Branches; almoſt inviſible in their Cauſes, but viſible enough in their Effects: Of which the firſt as to this, was a Solemn Day of Thankſgiving to God for this wonderful Deliverance, and next a new Kind of Ingagement and Security, form'd by the two Houſes, intitled, A Sacred Vow and Covenant, &c. The Preamble of which intimates, ‘ That ſince there has been a Popiſh Deſign to ſubvert the Proteſtant Religion, and a Popiſh Army to ſupport that Deſign, and ſince there had been a treacherous and horrid Plot lately diſcover'd, it was thought fit, that all Perſons true-hearted and Lovers of their Country, ſhou'd bind themſelves in the following Sacred Vow and Covenant: I A. B. in Humility and Reverence of the Divine Majeſty, declare my hearty Sorrow for my own Sins, and the Sins of this Nation, which have deſerv'd the Calamities and Judgments that now lye upon it: And my Intention is, by God's Grace, to endeavour the Amendment of my own Ways; and I do further in the Preſence of Almighty God Declare, Vow, and Covenant, That in order to the Security and Preſervation of the true Reformed Proteſtant Religion, and Liberty of the Subject, I will not conſent to the laying down of Arms, ſo long as the Papiſts, now in open War againſt the Parliament, ſhall by Force of Arms be protected againſt the Juſtice thereof. And that I do abhor and deteſt the wicked and treacherous Deſign lately diſcover'd; and that I never gave, nor will give my Aſſent to the Execution thereof, and will according to my Power and Vocation oppoſe and reſiſt the ſame, and all other of the like Nature. And in caſe any other like Deſign ſhall hereafter come to my Knowledge, I will make ſuch timely Diſcovery as I ſhall conceive may beſt conduce to the preventing thereof. And whereas I do in my Conſcience believe, That the Forces rais'd by the two Houſes of Parliament, are rais'd and continu'd for their juſt Defence, and for the Defence of the true Proteſtant Religion, and Liberty of the Subject; that I will according to my Power and Vocation, aſſiſt the Forces rais'd and continu'd by both Houſes of Parliament, againſt the Forces rais'd by the King, againſt their Conſent: And I will likewiſe aſſiſt all other Perſons that ſhall take this Oath, in what they ſhall do in purſuance thereof; and will not directly, or indirectly adhere unto, nor ſhall willingly aſſiſt the Forces rais'd by the King, without the Conſent of both Houſes of Parliament.------This was finiſh'd upon the ſixth Day of June: And tho' many were ſtartled at the Preamble, as void of Truth, and at the promiſing Part as a moſt fatal Denunciation of War, and Proteſtation againſt Peace; yet Fear, and other Motives ſo operated, that there was not a Member of either Houſe, but what took it. And being thus intangled themſelves, they ſent their Committee into the City, to engage them in the ſame Vow and Covenant, which was readily receiv'd; and by the Induſtry of their Preachers taken ſooner than was expected throughout that People. From whence it was tranſmitted to the Army, and after that became a Mark of Diſtinction; ſo that whoſoever refus'd it, was look'd upon and treated as a high Malignant.

They make a Sacred Vow and Covenant.

Which is taken throughout the City and Army.

Being thus ſecured againſt future Clamours for Peace, they proceeded to try their Priſoners by a Council of War, particularly Mr. Tomkins, Mr. Chaloner, a Citizen of good Wealth and Credit, Mr. Alexander Hampden, who brought the the laſt Meſſage from the King; one Haſſel, another of the King's Meſſengers who had often paſs'd between London and Oxford upon publick Occaſions, and ſome Citizens, whoſe Names were in the Commiſſion ſent from Oxford. By this Council Mr. Tomkins and Mr. Chaloner were condemn'd to be hang'd; and both were executed with all Circumſtances of Severity and Cruelty; the Former on a Gibbet by his own Houſe in Holborn, where he had long liv'd with ſingular Eſtimation; and the Latter by his Houſe in Cornhill near the Exchange. In their dying Speeches they clear'd themſelves from ſome Miſtakes and Aſperſions, but repented of being engag'd ſo far in a fooliſh Buſineſs, as Mr. Tomkins there call'd it. Haſſel, the Meſſenger, dy'd in Priſon the Night before his Tryal; and there being no Evidence againſt Mr. Hampden, but what came from Mr. Waller, they gave no Judgment againſt him, but kept him long in Priſon, till he dy'd; nor did they proceed capitally againſt thoſe Citizens whoſe Names were in the Commiſſion, ſince it did not appear they were us'd with their Conſent and Privity: But the Brand of being Malignants was ſufficient to hurry on their Ruin; for all their Eſtates were ſeiz'd, as well as theirs who were executed.

Mr. Waller's Behaviour.

The Earl of Portland and the Lord Conway were impriſon'd on Mr. Waller's Accuſation, and often confronted with him before the Committee, and they as poſitively denying, as he charging them, and there being no other Witneſs againſt them, the Proſecution was rather dropp'd than relinquiſh'd, till after a long Confinement they procur'd Bail. The Earl of Northumberland, tho' charg'd by him to be a Well-Wiſher to the Conſpiracy, and therefore ſecretly hated by the Incendiaries, yet on the Account of his great Reputation and Intereſt, was proceeded againſt very tenderly. Mr. Waller himſelf was confeſſedly the moſt guilty, and by his unhappy Demeanour had rais'd many Enemies; therefore with incredible Artifice he acted ſuch a Remorſe of Conſcience, that he procur'd his Tryal to be deferr'd out of Compaſſion, till he might recover his Underſtanding, or rather till the Heat of his Proſecutors was abated: And then by drawing in Viſitants of the moſt powerful Miniſters of all Factions; and having by his Liberality and Penitence, his receiving their vile Sayings with Humility and Reverence, as clearer Convictions than ever he had before, and diſtributing great Sums for their Prayers and Ghoſtly Advice, ſo ſatisfy'd them, that they ſatisfy'd others, he appeal'd from the Council of War, and was allow'd to appear at the Bar of the Houſe of Commons.

He eſcapes with a Fine and Baniſhment.

Here he diſplay'd the utmoſt of his Art and Eloquence, and both his Language and Behaviour being highly captivating, he let looſe ſuch a Stream of Compliments and Flattery, as was exactly calculated to that Aſſembly, with ſuch Submiſſion as gratify'd their Pride, and ſuch Dejection of Spirit, as was like to impoſe upon the Belief of the Majority: He laid before them 'Their own Danger and Concernment, if they ſhou'd ſuffer one of their own Body, how unworthy and monſtrous ſoever, to be try'd by the Soldiers, who might thereby grow to that Power hereafter, That they wou'd try both Thoſe, they wou'd not be willing ſhou'd be try'd, and for Things, which they wou'd account no Crimes; the Inconvenience, and inſupportable Miſchief of which, all wiſe Common-Wealths had foreſeen, by exempting their own Members from all Judgments but their own.' By theſe and the like Arguments he prevail'd not to be try'd by a Council of War, but was taken out of the Cuſtody of their Officers, and ſent to the Tower; where he had Time to get his Friends to him, and to oblige ſome leading Members, particularly Mr. Pym; inſomuch that when his Cauſe came to be adjudg'd, his Life was ſpared; but he was forc'd to pay ten Thouſand Pounds, and ſubmit to Sequeſtration and Baniſhment. The noble Hiſtorian ſays, he as much ow'd the keeping his Head to that Oration, as Catiline did the Loſs of his to thoſe of Tully: And there cou'd not be a greater Evidence of the ineſtimable Value of his Parts, than that after this he liv'd in the good Affection and Eſteem of many, the Pity of moſt, and the Reproach of few or none at all. This was the Concluſion of Mr. Waller's Plot, which beſides the new Covenant, produc'd a wonderful Animoſity againſt the King, a Prejudice to all Promoters of an Accommodation, and a Brand upon all Overtures of Peace, as ſo many Stratagems and Contrivances againſt the City.

The Earl of Eſſex marches to Thame.

VIII. I. During theſe violent Proceedings in London and Weſtminſter, the War like an ungovern'd Torrent overſpread the Nation, and rag'd in all Parts with the uſual Circumſtances of Severity, and threatning Marks of Deſolation. The Earl of Eſſex, after his taking of Reading, by means of great Sickneſs, ill Pay and Deſertion, had been detain'd ſix Weeks from any Action; and having brought his Army into as good a Condition as he cou'd, he march'd from thence to Thame, within ten Miles of Oxford, on the Borders of Buckinghamſhire. Here one Colonel Hurry, a valiant Scotchman, under ſome Pretence of Diſobligation, deſerted him, and was graciouſly receiv'd by the King at Oxford; and as a Proof of his Fidelity to the King, he gave Prince Rupert an Account of the Lodgment of the Parliament Horſe, and how looſe they were in their Quarters; and to give a further Teſtimony of it, he deſir'd to march a Voluntier with a good Party, to make an Attempt upon the Enemy. The Prince aſſigning him a ſtrong Party for the Service, he conducted him out of the common Road, till they got to a Town where a whole Regiment of Horſe was quarter'd, which they beat up, and kill'd or took moſt of the Officers and Soldiers, and then fell upon thoſe Quarters by which they had paſs'd, with the like Succeſs; and ſo return'd to Oxford with many Priſoners, and notable Damage to the Enemy.

Prince Rupert's Attempt upon his Quarters, with Succeſs.

Upon this Succeſs, he made another Propoſition to the Prince for attacking the Quarters near Thame; and aſſur'd him, That if he undertook it, before there ſhou'd be any Alteration in Quarters, the Enterprize wou'd be worthy of it. The Prince was ſo well ſatisfy'd with his former Performance, that he reſolv'd to forward the Attempt; ſo on the 17th of June, Saturday in the Evening, they iſſu'd out of the Ports of Oxford, and march'd beyond all the Quarters as far as Wickham, and fell in there at the farther End of the Town towards London, from whence no Enemy was expected, and ſo no Guards kept. A Regiment of Horſe and Foot, being lodg'd there, were all cut off, or taken Priſoners, and all the Horſes and a good Booty brought away. From thence they march'd backwards to another Quarter, within leſs than two Miles of the General's own Quarters, where his Men lodg'd with the ſame Security they had done at Wickham, not expecting any Enemy that Way, and ſo met with the ſame Fate, and were all kill'd, or made Priſoners. Thus having perform'd as much as was propos'd, and being laden with Priſoners and Booty, and the Sun being now riſing, the Prince thought it Time to retire to Oxford, and gave Orders to march with all convenient Speed, till they ſhou'd come to a Bridge yet two Miles from them, where he had appointed a Guard to favour their Retreat. But the Allarm being brought to the Earl of Eſſex, from all Quarters, he ſoon gather'd his neareſt Troops together, and directed them to follow the Prince, and divert him with Skirmiſhes, till Himſelf cou'd come up with his Foot, and ſome other Forces; in which he us'd the utmoſt Expedition. So that when the Prince had almoſt paſs'd a fair Plain, call'd Chalgrave Field, from whence he was to enter a Lane which continu'd to the Bridge, the Enemies Horſe were diſcover'd following them with all Speed. Upon which the Prince reſolv'd to make a Stand and expect them in the open Field, tho' his Horſe were all tired, and the Sun grown exceſſive hot; and ordering the Priſoners to be ſent to the Bridge, he plac'd himſelf as advantagiouſly as he cou'd to receive the Enemy, who came with more Haſte and leſs Order, than they ought to have done, as expecting nothing but Victory. But the Prince entertain'd them ſo roughly, that tho' they charg'd very bravely and gallantly, having many of their beſt Officers, of which the cheifeſt falling, the reſt in a ſhort Time fled, and were purſu'd till they came near the Earl of Eſſex's Body; which being at near a Mile diſtance, and making a Stand to receive their flying Troops, and to be inform'd of their Diſaſter, the Prince haſtned his own Retreat, paſs'd the Lane, and came ſafe to the Bridge before any of the Earl's Forces came up to him. Thus about Noon he enter'd Oxford with a great Booty, in a Triumphant manner, and preſented Colonel Hurry to the King, with a great Teſtimony of his Courage and Conduct; upon which the King honour'd him with Knighthood, and with a Commiſſion to raiſe a Regiment of Horſe.

A further Account of him.

This Succeſs very much rais'd the Spirits at Oxford, and it was viſibly great in the Number of the Priſoners, of whom many were of Condition; and the Names of many Officers were known, who were left dead in the Field, as Colonel Gunter, one of the beſt Horſe Officers they had, and a Man of known Spite and Hatred to the Government of the Church. But that which moſt heightned the Advantage of the Victory, was the Fall of the great Mr. Hampden, who being ſhot into the Shoulder with a Brace of Bullets, as it is generally reported, which broke the Bone, within ſix Days after dy'd with great Torment; to the great Conſternation of all his Party, as if their whole Army had been deſtroy'd. Many Men obſerv'd that Chalgrave Field, where this Gentleman receiv'd his Death's Wound, was the ſame Place, in which he had firſt executed the Ordinance of the Militia, and engag'd that County, where his Reputation was very great, in this miſerable War. And it was acknowledg'd by all, that upon the great Allarm that Morning, he was more than ordinary ſollicitous in purſuing the Enemy; and being a Colonel of Foot, put himſelf as a Voluntier among thoſe Horſe who were firſt ready; and that when the Prince was at a Stand, and all the Officers of Opinion to ſtay till their Body came up, he by his ſole Intereſt and Authority, ſecond to none but the General himſelf, perſuaded and prevail'd with them to advance: So violently was he hurry'd by his Fate, to pay the Forfeiture in the Place where he had moſt ſignally committed the Tranſgreſſion. The King cou'd not but be tenderly affected for a Man of his known Abilities, and ſtill hop'd that he might ſo far oblige him, as to beget a right Underſtanding between him and the two Houſes; and therefore ſent Dr. Giles, an opulent Divine of his near Neighbourhood and Acquaintance, to go and ſee him, as from himſelf, and to offer him any Surgeon, or other Aſſiſtance he might then want. The Doctor much regretted this Command, and declar'd, That he had ſeem'd ominous to him, at ſeveral Times when he had addreſs'd to him on his own Behalf: For when he and the other Prebendaries of Windſor were turn'd out of their Houſes, and his Waggons plunder'd contrary to his Paſſport, and applying to him for Relief, his Meſſenger arriv'd at that very Inſtant, when the News of the Death of his eldeſt Son came to him; and ſome Time after, falling into the like Calamity, his Meſſenger then met him with another that brought him News of his beloved Daughter, Mrs. Knightley's Death; ſo that he fear'd to ſeem a Scritch-Owl to him. However the Doctor ſent, and when he heard of a Meſſage from him, this poor Gentleman, tho' he was in a high Fever, and not very ſenſible, was much dejected and confounded at it. This is all we can learn as to the Death of this wonderful Man, whoſe Character we have in a great Meaſure given in another Place; only we ſhall add, that tho' he was ſo eminent a Patriot, yet wiſe Men are ſenſible he might have been purchas'd in the Beginning of this Parliament; and that he had a particular Ambition to be Governor to the Prince of Wales, ſo that he might have moulded him according to his own Principles. But after the King had accus'd him and the other Members of High-Treaſon, he became irreconcileable; and queſtionleſs when he firſt drew his Sword, he threw away the Scabbard: For he paſſionately oppos'd all Overtures of Accommodation, and was principally rely'd on to prevent all Impreſſions the Earl of Eſſex might receive towards a Peace, and in the main was more depended upon than the General Himſelf. When he undertook the Command of a Regiment, he ſhew'd himſelf a Man of Induſtry and Vigilance not to be tired out by the moſt Laborious, of Parts not to be impos'd upon by the moſt Subtle, and of Perſonal Courage equal to his brighteſt Parts; ſo prevalent in every Reſpect, that the Lord Clarendon compares him to the Roman Cinna, 'Who had a Head to contrive, a Tongue to perſuade, and a Hand to execute any Miſchief.' His Death therefore was a mighty Affliction to one Party, and ſeem'd no leſs a Deliverance to the other. As his Death was a great Surpriſe, ſo the Manner of it was very Uncommon, and generally unknown, as I am aſſured by a great Man, who ſays his Death's-Wound proceeded from the breaking of one of his Piſtols, which happen'd to be more than doubly charg'd. This was one of a choice Caſe preſented to him by his Son-in-law Sir Robert Pye, to carry on the War; and at the firſt Sight of him in his Illneſs, he cry'd out to him, Ah Robin, your unhappy Preſent has been my Ruin!

The Lord Fairfax defeated.

Shortly after this ill Succeſs to the Parliamentarians, the Earl of Eſſex and his Friends were diſcourag'd by the News from Yorkſhire, of the Earl of Newcaſtle's having defeated the Lord Fairfax's Forces at Adderton Moor, on the 29th of June, of his killing four or five Hundred Men, and his taking ſeveral Pieces of Ordnance, and many Priſoners. So that the General finding his Army weakned both by Sickneſs and Misfortune, and unable to form any great Deſign at preſent, he wrote a Letter to the Houſe of Commons, 'Informing them of his Condition, and that the Cries of the poor People were infinite; therefore adviſ'd them to ſend to his Majeſty to have Peace, upon reaſonable Security; or elſe, if the King wou'd pleaſe to abſent himſelf, to ſet a Day to give a Period to all thoſe unhappy Diſtractions by a Battel.' This occaſion'd new Debates in both Houſes; and particularly upon the Account of a late Proclamation publiſh'd by the King, 'Warning all his Subjects no longer to be miſ-led by the Votes, Orders and pretended Ordinances of One or Both Houſes, by reaſon the Members did not enjoy the Freedom of Parliament; with his gracious Offer of Pardon to the Members of both Houſes, and of Protection to ſuch of them as ſhou'd repair to him.' By which Proclamation, they alledg'd, 'That they were caſt out of his Protection as a Parliament, and thereby made incapable of Treating as ſuch; and that by their late Vow and Covenant, they had bound themſelves never to lay down Arms, ſo long as the Papiſts ſhou'd by Force be protected from the Juſtice of Parliament: And thereupon committed their General's Letter to return a ſatisfactory Anſwer to him; and that they wou'd recruit his Troops according to his Deſire.' However the Earl finding that the Factions and Animoſities at London requir'd his Preſence there, and that his Army wou'd be ſooner recruited there, than at ſo great a Diſtance, march'd directly from Thame to London, where he found ſufficient Jealouſy and Contention; leaving his Army quarter'd about St. Alban's.

The Earl of Eſſex writes for Peace.

The Houſes Allegation.

The ASSEMBLY OF DIVINES.

2. Before the Earl's Arrival, the Houſes had effected their Project for the calling of an Aſſembly of Divines, who were to make ſuch a Reformation of Church Government and Liturgy, as they ſhou'd adviſe. The King did all he cou'd to prevent it, and by a Proclamation countermanded this Meeting, and charg'd the far greater Part of the Members with having no Learning or Reputation. And becauſe it was apt to be alledg'd, that there was a general Diſaffection in the Nation againſt Epiſcopacy and the eſtabliſh'd Liturgy, he had anticipated that Pretence, by publiſhing a Collection of Petitions to the Parliament for the Preſervation of both; in only ſeven of which the Number of Subſcribers amounted to 482 Lords and Knights, 1740 Eſquires and Gentlemen of Note, 631 Doctors and Divines, and no leſs than 44559 Free-Holders of good Name and Note. But at this Juncture the Scotch were in a ſpecial Manner to be oblig'd, therefore no Arguments or Authority cou'd divert their Deſign, from which Wonders were expected; but by an Ordinance of their own they appointed the Earls of Northumberland and Bedford, with eight other Peers; Mr. Selden and Mr. Rouſe, with eighteen more of the Commons, and Mr. Palmer and Mr. Boules, with about a Hundred and Eighteen other Divines, to conſtitute this famous Aſſembly. For the better ſecuring this Aſſembly, the Knights of the Shires made Choice of two to ſerve as Members of every County; ſo that of the whole Number, there were not above twenty, who were not declar'd Enemies to the Doctrine and Diſcipline of the Church of England; among whom were Archbiſhop Uſher, Biſhop Brownrigg, Biſhop Weſtfield, Dr. Featly, and Dr. Holdſworth. The reſt were moſt Presbyterians, ſome Browniſts, with a few Independents, and ſome to repreſent the Kirk of Scotland; and the Lord Clarendon ſays, perhaps with too much Severity, that ſome were infamous in their Lives and Converſations, and moſt of them of very mean Parts in Learning, if not of ſcandalous Ignorance, and of no other Reputation than of Malice to the Church of England; ſo that that Convention never produc'd any Thing that might not then reaſonably have been expected from it. But in ſecular Matters, it ſerv'd as an Inſtrument to unite the different Intereſts of England and Scotland, and ſo to carry on the War with certain Fatality to the King.

The Perſons compoſing it.

On the firſt of July the Aſſembly met in the Chappel of King Henry the Seventh, and Dr. William Twiſs, a profound Anti-Arminian, was appointed Prolocutor by Order of the two Houſes of Parliament; and all were order'd four Shillings a Day for their Expences, and moſt of them rewarded with the beſt Livings, Lectorſhips, &c. Hearing of the Succeſs of the King's Forces in ſeveral Places, they deliver'd a peculiar Petition to the Houſes, humbly ſhewing, 'That upon the two late, ſad and unexpected Defeats of their Forces in the North and Weſt, they preſent unto their religious and prudent Conſiderations, Firſt, that they wou'd command a publick and extraordinary Day of Humiliation. Secondly, that they wou'd vouchſafe inſtantly to take it into their more ſerious Conſideration, how they may moſt ſpeedily ſet up Chriſt more gloriouſly in all his Ordinances within this Kingdom, and reform all Things amiſs throughout the Land. For which they humbly lay before them theſe Particulars. 1. The brutiſh Ignorance, and palpable Darkneſs of the People. 2. The grievous and heinous Pollution of the Lord's Supper, by admitting prophane and ignorant People to it. 3. The bold venting of corrupt Doctrines. 4. The Prophanation of any part of the Lord's Day and the Days of ſolemn Faſting. 5. A thorough and ſpeedy Proceeding againſt blind Guides and ſcandalous Miniſters. 6. The Laws to be quicken'd againſt Swearing and Drunkenneſs. 7. Severe Courſe to be taken againſt Fornication, Adultery and Inceſt. 8. All Monuments of Idolatry and Superſtition to be aboliſh'd. 9. Juſtice to be executed againſt all Delinquents. 10. Relief of our diſtreſſed Brethren Priſoners in Oxford, York and elſewhere, for the Cauſe of God. That ſo God, who is now by the Sword avenging the Quarrel of his Covenant, beholding your Integrity and Zeal, may turn from the Fierceneſs of his Wrath, hear our Prayers, go forth with our Armies, perfect the Work of Reformation, forgive our Sins, and ſettle Truth and Peace throughout the Kingdom. And your Petitioners ſhall ever pray, &c.

Their Petition to the Parliament.

The Spirit of this Aſſembly wou'd appear more from this Petition, if it was recited at large; and as to their Ignorance, at leaſt of ſome of them, that is expos'd by a Friend of their own, a Parliament Man, who ſat amongſt them, Mr. Whitelock, who tells us, That divers Members of both Houſes gave their Votes with the Divines in any Matter in Conſideration amongſt them: In which Debates, he ſays Mr. Selden ſpoke admirably, and confuted divers of them in their own Learning. And ſometimes when they had cited a Text of Scripture to prove their Aſſertion, he wou'd tell them, Perhaps in your little Pocket-Bibles with gilt Leaves, which they wou'd often pull out and read, the Tranſlation may be thus; but the Greek or the Hebrew ſignifies thus and thus: And ſo wou'd totally ſilence thoſe Pretenders to Divinity. The learned Dr. Featly was almoſt the only Epiſcopal Divine who remain'd with them; and he became ſo uneaſy at their zealous Proceedings, that he gave Account of them in Letters to Oxford, and promis'd to withdraw from them; but his Letters being intercepted, he was not only expell'd the Aſſembly, but depriv'd of all his Eccleſiaſtical Preferments.

The King's Proteſtation.

And that great Man, Archbiſhop Uſher, was ſoon after voted out of the Aſſembly, only becauſe he refus'd to appear in it, and choſe rather to attend his Royal Maſter at Oxford; who being to receive the Sacrament from his Hands at Chriſt-Church, riſing from his Knees, and beckoning to the Archbiſhop for a ſhort Forbearance, made this ſolemn Proteſtation, My Lord, I eſpy here many reſolved Proteſtants, who may declare to the World the Reſolution I do now make. I have, to the utmoſt of my Power, prepar'd my Soul to become a worthy Receiver: And may I ſo receive Comfort from the bleſſed Sacrament, as I do intend the Eſtabliſhment of the true Reformed Proteſtant Religion, as it ſtood in its Beauty in the happy Days of Queen Elizabeth, without any Connivance at Popery. I bleſs God, that in the midſt of theſe publick Diſtractions, I have ſtill Liberty to communicate: AND MAY THIS SACRAMENT BE MY DAMNATION, if my Heart do not joyn with my Lips in this Proteſtation.

The Corniſh Army joyn'd by Prince Maurice, &c.

Several Places ſubmit to them.

3. To return to the Military Affairs; about the latter End of June, Prince Maurice and the Marqueſs of Hertford, with a conſiderable Body of Foot and more Horſe, were ſent to joyn the Corniſh Forces under Sir Ralph Hopton; which was ſucceſsfully done at Chard in Somerſetſhire; ſo that all together, they compos'd an Army of near ſeven Thouſand Men, with an excellent Train of Artillery, a great Quantity of Ammunition, and of ſo good a Reputation, that they might promiſe themſelves a ſpeedy Increaſe of their Numbers. Taunton was the firſt Place they reſolv'd to viſit, a Place of great Moment, and well Garriſon'd by the Parliament. But the Army was no ſooner drawn near the Town, but the Inhabitants ſent to treat; and tho' nothing was concluded, this and the Commotion of the Priſoners in the Caſtle, ſtruck ſuch a Terror into the Garriſon, that they all fled out of the Town to Bridgewater. The ſame panick Fear drove them next Day from thence; ſo that the Marqueſs in three Days Time was poſſeſs'd of Tauton, Bridge-water and Dunſtar-Caſtle, the laſt ſo much ſtronger than both the other, that it cou'd not have been forc'd. The Army ſtay'd about Taunton ſeven or eight Days for the ſettling thoſe Garriſons, and obſerving the Motion or Station of the Enemy; in which Time they loſt very much Credit and Reputation. For tho' the Corniſh Army had been pious Obſervers of Diſcipline and good Order, yet the Horſe that came with the Marqueſs having liv'd under a looſe Management, and coming now into freſh and plentiful Quarters, were diſorderly enough, and by their Licence hinder'd thoſe regular Levies which ſhou'd have brought in a Supply of Mony for the due Payment of the Army. This Extravagancy produc'd another Miſchief, ſome Jealouſy, or Shadow of it, between the Lord Marqueſs and Prince Maurice; the Firſt, as being better vers'd in the Arts of Peace than the Myſteries of War, deſiring to regulate the Soldier, and reſtrain him from uſing any Licence upon the Country; and the Prince, being thought ſo wholly to incline to the Soldier, that he neglected any Conſideration of the Country; and not without ſome Deſign of drawing the ſole Dependance of the Soldier upon Himſelf.

Sir William Waller ſent againſt them

Upon the Progreſs of the King's Forces, the two Houſes immediately ſent what Troops they cou'd ſpare, under the Conduct of Sir William Waller, whoſe Valour and Activity had been ſo auſpicious, as to gain him the Name of William the Conqueror, both in the City and Parliament; and he was the more extoll'd by many, with Deſign to eclipſe the Reputation of the Earl of Eſſex, of whom they grew very ſuſpicious. Therefore they prepar'd all Things for his March with the utmoſt Expedition and Secrecy; ſo that the Marqueſs of Hertford had not long reſted his Men, when he heard that Sir William was within two Days March of him, and was more like to draw Supplies from Briſtol, and the adjacent Parts, than he cou'd from the open Country; and therefore it was held moſt adviſable to advance and engage him, before he had gather'd his full Strength. Waller took up his Quarters at Bath and the neighbouring Parts, where his Party was increas'd by thoſe that eſcap'd from the Fight at Stratton, and from the Towns lately taken, as well as good Supply out of the Garriſon of Briſtol. He likewiſe receiv'd from London a freſh Regiment of five Hundred Horſe, under the Command of Sir Arthur Haſlerig, who were ſo compleatly arm'd, that they were call'd by the other Side, The Regiment of Lobſters, becauſe of their bright Iron Shells, with which they were cover'd, being perfect Cuiraſſiers; the firſt ſeen ſo arm'd on either Side, and the firſt who made any Impreſſion upon the King's Horſe, who being unarm'd were not able to bear a Shock with them; and they were alſo ſecure from Hurts of the Sword, which were almoſt the only Weapons the other us'd. Several Skirmiſhes hapned between the contending Parties, particularly a very ſevere one near Wells, in which the Earl of Carnarvon ſhew'd invincible Bravery, and the Prince was wounded and reduc'd to great Danger, and which at laſt turn'd to the Defeat of Sir William Waller's Party.

The Fight at Lanſdown, Waller worſted.

At length, on the fifth of July, Sir William Waller having drawn out his whole Army at Lanſdown, on a Hill between Bath and Marsfield, the Royaliſts ſuffer'd themſelves to be engag'd upon great Diſadvantage. Sir William having poſſeſs'd and fortify'd the Hill, ſent a ſtrong Party of Horſe towards Marsfield, which ſoon allarm'd the other Army, and was ſhortly driven back to their Body. And tho' the King's Forces were now fond of engaging, yet ſeeing the Enemy ſo advantagiouſly fix'd on the Top of the Hill, they fairly retir'd to their own Quarters: Which Sir William perceiving, ſent his whole Body of Horſe and Dragoons down the Hill to charge them both on the Rear and Flank, which they did effectually; the Regiment of Cuiraſſiers ſo amazing their Oppoſers, that they totally routed them; and ſtanding unſhaken Themſelves, gave ſo great a Terror to them, that no Example of their Officers, who acted with invincible Courage, cou'd make them charge with their former unconquer'd Bravery. However, after Sir Nicolas Slanning with three Hundred Muſqueteers had valiantly beaten their Reſerve of Dragoons, Prince Maurice and the Earl of Carnarvon rallying their Horſe, and winging them with the Corniſh Muſqueteers, gallantly charg'd the Enemy's Horſe three times, till they routed them and chac'd them to the Hill, where they ſtood in a Place almoſt inacceſſible. The Brow of the Hill was guarded with Breaſt-Works and Cannon; yet the Corniſh Foot were ſo far from being cool'd at the Diſadvantage, that they cry'd out, That they might have leave to fetch off thoſe Cannon! Upon which Order was given to attempt the Hill with Horſe and Foot, which occaſion'd a tedious and bloody Conteſt: till at length Sir Bevil Greenvil with indefatigable Labour and Courage, leading up his Men in the Face of the Enemy's Cannon and ſmall Shot from their Breaſt-Works, gain'd the Brow of the Hill, but with the Loſs of his Life, and many of his Officers. So that at laſt the Enemy quitted their Ground to the Poſſeſſion of the King's Forces, and retir'd to ſome Diſtance, behind a Stone Wall upon the ſame; and ſtanding in reaſonable good Order. Either Party were ſufficiently fatigu'd and ſhatter'd, and the King's Horſe ſo ſhaken, that of two Thouſand ſeen in the Field in the Morning, there were not above ſix Hundred on the Top of the Hill. The other Party were likewiſe exceedingly diſpers'd; ſo that only exchanging ſome Shot from their Ordnance, they look'd upon each other till the Night interpos'd. Soon after Midnight Sir William Waller drew off to the City of Bath, leaving great Store of Arms and ſome Powder behind him; ſo that as ſoon as Day appear'd, the King's Forces found themſelves entirely poſſeſs'd of the Field, and the Dead, and all other Enſigns of a dear bought Victory.

The Death and Character of Sir Bevil Greenvil.

Sir Ralph Hopton in Danger; Major Sheldon ſlain.

Such was the ſharp Fight of Lanſdown, in which the King's Officers expos'd themſelves with that Gallantry, that more of them and Gentlemen of Quality were ſlain, than common Soldiers; and more wounded than ſlain. But that which wou'd have clouded any Victory, and made the Loſs of others leſs regarded, was the Death of Sir Bevil Greenvil; a very extraordinary Perſon, whoſe ſingular Activity and Reputation, was the Foundation of what had been done in Cornwall; and whoſe Temper and Affections were ſo publick, that no unhappy Accident cou'd make any Impreſſion on him; and whoſe Example preſerv'd others from all Complaints. In ſhort, a brighter Courage, and a milder Diſpoſition, were never more happily temper'd, in producing the moſt chearful and innocent Converſation. Many Officers and Perſons of Quality were wounded; as the Lord Arundel of Wardour, in the Thigh with a Brace of Piſtol Bullets; Sir Ralph Hopton, in the Arm with a Muſquet; Sir George Vaughan, and many others, at the Head of their Troops with Swords and Poll-Axes. But the Morning added much to the dark part of their Victory; when Sir Ralph Hopton, with other Officers and Soldiers about him, being near a Waggon of Ammunition, in which were eight Barrels of Powder, it accidentally took Fire, and kill'd many who ſtood neareſt, and maim'd many more, among whom Sir Ralph himſelf, and Major Sheldon were miſerably hurt; of which the Major, who was the more hopeful of the two, dy'd the next Day, to the general Grief of the Army, which entirely lov'd him, for his undaunted Courage, and Sweetneſs of Temper. Sir Ralph Hopton, whoſe Life was deſpaired of, was put into a Litter, and ſo the Army march'd to their old Quarters at Marsfield, exceedingly dejected with their Morning's Miſfortune, where they repos'd themſelves the next Day, principally to take care of Sir Ralph himſelf, a Perſon infinitely dear to the Soldiers, who began now to have Hopes of his Recovery, tho' he was unfit to travel. On the Parliament's Side, there fell Major Strawhan, a Scotchman, who gave a remarkable Charge to the King's Forces in Cornwall, one Lieutenant, and two Cornets: But the Number of common Soldiers loſt on either Side, are very differently and uncertainly related; only moſt Accounts do make them near equal.

4. After a Day's Reſt at Marsfield, the Royaliſts underſtanding that Sir William Waller was ſtill at Bath, and that he ſent for freſh Supplies from Briſtol and other Places, they concluded rather to march to Oxford, and ſo to joyn with the King's Army, than to ſtay and attend the Enemy, who had his Supplies ſo near; and ſo they march'd toward Chippenham, whither Sir William follow'd them with new Recruits, believing them to have loſt all their Ammunition, and even the Soul of their Army, Sir Ralph Hopton. The King's Forces wou'd have fought him there, but he not liking the Ground, declin'd it, ſo that Day they advanc'd towards the Deviſes, a Town in Wiltſhire; and all this Day there were perpetual Skirmiſhes in the Rear, which was nobly ſupported by Sir Nicolas Slanning, while the Enemy preſs'd very hard, but always with Repulſes, till the Army ſafely reach'd the Deviſes. But by this Means, the Deſign was alter'd as to their Retreat to Oxford, the Enemy being upon them with Improvement of Numbers: Whereupon it was unanimouſly adviſ'd and reſolv'd, that the Marqueſs of Hertford and Prince Maurice ſhou'd that Night break through with all the Horſe to Oxford; and that Sir Ralph Hopton, who daily recover'd, with the Earl of Marlborough, General of the Artillery, the Lord Mohun and other good Officers of Foot, ſhou'd ſtay there with their Foot and Cannon, where it was hop'd they might defend themſelves for a few Days, till the Marqueſs might return with their Relief from Oxford, which was not above thirty Miles diſtant. This Reſolution was purſu'd, and the ſame Night all the Horſe got ſafe away into the King's Quarters; by which Time Sir William Waller had drawn all his Forces about the Deviſes. The Town was open, without the leaſt Fortification or Defence, but ſmall Ditches and Hedges; upon which the Foot was plac'd, and ſome Pieces of Cannon conveniently planted. The Avenues, which were many, were ſoon barricado'd to hinder the Entrance of the Horſe, which was principally apprehended. Sir William finding the Horſe remov'd, and beyond his Purſuit, brought his whole Force cloſe to the Town, and entirely inveſted it; and having rais'd a Battery upon a Hill near it, he poured in his Shot upon it without Intermiſſion, and attempted to enter in ſeveral Places with Horſe, Foot and Cannon, but was every where gallantly repuls'd. At the ſame Time having Intelligence of the Earl of Crawford's marching with a Supply of Powder, according to Order, after the Battel of Landſdown, he ſent a ſtrong Party of Horſe to intercept him, who became ſo unfortunately engag'd, that he hardly eſcap'd with the Loſs of his Ammunition, beſides a Troop or two of his Horſe.

Waller beſieges the King's Foot in the Deviſes.

Upon this new Advantage, Sir William reckon'd his Victory out of Queſtion, and thereupon ſent a Trumpet into the Town to ſummon the Beſieged, and let them know, 'That he had cut off their Relief, and that their State was now deſperate, and therefore adviſ'd them to ſubmit themſelves to the Parliament, with whom he wou'd mediate in their Behalf.' The Royaliſts were inwardly pleas'd at this Meſſage, and return'd Anſwer, 'That they wou'd ſend an Officer to treat, if a Ceſſation were agreed to during the Time of the Treaty;' which was conſented to, provided it was ſuddenly undertaken. The Beſieged only wanted a little Reſt from their hard Service, therefore on their Parts ſuch Terms were propos'd as wou'd take up moſt Time in the Debate, and might imply Courage and Reſolution to hold out. Waller on the other ſide only offer'd Quarter and civil Uſage to the Officers, and Leave to the common Soldiers to return to their Houſes, without their Arms, except they wou'd chuſe to ſerve the Parliament. Theſe being Terms many of the Officers wou'd not have ſubmitted to in the laſt Extremity, the Treaty ended; after thoſe in the Town had gain'd what they only expected, ſeven or eight Hours ſleep, and ſo much ſparing of Ammunition. In reality, Sir William was ſo confident that they were all at his Mercy, that he had written to the Parliament, 'That their Work was done, and that by the next Poſt he wou'd ſend the Number and Quality of his Priſoners;' neither did he believe it poſſible that any Relief cou'd have been ſent from Oxford, ſince the Earl of Eſſex, to whom he had ſignify'd his Succeſs and Circumſtances, then lay with his whole Army at Thame, within ten Miles of it. But the Importance was too well underſtood by the King to omit the moſt hazardous Attempt, for the redeeming thoſe Men, who had wrought ſuch Wonders for him. Therefore, tho' he was juſt then in Perſon going to meet and ſecure the Queen in her March, he ſent Lieutenant General Wilmot, whom he had lately made a Lord, with moſt of his Horſe, to the Number of fifteen Hundred, to march that very Day in which the Advertiſement came to him, towards the Deviſes. Upon Notice of their ſudden Advance, Waller and his Party, careful to prevent the joyning this Body of Horſe with the Foot, drew off from all Parts of the Town, and put himſelf in Battalia upon the Top of a fair Hill, call'd Roundway-Down, two Miles off the Town, over which the King's Forces were neceſſarily to march.

Waller's Aſſurance of Succeſs.

The Fight at Roundway-Down: Waller intirely routed.

Here Sir William, out of pure Gaiety, departed from an Advantage of Ground he cou'd not again recover; for being in excellent Order of Battel, with two ſtrong Wings of Horſe to his Foot, a good Reſerve plac'd, and his Cannon well planted, and apprehending ſtill the Conjunction between the Horſe and Foot within the Town, he march'd with his whole Body of Horſe, from his Foot, to charge the Enemy, appointing Sir Arthur Haſlerig with his dreadful Cuiraſſiers to make the firſt Impreſſion; who was encounter'd by Sir John Byron, in whoſe Regiment the intrepid Earl of Carnarvon charg'd as Voluntier; and after a ſharp Conflict, in which Sir Arthur Haſlerig receiv'd many Wounds, that impenetrable Regiment was routed, and in a furious Career chac'd upon their other Horſe. At the ſame Time the Lord Wilmot bravely charging them from Diviſion to Diviſion as they were rang'd, in half an Hour there was ſo great an Alteration, that the whole intire Body of the triumphant Horſe were ſo totally routed and diſpers'd, that there was not one of them to be ſeen upon that large ſpacious Down; every Man ſhifting for himſelf with greater Danger and Loſs by the Precipices of the Hill, than he cou'd have undergone by oppoſing his Purſuer. The Foot ſtill ſtood firm, making ſhew of a gallant Reſiſtance; but the Lord Wilmot ſoon ſeiz'd their Cannon, and turn'd them againſt them, at the ſame Time when the Corniſh, juſt arriv'd from the Town, were likewiſe ready to charge them; upon which their Hearts fail'd; ſo they were ſharply attack'd on all Sides, and almoſt all kill'd or taken Priſoners; for the Corniſh, retaining too freſh a Memory of their late Diſtreſſes, now fully reveng'd themſelves on the Cauſers of them. Sir William himſelf with a ſmall Train fled to Briſtol, which had ſacrific'd a great Part of their Garriſon to his Defeat; and ſo were ready to expire at his Entry into the Town, himſelf being the firſt Publiſher of his own Diſaſter.

Such was the Defeat at Roundway-Down, on the thirteenth Day of July, which was ſo entire, that by the Soldiers it came to be call'd Run-away-Down; and was indeed a glorious and triumphant Day for the reſtoring and eſtabliſhing the King's Affairs. There were in this Battel ſlain of the Parliament Side above ſix Hundred on the Spot, nine Hundred Priſoners taken, beſides two or three Hundred retaken and redeem'd, whom they had gather'd up in the Skirmiſhes and Purſuit; with all the Cannon, being eight Pieces of Ordnance; all their Arms, Ammunition, Waggons, Baggage and Victuals, twenty eight Foot Enſigns, and nine Cornets; and all this by a Party of fifteen Hundred Horſe, and two ſmall Field-Pieces, (for the Victory was perfect upon the Matter, before the Corniſh came up) againſt a Body of full two Thouſand Horſe, five Hundred Dragoons, and near three Thouſand Foot, with an excellent Train of Artillery; and without the Loſs of any Man of Name on the King's Side, beſides Mr. Dudley Smith, an honeſt and valiant young Gentleman, always a Voluntier with the Lord Wilmot, and among the Firſt in any Action of Danger. Whitelock makes the Rout of the Parliament's Horſe to be occaſion'd by a Panick Fear; but Hollis, in his Memoirs, charges it upon the Unſkilfulneſs and Cowardiſe of Sir Arthur Haſlerig. However it was, Sir William Waller, whoſe Laurels were very freſh and growing, believ'd himſelf to be abſolutely betray'd, and ſacrific'd by the Earl of Eſſex, out of Envy at his great Actions, which ſeem'd to eclipſe his Glories; and complain'd, 'That he lying with his whole Army within ten Miles of Oxford, ſhou'd ſuffer the chief Strength of that Place to march thirty Miles to deſtroy him, without ſo much as ſending out a Party to follow them, or do any Thing to cauſe them to be recall'd.' On the other Hand, the haughty Earl diſdaining to be thought his Rival, reproach'd the Other 'With unſoldiery Neglects, and Want of Courage, to be beaten by a Handful of Men, and to have deſerted his Foot and Cannon, without hazarding his own Perſon in one Charge.'

Waller's Complaints.

'Charge.' Wherever the Fault was, it was never forgiven; and from this new Enmity the King often reap'd great Advantages: Tho' Whitelock ſays that Sir William's Preſence at London ſilenc'd Invectives againſt him, and made the better Way for Recruits for him.

The Queen's March.

5. All this Time the Queen was acting with great Vigour for her Royal Spouſe, increaſing her Forces, and making ſlow Marches towards Oxford, Mr. Henry Jermin being her chief Commander and Colonel of her Guard. From York ſhe advanc'd to Newark, where ſhe was met by the brave Colonel Charles Cavendiſh, the younger Brother to the Earl of Devonſhire, whom ſhe ſo much honour'd, that when ſhe was to give the Word to her Commander, it was that of CAVENDISH. Her Majeſty made ſome Stay at Newark, where ſhe treated the Ladies in thoſe Parts after a very obliging Manner; upon which Occaſion we are told a little Story in Doctor Kennet's Memoirs, which may give a Hint of her Conjugal Diſpoſition. Among the Ladies that were treated, there was a certain Sempronia, who had a ſingular Opinion of her Talent in Publick Affairs, becauſe ſhe govern'd her Husband, who in Times of Peace govern'd the Country: This Lady engag'd a few others of a lower Form of Politicians to joyn with her in a Petition of her own Indicting, wherein her Majeſty was humbly pray'd, 'Not to remove from 'Newark, till her Forces had taken Nottingham;' and this Buſineſs was to be kept very ſecret, eſpecially from their Husbands. This Petition was by the Ladies formally deliver'd to her Majeſty, who preſently imagining it was done without the Knowledge of their Husbands, ſhe let them know, 'She was very ſenſible of the loyal Affections 'of the Noblemen and Gentlemen of thoſe Parts to her 'Lord the King, and ſhou'd be glad if it lay in her Power 'to grant their Requeſts: But ſhe inform'd them that Af'fairs of that Nature were above their Sphear; beſides ſhe 'was commanded by the King to make all poſſible Haſte.' However ſhe thus concluded, Ye will receive this Advantage at leaſt by my Anſwer, Tho' I cannot grant your Petition, ye may learn by my Example to obey your Husbands.

Her Advice at Newark.

Before her Majeſty's Departure from Newark, out of Care for the Safety of Lincolnſhire and Nottinghamſhire, She left two Thouſand Foot, and Arms for five Hundred more, and twenty Troops of Horſe, under the Command of Colonel Cavendiſh; She herſelf marching with above two Thouſand well arm'd Foot, one Thouſand Horſe, ſix Pieces of Canon and two Mortars, and above a hundred Waggons. Colonel Cavendiſh waited upon her as far as Burton upon Trent, and by her Majeſty's Conſent he took the Town by Storm, encouraging the Soldiers to ſwim over the River, to ſcale the Works, and enter through a Thouſand Deaths and Dangers. At Edge-Hill, where the firſt great Battel was fought, ſhe was met by the King, with all the Marks of Joy and Tranſport, after they had been abſent from each other a Year and near five Months; and this was upon the very ſame Day that the Victory was obtain'd at Roundway-Down. They went and lodg'd that Night at Sir Thomas Pope's Houſe at Wroxon; and the next Morning, they came with the Prince, the Duke of York, and their whole Army to Woodſtock, and from thence to Oxford, which they enter'd in a triumphant Manner. Both their Majeſties were congratulated by the Univerſity, not only for their happy Meeting and Arrival, but alſo for the late Defeat of their Enemies. Upon their Arrival the Earl of Eſſex retir'd with his Army broken and diſheartned to Uxbridge, laying aſide all Thoughts of fighting with the King, till he ſhou'd be recruited with Horſe, Men and Mony; and ſuffering no leſs in the Diſcourſe of the People, for not interpoſing to hinder the Queen's March to Oxford, and Conjunction with the King, than for his ſitting ſtill near Oxford, while the Lord Wilmot went from thence to the Ruin of Sir William Waller.

She meets the King at Edge-Hill.

They both fix at Oxford.

6. His Majeſty now, upon full Advice, and Conſideration of his own State, with the broken Condition of the Enemy, reſolv'd to make an Attempt upon the important City of Briſtol, now under the Government of Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, who was more noted for his Cunning, than his Courage. For this End the Marqueſs of Hertford and Prince Maurice return'd to Bath, lately yielded to the Corniſh Forces, and agreed to appear on a fix'd Day with their whole Strength before Briſtol, on the Somerſetſhire Side, when Prince Rupert with the Oxford Forces wou'd appear before it, on the Glouceſterſhire Side. On the twenty fourth Day of July, both Armies ſat down before it; quartering their Horſe in that Manner, that none cou'd go out or into the City, without great Hazard of being taken; and the ſame Day, with the Aſſiſtance of Seamen prepar'd before, they ſeiz'd all the Ships that were in King-Road, which were not only laden with Goods of great Value, as Plate, Money, and the beſt ſort of Commodities, ſent on board by thoſe who fear'd the worſt, but with many Perſons of Quality, who being unwilling to venture the Conſequence of a Siege, thought that Way to have ſecur'd themſelves, and to have eſcap'd to London; and ſo were all taken Priſoners. The next Morning Prince Rupert came to his Brother, and the Marqueſs, and a general Council of all the principal Officers of both Armies being aſſembled, it was debated in what Manner they ſhou'd proceed, by Aſſault or Approach. There were in the Town five and twenty Hundred Foot, and a Regiment of Horſe and Dragoons; the Line about the Town was finiſh'd, yet in ſome Places the Graff was wider and deeper than in others; and the Caſtle within the Town was very well prepar'd and ſupply'd with great Store of Proviſions to endure a Siege. The Opinions were various; but at length Prince Rupert's Importunity, and a glorious Contempt of Danger prevail'd ſo far, that it was conſented on all Parts, to aſſault the Town next Morning by break of Day in three Places on the Somerſetſhire Side, and as many on the Glouceſterſhire Side.

Briſtol beſieg'd by Prince Rupert, &c.

A general Aſſault upon the Place.

The next Morning, with little other Proviſions for ſo great a Work than the Bravery of the Aſſailants, both Armies fell on: On the Weſt Side where the Corniſh were, they attack'd the Line in three Places; one Diviſion led by Sir Nicolas Slanning, aſſiſted with Colonel Trevanion, Lieutenant-Colonel Slingsby, and three more Field Officers: Another Diviſion on the Right was led by Colonel Buck, aſſiſted by Colonel Wagſtaffe, Colonel Aſhley, who commanded the Marqueſs of Hertford's Regiment, with other Field Officers: And the third Diviſion, on the Left, led by Sir Thomas Baſſet, who was Major-General of the Corniſh. Theſe three Diviſions fell on together with that intrepid Courage, and Reſolution, as Nothing but Death cou'd controul; and tho' the middle Diviſion got into the Graff, and ſo nearly fill'd it, that ſome mounted the Wall, yet by the prodigious Diſadvantage of the Ground, and the full Defence the Beſieged made within, they were repell'd with great Slaughter. On Prince Rupert's Side it was attack'd with equal Courage, and almoſt equal Loſs, but with better Succeſs; for tho' that Diviſion led on by the Lord Grandiſon, Colonel-General of the Foot, was beaten off, with the wounding of that Lord; and the Other, led by Colonel Bellaſis, met with no better Fortune; yet Colonel Waſhington, with his Party, finding a Place on the Curtain weaker than the reſt, ſucceſsfully enter'd, and ſoon made Room for the Horſe to follow. The Enemy, as ſoon as they ſaw the Line enter'd in one Place, either out of Fear, or by Command of their Officers, quitted their Poſts; ſo that the Prince enter'd with his Foot and Horſe into the Suburbs, being ſoon ſeconded by a Thouſand of the Corniſh Foot, and march'd up to Fromegate with the Loſs of many Men, and ſome very good Officers, by Shots from the Walls and Windows; inſomuch that all were much dejected to ſee ſo little gain'd with ſo great a Loſs: For they had ſtill a more difficult Entrance into the Town, than they had yet paſs'd, and where the Horſe cou'd be of no uſe to them; but of a ſudden, to the great Joy of the Commanders and Soldiers, the City beat a Parly, which the Prince willingly embrac'd, and Articles were agreed to that Night.

The Town Surrenders upon Articles.

The Articles themſelves were Ten in Number, ſufficiently fair and honourable to the Beſieged: The Subſtance of them was, 'That none of the Citizens ſhou'd be mo'leſted as to their Perſons, Goods, Charters and Privi'leges: That every Officer ſhou'd march forth with his 'Arms, every Trooper ride out with his Horſe and Sword, 'and every Soldier march out with his Sword, Bag and 'Baggage; and that a ſafe Convoy ſhou'd be allow'd them 'for twenty Miles, and they to paſs unmoleſted for three 'Days longer.' The next Morning, being the twenty ſixth of July, his Highneſs Prince Rupert was poſſeſs'd of the Town; but here the ill Example of Reading in the Breach of the Articles was remember'd, and unhappily follow'd with full Retaliation; for all that Garriſon was now before the Place. So that they with ſome Shadow of Juſtice, and the reſt, by their Example, us'd great Licentiouſneſs to the Soldiers, who ſhou'd have been ſafely conducted; which reflected much upon the Prince, tho' he us'd his utmoſt Power to ſuppreſs it, and charg'd Colonel Fiennes with being acceſſary to his own Wrong, by marching out of the Town an Hour before his Appointment, before the Convoy was ready, and at another Gate than was agreed on. And as theſe Articles were injuriouſly violated to thoſe who march'd away, ſo they were not enough obſerv'd to thoſe who ſtaid, and to the City it ſelf: For many of Colonel Fiennes's Soldiers taking Conditions, and entring with the King's Army, inſtructed their new Friends who were moſt diſaffected to the King, ſo that one whole Street upon the Bridge, whoſe Inhabitants lay under ſome Brand of Malignity, tho' many others were amongſt them, was almoſt totally plunder'd; which, becauſe there was but little or no Juſtice done upon the Tranſgreſſors, was believ'd to be done by Connivance from the Officers, and gave more Diſcredit to the King's Forces, and his Cauſe, than was then obſerv'd or diſcover'd.

Perſons ſlain on the King's ſide.

Major Kendall,
Colonel Buck,
Sir Nicolas Slanning,
Colonel Trevanion,

Colonel Lunsford,
Lieutenant-Colonel Moyle,

And the Lord Grandiſon.

The gaining of Briſtol was a full Tide of Proſperity to the King, which made him Maſter of the ſecond City of his Kingdom, and gave him quiet Poſſeſſion of Somerſetſhire, one of the richeſt Counties of the Nation, and likewiſe open'd an excellent Communication with Wales, which for the moſt Part was well affected to him. Yet the Purchaſe was very dear, by reaſon of the Loſs of five Hundred Foot of incomparable Skill and Courage, and a greater Proportion of admirable Officers, whereof many were of prime Command and Quality. On the Corniſh ſide, beſides Major Kendall, and many other inferior, but excellent Officers, there fell Colonel Buck, a modeſt and ſtout Commander, well experienc'd in Arms, who met with his Fate after he had mounted the Top of the Wall; Sir Nicolas Slanning and Colonel Trevanion, two Members of Parliament, the Life and Soul of the Corniſh Regiments, whoſe Memories can never be too highly celebrated, who being only govern'd by their Conſcience, and induc'd by the Exorbitancies of the Leaders in Parliament, engag'd themſelves with the firſt who appear'd for the King in Cornwall; rather doing great Things, than affecting any Notice of them, applying themſelves to all Infirmities, and condeſcending to all Capacities, for producing a loyal Unanimity in thoſe Parts. Sir Nicholas Slanning was a Man of admirable Parts, a ſharp and diſcerning Wit, a cloſe and ſolid Judgment, a gentle and moſt obliging Behaviour, and a Courage ſo clear and daring, as without the other Ornaments wou'd have render'd him a very conſiderable Man: They were both young, neither of them above eight and twenty, and of entire Friendſhip to each other, and to the excellent Sir Bevil Greenvil, whoſe Body was yet unbury'd: They were both ſhot almoſt in the ſame Minute, and in the ſame Place, and both had the Royal Sacrifice of their Sovereign's particular Sorrow, and the Concurrence of all good Mens; and they were as often lamented, as the publick Accidents made the Courage and Fidelity of the Corniſh of greateſt Signification. In Prince Rupert's Army, there fell alſo many good Officers, the chief of whom was Colonel Lunsford, a Perſon of extraordinary Sobriety, Induſtry and Courage; near whom likewiſe fell his excellent Lieutenant-Colonel Moyle. The wounded were the Lord Viſcount Grandiſon, Nephew to the great Duke of Buckingham, Colonel Bellaſis, ſince Lord Bellaſis, Colonel Bernard Aſhley, Sir John Owen, and many other Officers of Name, of whom none of Quality dy'd of their Wounds but the Lord Grandiſon, whoſe Loſs was highly lamented. He was a young Man of ſo virtuous a Diſpoſition, that no Temptation cou'd corrupt him; ſo great a Lover of Juſtice, that no Neceſſity cou'd make him deviate from the ſtricteſt Rules of it; and of that uncommon Piety and Devotion, that the Court or Camp cou'd not ſhew a more faultleſs Perſon. His Perſonal Valour and Courage had been exceſſive, even to make him condeſcend ſometimes to the Infirmity of Duelling, ſo that he was accus'd of being too prodigal of his Perſon; and as to his Duty to his King, he was wont to ſay, That if he had not Underſtanding enough to know the Uprightneſs of the Cauſe, nor Loyalty enough to inform him of the Duty of a Subject, yet the Obligations of Gratitude to the King, were ſuch, as his Life was but a due Sacrifice; therefore as ſoon as he ſaw the War unavoidable he engag'd himſelf and all his Brothers in the Service; and there were three more of them in the Army, when he was ſo unfortunately cut off. It is believ'd that his Wound was ſuch as might have been recover'd; but, as I am aſſur'd from a very good Hand, his going to Bed too ſoon to his Lady prov'd mortal to him; and at the ſame Time he got his Death, he gave Being to an extraordinary Daughter, who afterwards ſo beautify'd with her Perſon, and vilify'd with her Actions, the Title of the Dutchy of Cleveland.

The low Condition of the Parliament.

IX. 1. As the late Succeſſes, and the taking of Briſtol added great Luſtre and Beauty to the whole Face of the King's Affairs, ſo it produc'd an equal Paleneſs and a ſickly Aſpect on the Parliament Side; where the Jealouſies and Apprehenſions between themſelves ſtill grew higher, and new Remedies were ſtill propos'd which were generally thought worſe than the Diſeaſe. But rather than come to Terms, upon the News of the Lord Fairfax's being worſted in the North, and driven into Hull, which came about this Time, they reſolv'd to compleat what they had formerly propos'd, and ſend a Committee of the two Houſes into Scotland, 'To deſire their Brethren of that Kingdom, 'immediately to advance with an Army for their Relief.' When the Matter was firſt mov'd in the Houſe of Commons, and it being objected, 'That it wou'd be fruitleſs to 'call them, without propoſing them ſome conſiderable Ad'vantage,' Harry Martin ſtood up, and with great Confidence deſir'd, That an Offer might be made them of the Counties of Northumberland and Cumberland, and in Caſe that did not content them, to add two ſuch other Counties in the North, as ſhou'd be moſt convenient for them: So little Regard had he to the Honour and Advantage of the Engliſh Nation. This indeed was thought very extravagant; yet they reſolv'd that the Scots ſhou'd be invited in, and a Committee of both Houſes was accordingly appointed. Still this was judg'd ſo deſperate a Caſe, that upon the Lords nominating the Earl of Rutland and the Lord Grey of Wark, for that Embaſſy, the Earl upon Indiſpoſition of Health procur'd a Releaſe; and the other, who had never declin'd any Employment they cou'd confer on him, ſo poſitively refus'd to meddle in it, that he was committed to the Tower; and at laſt they were oblig'd to depute only Commoners to that Service: And ſo Sir William Armyne, Sir Henry Vane Junior, Mr. Hatcher, and Mr. Darley, aſſiſted with Mr. Marſhal and Mr. Nye, two of their principal Clergy, but of different Opinions, were embark'd in that Negotiation: In which, they who ſent them were ſo little ſatisfy'd, that they ſhou'd be driven to bring in Foreign Forces, a Scandal they had long thrown upon the King, that excepting a few deſperate Perſons, there was an univerſal Deſire of Peace. And their General's Inclination that way, his Correſpondence with thoſe Lords of the ſame Mind, and his ſevere Meſſages he ſent in Vindication of his late Inactivity, gave them all ſad Apprehenſions.

The King's Declaration after his late Succeſſes.

To work upon theſe diſcompos'd Humours, and to reduce them to ſuch a Temper as might produce the Kingdom's Peace, his Majeſty publiſh'd a pathetick Declaration to all his loving Subjects, after his Victories over the Lord Fairfax in the North, Sir William Waller in the Weſt, and the taking of Briſtol: 'In which he ſet forth the Ad'vantages he had gain'd, which might open the Eyes of thoſe 'who had been ſo miſerably ſeduc'd; and after a more 'ſolemn manner renew'd the noted Proteſtation he had 'made at the Head of his ſmall Army in September laſt, 'concerning the Proteſtant Religion, the Laws of the Land, 'the Liberties of the People, and the Privileges of Parlia'ment. Upon which he leaves the World to judge, whe'ther thoſe Men, who are profeſs'd Enemies to the eſta'bliſh'd Church, who perſecute the learned Orthodox Mi'niſters, and into their Places put ignorant and ſchiſmatical 'Preachers, who vilify the Common-Prayer, and profane 'God's Worſhip with their ſeditious Demeanour, are like 'to advance that Religion: Whether thoſe Men, who 'without Colour of Law, impoſe inſupportable Taxes, 'and odious Exciſes upon their Fellow-Subjects, and im'priſon and murder them, are like to preſerve the Liberty 'of the Subject: And whether thoſe Men, who ſeiz'd 'upon his own unqueſtionable Revenue, deny'd him his 'Negative Voice, by Force and Violence terrify'd the 'Members of both Houſes, and laſtly, as far as in them 'lies, have diſſolv'd the Parliament, by expelling and impri'ſoning the Members, and reſolving the whole Power into a 'Committee of a few Men, are like to vindicate and uphold 'the Privileges of Parliament. Therefore he conjures them 'to return to their Duty, and no longer ſuffer Themſelves 'to be miſ-led, their Prince diſhonour'd, and their Coun'try waſted and ruin'd by the Malice and Cunning of thoſe 'State Impoſtors, who under Pretence of Reformation 'wou'd introduce whatever is monſtrous and unnatural 'both in Religion and Policy; but rather free themſelves 'from this moſt intolerable kind of Slavery, that is, to be 'Slaves to their Fellow-Subjects. And after he has de'clar'd his Clemency and Readineſs to forgive, he deſires 'his good Subjects to put an End to theſe Miſeries, by 'bringing Men, Mony, Plate, Horſe or Arms, which may 'eſtabliſh a firm Peace; without the ſpeedy obtaining of 'which, this poor Kingdom will be utterly undone, tho' not 'abſolutely loſt.

This had a very remarkable Operation in the City of London, where the News of the Surrender of Briſtol had been receiv'd as a Sentence of Death, and where every Man reproach'd his Neighbour with his Want of Inclination to Peace, when good Conditions might be had, and applauded his own Wiſdom, for having fear'd It wou'd come to this. This new Declaration had been read by moſt Men, and was magnify'd 'as a moſt gracious and undeniable In'ſtance of his Majeſty's Clemency and Juſtice, and that 'he was ſo far from being exalted with his great Suc'ceſſes, that he renew'd all thoſe Promiſes for the Reli'gion, Laws and Liberties of the Kingdom, and Privileges 'of Parliament, which had been perverſly diſcredited be'fore, as proceeding from the Lowneſs of his Condition: 'And whereas they had been terrify'd with the Repre'ſentation of their own Guilt, and the Implacableneſs of 'the King's Temper, as if he deſign'd nothing but Conqueſt, 'his Majeſty had now offer'd all that cou'd be reaſonably de'ſir'd, and had expreſs'd himſelf a Prince not delighted with 'Blood and Revenge, but an indulgent Father to the moſt 'diſobedient Children.' In this Juncture of Affairs the Lords in their Houſe debated nothing but Expedients for Peace:

The Effects of it at Weſtminſter.

There

The Lords Propoſitions for Peace.

There was not above five of that Body who had any Inclination to continue the War; and the Earl of Eſſex, who was approaching them with a broken and diſmay'd Army, had ſufficiently declar'd he was weary of it, and held the cloſeſt Correſpondence with the moſt paſſionate Promoters of an Accommodation. So that on the fifth of Auguſt, they deſir'd a Conference with the Commons, and declar'd they were reſolv'd to ſend Propoſitions to the King, and they hop'd for their Concurrence: The Particulars were, '1. That both Armies be preſently disbanded, and his Majeſty entreated to return to 'his Parliament upon ſatisfactory Security. 2. That Religion be ſettled with the Advice of a Synod of Divines, 'in ſuch a manner as ſhall be agreed by the King and 'the two Houſes. 3. That the Militia be ſettled by a Bill, 'and all the Forts and Ships commanded by ſuch as the 'King ſhou'd appoint with the Approbation of the two 'Houſes; and the King's Revenue reſtor'd to him, with 'ſome Deductions for the Maintenance of his Children. '4. That the Members of both Houſes who had been expell'd only for their Abſence, or meer Compliance with 'the King, be reſtor'd to their Places. 5. That all Delinquents, from before the 10th of January 1641, be deliver'd up to the Juſtice of the Parliament, and a general 'Pardon for all others on both Sides. 6. That there be 'an Act of Oblivion for by-gone Deeds, and Acts of Hoſtility.'

The Commons Debates upon them.

They at laſt comply with the Lords.

When the Conference was reported in the Houſe of Commons, it produc'd a vaſt long and warm Debate, which laſted till Ten that Night, and continu'd a Day or two more: The more violent Party furiouſly inveigh'd againſt the Deſign it ſelf, of ſending to the King at all, and therefore wou'd not have the Lords Propoſitions ſo much as conſider'd. They alledg'd, 'They had receiv'd much 'Prejudice by the Treaty of Oxford; That the King ſince 'then had in Effect declar'd them to be no Parliament, 'and ſo they cou'd not treat in a ſafe Capacity: That 'they had ſent Members into Scotland to deſire Aſſiſtance, 'which that Kingdom was preparing with all Brotherly 'Affection and Forwardneſs; and after that to treat without their Privity, was to betray them, and forfeit all 'Hopes of future Aid. That London had expreſs'd all 'Chearfulneſs to recruit Sir William Waller, and the 'neighbouring Counties were ready to riſe as one Man, 'and furniſh the Earl of Eſſex with a better Army than 'ever he had, except the Diſcourſe of Peace extinguiſh'd 'the Zeal then flaming in the Hearts of the People.' But on the other Side, the more Moderate and leſs Deſperate alledg'd, 'They had been puniſh'd for breaking off the 'Treaty at Oxford, when they might have had better Terms 'than at preſent, which if they omitted, they wou'd meet 'with ſtill worſe: That they were not ſure of Aid from 'Scotland, nor was it ſcarce poſſible it ſhou'd come time 'enough to ſave them from imminent Ruin: And for the 'City of London, tho' the common Sort might deſire to 'mend their Fortunes by theſe Diſtractions, yet the moſt 'ſubſtantial Men deſir'd Peace, by their Refuſal of Mony 'for the carrying on the War. However, the ſending 'reaſonable Propoſitions to the King wou'd either procure a Peace, and ſo they ſhou'd need no Army; or by 'being refus'd, raiſe more Men and Mony than all their 'Ordinances without it.' Theſe Reaſons and Arguments prevail'd; ſo that at Ten a Clock at Night, it was reſolv'd upon the Queſtion, and carry'd by twenty nine Voices, 'That they ſhou'd inſiſt upon the Propoſitions, and ſend 'to the King.' And in all probability, if they had then ſent, a firm Peace had enſu'd; eſpecially ſince the Reſtoration of the Members, mention'd in the fourth Article, muſt have over-ballanc'd the Leaders and their Party, and prevented the kindling any more Fire in the Houſes.

The City petition againſt Peace.

The Commons reject the Lords Propoſitions.

But this laſt was too well known to be ſuffer'd to paſs; and therefore the next Day, being Sunday, the ſeditious Preachers fill'd all the Pulpits with Alarms of 'Ruin and 'Deſtruction to the City, if a Peace were now offer'd to 'the King;' and printed Papers were diſpers'd in the Streets, and fix'd on Poſts and all publick Places, requiring 'All well-affected Perſons to riſe as one Man, and 'repair to the Houſe of Commons next Morning, for 'twenty Thouſand Iriſh Rebels were juſt landed;' which Information was likewiſe given that Day in many Pulpits by their Preachers: And in other Papers ſet up, it was declar'd, 'That the Malignant Party had out-voted the 'Godly, and if not prevented, there wou'd be a Peace.' The Minds of the People being thus rous'd and prepar'd, Pennington their own Lord-Mayor, tho' on a Sunday, call'd a Common-Council; where a Petition was fram'd to the Houſe of Commons, taking notice 'of Propoſitions, paſs'd by the Houſe of Peers for Peace, which if 'allow'd, wou'd be deſtructive to Religion, Laws, and 'Liberties; and therefore deſired that Houſe to paſs an 'Ordinance, according to the Tenour of an Act of their 'Common-Council thereunto annex'd, for the vigorous 'proſecuting the War, and declining all Thoughts of 'Accommodation.' With this Petition, and a vaſt Attendance, the Lord-Mayor, who was a Member of the Commons, came to the Houſe and deliver'd it, with ſuch further Inſinuations of the Temper of the City, as were fit for the Purpoſe: the Multitude at the Door imperiouſly telling the Members of both Houſes, as they paſs'd, That if they had not a good Anſwer, they wou'd be there the next Day with double the Number. The Lords complain'd of the Tumults, and ſent to the Commons to joyn with them in their Suppreſſion; inſtead of which, the Commons, being thinn'd with the withdrawing of ſome, and awed with the Threats of others, gave the City Thanks for their Petition, Advice and Courage, and rejected the Propoſitions for Peace. Mr. Hollis ſays, the Rabble conſiſted of ſeveral Thouſands, who nam'd ſome Members of the Commons, whom they declar'd their Enemies; and tho' he himſelf had been too much engag'd in the like Practices, yet he exclaim'd againſt this, as the higheſt Strain of Inſolence in the Leaders, and the greateſt Violation of the Authority and Freedom of a Parliament, that before then was ever known.

A Female Tumult.

This rais'd a new Diviſion in the City, which was not willing to lye under the perpetual Brand of oppoſing Peace, as they did of firſt raiſing the War: Therefore the ſober Part of it wou'd gladly have diſcover'd their great Averſion to the late Act of the Common-Council; but the Execution of Tomkins and Chaloner, and the great Advantage taken againſt any who was moderately inclin'd, frighted all Men from openly appearing for what they moſt heartily deſir'd. At length the Women ſhew'd greater Courage than the Men; and having a Precedent of the ſucceſsful Appearance of a Rabble of that Sex in the Beginning of the Troubles, a great Multitude of the Wives of ſubſtantial Citizens and others came to the Houſe of Commons with a Petition for Peace. The Commons return'd Anſwer, 'That the Houſe was no Enemy to Peace, and 'doubted not in a ſhort Time to anſwer the Ends of their 'Petition, and deſir'd them to return to their Habitations.' But not being ſatisfy'd, they remain'd about the Place, and were in a little Time encreas'd to the Number of five Thouſand; and ſome Men in Women's Cloaths mix'd with them, and encourag'd them to go to the Commons Door, and cry Peace, Peace! which they did with that Hurry and Tumult, that none were ſuffer'd to go in or out of the Houſe for near two Hours. The Train'd-Bands that attended there, to fright them, firſt ſhot Powder; upon which they cry'd out, Nothing but Powder! and began to pelt them with Stones and Brickbats: Whereupon they ſhot Bullets, and kill'd two of their Company; which was ſo far from diſheartning them, that they cry'd out the louder, Give us theſe Traytors that are againſt Peace, that we may tear them in Pieces; give us that Dog Pym! At laſt a Troop of Horſe fell in amongſt them with their Swords, and by flaſhing and wounding many of them, eaſily diſpers'd the reſt. Serjeant Francis and Mr. Pulford were committed for promoting this Female Riot; and thoſe Members were eſpecially mark'd who ſeem'd moſt deſirous of Peace, that ſome Advantage might be taken againſt them. Upon diſcerning of which, many both of the Peers, and the Commons, firſt abſented themſelves, and then remov'd into thoſe Quarters under the King's Protection; and ſome of them went directly to Oxford.

The King's Army divided.

2. In the mean Time the King went from Oxford to Briſtol to ſettle the Government of that City, and to compoſe ſome Differences ariſing from thence between Prince Rupert and the Marqueſs of Hertford; which he did by conferring the Title of Governour of Briſtol upon Prince Rupert, and beſtowing the Power and Office it ſelf upon Sir Ralph Hopton. Here he found it high Time to reſolve upon further Action; and firſt it was debated in Council whether both Armies ſhou'd be united, which after many Arguments was reſolv'd to keep them diſtinct. So Prince Maurice and the Earl of Carnarvon were order'd to march with the Corniſh Army into the Weſt, and particularly againſt Dorcheſter, which was ſtrongly garriſon'd by the Parliament. The next Reſolution was concerning the King's own Motion with the other Army. As to which, there was not a Man, who did not think the reducing of Gloceſter, a City within little more than twenty Miles from Briſtol, of mighty Importance to the King, if it might be done without any great Loſs of Time or Men; and numerous Reaſons were given to ſhew the Advantage of the Conqueſt. Yet all the Reaſons and Motives were not thought worth the engaging his Army in a doubtful Siege; while the Parliament might recover their Fears, compoſe their Differences, and recruit their Army; therefore ſome other Meaſures were propos'd. But that which turn'd the Scale as to Gloceſter, was the Effects of a ſecret Correſpondence between Colonel Leg, and the Governour of 1643. Car. 19. the City Colonel Maſſy, a ſtout and diligent Officer, a Soldier of Fortune, and formerly in the King's Service; which cauſ'd ſome to believe that he was not immoveable, and Colonel Leg to ſound his Inclinations to the Bottom. Upon Tryal, he gave a fair Intimation, 'That if Prince 'Rupert appear'd before the Town, he muſt make all 'poſſible Reſiſtance; but if the King himſelf appear'd, he 'wou'd not hold it out againſt Him; and in that Caſe he 'ſhou'd be able to perſuade thoſe of the Town, which 'otherwiſe he cou'd not do.' Hereupon the King reſolv'd to appear before Gloceſter, but not to be engag'd in a Siege, and accordingly ſent his Army that Way; and the next Day follow'd with the Remainder of his Forces, having firſt honour'd Sir Ralph Hopton with the Title of Baron Hopton of Stratton, in Memory of the ſucceſsful Battel fought there, as was formerly hinted.

The King goes before Gloceſter, and Summons it.

On Wedneſday the tenth of Auguſt the King drew his whole Army upon a fair Hill, in full View of the City, and within leſs than two Miles of it; and about two in the Afternoon he ſent two Heralds with this Summons to the Town, 'That out of his tender Compaſſion to his 'City of Gloceſter, and to prevent the Prejudice from his 'Army, if he was compell'd to aſſault it, He was Perſonally come before it, to require the ſame; and was graciouſly pleas'd to let the Inhabitants and others know, 'That if they yielded, all ſhou'd have Pardon without 'Exception, without Damage to any Perſon in their Eſtates, and ſuch a Governour and moderate Garriſon 'ſhou'd be appointed, as was moſt for the Eaſe and Security of the City and County: But if they ſhou'd neglect 'this Proffer of Grace, they muſt thank themſelves for all 'the Calamities that ſhou'd befal them. To this Meſſage 'he expected a full Anſwer within two Hours, and granted Liberty for any Perſons ſafely to repair to, and return from him.' Within leſs than the Time preſcrib'd, there return'd two Citizens from the Town, with lean, pale and ugly Viſages, and in Garbs ſo ſtrange and unuſual, that at once gave Mirth to the moſt ſevere Countenances, and Sadneſs to the moſt chearful Hearts, who concluded that ſuch Ambaſſadors cou'd bring no leſs than a Defiance. Theſe, without any Marks of Duty or good Manners, in a pert, ſhrill, fearleſs Tone, ſaid, They brought an Anſwer from the Godly City of Gloceſter to the King; and were ſo ready in their inſolent Anſwers, as if they deſign'd to provoke the King to break his ſafe Conduct. They brought this Anſwer in Writing: 'We the 'Magiſtrates, &c. in Gloceſter, unto your Majeſty's gracious Meſſage return this humble Anſwer; That we do 'keep this City according to our Oaths and Allegiance, 'to and for the Uſe of his Majeſty, and his Royal Poſterity; and do accordingly conceive our ſelves wholly 'bound to obey the Commands of his Majeſty, ſignify'd 'by both Houſes of Parliament; and are reſolv'd by 'God's help to keep the City accordingly:' Subſcrib'd by Wiſe the Mayor, Maſſy the Governor, with thirteen of the Aldermen and moſt ſubſtantial Citizens, and eleven Officers of the Garriſon. And as ſoon as their Meſſengers return'd, without waiting for the King's Reſolutions, the Suburbs of the City, conſiſting of large, fair and well inhabited Buildings, were ſet on Fire; ſo that queſtionleſs the King was to expect nothing but an obſtinate Defence of the Place.

The Citizens and Garriſon's Anſwer.

This unexpected Indignity prompted Reſolutions of Revenge; and ſome thought the King ſo far engag'd, that in Honour he was oblig'd to ſit down before the Town, and force it: And theſe Inclinations made them more ready to believe what was ſaid of the ſmall Proviſions, and Ammunition, and the Weakneſs of the Place, and the Diſobligation of the Inhabitants occaſion'd by the Burning of the Suburbs; together with the preſent Diſability of the Parliament to relieve it at that Diſtance. Above all, the Confidence of the beſt experienc'd Soldiers, who were of Opinion, That they ſhou'd be able to take it by Approach in leſs than ten Days, ſo far prevail'd, that the Siege was unanimouſly agreed on in a Council of War. So the King immediately ſent to Oxford, for General Ruthen, now Earl of Brentford, to come with what Foot cou'd be ſpared, and all his Battering-Pieces; and diſpatcht Orders to Sir William Vavaſour, who now commanded the Forces in South Wales, to draw all his Men to the Foreſt Side of the Town; where the Bridges being broken down, a ſmall Strength wou'd cut off all Communication from the Garriſon. Thus was the King engag'd in a long and unſucceſsful Siege; which gave Time to the diſtracted Spirits at London to breath and compoſe themſelves, and more methodically to relieve themſelves, when their Caſe ſeem'd almoſt incurable. This gave a great and ſtrange Turn to the King's Affairs, and many Writers have believ'd it to be the Effect of treacherous Counſel, tho' ſome of the Adviſers were of unqueſtion'd Honeſty and Loyalty: For had the King, before the Diviſion of his Army, reſolv'd to march up to London, and had had Authority enough to command the Earl of Newcaſtle's paſſing through the Aſſociated Counties, and Joyning with him, humanly ſpeaking, it had rais'd ſuch a Confuſion among the two Houſes and the Londoners, that he might have had his own Terms, and finiſh'd the War at once. But the neglecting this Opportunity prov'd agreeable to that uſeful Obſervation, 'That ſometimes Providence gives a Man 'but one ſingle Seaſon to lay hold on.'

The King inveſts the Town.

Cenſure upon it.

Several Writers have been very free in cenſuring this unhappy Step; but there was one Circumſtance, which was a Secret in thoſe Days, and probably unknown to them. Upon the News of the taking of Briſtol, the King from Oxford had ſent an Expreſs to the Earl of Newcaſtle, who was then unfortunately engag'd to appear before Hull, That if he found the Siege of Hull very difficult, he ſhou'd leave it block'd up, and march with his Army into the aſſociated Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, &c. which was then eaſier to effect, ſince Lyn had lately been ſurpris'd for the King's Uſe; and if he wou'd bring his Army through the Counties towards London, the King wou'd march with his own towards it on the other Side. And when the King was before Gloceſter, and juſt before he began the Siege, he receiv'd the Earl of Newcaſtle's Anſwer, 'That he cou'd not poſſibly comply with his 'Commands, becauſe the Gentlemen who commanded 'the beſt Regiments, utterly refus'd to march, except Hull 'were firſt taken:' Which Advertiſement, with the Advantage of taking of Gloceſter, and the Concurrence of the Officers, produc'd that Reſolution of attempting it, notwithſtanding the Queen her ſelf writ ſo earneſtly againſt it, that the King took a Journey to Oxford, to convince her Majeſty, and compoſe ſome Differences then ariſing in the Council. As to the Earl of Newcaſtle, it appears from Sir Philip Warwick and others, that he deſign'd himſelf to be the Man that ſhou'd turn the Scale in the great Affairs of the Nation, and to be Independent and Self-Subſiſting, where-ever he march'd; therefore he ever declin'd coming nearer to the King, fearing he ſhou'd be eclips'd by the Court, and his Authority overſhadow'd by the Superiority of Prince Rupert. Therefore we cannot think it unnatural or ſtrain'd to ſay, That the aſpiring Earl was the main Occaſion of the Failure of this great Project, upon which the Nation's Fate ſo much depended.

The Earl of Newcaſtle blam'd.

The Siege it ſelf.

The Siege of Gloceſter laſted above three Weeks, and with a ſlow Progreſs; for tho' the Army was much increas'd by the Acceſs of Forces from all Quarters, yet the King wanted both Mony and Materials for a Siege, and the Garriſon and the Inhabitants behav'd themſelves with great Courage and Bravery, made many bold Sallies upon the King's Forces, and uſually did more Hurt than they receiv'd; the Governour himſelf performing every Thing that became a vigilant Commander. It was often found that theſe deſperate Sallies were the Effect of Drink, and that the Governor had upon thoſe Occaſions allow'd the Men great Quantities of Wine and Strong Waters. Yet it was very obſervable, that in all the Time of the Siege, when there was ſo great a Proſpect of reducing the Place, but one Officer and three Common Soldiers deſerted to the King; a mighty Proof of the good Diſcipline within. On the other Side there grew a very great Licentiouſneſs in the King's Army, both among the Officers and Soldiers; the Malignity of thoſe Parts being thought Excuſe for the Exerciſe of any Rapine among the Inhabitants. Inſomuch that it is hardly to be believ'd, how many Thouſand Sheep were in a few Days deſtroy'd, beſides what were brought in for a regular Proviſion; and how many Country Men were impriſon'd by Officers, without Warrant, or Knowledge of the King's, till they had paid good Sums for their Delinquency; all which rais'd a great Clamour againſt the Diſcipline of the Army, and the Juſtice of the Officers, and made them alſo leſs prepar'd for the Service they were to expect.

3. During this memorable Siege, the Diſtractions and Apprehenſions were very great at London; all which were increas'd by the News of the daily Succeſs of the Army under Prince Maurice and the Earl of Carnarvon, which took thoſe conſiderable Places of Dorcheſter, Weymouth and Portland, with little or no Reſiſtance; and that Exeter it ſelf and other Towns were like to meet with the ſame Fate. The Leaders therefore, having diverted the late Danger of a Peace, which might have torn up their Cauſe by the Roots, carefully conſider'd their whole Strength, and apply'd themſelves to the Recovery of the Spirits of their General; whoſe late Indiſpoſition threatned them more than any other Diſtreſs they felt. For the Curing of which, they cunningly apply'd Remedies of contrary Natures, which wou'd yet work to the ſame End: Firſt they careſs'd Sir William Waller with extraordinary Marks of Kindneſs; and as he was met at his Return, after a moſt ruinous Defeat, with all the Train'd-Bands and Militia in London, and receiv'd as a moſt victorious General, ral, ſo he was immediately choſen Commander in Chief of the Forces and Militia of the City, with a particular and publick Promiſe from the two Houſes, ‘ That they wou'd ‘ forthwith ſupply him with a good Body of Horſe and Foot, ‘ to take the Field again, and relieve their diſtreſſed Friends ‘ in the Weſt.’ Then another Ordinance was paſs'd to raiſe another great Army under the Earl of Mancheſter, a ſteddy Perſon, who had never harkned to any Overture of Peace, in order to oppoſe the Earl of Newcaſtle, and to take Charge of all the Aſſociated Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Eſſex, Hertford, Huntington, Cambridge, and the Iſle of Ely: And likewiſe an Ordinance paſs'd for Preſſing great Numbers, to ſerve both under the Earl of Mancheſter and Sir William Waller.

A new Army to be raiſed under the Earl of Mancheſter.

Cromwell's Riſe and Character.

The Earl of Mancheſter immediately enter'd upon his Province, which had been well prepar'd for him by the Vigour and Activity of Colonel Oliver Cromwell, whoſe Fortunes were now altogether deſperate, and whoſe Greatneſs was founded upon this Employment; of which extraordinary Man it will be proper to take ſome Notice in this Place. He was the younger Branch of an ancient and conſiderable Family in the County of Huntington, and born in the Town of Huntington in the Year 1599; whoſe Father being a younger Brother, allow'd the keeping of a publick Brew-Houſe to his Wife, who was Daughter to Sir Richard Steward, and whoſe Name alone was believ'd to have ſome Influence upon the Son's Actions. His Education was partly in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and partly in Lincoln's-Inn; of which he made no great Advantage, but for ſome Years after his Return led a debauch'd, riotous and boiſterous Courſe of Life, to the manifeſt Diſturbance of all the Neighbourhood, and to the Ruin of his Paternal Eſtate; which caus'd his Uncle, and God-Father, Sir Oliver Cromwell, utterly to diſcard and reject him. At length being reform'd, and falling into the Hands of ſome Puritan Divines, he ran into the contrary Extreams, and ſeem'd overgrown in a ſhort Time with Rigidneſs and Enthuſiaſm, and imitated and practis'd all the Peculiarities, both as to the Prayers and Sermons of the moſt preciſe of that Party. Here was a Perſon of a deep Thought, of a rough and unpoliſh'd Converſation, and of a reſolute and aſpiring Temper, and ready to head any Faction; as he boldly did in the Year 1638, againſt the King and ſome Lords, who became Undertakers for the Draining of the Fens. He joyn'd himſelf to thoſe who pretended to Tranſports and Revelations; and, as his own Phyſician obſerv'd, was himſelf a moſt Splenetick Perſon, often troubled with Dreams and Fancies, and ſtrange Preſages of his future Greatneſs; and yet ſtill the moſt diſtinguiſhing Part of his Character was a radical and original Hypocriſy, which he cultivated with ſuch indefatigable Pains and exquiſite Art, that it always turn'd to his Uſe and Benefit. Having ſpent moſt of a ſecond and better Eſtate, which had been left him by the Death of his Uncle Steward, he got to be elected a Member of this long Parliament, for the Town of Cambridge, chiefly by the Intereſt of Mr. Hambden, whoſe Kinſwoman he had marry'd. At firſt he made but a ſmall Figure in the Houſe, and was much inferior to the Leaders. Sir Philip Warwick deſcribes his firſt Appearance there; A Gentleman ſpeaking very ordinarily, apparell'd in a plain Cloth Sute, made by an ill Country Taylor; his Linnen mean, and not very clean; his Band unfaſhionable, with a Speck or two of Blood upon it; his Hat without a Hat-Band, his Sword cloſe to his Side, his Countenance ſwoln and reddiſh, his Voice ſharp and untunable, and his Elocution full of Fervour, and defending ſome Libels againſt the Queen, was much harken'd to. But he ſoon improv'd, and ſhew'd himſelf another Man; and by the Help of good Cloaths, Converſation and Succeſs, appeared of a great and majeſtick Deportment, and of a lofty and comely Preſence. Towards which he had ſingular Advantages from two great Maſters, Mr. Pym, and Mr. Hambden, who cunningly made uſe of his bold and enterprizing Spirit, at a time when he had nothing to loſe, and very much to expect.

His Behaviour in the Beginning of the War.

At the breaking out of the War, this Gentleman had a Commiſſion given him by the Parliament to be Captain of a Troop of Horſe, which he ſoon rais'd in his own native Country; where he ſhew'd himſelf more openly againſt the King, than any other Officer, and told his Men when they were firſt muſter'd, That he wou'd not cozen them by the perplex'd Expreſſions in his Commiſſion, To fight for King and Parliament; therefore if the King chanc'd to be in the Body of the Enemy, he wou'd as ſoon diſcharge his Piſtol upon him, as any private Perſon; and if their Conſcience wou'd not permit them to do the like, he adviſ'd them not to liſt themſelves under him. This was thought very bold and dangerous at that Time; yet it ſerv'd his Turn, and diſtinguiſh'd, and united all the furious Men againſt the Government, to look upon him as a Man true to their Intereſt, and one on whom they might depend to go through the Work he had undertaken. In this Year he was made a Colonel, and by his own Management rais'd a Regiment of no leſs than a thouſand Horſe; with which he ſecured the Town of Cambridge, rang'd about, and with great Diligence obſtructed many Levys for the King in Cambridgeſhire, Eſſex, Suffolk and Norfolk; and particularly he ruined the Deſign of a Counter-Aſſociation, made by Sir John Pettus, Sir Edward Barker, and other Gentlemen, at the Town of Leſtoft in Suffolk, where he was in ſome Danger of his Perſon. Having ſecur'd thoſe Counties, he marched into Lincolnſhire, towards the Town of Gainsborough, which had been juſt taken by the Lord Willoughby of Parham, who at the ſame time took the Earl of Kingſton Priſoner, and ſending him to Hull, the good Earl was unfortunately ſlain in his Paſſage. Near Gainsborough, Cromwell encounter'd with a Party under the brave Colonel Cavendiſh, and after ſome Time routed them: The Colonel himſelf, after a moſt valiant Reſiſtance, was driven into a Quagmire, or rather the Mud of the River Trent, where he is ſaid to have been ſlain in cold Blood, after Quarter had been given him by Colonel Bury; tho' others ſay he dy'd Magnanimouſly refuſing Quarter, throwing the Blood running from his Wounds in his Enemies Faces. This hapned in the latter End of July, to the great Affliction of all that knew this gallant Commander. As to his Perſon, the Writer of his Life ſays, The Sun beheld not a Youth of a more manly Figure, and a more winning Preſence: He was a Gentleman ſo furniſh'd with all the deep and politer Parts of Learning, as well as Perſonal Courage, that he was prepar'd to defend his Prince with his Head and Hand, by the ſtrongeſt Reaſons, and moſt generous Valour. When his Body was brought to Newark, the whole Town was ſo infinitely fond of it, that they wou'd not ſuffer it to be interr'd, till for ſome Days they had view'd it with their Eyes, and embalm'd it with their Tears. Nay, thirty Years after, when his Body was mov'd to Derby, freſh Lamentations were made by thoſe that knew, and others that heard of his Fame; and all the People of Newark expreſs'd the moſt ſorrowful Unwillingneſs to part with the Reliques of ſo dear a Perſon, who had been the Ornament and Defence of that Place.

Cromwell's Way of modelling the Army.

The Beginning of Independency.

Cromwell's great Deſign was by his new Army to attempt to change the whole Diſcipline of the Parliament's Forces; for having obſerv'd that the King's Horſe, who were his greateſt Strength, conſiſted of Gentlemen, and ſuch as were led on by a Senſe of Honour, and were accordingly ſucceſsful, he believ'd if the Parliament Horſe cou'd be form'd out of the moſt zealous of their Party, ſuch as were perſuaded by their Miniſters Sermons, That they were fighting God's Cauſe, and thoſe that were kill'd, dy'd in the Favour of God, they might ſet this Impulſe of Conſcience againſt the others Senſe of Honour, and arrive at a greater Probability of Succeſs than before. And this Method he put in Practice, as far as poſſible, in his new-rais'd Forces, of whom moſt of the Officers were very great Zealots, and the Soldiers gradually became of the ſame Leaven; for they had all either naturally the Phanatick Humour, or ſoon imbib'd it. A Herd of this Sort of People being drawn together by his Intereſt, he himſelf, like a Mahomet, having Tranſports of Fancy, and withal a crafty Underſtanding, and knowing the Strength of natural Principles, made uſe of the Zeal and Credulity of thoſe Perſons, and by his own Preaching taught them, as they too readily taught themſelves, That they engag'd for God, when he led them againſt their King. And where this Opinion met with a natural Courage, it made them more bold, and often more cruel; and theſe Men being more us'd to Spiritual Pride, than Carnal Intemperance, where natural Courage was wanting, Zeal ſupply'd its Place; ſo that at firſt they choſe rather to die, than fly, and Cuſtom remov'd the Fear of Danger. And afterwards finding the Sweet of good Pay, of opulent Plunder, and of Preferment ſuitable to their Activity and Merit, the lucrative Part made Gain ſeem to them a natural Concomitant of Godlineſs. Here was the main Root of Independency, which in Time ruin'd both the King and his Friends, and likewiſe the very Heads of the Rebellion.

The Earl of Eſſex fix'd to the Parliament.

4. To return to the Parliament: The Leaders having ſecur'd to themſelves the Earl of Mancheſter and Sir William Waller, and made the Earl of Eſſex to ſee, that they had another Earl, and more Generals than one at their Devotion, they ſent a formal Committee of both Houſes to him, to uſe all imaginable Skill to recover him to his former Vigour and Zeal. They highly applauded his great Services, and made ample Promiſes of Satisfaction to his Honour, and full Support to his Forces. Whether their Perſuaſions, with the Jealouſie of the Earl of Mancheſter, or the cunning Infuſions of the Lord Say and Mr. Pym, of the Deſperateneſs of his own Condition, wrought upon him; or whether he wanted Steadineſs to engage in ſo difficult a Task as an Accommodation, he became inſenſibly alter'd from his moderate Inclinations and Deſire of Peace. The Confidence in him had given many Lords the Spirit to appear Champions for Peace, who before had been as ſollicitous againſt it; and they deſign'd to have appear'd in the Army, and proteſted againſt the late Tumults in the City, and their over-ruling the Freedom of Parliament. But this ſtaggering in their General fruſtrated that Deſign, and put them upon other Reſolutions: And now having render'd themſelves very ungracious in the Houſes, and poſſibly ſuſpecting the Earl of Eſſex might diſcover ſome of their Overtures, many of them left the Town, and either went directly to Oxford, or into the King's Quarters. The Earl of Portland and the Lord Lovelace, who had only ſtaid to be the more ſerviceable to the King, went ſtrait to Oxford, and the Lord Conway ſhortly after them: The Earl of Clare went into Worceſterſhire, and from thence, by the King's Conſent, to Oxford; there being no other Objection to his Lordſhip, but his ſtaying ſo long at London. The Earls of Bedford and Holland, more obnoxious to the Court, having their Deſigns diſcover'd or ſuſpected, not without ſome Difficulty got into the King's Garriſon at Wallingford, from whence the Governor gave Advice of their Arrival. The great Earl of Northumberland, with the leave of the Houſe, retir'd for his Health to his Houſe at Petworth in Suſſex; waiting there for ſome favourable Opportunity, and to hear of the Succeſs of the other Lords. By the Abſence of theſe, the violent Party eaſily carry'd all before them; and for their further Security, they order'd the Divines of the Aſſembly to repair to their Cures, eſpecially in the aſſociated Counties under the Earl of Mancheſter, to ſtir up the People to riſe as one Man againſt their Sovereign; not a little pleas'd, that the King had given them Time to compoſe their Diviſions, by his Stay before Gloceſter; which they look'd upon as the greater Happineſs, becauſe at the ſame time there were ſudden Inſurrections in Kent, in Defence of the known Laws, eſpecially the Common-Prayer Book; which they wou'd never have been able to ſuppreſs, if the King's Army had been at a convenient Diſtance.

The Earls of Bedford and Holland and other Lords leave the Parliament.

This Revolt, or the going over of the Lords into the King's Quarters, occaſion'd great Debates in Council, as to the Manner of their Reception. No great Difficulties were rais'd concerning the Earls of Portland and Clare, and the Lords Conway and Lovelace; but the main Diſpute was concerning the two Earls of Bedford and Holland, who had given Notice of their Arrival at Wallingford; the Earl of Bedford having ſerv'd in Perſon againſt the King, as General of the Parliament's Horſe, and the Earl of Holland, in the King's Opinion, having done worſe; which was a Matter of ſo much Niceneſs, that it prov'd one Motive of the King's ſudden Journey from Gloceſter to Oxford. Here his Majeſty found much Uneaſineſs as to the Siege of Gloceſter, and the Adviſers much condemn'd, and likewiſe no ſmall Jealouſie in the Queen, That there was a Deſign to leſſen her Intereſt with the King, and that Prince Rupert was Chief in that Conſpiracy. Having ſoon compos'd thoſe Miſtakes, he attended to the warm Debates in his Council, concerning the Reception that ought to be given to the two Earls of Bedford and Holland. The foul Ingratitude of the latter was very much aggravated, and the Behaviour of both, at this Time, look'd upon as the Effect of the preſent low Condition of the Parliament; ſo that ſome were of Opinion that they ought to be treated with Severity, and made Priſoners; others thought they ſhou'd be barely permitted to come to Oxford, without any Reſpect paid to them; and ſome, as Mr. Hyde in particular, urg'd that they might be receiv'd with all the Marks of Confidence and Civility, ſo as to incourage other great Men to deſert the Intereſt of the Parliament. This Advice wou'd probably have been beſt for the King's Affairs at this Juncture; but his Majeſty thought fit to take a ſort of a middle Way, to allow the Earls to come to Oxford, and every one to treat them as they thought fit, and himſelf wou'd look upon them according to their future Behaviour. Accordingly the two Earls came, and, together with the Earl of Clare, enter'd into the King's Service in Gloceſterſhire; They were receiv'd without any Diſreſpect; but their Expectations were never anſwer'd.

Great Debates about their Reception.

About the ſame Time the brave Earl of Montroſs, together with his intimate Friend the Lord Ogilby, came to wait upon his Majeſty from Scotland, being well aſſur'd of the approaching Storm from that Kingdom. The Scots, finding that they cou'd not obtain the King's Permiſſion for the calling of a Parliament, had, by the Advice of Sir Thomas Hope, call'd a Convention of the Eſtates, which might as well effect their Deſigns as the other; but the Reaſons of this Aſſembly being kept ſecret, Montroſs, whom the Leaders had reſolv'd to gain, was one of the firſt that was made privy to it. They artfully ſounded him, and he no leſs ſubtlely giving them Hopes that he wou'd not be inflexible, they diſcover'd to him their Deſign of taking up Arms for the Parliament of England, offering to make him Lieutenant-General in the Army. He receiv'd their Secret and Offer with the ſame Diſſimulation he had us'd to draw it from them, and gave them cauſe to hope, without engaging in any poſitive Promiſe; but having brought himſelf off, upon pretence of Non-agreement among themſelves, he deſir'd them to bring Things to a Certainty, before he contracted with them, and privately leaving them, he and his Friend Ogilby came now and acquainted the King with all their Deſigns. But Biſhop Guthry tells us, That they found his Majeſty ſo confident, upon the Aſſurance the Marqueſs of Hamilton had ſent him from York by the Queen, that nothing they ſuggeſted to the contrary, cou'd prevail with him to attempt any Thing for Prevention. His Majeſty had ſtill the higheſt Confidence in that great Lord, whom he had lately made a Duke; and juſt before this Information, he had receiv'd a Letter from him, in which he wiſh'd not only Life and Fortune, but his Soul might periſh, if he left any Thing uneſſay'd and undone, that was in his Power for the King's Service; as appears in the Memoirs of Him and his Brother.

Montroſs diſcovers the Scots Deſign to the King.

But in vain.

5. In the mean Time, at London nothing was left unattempted, that cou'd provide for the Relief of Gloceſter; and all the Shops in the City were ſolemnly order'd to be ſhut up, till the Siege of that Place was rais'd. All Overtures of Peace were totally ſuppreſs'd, the Pulpits reſounded nothing but War, and a Book was ſet out by Mr. Saltmarſh, a noted Miniſter, in which among others were theſe Points of Advice. '1. That all Means ſhou'd be us'd to 'keep the King and his People from a ſudden Union. 2. 'To cheriſh the War under the Notion of Popery, as the 'ſureſt Means to engage the People. 3. If the King wou'd 'not grant their Demands, then to root him out, and 'the Royal Line, and to Collate the Crown upon ſome 'Body elſe.' Some ſober Perſons excepting againſt this in the Houſe of Commons, the famous Harry Martin ſaid, He ſaw no Reaſon to condemn Mr. Saltmarſh, and that it were better one Family ſhou'd be deſtroy'd, than many. Sir Nevil Pool mov'd that Mr. Martin might explain what one Family he meant: Upon which he boldly anſwer'd, The King and his Children. This gave ſo great Offence, that ſome Members exclaim'd againſt the Lewdneſs of his Life, as well as the Height and Danger of the Words; and after ſome ſharp Speeches, he was ſent to the Tower, but was ſhortly after releas'd, and a longer Time after readmitted to his Place in Parliament. About the ſame Time Sir John Conyers laying down the Lieutenancy of the Tower, the Cuſtody of it was given by the Houſes to Pennington the Lord-Mayor; that the City might ſee they were allowed to hold their own Reins, and truſted with a Juriſdiction that had always juſtled with their own. Which Compliment ſerv'd to a double Purpoſe; for as by this they made the City believe they had put themſelves under their Protection, they had rather put the City under the Power of One, who wou'd never abandon them out of an Inclination for Peace.

The Earl of Eſſex now declar'd, that he himſelf wou'd undertake the Relief of Gloceſter, whereas Sir William Waller had been deſign'd for that Employment, and was return'd to his old Vigour againſt the King, and recover'd thoſe Officers and Soldiers again, who had abſented upon his Connivance, or an Opinion he wou'd march no more: Yet his Numbers increas'd not ſo faſt as the Occaſion requir'd; for Colonel Maſſy found Means to ſend many Meſſengers out of the Town, to diſcover his Diſtreſs, and the Time he ſhou'd be able to hold out. Their Ordinance of Preſſing, tho' executed with unuſual Rigour, did not anſwer their Expectation; ſo that they were forc'd to apply themſelves to their true Friends, the Citizens, whom they allarm'd with the King's Irreconcilableneſs to them, to ſend what Aſſiſtance they cou'd in this Exigency. At length ſo many Regiments of Horſe and Foot as the Earl deſir'd, were aſſign'd to march with them; and ſo towards the End of Auguſt he left London, with the Prayers of the People for Succeſs, and at his Rendezvous at Ayleſbury, he was met by the Lord Grey, and other Forces of the aſſociated Counties; from whence he march'd by eaſy Journies towards Gloceſter, with an Army of above eight Thouſand Foot, and four Thouſand Horſe. It wou'd not at firſt be credited in the Camp, that the Earl cou'd be in a Condition to attempt ſuch a Work; and therefore they were too negligent upon the Intelligence, and rather ſuſpected that he wou'd give ſome Allarm to Oxford, where the Queen was, and endeavour to divert the Siege, than venture upon ſo tedious a March, in which he muſt paſs a Campaign of near thirty Miles, where half the King's Horſe might diſtreſs, if not deſtroy his Army, and through a Country eaten bare, where he cou'd neither find Proviſion for Man or Horſe: And if he ſhou'd paſs without Impediment into Gloceſterſhire, he cou'd neither continue there, nor retire to London, without being deſtroy'd in the Rear by the King's Army, and that without the Hazard of a Battle. Upon theſe Concluſions, they proceeded in their Works before Gloceſter, having near finiſh'd their Galleries, and and contriv'd ſeveral Engines for Battery, and other Uſes. But Maſſy, by his indefatigable Activity, did continually oppoſe Force to Force, Sallies to Aſſaults, and Countermines to Mines from without. Tho' neither as yet underſtood the Methods of Beſieging and Defending, that part of War being in its Infancy in England; yet the Bravery of the Defendants was very remarkable, and carry'd the Cauſe, ſince they held out till the Arrival of their Succours.

The King being inform'd of the Enemies Advance, ſent Prince Rupert with all the Horſe to interrupt their March; which he did by continual Excurſions, Velitations, and forcing of Poſts and Quarters. At Stow in the Would, the Prince drawing all his Horſe in one continu'd Line, upon the Side of a Hill, made a very great Appearance. On the contrary, the Enemy march'd up the Aſcent in Battalia; where Lieutenant-Colonel Bayly, with the City Regiments, were in the Left Wing, and Colonel Harvey, with his Regiment of Horſe and two of Foot, being ſomewhat advanc'd on the Right, the Prince ſent a ſtrong Party, with Orders to endeavour to get between them and Home: Which being perceiv'd, three Regiments more were ſent to his Aſſiſtance; which, with the Thunder of their Cannon, oblig'd the Royaliſts, after ſome ſkirmiſhing, to retire to their Body; which being compos'd only of Horſe, gave Way to this great Army, which was juſt before encreas'd at Brackley-Heath. The King himſelf was very deſirous of a Treaty, and ſent a Trumpeter with Propoſitions to the Earl of Eſſex, who crudely anſwer'd, That he had Orders to relieve Gloceſter, not to treat. Upon which the King aroſe from before the Place, and paſs'd the River, with a Deſign to fight the Enemy upon their Return; which was thought a great Omiſſion, ſince if he had fought them before they reach'd the Town, he had probably defeated them, or ſtopp'd their Progreſs, either of which wou'd have oblig'd the Town to ſurrender; for the Earl of Eſſex found but one Barrel of Powder, and other Proviſions as low, in the Place. Thus on the 5th Day of September was the Siege of Gloceſter rais'd, after the King's Forces had lain before it three Weeks, and five Days; and it muſt be own'd that the Bravery of the Governor gave a Stop to the Career of the King's good Fortunes, and from his invincible Defence of that Place, the Parliament had Time to recover their broken Forces, and more broken Spirits, and did owe to this Riſe, the Greatneſs to which they afterwards aſpir'd.

The Siege rais'd.

The Affairs of Ireland.

X. 1. Soon after this great Diſappointment at Gloceſter, the King, by means of his urgent Neceſſities, and the extream Miſeries of his Proteſtant Subjects in Ireland, was forc'd to condeſcend to a Matter that was turn'd as much againſt his Reputation, as the other was againſt his Intereſt. Ireland for a long Time had lain languiſhing and weltring in her Blood, and there hapned many ſtrange and memorable Actions, which do not ſo properly come within the Compaſs of an Engliſh Hiſtory; tho' ſeveral of them were ſignal Inſtances of the Divine Vengeance againſt perfidious and inhuman Traitors, who had receiv'd all manner of Encouragement and Aſſiſtance from Spain, France, and Rome it ſelf. The famous Marqueſs of Ormond, by his own powerful Sway, had made a glorious Stand, and with unparallel'd Courage and Conduct, and almoſt miraculous Succeſs, had hitherto reſtrain'd the Rage and Fury of the Rebels; and indeed he was a Man ſo accompliſh'd, that he had either no Enemies, or ſuch as were aſham'd to be thought ſo. But this Summer the Affairs of that Kingdom ſuffer'd beyond Expreſſion for want of Proviſions, Mony and Ammunition out of England, which the two Houſes of Parliament, by Agreement, and the King's Authority, were oblig'd to ſend. Several melancholy Letters and Meſſages were ſent, both to the King and the two Houſes, from the Lords Juſtices of Ireland, to repreſent their diſmal Condition, and the abſolute Neceſſity of Supplies; but all to little or no Effect, for neither Party cou'd do what they deſir'd, and each was ready to caſt the Blame upon the other. His Majeſty alſo receiv'd other Advices from the chief Men of that Kingdom, who were Abhorrers of the Rebellion, 'That now there was no reaſonable Hope of preſerving his Proteſtant Subjects, and his own Intereſt in Ireland, but by treating with the Rebels, and making a Peace, or Truce with them.' This was a terrible Hardſhip upon the King, who had been ſo ſcandalouſly charg'd with countenancing that Rebellion, and had bound Himſelf not to make a Peace with the Rebels without the Conſent of his two Houſes of Parliament. But as nothing was more evident, than that his Proteſtant Subjects cou'd not ſubſiſt without extraordinary Aid from England, which was as impoſſible for him to ſend, as it was for the Parliament, while the War continu'd doubtful; ſo he was plainly reduc'd to this Choice, 'Whether he wou'd preſerve the Remainder of his Proteſtant Subjects, and the whole Kingdom of Ireland, with the Inconvenience of ſome perverſe and unreaſonable Scandal; or ſuffer them to be rooted out, and undergo the perpetual Obloquy of loſing a Kingdom, and abandon the moſt miſerable Objects of Pity, when it was in his Power to have preſerv'd One and the Other.' Then it was further conſider'd, that the two Houſes had not perform'd their Parts in thoſe Acts that had bound the King, but had employ'd the Mony that had been rais'd by thoſe very Acts for the Relief of Ireland, in the Maintenance of their firſt rais'd Forces; ſo that the King might reaſonably think himſelf diſengag'd on his Part, eſpecially when his own and his poor Subjects Neceſſities requir'd it.

The Marqueſs of Ormond's Bravery.

The King neceſſitated to treat with the Rebels.

1643. Car. 19.

Upon theſe Conſiderations, his Majeſty, after two Months waiting for the Parliament's Proceedings, about the End of July wrote to the Lords Juſtices of Ireland, 'That they ſhou'd iſſue out a Commiſſion, under the great Seal of Ireland, to the Marqueſs of Ormond, to Treat and Conclude a Ceſſation of Arms with the Rebels, upon ſuch Articles and Conditions as he ſhou'd judge moſt reaſonable; and during that Ceſſation, that ſuch Agents as they cou'd chuſe, ſhou'd have Acceſs to his Royal Perſon, to preſent their own Propoſitions for Peace.' Hereupon the Marqueſs of Ormond, being then only General of the Horſe there, enter'd upon a Treaty with Commiſſioners authoris'd by the Council at Kilkenny, to whoſe Juriſdiction the Rebels had committed the whole Government of their Affairs: And Articles of Ceſſation being prepar'd for a Year, and approv'd by the Lords Juſtices and Council, without whoſe Advice the Marqueſs wou'd not proceed; and all the principal Officers being preſent at the Treaty, having given it under their Hands, 'That it was moſt neceſſary for the Preſervation of that Kingdom, that a Ceſſation ſhou'd be made for a Year, upon thoſe Articles and Conditions;' and laſtly, the Rebels undertaking 'To pay to his Majeſty's Uſe thirty thouſand Pound Sterling within a ſhort Time, whereof one Moiety was to be in ready Mony, and the reſt half in Mony and half in good Beefs,' a Ceſſation of Arms was concluded by the Marqueſs; and publiſh'd with the Articles and Conditions, by the Lords Juſtices and Council of Ireland, to begin on the fifteenth Day of September, and to continue for the Space of one whole Year.

He agrees to a Ceſſation of Arms.

This Ceſſation was no ſooner known in England, but the two Houſes took the Advantage, and declar'd againſt it with all poſſible Severity, and Reflection upon his Majeſty's Honour, perſuading the People, 'That the Rebels were now brought to their laſt Gaſp, and reduc'd to ſuch a diſmal Famine, that like Canibals they eat one another, and muſt have been immediately deſtroy'd and rooted out, if the King had not been perſuaded by the Popiſh Counſels at Court to conſent to this Ceſſation.' And when ſome of the King's Officers and Soldiers came over from Ireland, new Invectives were made, and Paſquils to this Effect, 'That the Queen's Army of French and Walloon Papiſts, and the King's Army of Engliſh Papiſts, together with the Iriſh Rebels, were to ſettle the Proteſtant Religion, and the Liberties of England.' It is incredible what a ſtrange Impreſſion this Ceſſation made upon the Minds of many well-meaning People, and what Numbers of Stories were rais'd upon it; which can be attributed to nothing ſo much as the general Diſtemper of the Times, which converted all Actions into Deſigns upon the Proteſtant Religion, and whatever was done by Papiſts, to the Queen's Zeal for her own Religion. As to the King's Part in this Rebellion, which has been ſo often charg'd upon him, notwithſtanding the poor Story of the Marqueſs of Antrim, we find that all Authentick Writers have declar'd him blameleſs, and enough has been formerly ſaid to clear him of it. Therefore wholly to diſmiſs this Subject, we ſhall only take Notice of the Teſtimony of the Lord Clarendon, who moſt ſolemnly declares, That the King always look'd upon it, as the moſt groundleſs, bloody and wicked Rebellion, that ever poſſeſs'd the Spirits of that People; and was not more griev'd at any one Circumſtance of the Domeſtick Diſtractions, than as it hinder'd him from chaſtiſing, and taking Vengeance upon the Other, which from his Soul he deſir'd.

The two Houſes declare furiouſly againſt it.

2. But to proceed in the military Tranſactions; the King, notwithſtanding his great Diſappointment at Gloceſter, before he parted, heard the pleaſing News of Sir John Digby's routing a conſiderable Party of Parliamentarians near Torrington, and his taking of Barnſtable and Bediford in Devonſhire, and likewiſe the Surrender of the rich City of Exeter to the Arms of Prince Maurice. He himſelf for ſome Time lay at Sudley Caſtle, within eight Miles of Gloceſter, waiting for the Return of Eſſex's Army; and to open a Way for their Retreat, he remov'd to Eveſham, expecting the Earl wou'd go back the ſame Way he came; and thereupon the Earl march'd to Tewkeſbury, as if he had no other Deſign. The King's Horſe, tho' vigorous in Action, were commonly impatient under Duty and ill Accommodation, and now were ſo indiſpos'd with Wearineſs, that they became leſs vigilant as to the Motions of the Enemy: So that Eſſex was march'd from Tewkesbury with his whole Army twenty four Hours before the King heard which way he had taken; and having the Advantage of a dark Night and ſure Guides, reach'd Cirenceſter before Day-Break, where he totally ſurpris'd two Regiments of the King's Horſe, to the Number of above three hundred; and what was much more ſerviceable to his Men, was the ſeizing a great Quantity of Proviſions, prepar'd by the King's Commiſſaries for the Army before Gloceſter, which prov'd a mighty Relief to them, who were now more apprehenſive of Hunger than the Sword. From hence the Earl, having no further Fear of the King's Horſe, which he had no Deſire to encounter in the open Field, and being at leaſt twenty Miles before him, by eaſie Marches mov'd through that deep and encloſed Country of North-Wiltſhire, his direct Way to London.

As ſoon as the King had certain Intelligence which Way the Enemy was gone, he endeavour'd by Speed and Induſtry to recover the Advantage, which had been loſt by the ſupine Negligence of thoſe he had truſted; and himſelf with great Diligence leading on the Foot, Prince Rupert with near five thouſand Horſe march'd Day and Night over the Hills to get between London and the Enemy, before they cou'd free themſelves from thoſe deep enclos'd Countries, and narrow Lanes, and to divert them with Skirmiſhes, till the whole Army ſhou'd come up. This Deſign, purſu'd and perform'd with indefatigable Pains, ſucceeded to his Wiſh; for when the Van of the Enemy's Army had almoſt march'd over Awborne Chaſe, deſigning that Night to have reach'd Newbury, Prince Rupert unexpectedly appear'd with a ſtrong Body of Horſe ſo near them, that before they cou'd put themſelves in order to receive him, he charg'd their Rear, and routed them with conſiderable Execution; and tho' the Enemy perform'd the Parts of brave Men, and more dexterouſly reliev'd each other, than cou'd have been expected, from ſuch a ſurpriſing Action, yet with ſome Difficulty, and the Loſs of many Men, the Night coming on, they were glad to ſhorten their Journey, and took up their Quarters at Hungerford. In this Conflict, which was very ſharp for an Hour or two, there fell many of the Enemy; but of the King's Party none of Name, but the Marqueſs of Vieu Ville, a gallant Gentleman of the French Nation, who had attended the Queen out of Holland, and is ſaid to have been kill'd in cold Blood, after he was taken Priſoner. There were many Officers wounded, and among thoſe the Lord Jermin, and the Lord Digby; which laſt met with an Eſcape agreeable to the Romantick Courſe of his Life, his Face being much hurt by Powder at the Mouth of a Piſtol, when the Bullet was neither felt nor found.

Prince Rupert overtakes and charges his Rear.

By means of this Expedition, the Enemy was oblig'd to ſuch Delay, that the King came up with his Foot and Train, tho' his Numbers, by his exceeding long Marches and other Accidents, were leſſen'd above two thouſand, ſince the raiſing the Siege of Gloceſter. The King was ſo very expeditious, that when the Earl of Eſſex had advanc'd from Hungerford, hoping to recover Newbury, and came within two Miles of the Town, he found his Majeſty intirely poſſeſs'd of it, a few Hours before; which drove him to a Neceſſity of ſtaying in the Field all Night. It was thought by many that the King had now recover'd whatever had been loſt by former Overſights or Neglects, and that by deſtroying the Army which had reliev'd Gloceſter, he ſhou'd be fully recompenc'd for the Diſappointment before that Place. He ſeem'd poſſeſs'd of all the Advantages to be deſir'd, a good Town for the Refreſhment of his Men, his own Quarters ſecure, his Garriſon at Wallingford at hand, and Oxford near enough for any conſiderable Supply; while the Enemy lodg'd in the Field, equally tir'd with long Marches, and from the Time the Prince had attack'd them the Day before, had ſtood on their Arms in a Country where they wanted Victuals. So that it was concluded to be in the King's Power to fight or not, and conſequently to compel them to great Diſadvantages, who muſt force their Way through, or ſtarve; and this was ſo well known, that it was reſolv'd over Night, not to engage in Battel, but upon the moſt aſſur'd Grounds of Victory. But contrary to this ſound Reſolution, when the Earl of Eſſex had with excellent Conduct drawn out his Army in Battalia upon a Hill call Bigg's-Hill, within leſs than a Mile from the Town, and every where plac'd his Men to the beſt Advantage, by the precipitate Courage of ſome young Officers, who unhappily undervalu'd that of the Enemy, ſtrong Parties became ſucceſſively ſo far engag'd, that the King was compell'd, contrary to his Deſigns, to put the whole to the Hazard of a Battel.

The King's Army gets before him.

BATTEL II. at Newbury.

This was the famous Battel of Newbury, fought on the 20th Day of September, begun at Six a Clock in the Morning, and diſputed many Hours with infinite Fierceneſs and Courage, on all Parts The Earl of Eſſex's Party preſerv'd excellent good Order, and ſtood rather to maintain the Ground they were upon, than to gain more; by which they did not expoſe Themſelves to thoſe Diſadvantages, which any Motion wou'd have offer'd to the Aſſailants. The King's Horſe, with a kind of Contempt of the Enemy, charg'd with intrepid Fury, upon all Grounds of Inequality; and were ſo far ſuperior to the Enemy's Troops, that they routed them in moſt Places, till they had left the greateſt Part of their Foot without any Guard of Horſe. But then the Parliament Foot behav'd themſelves to Admiration, and gave their ſcatter'd Horſe Time to rally, and were ready to aſſiſt and ſecure them upon any Difficulty. The London Train'd-Bands and Auxiliary Regiments, whoſe Experience and Courage had been too much deſpis'd, perform'd Wonders; and were in reality the Preſervation of the Army this Day. For they ſtood as a Bulwark and Rampire to defend the reſt; and when their Wings of Horſe were broken and diſpers'd, ſo ſteadily kept their Ground, that tho' Prince Rupert Himſelf led up the choice Horſe to charge them, and endur'd their Storm of ſmall Shot, he cou'd make no Impreſſion upon their Stand of Pikes, but was forc'd to wheel about. The Battel was fought all the Day without any ſuch remarkable Turn, as to make either Party think they had much the Advantage: For tho' the King's Horſe often forc'd the Enemy's to give Ground, yet the Foot was ſo immoveable, that little was gain'd by the other; and then the Beginning of the Battel was ſo ſudden, and with ſo little Order, that all the Day no Uſe was made of the King's Cannon, tho' that of the Enemy was ſo exactly plac'd, that it did very great Execution upon the King's Party, both Horſe and Foot. The King and the Queen, from a Hill, were both Spectators of this ſharp and tragical Sight, which cou'd not be concluded but by the Shades and Darkneſs of the Night. The Enemy had ſucceeded as well as they hop'd for, therefore early in the Morning they prepar'd themſelves for marching, being under a Neceſſity to gain ſome Place where they might eat and ſleep. And the Earl of Eſſex finding a Paſſage open, purſu'd his main Deſign of returning to London, and took the Way to Reading; which Prince Rupert obſerving, ſuffer'd him to paſs without Impediment, till his whole Army was enter'd into the narrow Lanes; and then with a ſtrong Party of Horſe, and a thouſand Muſqueteers, ſo effectually preſs'd upon their Rear, that he put them into great Diſorder, and kill'd and took a great many Priſoners. However the Earl with the Groſs of his Army, and Cannon, got ſafe into Reading, which he ſoon abandon'd to the King's Forces; and it was immediately poſſeſs'd by Sir Jacob Aſhley, who again made it a Garriſon for the King.

Such was the memorable Battel of Newbury, which was far more obſtinate than that of Edge-Hill, and which, by reaſon of the ſharp Actions before and after, is ſaid to have laſted three Days. Writers do not agree as to the Number of the Slain, and both Sides laid claim to the Victory. As to the Earl of Eſſex, the whole Action, from his leaving London to his Return, was perform'd with incomparable Conduct and Courage, and the Succeſs very much owing to his own Perſonal Valour; having with great Difficulties reliev'd the Place he undertook, and paſs'd through greater to London, with leſs Loſs than cou'd be expected. On the other Side, the King was not without Signs of Victory: He had follow'd, and compell'd the Enemy to Battel, had the Spoil of the Field, purſu'd them next Day with conſiderable Execution, and laſtly recover'd the Garriſon of Reading, which much enlarg'd his Quarters.

The Deaths and Characters, of the Earl of Sunderland,

But all theſe Advantages were exceedingly darkned by the Loſs of ſeveral great Men and Officers on his Side; while thoſe on the other, in Compariſon, were Perſons of Obſcurity. Here fell Henry Spencer, Earl of Sunderland, a modeſt and couragious young Lord, not above twenty three Years of Age; who having no Command in the Army, attended upon the King's Perſon, under the Obligation of Honour; and putting himſelf a Voluntier into the King's Troop, was in the Beginning taken off by a Cannon Bullet. There alſo fell Robert Dormer Earl of Carnarvon, a Perſon with whoſe great Parts and Virtue the World was not ſufficiently acquainted. His Mind was adorn'd with all the Advantages of Education and Travels, but a little corrupted with the Pleaſures and Extravagancies that are too incident to great Fortunes. King Charles the Second us'd to ſay, He was the fineſt Gentleman he ever ſaw. But when the War began, having the Command of a Regiment of Horſe, he baniſh'd all Licentiouſneſs with Severity, gave glorious Marks of Reformation, and yielded himſelf wholly to the Duty of his Place; no Man more diligently obeying, or more dexterouſly commanding; for he was not only of a very keen Courage in expoſing his Perſon, but an excellent Diſcerner and Purſuer of Advantage upon his Enemy; having a mighty Preſence of Mind in any time of Danger. He was a great Lover of Juſtice, and a ſtrict Obſerver of his Word, which he ſignally ſhew'd, when it was moſt in his Power to break it: He was in all Reſpects an excellent Soldier, and an Ornament to that Profeſſion, and by his Death the King felt a ſenſible Weakneſs in his Army.

And the Lord Falkland.

But the greateſt Loſs of all, was the incomparable Lucius Cary, Lord Viſcount Falkland, whoſe Memory the Lord Clarendon celebrates, both with the Majeſty of an Hiſtorian, and the Tenderneſs of a Friend, when he ſays, ‘He was a Perſon of ſuch prodigious Parts of Learning and Knowledge, and of that inimitable Sweetneſs and Delight in Converſation, of ſo flowing and obliging a Humanity and Goodneſs to Mankind, and of that primitive Simplicity and Integrity of Life, that if there were no other Brand upon this odious and accurſed Civil War, than that ſingle Loſs, it muſt be moſt infamous and execrable to all Poſterity.’ Several others agree in a great meaſure as to this extraordinary Character; One calls him ‘The greateſt Ornament to our Nation that the laſt Age produc'd;’ another calls him ‘The Envy of this Age, and will be the Wonder of the next;’ and a Third ſays, ‘That by his Death, Learning had the greateſt Loſs, that ever hapned in that or the Age before.’ We have already given the Subſtance of his Character in another Place; but ſhall further obſerve, that as his Integrity was as bright as ever appear'd in Mortal, and his Reverence to Parliaments and the eſtabliſh'd Laws as profound as ever was ſeen in any Subject, ſo in the Beginning of the Parliament no Man more heartily joyn'd with the Leaders, while he found their Complaints were reaſonable, and while he believ'd their Intentions were honeſt; but having a Judgment too ſagacious to be long impos'd upon, after that, no Man more abhorr'd their Proceedings: And after the War broke out, when any Overtures of an Accommodation were made, after a deep Silence, he wou'd with frequent Sighs and melancholy Accents, ingeminate the Word Peace, Peace! and wou'd paſſionately profeſs, That the very Agony of the War, and the View of the Calamities of the Kingdom, robb'd him of his Sleep, and wou'd ſhortly break his Heart. Yet no Man was more bold in Battel, for which he wou'd ſay, That it concern'd him to be more active in hazardous Enterpriſes, than other Men; that all might ſee, that his Impatiency for Peace, proceeded not from any Fear of venturing his own Perſon. In the Morning before the Battel, Whitelock tells us, that he call'd for a clean Shirt, and being ask'd the Reaſon of it, anſwer'd, That if he was ſlain in the Battel, they ſhou'd not find his Body in foul Linnen. And being diſſwaded by his Friends from going into the Fight, as having no Call, and being no Military Officer, he declar'd, He was weary of the Times, and foreſaw vaſt Miſery to his own Country, and did believe he ſhou'd be out of it before Night. And thus he met with his Death in the thirty fourth Year of his Age, to the infinite Affliction of Thouſands in the Nation; ‘having ſo well diſpatcht the true Buſineſs of Life, that the Eldeſt rarely attain to that immenſe Knowledge, and the Youngeſt enter not into the World with more Innocency.’

The Earl of Eſſex*'s Reception at* London.

3. Tho' the King had ſome conſiderable Marks of Victory, in and after the Battel, yet the Earl of Eſſex was receiv'd with all imaginable Demonſtrations of Affection and Reverence; and a publick and ſolemn Thankſgiving was appointed for his Victory, as it was declar'd by the two Houſes, tho' more properly belonging to the whole Action, than the laſt Conflict. The Day after his Arrival, he was viſited at Eſſex-Houſe by the Speaker, and the whole Houſe of Commons, who declar'd to him, ‘That they came to congratulate his mighty Succeſs, and to render the Thanks of the Kingdom to him for his incomparable Conduct and Courage; and that they had caus'd their Acknowledgment to be enter'd in their Journals as a Monument and Record of his Valour and their Gratitude.’ The Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen waited upon him in their Formalities, and highly complimented him, ‘As their Protector and Defender of their Lives and Fortune, and of their Wives and Children.’ Next, the Commons render'd ſolemn Thanks to thoſe Members of both Houſes who had Command in the Army, with ſome Extraordinary Signification of Reſpect to the Superior Officers throughout the Army. A florid Letter of Kindneſs and Eſteem was ſent to Maſſy the Governor of Gloceſter, and what made the Letter more valuable, a thouſand Pounds was ſent to him as a Gratuity for his Service, beſides what was due for his Pay, and ſome Largeſs to all the inferior Officers, and a free Gift of a Month's Pay, beſides their Arrears, to the Soldiers of the Garriſon. And becauſe Sir William Waller had deſignedly neglected to aſſiſt the Earl of Eſſex, in his Return, and in the late Battel, that the King might receive no Advantage from the Jealouſy of thoſe two Commanders, great Care was taken to make, and greater to publiſh, a Reconciliation between them; in which ‘Sir William was all Submiſſion and Humility, and his Excellency full of Grace and Courteſy.’

Maſſy and others rewarded.

1643. Car. 19.

The Heat and Paſſion which Variety of Opinions had produc'd between any Members was totally laid aſide and forgotten, and no Artifice omitted to make the World believe, that they were a People newly incorporated, and as firmly united to the ſame End, as their Brethren the Scots, of whoſe timely Aſſiſtance they were now very confident: So that the Spirit of the Parliament was viſibly exalted, and their Impatience for Peace intirely abated.

Diſcontents and Cenſures at Oxford.

On the other Side, upon the King's Return to Oxford, ſoon after the laſt Battel, there appear'd nothing but Dejectedneſs, Diſcontent, and ſecret Mutiny in the Army, Anger and Jealouſy among the Officers, every one accuſing another of Want of Courage and Conduct in the Actions in the Field; and they who were not of the Army, blaming them all for their ſeveral Failings and groſs Overſights. The Siege of Gloceſter was not believ'd to have been well manag'd, and that it might have been reduc'd in half the Time they were before it, had it been ſkilfully undertaken. The not Engaging the Earl of Eſſex in his March over ſo open a Country, was thought inexcuſable, and was imputed to the Want of Courage in the Lord Wilmot, who was in no Degree favour'd by Prince Rupert: Nor was that Prince himſelf without ſome Reflection and Reproaches for ſuffering the Earl of Eſſex, after all the Horſe was joyn'd, to march down a long ſteep Hill into the Vale of Gloceſter, without any Moleſtation; and that the whole Army, after the Siege was broken up, had not been brought to fight in that Vale, at ſome Diſtance from the Town, when the King's Men were freſh, and the Enemy tired out with ſo long a March. But then all renew'd their Execrations againſt thoſe who adviſ'd the Siege of Gloceſter; even the Officers, who had been preſent, and conſented to all the Counſels, diſclaiming as much as any the whole Deſign; and all conſpir'd to lay the whole Reproach upon Sir John Colepeper, the Maſter of the Rolls, a Man of unqueſtionable Fidelity, who ſpoke moſt in thoſe Debates, and was not at all gracious to the Soldiers: And the Clamour againſt that Enterpriſe was ſo popular and univerſal, that no Man undertook to ſpeak in Defence of it; tho' many powerful Reaſons had been formerly given for it.

At the ſame Time, the Temper of the Court was no better than that of the Army; and the King was ſo much diſturb'd with both, that he did not enjoy the Quiet that was neceſſary for his Condition. He was frequently vex'd with the Importunities of Perſons ſuing for Honours and Offices; but no one Particular gave him more Trouble than the Pretence and Expectations of the Earl of Holland. He with the two forementioned Earls of Bedford and Clare, who had attended the King before he roſe from Gloceſter, and had behav'd themſelves bravely in the laſt Battel, being return'd to Oxford with his Majeſty, now expected to be kindly receiv'd. Clare and Bedford had no Reaſon to complain, ſince the King upon all Occaſions ſpoke very graciouſly to them; but Holland was by no Means pleas'd, who thought none of his former Miſcarriages ought to be remember'd, and that all were cancell'd by the Merit of his Return, and bringing ſuch conſiderable Perſons with him; and expected to have his Key immediately reſtor'd to him, and to be in the ſame Condition in the Bed-Chamber, the Council, and the King's Favour as formerly; of all which he had particular Aſſurance from the Queen, who now really deſir'd to oblige him, according to his own Deſire. But the King, tho' he frequently ſpoke with him, was always upon his Guard towards him, and knew not how to abate any thing of his former Rigour or Prejudice; eſpecially when he had waited, and found that the Earl cou'd not conquer himſelf ſo far as to ask Pardon, or to acknowledge his Crimes. This he delay'd ſo long, that the King thought fit to diſpoſe of the Key to the Marqueſs of Hertford; upon which the Earl withdrew himſelf to a neighbouring Village, where he had a private Lodging, and with the Help of a dark Night, and a good Guide, he got himſelf into the Enemies Quarters, and laid himſelf at the Feet of the Parliament; which, after a ſhort Impriſonment, gave him leave to live in his own Houſe, without farther conſidering him, than as a Man able to do little Good or Harm. And yet he endeavour'd to make himſelf grateful to them by an Act unſuitable to his Honour, or his generous Nature: For he publiſh'd a Declaration, in which he intimated, ‘That his Compaſſion and Love to his Country had only prevail'd with him to go to the King, in Hopes to have been able to perſuade him to make a Peace with his Parliament; but that he found the Court ſo indiſpos'd to make Peace with the Parliament, and that the Papiſts had ſo great a Power there, as to procure a Ceſſation for the Iriſh Rebels; ſo that he reſolv'd, tho' with the Hazard of his Life, to return to the Parliament, and ſpend the remainder of his Life in their Service.’ This more ſunk his Reputation, and did him no Kindneſs with the Party, who had the Benefit of his Return; for his Eſtate having been ſeiz'd by them, it was a long Time before he cou'd get the Sequeſtration taken off, and with all the Interceſſion of powerful Friends, he never cou'd prevail to be re-admitted to his Place in their Council.

But how inconſtant or irregular ſoever the Carriage of the Earl was, it did not acquit the Court from an Overſight in treating him no better; which was a great Error, that occaſion'd the King, and all thoſe about him, to be look'd upon as Implacable; and ſo diſcourag'd others from returning to his Majeſty by ſuch Application, and likewiſe made thoſe who abhorr'd the War, rather to acquieſce, and wait for a Conjuncture when a general Peace might be made, than expoſe themſelves by unſeaſonable Addreſſes. The Earl of Northumberland, who had retir'd to Petworth with a Deſign of going to the King, if incourag'd by the Lord Conway's Negotiation, and the Earl of Holland's Reception, return'd to the Parliament, where he was receiv'd with great Reſpect, all Men concluding he had never intended to do what he had not done. The other Members who had entertain'd the ſame Reſolutions, chang'd their Minds with him, and return'd to their former Stations, and the two Earls of Bedford and Clare, who yet remain'd at Oxford, ſhortly after found means to make their Peace at Weſtminſter; and return'd again to their own Habitations in London, without further Mark of Diſpleaſure, than a temporary Reſtraint from coming to the Houſe of Peers, or being truſted in their Counſels. Of the three Earls it was jocoſely ſaid, That they had confirm'd others to continue with the Parliament; ſince having try'd both Parties, they found by Experience where was the beſt Treatment.

And likewiſe the Earl of Bedford and Clare.

The Tranſactions of the Parliament Committee in Scotland.

XI. I. Notwithſtanding the King's great Diſappointment, and Loſs of his beſt Time, by means of the Siege of Glouceſter, yet, having made a great Progreſs with his Arms, he had ſtill much the Advantage, as to a general Courſe of Succeſs; and might probably have continu'd that Advantage to the Ruin of the Leaders at Weſtminſter, had not they timely procur'd the Aſſiſtance of their Brethren the Scots, whoſe ſolemn Promiſes and Fidelity had been too much rely'd on by his Majeſty. It was in the Month of Auguſt that their Commiſſioners and Preachers formerly mention'd, arriv'd at Edinburgh, to beg all ſpeedy Aſſiſtance for the Relief of their declining Cauſe in England. They preſented to the General-Aſſembly a Letter from the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter, together with a Declaration from the two Houſes of Parliament, both to the ſame Effect, namely, 'That they deſign'd to extirpate Epiſcopacy Root and Branch, and to introduce that which 'they ſhou'd find moſt agreeable to the Word of God.' The great Mr. Henderſon was their Moderator, who having receiv'd ſeveral Kindneſſes from the King in 1641, had for a long Time declin'd inſiſting upon a Reformation in England; but now being warm'd by others into a greater Zeal, he reſolv'd to go their Way, and readily propos'd the Matter to the Conſideration of the Members, and his Aſſeſſors, which, beſides ſeveral leading Miniſters, conſiſted of many of the Nobility, under the Name of Ruling Elders. In the Debate, Mr. Henry Guthry, a Miniſter of great Note, ſtood up and ſaid, He obſerv'd that the Aſſembly of Divines, and the Engliſh Parliament were both clear and particular as to the privative Part, the Extirpation of Epiſcopacy Root and Branch; but as to the poſitive Part, what they deſign'd to bring in, they cover'd over with many ambiguous general Terms: So that it cou'd not be known whether it wou'd be Presbytery, or Independency, or any Thing elſe. Therefore at preſent, he ſaw not how this Church, which holdeth Presbyterian Government to be Jure Divino, cou'd joyn with them; but it was firſt neceſſary that the Parliament and Divines at Weſtminſter ſhou'd explain themſelves, and be as expreſs in what they reſolv'd to introduce, as they had been in what they deſign'd to remove. Which reaſonable Speech, tho' approv'd of by many, was ſeconded by none; but the Majority, or rather the whole Body of the Aſſembly, chearfully inclin'd to the Engliſh Commiſſioners; and ſome ran ſo far back as to remember, 'how Queen Elizabeth help'd the Lords of the Congregation in the Scotch Reformation, in Oppoſition to the 'Queen Regent; and therefore it was but Juſtice that 'they ſhou'd now repay them with the like Aſſiſt'ance.

The Kirk Aſſembly joyn with them.

Notwithſtanding this Forwardneſs, the Nation of Scotland in general ſeem'd ſo fully ſatisfy'd with all they cou'd deſire, that they were well diſpos'd to be Spectators of the Engliſh Affairs, without engaging themſelves in the Quarrel; nor had they any ſuch Face of Authority to invite them to it, till by the Advice of Sir Thomas Hope and others, a Way was found to call a Convention of the Eſtates, as was formerly mention'd, which they judg'd as effectual as a Parliament. Yet ſome are of Opinion, that even after this Advantage, when the Convention acted altogether as a Parliament, they did not deſign to engage in the War againſt the King; but juſt as a few Men cozen'd the Parliament at Weſtminſter, by perſuading them, 'That 'they only deſir'd a ſafe Peace, till by Multiplication of 'Indignities they made it impoſſible to get a Peace that 'wou'd appear Safe;' ſo there were as ſmall a Number in Scotland that over-reach'd the Convention there, by perſuading them, 'That they never deſign'd any Thing againſt 'the King, but it wou'd be a Thing too ungrateful, and 'render them very odious to the Engliſh Nation, if after 'ſo many Obligations receiv'd from the Parliament there, 'to whom they ow'd their Religion and their All, they 'ſhou'd refuſe ſo much as to treat with them, and by their 'Interpoſition endeavour to procure a good Peace for 'them with the King; which wou'd be a great Honour to 'Them, and as great an Obligation to his Majeſty, as to 'the Parliament.' This is all, as it is believ'd, that was in their Thoughts; and that they wou'd avoid any Engagement in a War, not by rejecting the Propoſition, but by making ſuch Demands as they well knew, or ſtrongly believ'd, wou'd never be accepted by the Parliament at Weſtminſter. Thereupon they let the Engliſh Commiſſioners underſtand, 'That it wou'd be impoſſible to en'gage their Nation in a joynt Concurrence with them a'gainſt the King, but by the Influence and Authority of 'their Kirk; and that it wou'd be as impoſſible to procure 'their Conſent, without making it evident to them, 'That the Government of the Church in England ſhou'd 'be reduc'd to the very ſame Model with theirs in Scotland, and that Epiſcopacy ſhou'd be totally extirpated, 'and Deans and Chapters utterly aboliſh'd; without which 'they cou'd never think their own Government ſecurely 'eſtabliſh'd. All which muſt be done by an Obligation of 'Conſcience laid upon the People, who only preferr'd 'their Piety to God, before their Inclination to their 'Prince, and the Setting up the Kingdom of Jeſus Chriſt, 'before the Vindication of a Temporal Juriſdiction.' For ſuch an Expedient therefore, they propos'd, 'That a Covenant might be agreed upon between the two Kingdoms, 'for the utter Extirpation of Prelacy, Root and Branch, '&c. which wou'd throughly engage the Kirk and the 'Nation to a Man; and the People being cemented toge'ther by ſuch a ſtrong Obligation, wou'd never be ſever'd 'and disjoyn'd by any Temptation whatſoever.

The Scots propoſe a Covenant between the two Kingdoms.
